The instructions of the court do not properly present the law of the case. In lieu of instruction 1, the court will tell the jury that if the defendant negligently failed to transport plaintiff from Harrodsburg to Burgin in a reasonable time, or negligently failed to keep its caboose in a reasonably comfortable condition under the circumstances, or negligently failed to deliver plaintiff at the regular place for the landing of passengers at Burgin, and as the proximate result of these things or any of them, the plaintiff suffered pain or was made sick, they should find for him a fair compensation for the time lost, for any physical or mental suffering he endured, and for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money, if such there was. In lieu of the second instruction, the court will tell the jury that the plaintiff can not recover for any suffering or sickness which he might have prevented, by the exercise of ordinary care, on his own part, or for anything which the carrier, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not reasonably have guarded against, and if when there was no negligence delaying the train, the plaintiff voluntarily left the train and walked to Burgin station, the defendant is not responsible for any sickness brought upon him by the walk. By another instruction, the court will tell the jury that if the delay in reaching Burgin was due to a wreck on the road and could not have been avoided by ordinary care, and ordinary care was used to keep the caboose reasonably comfortable, they should find for the defendant.

It is not material who owned the track upon which the defendant ran its cars into Burgin station. It was incumbent upon the defendant to carry its passengers to Burgin and no order given by the Cincinnati Railroad Company can excuse it from its obligation. But the facts may be shown, and if by reason of the wreck the train could not, by ordinary care, have been run into Burgin any sooner than it was, the defendant is not liable; and if, rather than wait for the train to get down to the station, the plaintiff walked to it, when there was no negligence on the part of the railroad company causing the delay, the defendant would not be responsible for any sickness brought upon him by reason of the walk. The fact that Miller was infirm or in a condition which aggravated the injury will not excuse the defendant from liability. The rule is thus stated in 3 Hutchinson on Carriers, sec. 1432:

"If the passenger, at the time an injury is received, through the negligence of the carrier, is suffering from some disease or illness which tends to aggravate the injury, the passenger's previous infirmity will not excuse the carrier from answering in damages to the full extent of the injury as affected by such infirmity; and the fact that the carrier was not informed of the passenger's condition will make no difference. Where a female passenger fell and was injured through the carrier's negligence while alighting from a passenger car, it was held that the fact that she wore an artificial limb, which greatly aggravated the injury, would not relieve the carrier from making full compensation for the real injury suffered. So, where a female passenger, who was pregnant was injured in a collision of cars, it was held that the carrier was liable for the injury, notwithstanding the fact that, had she not been pregnant, she would not have been injured." (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Dougherty, 108 S. W., 336.)

LOGAN, &c. v. VANARSDALL, &c.

(Filed May 19, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Inquests—Subsequent Inquest—Finding Party Insane—Proceedings—Conveyances—This action seeks to recover certain land conveyed by T. on the ground that he was of unsound mind when he conveyed it. The transaction complained of occurred thirty years ago and there is a failure of proof that, during all this time, either T. or his children complained or asked a rescission.

2. Same—The inquest complained of occurred more than thirty years ago and except a clerical error by the county judge in failing to turn the papers over to the circuit court, appears to have been regular. Nor did the failure of the party making the affidavit to sign the jurat invalidate it, the statute in that regard being merely directory.

Breckinridge & Breckinridge and Greene & VanWinkle for appellants.

J. F. Vanarsdall and J. Morgan Chinn for appellees.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

At the April term, 1876, of the Mercer Circuit Court, James P. Terhune was found to be a person of unsound mind, by the verdict of the jury, and was committed to the lunatic asylum at Lexington. After he had been in the asylum about five weeks he was discharged as improved. On his return home another inquest was held in the Mercer County Court—the circuit court not being in session. At this inquest he was found of sound mind. In January, 1878, he and his wife sold and conveyed to C. S. Vanarsdall a tract of 147 acres of land in consideration of $5,932. Vanarsdall sold the land to Thomas E. James. The widow of James conveyed it to Enoch F. Godfrey. James P. Terhune died in the year 1903. After his death this suit was brought by his children and heirs at law against Vanarsdall, Mrs. James and Enoch F. Godfrey, to recover the lands, on the ground that Terhune was of unsound mind at the time of the sale to Vanarsdall, and that he continued of unsound mind up to his death. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition. On appeal to this court the judgment was reversed, the court holding that, under the allegations of the petition, a cause of action was stated. (Logan, &c. v. Vanarsdall, &c., 27 Ky. Law Rep., 822.) On the return of the case to the circuit court the defendants filed answer. A large amount of proof was taken, and, on final hearing, the circuit court again dismissed the petition; and from this judgment the plaintiffs again appeal.

It is insisted that the proceedings in the Mercer County Court, by which Terhune was found of sound mind, in May, 1876, were void. The county court did not, by its judgment, annul the judgment of the Mercer Circuit Court. The judgment of the Mercer Circuit Court determined that Terhune was of unsound mind in April, 1876. The question presented in the county court was whether he was of unsound mind something over a month later, when he demanded an inquest in the county court. The one judgment in nowise conflicts with the other. He may have been sane at the later date and insane at the first. The inquest merely determines the condition of the mind of the person charged at the time of the inquest. By section 14, chapter 53, of the General Statutes, which was then in force, the county judge was authorized to hold the inquest. The fact that the papers were not returned to the circuit court did not invalidate the proceedings. The validity of the proceedings depended upon the action taken at the time, and not upon the failure of the county judge to perform the clerical duty afterwards of returning the papers to the circuit court. By section 15, of the General Statutes, it was provided that, "whenever it shall be suggested to the court, by affidavit, that a person found of unsound mind has been restored to his proper senses," the court shall forthwith direct the facts to be inquired into by a jury. It is insisted that no affidavit was filed for the inquest in the county court. One of the sons of James P. Terhune, who came with him to the inquest, made oath to the necessary facts, and this statement, in writing, which was sworn to by him and is certified by the county judge, is in the record. By some oversight, the affiant failed to sign it above the jurat. But the statute is merely directory. When the facts were shown to the court by a witness under oath, the statute was substantially complied with, and the mere informality of the affidavit did not affect the validity of the proceedings.

As to the facts in regard to the condition of Terhune's mind after his return from the asylum, the proof is conflicting; but we can not say that the weight of the evidence does not sustain the conclusion of the chancellor. Vanarsdall was advised by his attorney that, as Terhune had been found of unsound mind by the verdict of a jury, it would be safer to have a writing from his children before accepting the deed and paying the money. The writing was prepared by the attorney and was signed by all the children of Terhune. They were well acquainted with their father and his condition, and in this writing they guaranteed that he was of sound mind. He had three grown sons. One of the sons is shown to have been a man of unusual business capacity, and to have advocated the trade. The consideration was fairly adequate for the land at that time. The trade was canvassed for some time before it was consummated. The whole family of Terhune knew all about it. None of them at that time made any objection, but, on the contrary, acquiesced in it. Not only so, but, a year before, Terhune had sold and conveyed another tract of land. His children and friends had acquiesced in this sale, making no suggestion that he was incompetent to transact his business. After the sale to Vanarsdall, he sold and conveyed three or four other tracts of land, no complaint having ever been made of any of these transactions. While there is much evidence in the record that his mind was never right after he came back from the asylum, we are by no means satisfied from it that he was continuously of unsound mind. He was regarded by his neighbors as restored, and of the witnesses who are in nowise interested in the matter, personally, the weight numerically is perhaps with the appellees. But, however this may be, the transaction occurred something like thirty years ago. There is proof in the record that these children desired some action taken by their father during his life-time, when Vanarsdall wanted the lien on the land released, and Terhune said he had not released the lien and would not release it, and the matter might be settled after his death. The statements testified to as made by him, show that he understood very well what he had done, and there is an utter failure to show that, in all these thirty years, neither he nor his children ever complained to Vanarsdall or asked a rescission of the contract. When a transaction is so old and has stood without complaint so long, the presumption in its favor is strong and it will not be set aside except upon clear evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

BUTLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Evidence—Statement of Wife—Appellant shot and killed deceased as a result of a whipping deceased gave his daughter, who was appellant's wife. If it was admissible for appellant to testify to all the circumstances, as detailed him by his wife of the beating deceased gave her, its exclusion was not prejudicial to appellant, who, instead of waiting for the law to take its course, went home and, preparing for a conflict, sought deceased and killed him.

John B. Grider and Nat A. Porter for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellant, Frank Butler, was indicted for the offense of murder. The jury found him guilty of voluntary manslaughter and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for twenty-one years. From an order overruling his motion and grounds for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

On the night before the homicide, Joe James met his daughter, the wife of appellant, and severely beat and bruised her because she apprehended the deceased (Joseph James) in company with a lewd character who lived in the vicinity, and had communicated this fact to her mother, the wife of Joe James. Appellant's wife narrated to appellant the circumstances under which her father beat her, and appellant and she then went to police headquarters and secured a warrant for the arrest of deceased. There, in the presence of the police officers, appellant's wife again detailed the circumstances of the beating. On the day that Joe James was killed, he and his two sons, in company with other men, were engaged in repairing the interior of a negro Methodist church, on Kentucky street, in Bowling Green. On his way to dinner, just previous to the killing, appellant met the accused in the street. According to some of the witnesses, they did not speak or say anything to each other. Appellant contends, however, that deceased laughed at and mocked him, and asked him if he didn't like it, &c. At that time appellant asked one of the James boys, who was with his father, if the old man had been arrested yet, and the boy told him he had not. Appellant then proceeded on his way to dinner. After dinner he put his revolver in the bib of his overalls and then went to the church where he knew deceased was at work. Deceased was on the floor counting out a pile of shingles. James Grainger was at work on one of the windows near by, and the two James boys (sons of the deceased) and another boy were at work in different parts of the church, fixing the ceiling, moving scaffolding, &c. Appellant entered the church, and, after looking around and speaking a word or two to one or more of the persons present, walked over to where the deceased was at work on the floor, and asked him what about the trouble that he and Bertha had had the night before. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not deceased made any reply. Appellant immediately drew his revolver and shot the deceased three times. As they grappled with each other and scuffled out into the vestibule and out the door of the church, another shot was fired. Grainger and one of the boys of the deceased reached them just about the time they got to the outside of the church, and pulled appellant off of the deceased. The latter then fell to the sidewalk and died immediately. Appellant left the scene, and, as he was departing, one of the sons of the deceased, who had gone to his father's tool-chest and secured a revolver, returned and fired three shots at appellant, who was then some distance away.

According to the testimony for the Commonwealth, the deceased made no demonstration towards appellant until after the latter had fired the first shot. According to the evidence of appellant, the deceased first grabbed his chisel and sprung at appellant before the latter attempted to do any shooting. Appellant claims that he did not go to the church with the intention of shooting deceased at all, but that he stopped there for the purpose of having an understanding with deceased as to why the latter beat appellant's wife and then laughed at him about it. While appellant was on the stand, the court permitted him to testify that his wife had told him that her father beat and bruised her, and that she exhibited her wounds to appellant, but declined to permit him to state to the jury all the circumstances of the beating as detailed to him by his wife. For this error, alone, appellant seeks a reversal.

Even assuming that such testimony was admissible, we do not think its exclusion in this case was prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant. Instead of waiting for the law to take its course, he went home and prepared for a conflict; after which he sought the deceased, and, according to the decided weight of the evidence, attacked him when he was bending over and had no weapons with which to defend himself. The court did permit appellant to testify that his wife had told him her father had beat her, and that she exhibited to him her wounds. Doubtless this testimony accounts for the fact that the jury did not impose a severer sentence on the appellant.

Upon the whole case, we are unable to say that the substantial rights of the defendant were prejudiced by the error complained of, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

ACTION BY INFANT, BY NEXT FRIEND—	Page.
1. Failure to File Affidavit—Motion to Dismiss Action—Tender of Affidavit Pending Motions—In an action by an infant, by next friend, for damages for injuries received by being run over by an automobile, under sections 35 and 37, of the Civil Code, it was not error in the trial court to refuse to dismiss the action because of the failure of the plaintiff to file with his action the affidavit required by section 37, showing his right to sue as next friend, where the plaintiff tendered such affidavit when the motion to dismiss was made. Campbell v. Dreher, By Next Friend	444
2. Motion for Continuance—Absent Witness—Diligence Used Cumulative Evidence—It was not error in the trial court to refuse a motion for continuance of a case, where it was not shown that any diligence was used by the party in securing the attendance of his witnesses at the trial, and where the evidence of the absent witness was merely cumulative. Idem	444
3. Evidence—Extent of Injury—Excessive Verdict—In an action by a sixteen-year-old boy for damages for being negligently run over by an automobile, where the evidence was conflicting on the question of negligence and the extent of the injury, a verdict for $500 in damages can not be held to be excessive, under the evidence. Idem	444
4. Automobiles—Prejudice Against—Consideration—The fact that there may be a prejudice against automobiles will not be considered in a case where a sixteen-year-old boy, riding on a bicycle, was run over and seriously injured by an automobile, where it is shown by the proof that the owner of the automobile, after the accident, immediately ran away with his automobile, without offering any aid to the boy, or to learn the extent of his injury. Idem	444
AFFIDAVIT FOR JUDGES—See Action by Infant, 1—
1. Bias of Regular Judge—Facts Showing Bias—In an action against a party for a libel in accusing the plaintiff of forging a letter purporting to have been written by defendant, where the defendant filed an affidavit asking for a special judge to try the case, alleging that “the regular judge will not afford him a fair trial, because he had a political bias and enmity towards him, and that he had openly asserted his belief in the genuineness of the signature of the defendant to the letter in question and that said judge had been in frequent communication with the plaintiff concerning the publication of said letter in a newspaper under the control of plaintiff,” the affidavit thoroughly disqualified the regular judge from presiding at the trial. Ky. Journal Pub. Co. v. Gaines	402
2. Explanation to Judge—Admissions—Canvassing Question to be Tried—No judge should preside over a trial where the evidence requires so elaborate an explanation of his relations to the subject-matter of the litigation as that given by the trial judge in this case which shows conferences with the plaintiff concerning the letter, the genuineness of which was involved in the litigation before him, and where he had to some extent at least, canvassed its value as a political asset in a heated campaign in which he was deeply interested. Idem	402

3. Political Bias—Effect—Political bias, amounting to personal hostility, is an arch enemy to an impartial trial, and its presence undermines and weakens the foundations of the temple of justice, and it is no answer to say that the record, as a matter of fact, does not show, on the trial, any subsequently occurring error on the trial, prejudicial to the party complaining. Idem	402
APPEALS—See Second Appeal.
CARRIERS—See Railroads, 14, 16; Telephones; Cities and Towns; Municipalities, 1, 4.
CONTRACTS—
1. Construction of—Evidence—This action grows out of the sale of an interest in a patent to appellant, appellees insisting that the contract guarantees a minimum of royalties, but an examination of the contract shows that while it was contemplated that the business should yield a royalty of $200 a year, that amount was not agreed upon at all hazards. Therefore, it was error to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for appellees the balance necessary to make up that amount. Neither was the contract so ambiguous as to admit of extraneous evidence to explain it. Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Guilfoyle, &c	408
2. Not to Engage in Business—Construction of Such Contracts—Contracts in partial restraint of trade have been frequently upheld by this court; and a contract not to engage in business, for three years is a valid and enforceable contract. Skaggs v. Simpson	410
3. The delivery of the check and the execution of the writing were a part of the same transaction, and while, by the terms of the writing, S. only obligated himself not to engage in business in the city of Murray, yet from the circumstances it is manifest that it was the intention of both parties that S. should not engage in business in Murray or its vicinity, and his attempt to establish an opposition business just outside of the city limits was a violation of the spirit of the contract, and an injunction will properly lie to restrain him from so doing. Idem	410
CONVEYANCES—See Street Improvements, 1, 2.
COUNTY TREASURER—
1. Paying Out Money—Orders of Fiscal Court—Liabilities of Sureties—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 931, providing that all moneys received by the county treasurer shall be held by him subject to the order of the fiscal court of the county, where a county treasurer pays out money under the orders of the fiscal court of the county, he and his sureties are not liable therefor, though the court had no right to make such orders. Harrison, &c. v. Logan County, &c	465
2. The county treasurer is a ministerial officer or agent of the county, and may be removed at any time by the fiscal court for a failure to obey its orders, and there is no principle of law making an agent liable for its principal for money paid out in accordance to the orders of the principal though the principal may afterwards discover that the money was paid to the person not entitled to it.

Idem	465
3. Where a county treasurer pays out money in his hands on an irregular order, he should be allowed a credit therefor in his settlement with the court, if it appears that they were just claims against the county, and there is no doubt about his good faith in the payment of them. Idem	465

DEEDS—
Action to Set Aside on the Ground of Fraud—Evidence—This action to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud and undue influence can not be sustained for want of proof. The deed was made four years before the grantor's death, and was at once put to record. Appellees knew about it from the time it was made, and waited until the death of the grantor to institute the action. The facts and circumstances show that the grantor was the grandmother of appellant. She raised him from infancy and he remained with her during her old age and helpless condition, and her action in conveying him the property is what any grandmother would have done under the circumstances. Barbee v. Stokes, &c.	439
EVIDENCE—See Contracts, 1.
EXCESSIVE VERDICT—
1. Motion to Set Aside Verdict—Absence of Prejudice or Passion—Courts are always slow to disturb the finding of a jury on the ground that it is excessive, in the absence of some evidence tending to show that it was the result of prejudice or passion. Merchants Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Bargholt	488
2. Negligence—Relative Term—Depending on Circumstances—Question for Jury—Negligence is a relative term, depending upon the circumstances in each individual case. Facts which would show negligence in one case would not be construed to be such in another, hence it is peculiarly the province of the jury to determine, from the facts in each particular case, whether or not one is guilty of negligence. Idem	488
3. Peremptory Instructions—When Allowable—Absence of Doubt—The courts will not only instruct the jury to find for the defendant when the facts admitted or proven leave no room for doubt that he failed to exercise that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under like or similar circumstances for his own safety. Idem	488
4. Sidewalks—Use by Pedestrians—Presumption of Safety—Injury by Obstruction—Negligence—Question for Jury—A pedestrian on a sidewalk in a city has a right to the free use of any portion thereof which is open for public use, and he has a right to assume that it is free from obstruction and in a reasonably safe condition for travel, and if, while passing over and upon a sidewalk of a street, his attention is distracted, so that he fails to observe an obstruction placed thereon, where he has no right to expect it, and is injured by falling over it, the question as to whether or not he was proceeding with due care for his own safety is properly a question for the jury. Willful disobedience of the authority of the teachers * * * shall constitute good cause for the suspension and expulsion from school,” where a pupil in a graded common school was assigned by his teacher the task to take part in a dialogue in the commencement exercises thereof, which the pupil refused to accept, such refusal was an act of disobedience to the authority of the teacher for which he had the right to suspend the pupil from the school for the remainder of the term. *Cross, By, &c. v.  2. Report of Teacher to Trustees—Approval of Trustees—Where a teacher in a graded common school suspended a pupil for a willful disobedience of his assignment to a part in a dialogue in the commencement exercises thereof, and reported such suspension to the board of trustees, who offered to allow the pupil to return to school if he would take a different character in the dialogue from the one assigned him by the teacher, the refusal of the pupil to accept the terms offered by the trustees, rendered him not only guilty of disobedience, but also of insubordination, and their approval of the suspension of the pupil for the remainder of the term was final and conclusive, and can not be questioned by the courts. Idem 472

3. Action by Wife—Proof Required—Intentional Conduct of Defendant — Rebuttal Evidence — In an action by a wife against another woman, for alienating the affections of her husband, it is necessary for the plaintiff not only to show alienation of her husband's affections, but that such alienation was due to the intentional conduct of the defendant, and the defendant could introduce any evidence that would tend to rebut either of these facts. Idem..... 450
4. General Denial—Evidence Admissible—On the trial of an action for the alienation of a husband's affections, it was competent for the defendant to prove that the husband sought her, and made love to her, and that she endeavored to get rid of him and have him return to his wife, and that he really sought her for the purpose of getting her money, and not because of any affection for her, and his letters to, and conversations with her, as well as her financial condition, and the money she had given him by reason of his threats, and all this evidence was admissible under a general denial by the defendant. Idem 450

INDUSTRIAL MUTUAL DEPOSIT COMPANIES—

The house was built and accepted by A and the company failed and became insolvent. A had paid $138 and received $148.31, which had gone as a credit on his house. INSURANCE, FIRE—

1. Defense—Voluntary Act of Insured—Denial—Plea of Insanity—In an action to recover upon a policy of fire insurance the defense was that the property was destroyed by the voluntary act of the insured. The insured having died before the case came on for trial, his administrator, for reply, denied (1) that the fire was caused by the voluntary act of the deceased; (2) that if the fire was caused by deceased he was at the time temporarily insane and incapable of forming any wrongful or fraudulent design. Held—That the reply, while technically defective, was a good plea and a demurrer thereto was improperly sustained. Bindell, &c. v. Kenton Co. Assessment Fire Ins. Co. 385
2. Insane Person—Wrongful Purpose—Incapacity to Design—An insane person acts without design, has no will of his own, and is influenced by no motive. So an insane person, being unable to form a wrongful or fraudulent design in destroying his own property, so far as the insurer is concerned, the insurers are liable although the insured himself burns the property when insane. Idem 385

2. Injury to Servant—Prank of Fellow-Servant—Liability of Master—While two fellow-servants were at work at a machine shop, one of them, as a prank, turned compressed air on the other from a hose used therein, which entered his bowels through his rectum, causing his death, for which suit was brought against the master by the administratrix of the deceased servant. Held—That the master is responsible only for the acts of the servant in the scope of his employment. Ballard's Adm'x v. L. & N. R. R. Co. 423
3. The master in selecting his servants is not required to take into consideration the pranks they may play on their fellow-servants outside the scope of their duties, unless they use an instrument that is dangerous, and the master, with the knowledge of its deadly character, has failed to exercise such care as a man of ordinary prudence would do in keeping it so that it would not do any injury. Idem 423
4. The master must exercise ordinary care in the selection of his servants, and if he fails to exercise such care and one of the servants is injured by the incapacity of another servant, the master is liable, but such incapacity must relate to the duties required by the master of the servant. Idem 423
5. If a fellow-servant is entirely competent to discharge the duties assigned him by his master, and he should, without authority from the master, undertake to do things beyond the scope of his employment, the master would not be responsible for his negligence in these matters, on the ground that he was not a suitable person for that service. Idem 423

MORTGAGE LIEN—

1. Description of Property—Identification—Validity—A mortgage on property which was sold and used in building a water plant is void for uncertainty which does not locate the property as to State, county or town, and which contains no reference which would supply the omission. A mortgage covering so many feet of "spiral pipe" is void for uncertainty in description where there is nothing in the mortgage by which it could be identified and distinguished from other pipe of like kind. Miller Supply Co. v. Louisa Water Co.'s Ass'ee, &c...... 388
2. Water Plant—Enforced Sale—Liens on Connected Parts—Distribution of Proceeds—Where parties sold property to a water company by a contract, which was recorded, in which they retained the title to the property sold until the purchase price was paid, on the sale of the waterworks to pay its debts, under order of a court, where the property sold could not be attached without injuring the sale of the waterworks plant, the court should have ascertained the cost of each item that constituted the plant, and distributed the proceeds of the sale according to the cost of each of them on their respective claims, and if their whole claims are not then satisfied they should be permitted to present the balance as a general claim, to share with the other creditors pro rata, under section 74, Kentucky Statutes. Idem 388

MUNICIPALITIES—Page.

1. Public Common Nuisance—Omitting Legal Duty Required for Common Good—A common or public nuisance is one that affects the people at large, and is a violation of a public right, either by a direct encroachment upon public property, or by doing some act which tends to the common injury, or by omitting to do, in the discharge of a legal duty, that which the common good requires. City of Owensboro v. Hope; City of Owensboro v. Lossie 426
2. Street Improvement—Property Owners—Common Law Liability—Statutory Requirements—There is no common law liability on the part of abutting property owners to pay for street improvements. The only liability is that imposed by statute. The general rule is, that when a power is conferred upon a municipal corporation, and the manner in which it is to be exercised is prescribed, such mode must be pursued. Idem 426
3. Abatement—Jurisdiction of Courts—In addition to the ordinary remedies by indictment and abatement, a court of equity will often take jurisdiction of a public nuisance, such as the unlawful obstructing of a public highway, and restrain or enjoin acts prejudicial to the interests of the community. The jurisdiction of the court, in such cases, is founded upon the greater promptitude and efficiency of the remedy, as well as the desirability of preventing irreparable mischief and vexatious litigation. Idem 426
4. Abating Nuisance—Mandatory Injunction—Under section 3290, sub-section 7, Kentucky Statutes, relating to cities of the third class, authorizing the common council "to open, alter, abolish, widen, extend, establish, grade, pave, or otherwise improve and keep in repair, streets and sidewalks, or have the same done," the only liability created by these sections and by sections 3449 to 3452, inclusive, is the liability on the part of the abutting property owner to pay for the improvements, after they have been made, and a mandatory injunction will not lie to compel a property owner, in such city, to construct a sidewalk and abate a nuisance suffered by his failure to do so. Idem 426

OBSTRUCTION IN STREET—

1. Injury to Pedestrian—Joint Liability of City and Person Placing Obstruction—Liability as Between Wrongdoers—Although a person injured by an obstruction in a street may sue the city alone, or both the city and the person who placed the obstruction in the street, and recover damages against both and look to either for satisfaction of the judgment, yet as between the wrongdoers the city may, if it is required to satisfy the judgment, recover the amount thereof from the person who placed the obstruction in the street. Blocker v. City of Owensboro, &c..... 478
2. Judgment Against City—Negligence of Another—Assignment of Judgment—Purchase by One Jointly Liable—Enforcement of Judgment—In an action by D. against Mr. B. and the city of O. for damages for an injury in falling over some brick negligently allowed to be in the street of the city in the building of a house on a lot owned by B., the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $500 and costs. The wife of B. paid the judgment and took an assignment thereof and proceeded by mandamus to collect same from the city. It was shown by the evidence that the house was built and owned by Mrs. B. who, though not a party to the record, was the real property in interest. It also appeared that Mr. B. owned property subject to execution. Held—That the court has the right to look beneath the surface to ascertain the truth and to adjudge the case as appears right, and it was properly adjudged that the purchase of the judgment was not made in good faith by Mrs. B., but was done by agreement with her husband, who was the real purchaser, and that no action could be maintained by her against the city. Idem. 478

OIL AND GAS WELLS—

Contract for Boring—Construction of Lease—Expiration of Lease—A gas company leased a farm on which to bore for oil and gas in February, 1903, for three years, and "as much longer as oil and gas are found, provided wells are completed during said term, and if gas is found in sufficient quantities to market it," and, if piped away, to pay $100 a year for each well as long as the gas is marketed, and to sink a test well within one year. Held—That to entitle the lessee to a longer term than three years it was incumbent on it that other wells besides the test well should be completed during three years from the date of the lease, and failing to do so, the lease expired at the end of the three years. Hazel Green Oil and Gas Co. v. Collier, &c.. 495

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—See Replevin—

1. Release of Surety on Note—Contract Between Principal and Creditor—In order that a surety on a note be released, there must be an enforceable contract between the principal and the creditor, by which the creditor would be prevented from suing on the note when due, and, for that reason, the surety be prevented from paying off the debt that day, and thereupon subrogated to the creditors' rights, by suing or taking other steps to save himself from loss. Davless County Bank & Trust Co. v. Wright, &c.. 457
2. Indulgence by Principal—Assent of Creditor—Ignorance of Surety—Mere indulgence of the principal in a note by his creditor does not operate to discharge the surety thereon, even though it be expressly assented to by the creditor, at the instance of the principal, of which the surety is ignorant, even if the principal has, during such indulgence, become a bankrupt. Idem 458
3. Novation—Making New Contract—Definite Extension of Time to Principal—Consideration—A novation is the making of a new contract. Its elements are essentially the same as in the first contract, which are (1) parties, (2) a meeting of their minds, and, (3) a consideration. Hence, the further indulgence by a principal in a note of the creditor, if the surety is to be released thereby, must be upon an agreement for an extension for a definite time, and this agreement must be based upon a new consideration. Idem 458
4. Acts of Personal Representative—Authority of Court—It is not competent for a personal representative of an estate, without the authority of a court of competent jurisdiction, to enter into a contract with a debtor to the estate, by which the jurisdiction of the court may be ousted, or the statutory rights of other litigants or claimants be charged or postponed. Idem 458

RAILROADS—Page.

1. Freight Trains—Carrying Passengers on Caboose—Separate Caboose for White and Colored Passengers—Under Kentucky Statutes, sections 772a and 801, the carrying of passengers by a railroad in a caboose attached to a freight train, does not change the freight train into a passenger train, and though a railroad company may allow both white and colored passengers to ride in such caboose, it is not subject to indictment under Kentucky Statutes, section 795, for failing to provide separate coaches on said trains for white and colored passengers. Southern Ry. Co. in Ky. v. Commonwealth 430
2. Crossings—Gates—Flagman—Signal—Invitation to Cross—Assumption of Traveler—A traveler, in approaching a railroad crossing that is protected by a flagman or safety gates, has the right to depend upon the invitation extended to cross the track by the open gates, or the signals of the flagman. When the safety gates are open, or the flagman signals the traveler that he may cross, it is an invitation to do so, and the traveler has the right to assume that he can pass in safety. Cross v. I. C. R. R. Co. 432
3. Implied Invitation—Care Required of Traveler—But the fact that the gates are open, or the flagman gives the signal to cross, does not relieve the traveler from exercising ordinary care for his own safety, as if, notwithstanding the invitation implied by the open gates, or the flagman's signal, the traveler, by the exercise of ordinary care, could know that a train was approaching, the invitation would not be an absolute protection against his negligence. Idem 432
4. Duty of Trainmen—Giving Statutory Signals—The fact that the crossings are protected by gates, or flagman, does not relieve those in charge of a train of the duty to exercise ordinary care, in approaching the crossings, to prevent accident to the persons at the crossings, or of the duty of giving statutory signals, or other warning, where the statutory signals are not required. Idem 433
5. Instruction of Court—While the travelers may not rely, to the exclusion of exercising ordinary care for his own safety, on the open gate, or the flagman's signal, it is not proper in the trial court to instruct the jury that the traveler has no right to rely entirely on the flagman, or the open gates, as the case may be, thus diminishing the weight and importance that the traveler has the right to attach to the invitation to cross, by the open gates or the flagman's signal. Idem 433
6. Trespassers on Track of—Infants—The deceased was a trespasser on appellee's track, and the fact that it was an infant two years old, added no duty or responsibility on the railroad's employes to anticipate its presence on the track, or to keep a lookout in advance of actually seeing its peril. O'Bannion's Adm'r v. Southern Ry. in Ky. 436
7. Instructions—There was no evidence to show that the child was killed by the negligent acts of those in charge of the train, and the peremptory instruction to find for appellee was properly given. Idem 436
8. Cattle Guards—Reasonable Construction—Sufficiency—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 1793, requiring "all corporations and persons owning or controlling and operating railroads, to erect and maintain cattle guards at all ter-

- minal points of fences constructed along their lines," if a cattle guard is not reasonably sufficient to prevent cattle from going across it, then it is not such a guard as the statute contemplates, although it may be in general use by all railroads. N., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Russell 447
9. Care Required of Railroads—Question for Jury—This does not mean that a cattle guard must be so constructed as that, under no condition, cattle can pass over it, or that it must afford absolute or perfect protection against trespassing or wandering stock, but railroad companies should at least exercise ordinary care to provide and maintain guards reasonably sufficient for the purpose intended, and no better test can be applied to determine the statutory sufficiency of a guard than to submit, under competent evidence, the question of its reasonable sufficiency to a jury. Idem 447
10. Crossings—Instructions—In this action to recover of appellant for the death of appellee's intestate which occurred at a crossing, so much of an instruction based on the idea that the crossing was unusually dangerous should not have been given. This instruction would have been proper, had the crossing been exceptionally dangerous, but it was only an ordinary country crossing. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. O'Nan's Adm'r 642
11. An instruction was also erroneous which told the jury that it was the duty of the railroad company to keep its crossings and approaches in "good repair" so as not to unreasonably interfere with travelers, &c., when the instruction should have directed that the crossing be kept in such repair as is reasonably safe for public travel. Idem 462
12. The proof showing that deceased was not seen until he came on the track about 100 yards ahead of the train, at which time it could not be stopped before it reached him, it was error to instruct the jury to find for plaintiff if the servants in charge of the train saw deceased, or could have seen him by the use of ordinary care in time to avoid injuring him. Idem 462
13. Passenger on Caboose—Delay of Train—Evidence Excluded—In an action by a passenger on a railroad train for damages for delay in being carried to his destination, and for being compelled to ride in a caboose without fire, and for being put off of the train a long distance from the depot. Held—That the court erred in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant to show the cause of the delay. Southern Railway Co. in Ky. v. Miller..... 505
14. Carriers of Passengers—Responsibility for Delay—Unavoidable Accidents—A common carrier must use ordinary care to carry its passengers to their destination in a reasonable time, but is not responsible for delays which are caused by accidents that ordinary care may not guard against. If there was a wreck on the road, not due to defendant's negligence, which prevented the train running to plaintiff's depot, the defendant is not responsible for the delay which could not be avoided by ordinary care. Idem 505
15. Negligence of Carrier—Instructions Applicable—Measure of Recovery—The court should have instructed the jury that if the defendant negligently failed to keep its caboose in a reasonably comfortable condition, under the circumstances, or negligently failed to deliver plaintiff at the regular place for the landing of passengers at B, and as the proximate result of these things, or any of them, plaintiff suffered pain or was made sick, they should find for him a fair compensation for the time lost, for any physical or mental suffering he endured and for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money, if such there was. Idem.....

505

16. The plaintiff can not recover for any suffering or sickness which he might have prevented by the exercise of ordinary care on his part or for anything which the carrier, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not reasonably have guarded against, and if when there was no negligence delaying the train, the plaintiff voluntarily left it, and walked to the station, the defendant is not responsible for any sickness brought upon him by the walk. Idem

506

REPLEVIN—

Action Against Sureties on Replevin Bond—Failure to Show Breach—Recovery Denied—In an action against the sureties on a replevin bond, where it appears that no restitution of the property in controversy was directed in the replevin suit, and no damages were sought or awarded, the plaintiff's right of recovery against the sureties being dependent upon the breach of the bond, they must fail in the absence of showing that there has been a breach of some of its provisions. Vallandingham, &c. v. Ray, &c.

392

SECOND APPEAL—

Action of Lower Court—Compliance with Opinion—On a former appeal of this case (28 Ky. Law Rep., page 9) the trial court was directed to determine two questions: 1st. Were the 350 acres in controversy embraced in the 687-acre tract? 2d. Had appellants previously bought and paid for the 350 acres? Held—That the lower court, having found that the 350 acres were not embraced in the 687-acre tract, or in any other survey with which appellants were charged in the former judgment, therefore appellants were properly chargeable with the 350-acre tract in controversy. Ewell & Smith v. Jackson's Adm'r., &c.

1. Apportionment Warrants—Sale—Right of Redemption—Prior Judgment—Effect Thereon—Under section 2834, Kentucky Statutes, referring to apportionment warrants, a failure to provide in a judgment of sale thereunder, that the defendant in the warrant may redeem the land within two years from the report of the sale, does not affect a previous judgment in favor of the parties to the action, where the defendant did not offer to redeem the land within the two years. Maypother v. Gast, &c.

2. Sale and Conveyance—Failure of Owner to Object—Legality of Sale—Under section 989, Kentucky Statutes, providing that the court may summarily determine the amount due on the assessment and provide for its payment in the judgment, where property was sold under an apportionment warrant and was conveyed to the purchaser without objection by the owner, who failed to ask that he should have two years time in which to redeem it, he can not thereafter raise the question as to the legality of the sale and conveyance. Idem	396

STREET CARS—

1. Collision With Wagon—Injury to Driver—Care Required—The only duty required by travelers or persons using streets that are occupied by street car tracks and cars thereon, is to exercise ordinary care for their own safety, and, in the exercise of such care, they have the right to change their course in any way they please, and to use any part of the street necessary for their purpose. While this is the rule, as applied to the individual, it is proper to define, with more particularity, the duty resting upon persons in charge of engines or cars, because of their dangerous character. Louisville Ry. Co. v. Boutellier. 484
2. Relative Care—Lookout Duty of Motorman—The duty of lookout and warning is included in the ordinary care required of persons operating engines or cars, and it is the duty of the motorman of street cars to keep a lookout for persons and vehicles on the track, and to give timely warning of the approach of the car, when he discovers, or, in the exercise of ordinary care by keeping a lookout, should have discovered, the presence of persons or vehicles on the track, in apparent peril, and to exercise ordinary care to avoid a collision. Idem. 484

SURETIES—See County Treasurer, 1, 2.

TELEPHONES—

1. Contract Between Two Companies—Pleading—The parties to this action entered into a five year contract providing for an interchange of business, and a controversy arising as to appellant's right under the contract, appellee cut off all connection before the termination of the contract. In this action against appellee for damages for the breach of the contract, appellee, in an amended answer, alleged that appellant had not obtained a franchise from Sonora, the place of its central station, as required by sections 163-164, of the Constitution. In its reply appellant admitted such failure, but averred that many of his subscribers were reached by lines that did not go over or upon any street in Sonora, and that most of his rural subscribers were of this class. It was error to sustain a demurrer to the reply. The contract was severable. There was an agreement to use such lines as the parties might from time to time set up. Bland v. Cumb. Tel. & Telg. Co...... 399
2. Rule as to Construction of Contracts—The rule is elementary that contracts, though partly in violation of a statute, severable into parts, may be enforced as to the part that is good. Idem 399

VERDICT—See Excessive Verdict, 1.

TAXES—

1. Lien of City Therefor—Negligence of Officials—Effect—on Lien Notes—Whatever might be the rule between individuals, it can not be held that a city shall lose its right to collect its public dues by reason of the failure of its officers to present its claim in a suit of which they have no knowledge, the city not being a party to the suit. Middlesboro Town & Lands Co. v. City of Middlesboro; City of Middlesboro v. Coal & Iron Bank, &c. 469

TAXES—Continued—Page.

2. Execution Sale—Purchasers—Conveyance to Wife—Effect—Where in a proceeding to sell a lot in a city, under execution, and on which the city had a lien for taxes, and of which lien the purchaser had notice, the fact that the purchaser had the deed to the lot made to his wife did not make her a bona fide purchaser without notice—she being a lis pendens purchaser took the property subject to the lien of the city which it had asserted in the action. Idem 469

TEACHER, REPORT OF—See Graded Common Schools, 1, 2, WILLS—

1. Devise of Fund to a Daughter—As a Home for Herself and Family—Sale or Re-Investment—Restrictions—Construction—A testator, by his will, devised to his daughter a house and lot of the estimated value of $4,000, "as a home for herself and family, as long as she lives, free from the control of her husband, to have no power to encumber or sell same, except for re-investment, and, if sold, the proceeds to be re-invested in other property, suitable for a home for herself and family, and to be used for that purpose." She exchanged this home for a farm, which she subsequently sold for $6,250, which the purchaser declined to pay, on the ground that she could not convey him a good title thereto. Held—That the word "family," in this will, includes children, and that the testator, in using the word "family," intended it to embrace not only his daughter, but her children, as well as her husband, and that the fund, when invested in a home, should be preserved in a home as long as his daughter lived. Coleman v. Grimes. 455
2. Exchange for Farm—Sale of Farm—Increased Price—Separation from Principal—Fund in Court—It does not follow, from the fact that, as only $4,000 was set apart by the will for a home, that any increase in this fund might be used for other purposes. The increase can not be separated from the principal, and the entire fund, $6,250, should be paid into the court by the purchaser of the farm, and retained until the devisee selects a home in which to invest it, subject to the approval of the chancellor. Idem..... 455

The Triple Expansion Ledger.

"BEST ON EARTH."

BECAUSE of the following features of merit, the sales of the Triple Expansion Ledger are increasing rapidly, and our agents are unanimous in saying it deserves the name "Best on Earth."

It has an expansion of nearly 200 per cent. You know the value of this feature, the ease in inserting sheets, and the great increase in capacity for additional accounts, as the business demands.

It is the lightest ledger made to-day; weighing less than half as much as aluminum back ledgers. You know that excess weight is unnecessary, and that bookkeepers do not like to handle a ledger weighing four or five pounds.

It has no exposed metal parts to mar the desk, a feature appreciated by all users.

It has strong, positive, quick-acting mechanism.

It is made of absolutely the best materials obtainable, the highest grade of leather and corduroy, with the finest nickel-plated finish.

The price is right, enabling the dealer to meet competition.

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. JOSH LIN.

(Filed May 19, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Injury to Traveler at a Crossing—Action for Damages—Conflicting Evidence—Slight Evidence for Plaintiff—Refusal of Peremptory Instruction—In an action for damages by one injured at a railroad crossing by a collision with a train, in crossing the track in a buggy, where there is any evidence, however slight, that the usual signals of the approach of the train were not given as compared with the positive evidence of the railroad's witnesses that they were given, it was not error in the trial court to refuse to give a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant company.

2. Same—Proof of Admissions by Plaintiff—Denial—Question for Jury—In an action for damages by a woman for injuries received by being struck by a train in crossing a railroad track in a buggy, evidence was admitted that she said to the physician who treated her injuries, soon after the collision, that "she heard the train whistle and undertook to cross, and it ran into her, and that she was to blame," which she denied, the question of whether she made the admission or was in such a state of mind as to know that she was at the time saying, was for the jury.

3. Instructions on False Issue—Prejudicial Error—An instruction on a false issue in a case, and upon which no evidence was introduced, is misleading and prejudicial.

John T. Shelby, Lewis L. Walker and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

Jas. I. Hamilton, W. I. Williams, R. H. Tomlinson and Greene & VanWinkle for appellee.

Appeal from Garrard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

The appellant complains that appellee was illegally permitted to recover in the court below a verdict and judgment against it for $4,000 damages, for injuries to her person, and also for the destruction of her buggy; all resulting, as alleged, from the negligence of appellant's servants in charge of one of its trains, in failing to give the statutory and customary signals of its approach, and by running it upon and against appellee, her buggy and horse, at Price's crossing, near the city of Lancaster. Appellant was refused a new trial and by this appeal seeks a reversal of the judgment complained of.

The appellant's answer specifically denied the acts of negligence alleged in the petition and averred contributory negligence on the part of appellee, but for which she would not have been injured, or her buggy destroyed. The contributory negligence thus charged was denied by reply.

According to appellee's evidence she and her daughter, eleven years of age, were, on the day of the accident, driving to their home from Paint Lick, in a buggy to which a single horse was attached. They reached Price's Crossing at a time when there was no regular train due to pass at that point. It turned out, however, that a passenger train which, when on time, arrived at Lancaster, two miles away, about 1:50 o'clock, p. m., was on that occasion between 30 and 40 minutes late. The time on which this train ran being known to appellee, she supposed it had passed the crossing as usual and reached Lancaster on its schedule time, and did not, therefore, know of its being late. Appellee had the curtains on her buggy and there was some wind blowing in the direction from which the train was coming and consequently against the train; the noise made by the wind and the running of the buggy doubtless prevented appellee and her daughter from hearing the noise made by the train. At any rate they drove upon the crossing and track in advance of the approaching train without seeing it and claimed not to have known of its presence until it struck the buggy, which was broken into pieces and appellee and her daughter thrown to the ground, but out of the way of the train. The horse, though knocked down in the collision, was not materially injured.

Appellee and her daughter both testified that they heard no signal from the train, whistle or bell as it approached, or before their buggy was driven upon the crossing, though both admitted that they did not stop or look for a train before going upon the crossing.

Appellee was rendered temporarily unconscious by the collision, sustained a serious scalp wound, broken rib and perhaps some injury to her back.

According to the testimony of Wallace, a surveyor who, at appellant's instance, furnished a map showing the crossing and adjacent ground, there was no obstruction in the way of appellee's seeing the train when she was yet far enough from the crossing to have avoided the collision. The engineer and fireman of the train testified that one approaching in a buggy from the east, as appellee was, could be seen from the engine when the buggy was 80 or 100 feet from the crossing, and the engine 250 feet away; that they kept a constant lookout ahead from the time it got in sight of the crossing, which was 250 feet off until the crossing was reached, and that they first saw appellee when they were in 250 of the crossing; that her buggy top was up and the curtains down and she was whipping the horse with the lines and driving rapidly toward the crossing as if to reach it and get over and beyond the track before it could be reached by the train, and that when they first saw appellee she was at a safe distance from the crossing and could, if she had looked for and seen the train, have stopped the horse and buggy before reaching the crossing and before it was reached by the train, and thereby prevented her injuries.

The engineer and fireman further testified that the train, upon arriving at the whistling board, a fourth of a mile from the crossing, sounded the customary whistle signal for the crossing and that from the whistling board to the crossing, the engine bell was continuously rung; that upon seeing appellee and that she was apparently going upon the crossing in front of the train, the alarm whistle was immediately sounded and the whistling continued until the crossing was reached by the train; that upon the sounding of the alarm whistle the emergency air-brakes were applied and the train stopped at the earliest time possible; that when appellee could be seen, and was first seen from the engine, the train was running at a speed of 30 miles an hour and by the application of the air-brakes, its speed was reduced to 12 or 15 miles an hour by the time it struck appellee's buggy. Moreover, that in view of the speed at which it was going when appellee was first seen and the air-brakes were applied, and the fact that it was down grade from that point to the crossing, 500 feet was the shortest distance in which it was possible to stop the train, and it was actually stopped within 520 feet, which carried it to a point 270 feet beyond the crossing; and that it was impossible for those in charge of the train to have stopped it, after discovering appellee's peril, in time to have prevented the collision.

The engineer and fireman were corroborated as to the giving of the signal at the whistling board for the crossing and the alarm signals, by Price Floyd, James Smart Rice and Russell Floyd; the Floyds being near the railroad as the train passed, and Rice, baggage master, and Smith a passenger, on the train. Russell Floyd also said he thought he heard the bell ringing after the crossing signal was given, but was not positive about it.

The conductor and flagman of the train also testified as to the several whistle signals, and the quick stopping of the train, but neither of them was able to remember as to the ringing of the bell.

The evidence as a whole conduced to prove that for a short distance the public road traveled by appellee in going toward Price's crossing, runs nearly parallel with the railroad, consequently, just before reaching the crossing, appellee was driving with her back somewhat, if not altogether, toward the train as it approached the crossing. This fact together with that of the wind blowing against the coming train, may have served to prevent appellee's hearing the noise and signals, if any, of the train. Otherwise it is incredible that she would have ventured upon the crossing in the face of so great a danger.

The testimony of appellee and her daughter furnished some evidence that those in charge of the train failed to warn them of the coming of the train by giving the customary signals. It is true this testimony was mainly to the effect that appellee and her daughter did not hear such signals, but taking into consideration all they said on the subject, it must, however slight its weight, as compared to the positive statements of appellant's witnesses that the usual and customary signals were given, be accepted as amounting to a denial that such signals were given. Therefore, there was some evidence in support of the cause of action to go to the jury, and this being true the trial court did not err in refusing the peremptory instruction asked by appellant. Section 786, Kentucky Statutes, provides:

"Every company shall provide each locomotive engine passing upon its road with a bell of ordinary size, and steam whistle, and such bell shall be rung, or whistle sounded, outside of incorporated cities and towns, at a distance of at least 50 rods from the place where the road crosses upon the same level any highway or crossing, at which a signboard is required to be maintained, and such bell shall be rung or whistle sounded continuously or alternately until the engine has reached such highway crossing, and shall give such signals in cities and towns as the legislative authorities thereof may require."

If appellee's injuries were caused by the failure of those in charge of appellant's train to give the signals required by the section, supra, such failure was negligence for which she should recover, and the question of whether there was such negligence is one of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions from the court. The same is also true as to the question of contributory negligence, which is not to be presumed any more than that negligence may be presumed. It was therefore left to the jury to say whether appellee would have been injured if she had looked or listened for the train, instead of driving on the crossing without taking such precaution.

The crossing at which appellee was injured is a public crossing and therefore one to which the requirements of the statute quoted fully apply.

In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Lucas' Adm'r., 30 Ky. Law Rep., 359, it is said:

"A peremptory instruction should be denied when the inference of negligence to be deduced from proved or admitted facts, is such as the jury might fairly differ about."

In Cahill v. Cin., &c. Ry. Co., 92 Ky., 345, a more elaborate statement of the same principle is thus announced:

"But to decide that the failure of a person to look along a railroad before attempting to cross it is, under all circumstances and necessarily, negligence, would be arbitrary and without reason, for there may be evidence sufficient to satisfy a person of ordinary carefulness that the track is clear without taking that precaution, as when he knows it is not the usual time, and does not hear the signals he knows it is customary for the company to give or for him to hear. A person thus reasoning and acting it seems to us, can not, upon principle, be regarded as negligent, even if he does fall short of the measure of vigilance needed to prevent him being injured by a passenger train running behind time, at an extraordinary rate of speed, and without signal of its approach."

The steadfastness with which this court has adhered to the rule stated in the case, supra, will be made manifest by a reading of the opinions in the following cases: L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Molloy's Adm'r., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1113; L. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Davis, 106 S. W., 305; Hutchison v. R. R. Co., 52 S. W., 954; 21 Ky. Law Rep., 753; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Vaughn, 97 S. W., 774; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ueltsch's Adm'r., 97 S. W., 14, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 931; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. O. Nan's Adm'r., 32 Ky. Law Rep., —.

We do not attach to appellee's admission made to Dr. Kinniard, "that she heard the train whistle and undertook to cross the track and it ran into her and that she was to blame herself," the importance given it by appellant's counsel. The statement was made in the office of physician immediately after she was injured and while under treatment, and if, as she testified, she was rendered unconscious by the collision, it is more than probable that she had not fully recovered her mental faculties at the time of making the admission; on the trial she claimed to have no recollection of making the admission and in effect denied it. However, the question of whether she made the admission or was in such a state of mind as to know what she was at the time saying, was one for the jury, in the light of the circumstances, to decide, and therefore, it was properly allowed to go to them. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Molloy's Adm'r., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1113.)

Consideration of the instructions leads us to the conclusion that all of them are substantially correct except number 3, which is as follows:

"Although you may believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was negligent in attempting to cross said railway at the time and place mentioned, yet if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant's servants and agents in charge of said train, after they discovered the plaintiff's danger, or with ordinary care could have discovered her danger, failed to use ordinary care for the protection of plaintiff, and but for said failure, if any, could have avoided the injury to plaintiff, if any, then you will find for the plaintiff in the sum of not exceeding $10,000, the criterion of damage being as set forth in instruction No. 1. By negligence is meant the failure to use ordinary care, and by ordinary care is meant such care and caution as a person of ordinary prudence might reasonably be expected to exercise under like circumstances."

There was no evidence upon which to base this instruction, therefore, it was misleading and necessarily prejudicial, because it authorized the jury to find a verdict for appellee upon a false issue or ground that did not exist. Appellee and her daughter did not undertake to state when their presence near the crossing was first discovered by appellant's engineer and fireman, for they claimed not to have themselves discovered the train until it was in the act of striking them. The only witnesses as to when she was first seen were the engineer and fireman and they testified that the train was at the time in 250 feet of her. All the testimony seems to be of a kind as to the fact that appellee could not be seen at or near the crossing by the engineer or fireman until the train emerged from a cut near the crossing. It is true the evidence is somewhat indefinite in regard to the distance of this cut from the crossing. There is an intimation in the brief of appellee's counsel that the distance is 500 feet. But the testimony of the engineer and fireman seems to place the distance between the crossing and cut at 250 feet; but whether 250 or 500 feet is the true distance, it is perfectly manifest that it was impossible on the occasion of the accident to stop the train by the application of the air-brakes under 520 feet. So, if it be assumed that 500 feet is the distance from the cut to the crossing and that appellee's peril was discovered by the engineer after the engine left the cut, according to the uncontradicted testimony, both of the engineer and fireman, it was not possible to stop the train in time to prevent it from striking appellee's buggy. The undisputed testimony of these two witnesses was that they kept a constant lookout in approaching the crossing and that appellee was not seen, and could not be seen by them, until the engine got in 250 feet of the crossing; that every effort possible was immediately made to stop the train to avoid running over her, but without avail, and that the train was not stopped under 520 feet.

On a re-trial, if the evidence is substantially the same, the instruction in question, except the last clause defining negligence and ordinary care, should be withdrawn and rejected.

As there must be a re-trial of the case and instruction No. 1, as to the measure of damages is not clearly stated, the court, in lieu of that part of it, should substitute the following:

"If you find for plaintiff you should allow her such a sum in damages as you may believe from the evidence will fairly compensate her for the physical and mental suffering, if any of either, and for the permanent impairment, if any, of her ability to earn money, that the evidence may show were caused by the negligence, if any, of appellant's servants complained of; also such further sum, if any, not exceeding $35 as the evidence may show will fairly compensate her for the fair market value of her buggy, destroyed by appellant's train; but the damages altogether, if any are allowed her, should not exceed $10,000."

As the case must be re-tried, we decline to express an opinion as to whether or not the verdict on the last trial was excessive.

We have discovered no prejudicial error in the admission or rejection of evidence on the former trial.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with the opinion.

SANDLIN v. LEXINGTON RAILWAY CO.

(Filed May 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Street Cars—Injury to Passengers in Alighting Therefrom—Action for Damages—Error in Instructions—In an action by a passenger injured in alighting from a street car, it was error in the trial court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff attempted to alight from the car before it was brought to a standstill and while it was in motion, and in so attempting to alight was thrown upon the ground.

2. Same—Per Se Negligence—Intention to Alight—Notice to Conductor—Sudden Increase of Speed—Actional Negligence—It is not per se negligence for a passenger in a street car to make preparations to alight therefrom before it comes to a standstill or to get off before it actually stops. When a car has slackened its speed to enable a passenger to alight therefrom, upon notice by him of his purpose to those in charge thereof, and it is then running at a rate of speed that a reasonably prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, might attempt to alight, it is negligence to suddenly and violently increase the speed of the car until the passenger has had reasonable opportunity to alight.

C. J. Bronston and Wallace Muir for appellant.

Stoll & Bush and Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

The petition, as amended, in this case states the cause of action of appellant, who was plaintiff below, in substance as follows: That he took passage upon one of defendant's cars at or near its central station, to be conveyed to a point on Jackson street, near the home of Curtis Kindred, and when he indicated to defendant's employes in charge of the car, his desire to leave the car at the point of destination, it was slackened in speed for the purpose of allowing him to alight therefrom. That the persons in charge of the car had knowledge of the fact that he was about to alight, but whilst he was still standing upon the rear platform of the car, and had moved towards the step for the purpose of, and with the intention of alighting, and before he could place his foot upon the step of said car, the employes of defendant in charge of said car, negligently caused the same to suddenly jerk forward and rapidly increase its speed, thereby throwing him with great violence from the car, upon the street.

The appellee company, in its answer, denied all the material averments of the petition, and in addition thereto pleaded contributory negligence.

Upon a trial before a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of appellee company.

On this appeal, prosecuted for the purpose of obtaining a reversal of the judgment upon the verdict, the only error complained of is that alleged to have been committed by the trial judge in giving instruction number three, which will be hereafter noticed.

The point on Jackson street, to which appellant desired to go is near the corner of Breckinridge street. The car upon which he was riding went out Breckinridge to Jackson street, thence down Jackson to Seventh street. Appellant testified that when he boarded the car, he informed the conductor that he wanted to get off near the corner of Breckinridge and Jackson streets. That as they approached the house of Kindred, he indicated to the conductor that he wished to get off, and in response to his signal the conductor rang the bell one time, and the motorman slowed down the car. That, assuming that the car had been slowed down for the purpose of allowing him to alight, he took one step forward, holding with his right hand to the upright post on the rear platform, upon which he had been riding and as he was in the act of stepping from the platform to the car step, for the purpose of getting off, and when the car was moving at a rate of speed that would have enabled him to alight safely, the car, by signal from the conductor, suddenly lunged forward and threw him upon the back of his head on the macadamized street.

The evidence of appellee's witnesses tended to establish the following facts: That the speed of the car was slackened as it came around the curve from Breckinridge into Jackson street; but that no signal was given by any one to stop on Jackson street, and the speed of the car as it moved towards Seventh street, gradually increased after it came into Jackson street. That when the car reached a point on Jackson street, nearly half-way between Breckinridge and Seventh streets, a lady passenger indicated to the conductor to stop the car at Seventh street. That the conductor, in response to her signal, sounded one bell, which was the signal to the motorman to stop at Seventh street, and immediately after the signal was given, appellant hurriedly jumped or stepped off the car, receiving the injuries of which he complained.

From this summary, it will be seen that the issue between the parties is sharply defined. Briefly, it may be thus stated: The appellant's theory is that when the car had slackened its speed in obedience to a signal given by him to the conductor, to permit him to alight and he was in the act of getting off, or preparing to get off, the motorman suddenly and violently started the car, throwing the appellant to the street. The theory of appellee is that appellant, without giving any notice that he desired to get off, jumped from the car when the speed had not been reduced, receiving the injuries complained of.

With the evidence in this condition, the court gave to the jury the following instructions:

"1. If the jury believe from the evidence, that defendant's car, upon which plaintiff was riding, was being slowed down by defendant's employes in charge of the car, for the purpose of permitting plaintiff to alight therefrom; and if the jury further believe from the evidence, that the plaintiff, when said car was slowing down, was preparing to alight therefrom; and if the jury further believe from the evidence, that while plaintiff was so preparing to alight, said car was, without notice to plaintiff, and through the negligence of said employes, caused to suddenly start forward at an increased rate of speed, and that the plaintiff, by reason of said car being so suddenly caused to start forward, was thrown from said car, the jury should find for the plaintiff.

"2. The jury should find for the defendant, unless the jury believe from the evidence, that defendant's car, upon which plaintiff was riding, was slowed down for the purpose of permitting plaintiff to alight therefrom, and that after it was being so slowed down, and while plaintiff was preparing to alight therefrom, said car was without notice to plaintiff, and through the negligence of defendant's employes in charge of said car, caused to suddenly start forward, at an increased rate of speed, and that through said car being so suddenly started forward at such increased rate of speed, the plaintiff was thrown to the ground.

"3. The jury should find for the defendant, if the jury believe from the evidence, that the plaintiff attempted to alight from defendant's car before said car should be brought to a standstill, and while said car was in motion, and in so attempting to alight he was thrown upon the ground.

"4. Before the jury can find for the plaintiff, they should believe from the evidence, that the plaintiff was thrown from defendant's car by reason of a sudden jerk or forward movement of said car at a time when the speed of the car was reduced to an extent or degree which would reasonably warrant an ordinarily prudent person in assuming he could alight therefrom with safety, and that such jerk or forward movement of this car occurred after the plaintiff had given notice to defendant's employees in charge of the car to stop the same for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to alight therefrom, and after the speed of the car had been reduced by the motorman for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to alight from the car, and unless the jury should so find, they should find for the defendant.

"5. If the jury find for the plaintiff, they should find for him in such sum, in damages, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, as will fairly compensate the plaintiff for any mental and physical suffering (if there was any) endured by him, by reason of the injury resulting to him from being thrown upon the street from defendant's car, and also, for any reduction of his power to earn money—if there is any—caused by any permanent injury—if there has been such permanent injury—resulting to the plaintiff through being thrown from defendant's car."

Instruction number three is the one complained of. Instructions one, two and four presented, as we understand it, the real issue the jury was called upon to try. Instruction number three was in effect a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for appellee, as all the evidence in the case tended to establish that appellant attempted to alight from the car before it stopped. Appellant so testified himself. As the jury were directed by this instruction to find for the appellee company if they believe from the evidence that the appellant attempted to alight from the car before it was brought to a standstill and while it was in motion, there was no reasonable way by which the jury could avoid returning a verdict for the company. Appellant's case was predicated entirely upon the proposition that he had a right to prepare to alight from and to get off of the car when the speed was reduced and the car was running at a rate that would permit him to alight in safety.

Under repeated decisions of this court, it is not per se negligence for a passenger in a street car to make preparations to alight from a car before it comes to a standstill, or to get off before the car actually stops. When a car has slackened its speed for the purpose of enabling a passenger to alight therefrom, in obedience to notice by him of his purpose to the persons in charge of the car, and the car is running at such a rate of speed that a reasonably prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, might attempt to alight, it is negligence to suddenly and violently increase the speed of the car, until the passenger has had reasonable opportunity to alight from the car. This view is fully supported by the following cases:

In Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Eakin, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 736, which was an action by the administrator of Eakin to recover damages for his death caused by being run over by a train from which he was attempting to alight while it was in motion, it was contended for the company that the attempt of decedent to alight from the train while it was in motion was per se negligence, and that it could not be held responsible for the injury resulting therefrom. But the court rejected this view, and held—quoting with approval from other authorities. that:

"It can not be said, as a matter of law, that it would, under all circumstances, be an act of negligence for a passenger to attempt to alight from a moving train. * * * Whether alighting from a moving train constitutes negligence or not is a fact to be determined by the jury trying the case, taking into consideration all the circumstances in connections with the alighting. * * * If the leap is made under such circumstances as that a person of ordinary caution and care would not have apprehended danger therefrom, then it was not such an act of carelessness as would relieve the company from the responsibility otherwise resting upon it."

In Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Whittaker, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 395, it was said:

"The decided weight of modern authority is that it is not contributory negligence per se for a passenger to voluntarily alight from a moving train; and that ordinarily it is a question for the jury to determine, whether the passenger, under the circumstances, acted as a reasonably cautious and prudent man."

In Central Passenger Railway Co. v. Rose, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 209, the car, in obedience to a signal by Rose, slowed up for the purpose of permitting him to get on; and when he got hold of the rail and started to step upon the platform, the speed of the car was suddenly increased, throwing him to the ground. In response to the plea of the company that he was guilty of such contributory neglect as would defeat a recovery, the court said:

"We can not say, as a matter of law, that it was contributory negligence on the part of Rose to undertake to board a slowly moving electric car. The rate of speed at which it was going on the occasion referred to—the manner of attempting to board it by Rose, and the conduct of the persons in charge of the car after the peril was discovered, were matters put in proof before the jury. Their province was to determine from the proof what state of case actually existed, and what acts were or were not negligent acts, under all the proof and the instructions." To the same effect is Belt Electric Line Co. v. Tomlin, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 433; Ford v. Paducah City Ry. Co., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 753; Louisville Railway Co. v. Williams, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 493; Paducah City Railway Co. v. Walsh, 22 Ky., Law Rep., 532; L., H. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Coons, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 509; Bishop v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1363; Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Glover, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1447.

On a re-trial of the case, instruction number three should be omitted.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

(Filed May 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Contract—Action to Enforce—Striking Case from Docket—Agreed Order—Leave to Reinstate Without Notice—Effect of Order—In an action to enforce a contract for the development of certain minerals on a tract of land "of any kind except oil, gas and salt," to which an answer was filed controverting the allegations of the petition, an agreed order was entered that "the plaintiff hereby agreed to have the case dismissed at the March term of 1909 of said court, with leave to re-instate same at any time without notice to defendant and the defendant to pay all cost;" such agreement was not a final order that terminated the case, and the plaintiff had a right, at the following September term of the court, to have the case redocketed without notice.

2. Contract Leasing Mineral Rights—Transfer of Contract—Rights Acquired—Where a contract was made by W. with McG. leasing him the right to all minerals on his land "of any kind except oil, gas and salt, which McG. transferred to B. and B. transferred it to the L. Hodge & Hodge for appellant.

Frank Rives for appellees.

Appeal from Caldwell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

In December, 1903, D. B. Wigginton, in consideration of one dollar and certain royalties, leased to appellant, H. C. McGoodwin for the term of twenty years, "the right to all the minerals of any kind and rock or stone, except oil, gas and salt, which is on, in or under the following described tract of land situated, lying and being in Caldwell county, Kentucky, * * * containing 261 acres, more or less. Now, in consideration of the above lease, the second party hereby binds himself, his heirs and assigns, to pay to the first party hereto as royalties fifty cents per each ton of flour spar of two thousand pounds; one dollar per ton of two thousand pounds for lithite or polishing stone, and one dollar for each ton of two thousand pounds of lead and zinc and ten per cent. of all other minerals that may be mined on said land, and the second party is to have and shall have free ingress and egress, to, on, over and from said tract of land, and shall have free use and control over so much of the surface of said tract of land that may be necessary to erect suitable buildings thereon and to carry on the mining for said minerals successfully. Said second party binds himself to begin mining in good faith on said tract of land between the date hereof and 1st day of May, 1904, and that he will carry on and continue said mining operations vigorously and in good faith at least six months in each year so long as this lease may be in force, and he shall keep a weigher's book of all the weights of all the minerals and stone that may be mined and taken from said land, and he shall make monthly reports thereof to the first parties, and at the end of each month or within ten days thereafter to said first parties all royalties due them for minerals and stone mined and taken from said land during each month previous thereto. Said books shall be free and open to inspections of the first parties or their agents. Upon the termination of this lease the second party or his assigns shall have the right to remove all machinery, &c., that he or they may have placed upon said land. This lease to be void and of no effect upon the failure of the second party or his assigns to comply with the above stipulation to begin and carry on said mining operations vigorously and in good faith as above set forth. The first party further agrees, and do hereby give to the second party or his assigns, an option or privilege to purchase the rights to all said minerals herein above named, and the right to continue the mining for same on said tract of land by paying to said first parties the sum of $40,000 on or before January, 1909, and upon the payment of said sum the first parties hereby bind themselves, their heirs and administrators, &c., to make the second party or his assigns a general warranty deed for all mineral stone, &c." * * *

On the 31st day of December, 1903, McGoodwin, in consideration of $200 paid, and other considerations mentioned, sold and transferred to J. J. Boynton, the lease executed to him by Wigginton. Boynton accepted the lease subject to all the conditions and terms therein specified, and "in addition thereto agrees and binds himself, his heirs and assigns, to pay to the first party monthly ten per cent. 'approximately' of the gross sales of all the stone or lithite mined on said tract of land. Said stone or lithite to be prepared suitably for all the uses for which it may be used before the sale thereof, and when sold the second party is to pay monthly as above stated, and shall pay monthly ten per cent. approximately of the gross sales of all other minerals mined and shipped from said tract of land under said lease. A full settlement of the ten per cent. shall be made at the end of each six months. Said second party, or his assigns, shall begin work under said lease in good faith on or before the first day of March, 1904, and upon their failure so to do, then and in that event this assignment or contract shall cease and be of no effect, and said lease shall revert back to the first party, this 31st day of December, 1903."

In January, 1904, Boynton, for a valuable consideration, sold and transferred to appellee, Lusterine Mining & Polishing Co., "the mineral and stone lease executed to him by H. C. McGoodwin and wife on December 31, 1903, and the same conveyed to H. C. McGoodwin, by writing, dated December 14, 1903, * * * upon the mineral and stone of every kind and description in, upon or under said land mentioned and described in each of said leases. Said second party takes and accepts said lease subject to all the conditions and terms therein specified, and subject to the conditions and terms specified in the lease from D. B. Wigginton and wife to H. C. McGoodwin."

In October, 1904, Wigginton and appellee company entered into a contract, which, after reciting the fact that Wigginton had theretofore executed a lease for twenty years to McGoodwin, which McGoodwin assigned to Boynton, and Boynton to the appellee company, set out that "in consideration of one dollar cash in hand paid, and the further consideration that the same royalties and considerations set forth in said original lease be continued with exception that the royalty on the lithite or polishing stone shall be two dollars per ton. The said parties of the first part hereby contract and agree to give to the said Lusterine Mining & Polishing Co. a new lease or an extension of said original, upon the same terms and conditions set forth therein, with exception that royalty on lithite or polishing stone shall be two dollars per ton instead of one dollar for the term or period of twenty years with option to extend another twenty years at the expiration thereof of said original lease either by lapse of time or failure to comply with the terms and conditions thereof or from any other cause, to have and to hold same unto the said Lusterine Mining & Polishing Co., or its assigns."

In 1905, McGoodwin filed his petition against the appellee company, in which, after reciting the leases before mentioned, averred that he recognized the company as the assignee of Boynton, and looked to it to perform all the conditions stipulated in the Boynton lease. That in February, 1904, it did a little work towards developing the lease, and again in May, 1904, worked about ten days, and in September following, worked a short time, and did nothing more until December, 1904, when it again worked a short time. And that it had not done anything since December. That it violated its contract, first, in not commencing to work the minerals in good faith before the first of March, 1904; second, that it has not at any time mined for lithite or polishing stone or any other mineral for as much as two months since the making of the contract; third, that it has not at any time worked the mines in good faith or vigorously, with a view of making them paying property; fourth, that it has not kept a weigher's book of any or all the weights of the minerals or stone that have been mined or taken from the land; nor has it made monthly reports, or any report whatever, to the plaintiff, McGoodwin, or Wigginton; fifth, that it did not at any time report or pay to McGoodwin ten per cent., or any other sum, on the gross sales of all, or any, of the stone or lithite.

It is further averred that the company, instead of mining the land, and for the purpose of practicing a fraud upon him, procured from Wigginton and wife the contract before mentioned. That this contract from Wigginton was obtained for the purpose of forfeiting the lease made by Wigginton to McGoodwin. He prayed for a judgment cancelling the contract between himself and Boynton, and asked that the contract between Wigginton and the company be set aside, and for judgment against the company for five thousand dollars.

In June, 1905, the company filed its answer, in which, after traversing generally the averments of the petition, it averred that it had carried out to the best of its ability, the contract, and had worked the mines in good faith and vigorously, and had made every effort to create a market for the product mined on the land, and had gone to great expense, time and trouble to put said product on the market.

It further said that the chemical properties of the Lusterine product were practically unknown at the time its company acquired said lease; that the process of reducing the stone in its crude state to an impalpable powder had required time and money, but it says it has acquired formulas, receipts for the making of various articles of commerce out of Lusterine powder; it has installed a mill in Hopkinsville at great expense, and also established on the leased premises valuable machinery, and in all other respects made a diligent effort to find a market for the product, but that McGoodwin had maliciously and falsely circulated and published reports about the company that were calculated to, and did destroy its business credit, and drive from it the capital necessary for use in the development of its properties; and it had been damaged by this conduct of McGoodwin in the sum of five thousand dollars, which it pleaded as a set-off.

In February, 1906, the following agreement was entered into between McGoodwin and the company: "The plaintiff hereby agrees to have the above entitled cause dismissed at the March term, 1906, of said court, with leave to reinstate same at any time without notice to defendant; and defendant, the Lusterine Mining & Polishing Co., agrees and binds itself to pay all the costs of said suit, including the order of dismissal."

This agreement to dismiss was based upon a written agreement entered into between the parties, but it is not in the record. At the March term of the court, the following order was entered: "Ordered that this action be dismissed as per agreement filed. Wherefore, it is adjudged by the court that the plaintiff recover of defendant his costs herein expended, for which execution may issue.

Afterwards, on the 3d day of September, 1906, this order was made: "This day came plaintiff, H. C. McGoodwin, and on his motion it is ordered that the above entitled case be, and the same is hereby, reinstated upon the docket."

In October, 1906, a reply was filed, controverting the affirmative matter in the answer.

In November, 1906, April, 1907, and again in June, McGoodwin filed other amended petitions, in which he reiterated that the company had broken its contract, and set up the breaches thereof.

To these various pleadings demurrers were filed, but they do not appear to have been acted upon, and an answer was filed by the company.

Three separate depositions of McGoodwin appear in the record; as do also the depositions of J. H. Thompson, and D. B. Wigginton.

In November, 1907, the following judgment was entered: "This cause coming on for trial and having been submitted to the court upon the pleadings, exhibits and depositions filed, and the court being advised, after reading the depositions and hearing the argument of counsel, upon consideration of the whole case, without regard to the rulings of the court upon demurrers or motions hitherto made, it is adjudged that the petition and amended petition, be, and they are hereby, dismissed and defendant will recover of plaintiff the costs herein expended for which execution may issue. To all of which plaintiff excepts and objects, and his objections being overruled, plaintiff excepts and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted.

We do not know the ground upon which the lower court rested its judgment, except from the statement contained in the brief for appellant, that the court was of the opinion that the agreement of February, 1906, and the order entered in pursuance thereof, was a final disposition of the case. This view is also insisted upon by counsel for appellee, who argues that the agreed order terminated the pending action and if the agreement entered into between the parties that resulted in the order dismissing the case was not performed, McGoodwin should bring a new action based upon the breaches of this agreement. We do not consider the agreement under which the action was dismissed as a final order or one that terminated the case. It expressly provides that the dismissal was with leave to reinstate the action at any time without notice. It was not contemplated by the parties that the order of dismissal was a settlement of the controversy; but, on the contrary, that it might be renewed at any time. And if the company failed to comply with the terms of the agreement, McGoodwin had the right to have the action placed on the docket and to set up, in an amended pleading, his complaint growing out of the company's breach of the agreement. This, we understand to be, the course he followed, and there is some evidence tending to support his contention.

Nor is the point well taken that McGoodwin would not maintain an action against the company for a breach of its contract with Boynton, because in its contract with Boynton it is expressly stipulated that "it takes and accepts said lease subject to all the conditions and terms specified in the lease from W. B. Wigginton to McGoodwin." In other words, the company took the place of Boynton, and assumed the obligations he entered into with McGoodwin, hence McGoodwin, for a breach of the stipulations of the contract, had the right to proceed directly against it.

Upon a return of the case, the appellant should be required to file an amended petition, setting out his entire cause of action and the appellee be permitted to file an answer thereto, setting up its entire defense; and such other pleadings may be filed as are necessary to complete the issue. The parties may then take such evidence in support of their respective contentions as they desire.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, with directions for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

MYERS, &c. v. BROWN, &c.

(Filed May 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Land—Oral Contract to Convey—Validity of Contract—An oral contract made by a father with his daughter to convey land to her is within the statute of frauds and not enforceable.

2. Sale of Land to Daughter—Deed Made but Not Delivered—Effect—Where a deed made by a father to his daughter was never delivered to the daughter, but remained in his possession until his death, no estate passed by virtue of such deed.

3. Services of Daughter—Nursing Father and Grandchildren—Allowances—Lien of Land not Conveyed—Where a married daughter went to her father's home and performed valuable services in nursing and caring for his two grandchildren, who had tuberculosis, she was entitled to compensation for such services, and an allowance by the lower court of $1,250 was proper, and to secure this sum she has a lien on the 205 acres of land which her father put her in possession of under an oral promise to make her a deed.

W. S. Pryor, N. H. W. Aaron and J. Boyle Stone for appellants.

E. V. Puryear and Robert Harding for appellees.

Appeal from Casey Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

W. C. Myers died, intestate, in Casey county, Kentucky, in the year 1904, leaving surviving him as his only children and heirs at law appellant, W. M. Myers, and his three sisters, Julia Brown, Mary Brown and Cordelia Simpson. W. M. Myers thereafter qualified as administrator of his father, and filed this action in the Casey Circuit Court for a settlement of the estate. In his petition he claimed that he and his three sisters are the owners, as heirs of W. C. Myers, of two tracts of land, one of them containing 205 acres, and asked that these two tracts of land be sold and the proceeds divided among those entitled thereto, upon the ground that the lands could not be divided without materially impairing their value. He also averred that each of the four children received certain advancements with which they should be charged. In her answer, Julia Brown denied that certain sums for timber and rents, which plaintiff below claimed should be charged to her, were advanced to her by her father. She also claimed that her brother and sisters did not own any part of the 205 acres of land described and sought to be sold in the petition, but averred that she, alone, was the owner thereof. In her answer, Cordelia Simpson admits that her father advanced her certain lands, but denies that these lands were of the value of $2,500, or of any value in excess of $2,000, and avers that she should be charged only with the sum of $2,000 for the lands advanced. Julia Brown and Cordelia Simpson, in their answers, denied that appellant correctly stated the advancements to himself. They averred that, in addition to the sums named, aggregating $2,500.94, he should also be charged with $1,000 given him by the decedent in 1887 or 1888; also a $700-note, payable to W. C. Myers, and given to him by decedent; also the Myers and Lyons note of $700, with interest, given him by decedent; also $600 given him by W. C. Myers in 1899 or 1900, and a $200-note, with its accrued interest, owing by him to his father. In his reply, Myers denied that he should be charged with any of these sums, except $381.11 of the Myers and Lyons note.

The issues were made up and the case referred to the master commissioner, to hear proof and make report thereon to the court. Upon the filing of his report, exceptions were filed thereto. The case was heard upon these exceptions, and the court entered judgment charging the parties with the advancements set out below:

William Myers was charged as follows:

Myers and Lyons note	$762 50
Horse and calf	120 00
Sheep	7 50
Note and interest	106 50
Note and interest	570 83
Note and interest	212 00
Note and interest	1,115 00

Total chargeable $2,894 33

Julia Brown was charged as follows:

Horse and cash	$250 00
Timber	500 00
Rents on her husband's land	600 00
205 acres of land	4,000 00

Total chargeable 5,350 00
Credited by board and care 1,250 00

Amount chargeable $4,100 00

Cordelia Simpson was charged as follows:

Cash and personal property	$377 50
Land	2,400 00

Total chargeable $2,835 00

Mary Brown was charged as follows:

Personal property	$335 00
Land	2,500 00

Total chargeable $2,835 00

The court directed the commissioner to convey to Julia Brown the 205 acres of land charged to her at $4,000. From this judgment W. M. Myers appeals. Julia Brown appeals from so much of the judgment as charges her with timber and rents amounting to $1,100; Cordelia Simpson appeals from so much of the judgment as charges the land advanced to her at a value of $2,400; and Mary Brown appeals from so much of the judgment as fixes the value of her land at $2,500. Julia Brown, Cordelia Simpson and Mary Brown appeal from so much of the judgment as charges W. M. Myers with advancements amounting to only $2,894.33.

Julia Brown claims the 205 acres of land, both by virtue of an oral promise made by her father to convey the land to her, and a deed which he executed, but never delivered to her. In pursuance to her father's promise, she and her husband moved to her father's home, and took care of him and two of his grandchildren, afflicted with consumption, for several months. Thereafter, on account of some misunderstanding with her father, she moved away from the home place. The oral contract on the part of her father, to convey the land in question, was within the statute of frauds, and on that account is not enforceable. (Usher's Ex'or v. Flood, 83 Ky., 553; Speers, &c. v. Sewell, &c., 4 Bush, 239; Glass v. Gaines, &c., 13 Ky. Law Rep., 277.) Furthermore, it appears that the deed, by which it is claimed the land was conveyed to Julia Brown remained in the possession of the intestate and was found among his papers, and, as said before, was never delivered to Julia Brown. That being the case, no estate passed by virtue of the deed in question. (Bell v. Farmers' Bank of Kentucky, &c., 11 Bush, 34; Jefferson County Building Association v. Heil, &c., 81 Ky., 513; Ward v. Small's Adm'r, 90 Ky., 198; Colyer v. Hyden, &c., 94 Ky., 180.) It was error then for the trial court to direct a conveyance of the land in question to Julia Brown. Upon the return of the case, if the court is of opinion that the land can not be divided without materially impairing its value, it should direct that the land be sold. Inasmuch, however, as Julia Brown went to her father's home and performed valuable services in looking after his wants and in nursing and caring for his two grandchildren who were afflicted with tuberculosis, we are of the opinion that she is entitled, for such services, to the allowance of $1,250, made by the trial court, and to secure this sum she has a lien on the 205 acres of land.

As to the charge for timber and rent, made against Julia Brown, it appears that her father made a conveyance of a certain tract of land, which he intended for his grandchildren, to her husband, which the latter purchased at the price of $2,500, and executed his four notes therefor, each in the sum of $625. For some reason or other, her husband failed to pay the notes as they fell due, and the matter was finally settled by a reconveyance of the land to her father and the cancellation of the notes. The trial court charged Julia Brown with the rent on this place at $600, and with $500 for timber which was removed therefrom. We are unable to see upon what theory these sums can be charged as advancements to Julia Brown. When her father elected to take back the land and cancel the notes, he thereby waived any claim he might have against her husband either for rents or for timber removed. The timber and rents were in no sense advancements to Julia Brown. Her father was willing to take the land back and cancel the notes, and in this way the whole transaction was closed. The fact that Julia Brown indirectly derived some benefit from the occupancy of the land, and from the timber taken therefrom during the time that it was in possession of her husband, does not alter the case. These benefits came to her indirectly, just as they would have come to the wife of any other purchaser of the land who failed to pay for the same and who settled the whole transaction by a reconveyance of the land to his vendor and the cancellation of the notes executed for the purchase price. We, therefore, conclude that the court erred in charging Julia Brown with the sums of $600 and $500, for rents and timber taken from the farm.

We shall next consider the question of the value of the land advanced to Cordelia Simpson. Her father fixed the value at $2,000 in the deed by which the land was conveyed to her. Subsequently she put improvements upon the land, of the value of about $1,000. Thereafter it appears that the land with the improvements on it sold, first, for $2,475, then for $2,800, and again for $2,900. Mrs. Simpson's brother, W. M. Myers, testified that the land at the time her father deeded it to her was worth $2,500. One other witness corroborates his testimony. C. P. Brown testifies that the property, at the time of the conveyance, was worth $2,000. John Elliott places the same valuation upon the land. George King, who purchased the land with the improvements on it, valued the land and improvements, at the time he bought the same, at $2,500. We are of opinion that the decided weight of the evidence is in favor of the view that the land, at the time of the conveyance to Mrs. Simpson, was worth only $2,000. It subsequently sold for more, but only after the improvements had been placed upon the farm. The trial court, therefore, erred in charging Mrs. Simpson with an advancement of $2,400, instead of $2,000.

Of the advancements charged by the court in its judgments to W. M. Myers, both he and his sisters complain. As to the various items, a large amount of testimony was taken. Without attempting to detail the evidence, which we have carefully considered, we may say that it leaves the mind in such doubt that the judgment of the chancellor will not be disturbed.

The court charged the land advanced to Mary Brown, in 1896, at $2,500. It appears that she received a few more acres than were given to her sister, Cordella Simpson; that being the case, we think a fair valuation of Mary Brown's land would be $2,200.

For the reasons given, the judgment on the appeal of W. M. Myers, and also on the appeals of Julia Brown, Cordelia Simpson and Mary Brown, is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

DISTRICT OF CLIFTON v. PFIRMAN, &c.

(Filed May 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Pleadings—Failure to Answer—Admissions—Effect—Where plaintiff in a suit to subject land to the payment of taxes failed to reply to an answer alleging that certain infants, who owned an interest therein, were omitted as parties defendant and failed to reply to answer of the infants, the averments of such pleadings must be taken as true.

2. Judgment—Omission of Parties—A judgment to subject land to the payment of taxes does not affect persons claiming an interest thereon who were not parties to the suit.

3. Judgment—Sale—Reversal—Rights of Infant Defendants—Where a judgment against infants for the sale of land is reversed, the infants may elect to allow the sale to stand or have it vacated and take the property by paying the debt which was a lien upon it.

C. L. Raison, Jr., for appellant.

John S. Roebuck, Jr., for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

In 1898 the appellant brought a suit in the Campbell Circuit Court against the widow and children of Casper Pfirman, alleging, in substance, that Casper Pfirman, who died in 1895, the owner of a lot of land in the district, left surviving him his only heirs at law, his widow and children, the defendants in said suit. That under his will his widow was given a life estate in the lot, with remainder in fee to his children. That Casper Pfirman, before his death, was indebted to the district for taxes due upon said lot, and that his heirs were also indebted for taxes upon it. The purpose of the action was to subject the lot to the payment of the taxes due by Pfirman and his widow and children.

In this action an answer was filed by the "defendants," in which they in effect controverted all the affirmative matter and prayed that the petition be dismissed. It does not appear that any evidence was taken in the case, but a decree was rendered, adjudging that the district had a lien upon the lot for the taxes sought to be recovered, and a sale of it was ordered for the purpose of satisfying the same. At a sale, under this judgment, the lot was purchased by the district for the amount of its taxes. Afterwards, the defendants in that action prayed an appeal to this court, and the judgment was reversed because of error in computing the interest due upon the taxes, and the case was remanded for proceedings in conformity with the opinion, which may be found in 29 Ky. Law Rep., 1004. Upon a return of the case to the lower court the defendants filed a supplemental answer, in which it was averred that Emma Shuckholz, a daughter of Casper Pfirman, and who was a defendant in the original action, died in 1889, and before the action was instituted, leaving surviving her as her children Clara Shuckholz, an infant daughter, and Eliza Reutler, and Lillie Caldwell. They further averred that Charles Pfirman, a son of Casper Pfirman, and his wife, died in 1903, and before the judgment was rendered, leaving two infant children. That neither of the children of Emma Shuckholz or Charles Pfirman were parties to the action in which the judgment was rendered decreeing a sale of the land, although each of them owned, and now own, two-sixths of the entire lot. The infants, as well as the adult children, also filed an answer to the merits of the petition, in the action in which the lot was sold, and asked that the judgment and sale be set aside. To these pleadings no answer was filed, so that these averments must be taken as true. Upon motion the lower court set aside the judgment and sale, and awarded appellees a writ to place them in possession of the land sold under the decree. This appeal is facts hereinbefore mentioned, to be filed, and also in setting aside the ment and sale and awarding a writ of possession.

When the judgment was rendered, the children of Emma Shuckholz and Charles Pfirman were not parties to the action, although they owned a two-sixths interest in the lot, and it is of course apparent that the judgment did not affect them. We are also of the opinion that the lower court properly permitted the pleading, setting up the facts hereinbefore mentioned, to be filed, and also in setting aside the judgment and order of sale.

The point is made for appellant that the court erred in setting aside the sale, because some of the owners were parties to the suit and before the court, and further that, as the appeal in the original action was from the judgment and not the order confirming the sale, the reversal did not have the effect of disturbing the title or possession of the purchaser at the judicial sale.

It has been held by this court that when a judgment is reversed the reversal does not affect the title or possession of the purchaser at a sale made under the judgment before the reversal, although he may be the plaintiff or a party to the action. (Yocum v. Foreman, 14 Bush, 494; Blake v. Wolfe, 111 Ky., 840; Talbott v. Campbell, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2198.) But there are exceptions to this rule, as may be seen from an examination of the cases of Baker v. Baker, 87 Ky., 461; Spicer v. Seale, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1869. The principle announced in the Yocum case has been further modified in the cases of Kavanaugh v. Wilson, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 476; Hess v. Deppen, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 15. It is not, however, necessary here to do more than mention these cases as illustrating that the purchaser at a judicial sale who is the plaintiff or a party to the action in which the judgment is rendered, will not, in every instance, be permitted to hold the property purchased without in some way accounting to the judgment creditor when the judgment is reversed. And we have no hesitation in declaring that if a judgment against infants is reversed the purchaser, if he be the plaintiff or a party to the action, will not be permitted to hold against their interest real property bought under it at a judicial sale. In such case the infants may either elect to allow the sale to stand or they may have the sale set aside and take the property upon the payment of the debt, which is a lien upon it.

It is the especial duty of the chancellor to guard the interests of infants, and the law has carefully provided that their rights shall be protected. Under section 518 of the Civil Code the lower court is given the power, after the term at which a judgment has been rendered, to vacate it upon the application of infants; and when, upon their application, regularly and properly made, the judgment decreeing a sale of their land is set aside, the sale should also be set aside, to the end that no injustice may be done them. The relief would be very inadequate and oftentimes wholly insufficient if the judgment alone should be set aside but the property sold under it be taken from the infants.

In answer to the argument of counsel for appellant that some of parties were adults, and although it might be proper to set aside the judgment and sale, so far as the infants were concerned, it was not proper to do so as to the adults. It may be said that the judgment was an entirety. The land sold was indivisible. The sale could not be set aside in part. The interests of the infants would be prejudiced by a partial vacation of the judgment and sale; and the court correctly set aside both. All of the parties in interest are now presumably before the court. If not, they can be brought in. The court has referred the matter to the commissioner to ascertain the amount due, and when it is determined, unless the defendants pay the same, the property may be sold to satisfy the debt.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BRADSHAW v. BUTLER.

N. H. W. Aaron for appellant Bradshaw.

Montgomery & Montgomery for Smith and others.

James Garnett and W. W. Jones for appellee Butler.

Appeal from Adair Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

John W. Butler died, testate, a resident of Culumbia, Kentucky, in July, 1905. Prior to his death, he made a will in January, 1905, one in February, 1905, and one in March, 1905. The March will was probated by the Adair County Court. Appellant and an adopted daughter, and the brothers and sisters of said Butler, prosecuted an appeal to the Adair Circuit Court from the order of the county court probating the March will. On the trial of this appeal the March will was rejected and the will made in February was probated, as the last will of John W. Butler. From that judgment an appeal was prosecuted to this court, and the judgment affirmed. The opinion may be found in 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1249.

This suit was brought by Bettie W. Butler, widow of John W. Butler, and devisee under his will, to obtain a construction of the will, and to recover the value of bonds and coupons amounting to about $1,500, which she claims to have furnished her husband in the years 1896 and 1897, at his special instance and request, to put in a house and improvements he was then building on a lot in Columbia, Kentucky. She also seeks to recover interest on the same from the time it was furnished, the whole aggregating $2,731.35, and to be adjudged a lien against the house and lot to secure the payment of the same. She occupied this property with the family until her husband's death, and has since occupied it as his devisee under the following will, which was probated as set out above:

"I, John W. Butler, of Adair county, make and publish this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills made by me.

"1st. I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid.

"2d. I will and devise to my brothers and sisters, who are living, and to the heirs of those who are dead, the sum of five thousand dollars, to be divided between them, that is, one-tenth to my brothers and sisters who are living, and one-tenth to the heirs of each of my brothers and sisters who are dead. These sums are to be paid to them by my executor.

"3d. I will and devise to my beloved wife, Bettie W. Butler, for and during her life, all the remainder and residue of my estate of every kind, real and personal and mixed, including my farm of 192 acres, which was conveyed to me by W. E. Frazer, and at her death to our daughter, Grace Butler Bradshaw; but should our said daughter, Grace Butler Bradshaw, die without issue, then what remains of my estate shall be divided in two equal parts, and one-half thereof shall go to my brothers and sisters and their heirs, as directed in the second clause of this will, and the other half shall go to the brothers and sisters of my said wife, or to their heirs.

"4th. I authorize my wife to sell and convey any or all of my real estate and to pass the fee-simple title to same.

"5th. I appoint my wife, Bettie W. Butler, executrix of this my last will, and request that she be permitted to qualify without security.

"Executed as my last will and testament, this 20th day of February, 1905.

(Signed) "JOHN W. BUTLER.

Witnesses: "R. F. PAUL, W. A. COFFEY."

On submission of the case the chancellor adjudged (1) that appellee, Bettie W. Butler, recover of the estate of her husband the sum of $1,500, with interest thereon from the 21st day of January, 1897; (2) That in addition to the income of the estate she was entitled to use the principal, if necessary for her reasonable comfort and support. (3) That the expression, "but should our said daughter, Grace Butler Bradshaw, die without issue," refers to her death without issue during the life-time of Mrs. Bettie W. Butler, and that Grace Butler Bradshaw took a fee-simple estate in the property devised. From so much of the judgment as gave to Mrs. Butler a recovery for the $1,500 and interest, and adjudged that she was entitled to encroach upon the principal of the estate, Grace Butler Bradshaw has prosecuted this appeal; from so much of the judgment as adjudged that Grace Butler Bradshaw takes an absolute estate in remainder of the property devised, the defendants, Sallie F. Smith and others—the brothers and sisters of John W. Butler—have also appealed.

It appears from the record in this case, that Mrs. Butler had some property which had been given to her by her father; that the sum which she had amounted to about $1,500, and was used in constructing the house in question. It seems that J. W. Butler preferred to build on his farm; but his wife and adopted daughter insisted that he build on the lot in town. As an inducement to his building in town, Mrs. Butler agreed to furnish a portion of the money necessary for that purpose. Passing the question of the competency of her testimony, it appears from her own statement that her husband said: "I am building this house for you;" to which she responded: "Put my money in it; that is all right; I would as leave have it in a house as any where else." No where in the record does it appear that he promised to repay the money, or to convey the house and lot to Mrs. Butler. Indeed, the very basis of the latter's claim shows that she does not rely on an express contract. The account which she filed in this case says: "To money furnished to John W. Butler in the years 1896 and 1897, at his special instance and request, for the purpose and which said money was used by him to build a two-story brick house and improvements on his lot, * * * with the understanding and agreement between us that said house and lot, with the improvements, should be mine, but which was never conveyed to me by deed, and on which account, he became indebted to me in the full amount of the money so furnished and the interest," &c. Col. Butler, one of the witnesses, states that Judge Butler said the house was to be Grace Butler Bradshaw's after Mrs. Butler got through with it.

We think the facts of this case bring it within the rule laid down in Nall, &c. v. Miller, 95 Ky., 448, and that Mrs. Butler was to find her reimbursement for the money furnished by her for the construction of the house in the location which she preferred and in the future use and enjoyment of the house. Furthermore, it appears that Judge Butler, as a matter of fact, did actually devise the premises in question, to Mrs. Butler for life. This was, in effect, a compliance with his promise when he said, as claimed by Mrs. Butler, "I am building this house for you." But even if this be not true, Mrs. Butler could not claim the property under the will and also claim compensation for improvements against the will. The two claims are inconsistent, and having elected to take the property under the will, she can not claim contrary to the will. (Gentry, &c. v. Gentry, 77 S. W., 1115; Morrison, &c. v. Fletcher, 119 Ky., 488.) The trial court, therefore, erred in giving Mrs. Butler judgment for the $1,500 and interest.

The next question is: Has Mrs. Butler the right to encroach upon the principal of the estate? The language of the will is certain and explicit. The estate is given to Mrs. Butler for and during her life. The fact that the testator afterwards used the expression "what remains," &c., can not be held to amplify the estate given to his wife. Nor do we think that the power of sale given in the fourth clause conferred any authority upon Mrs. Butler to encroach upon the principal of the estate. By the fifth clause she was appointed executrix. We think these two clauses should be construed together, and that the power given by the fourth clause was solely for the purpose of enabling Mrs. Butler to sell the property for the purpose of paying the debts and other charges against the estate. In no event could it be construed to enlarge the interest she was to receive; that was definitely fixed by the expression "for and during her life." We, therefore, conclude that the judgment of the chancellor, in holding that she could encroach upon the principal of the estate, was erroneous.

The last question involved is the character of the estate devised to Grace Butler Bradshaw. While it is true, as contended by counsel for Sallie F. Smith and others, that the cardinal rule of construction of wills is to arrive at the intention of the testator, yet in seeking the intention of the testator we must construe the language of the will in the light of the uniform rules of interpretation adopted by this court. In a long line of decisions, this court has held that, where an estate is devised to one for life, with remainder to another, with the further provision that if the remainderman should die without children or issue, then to a third person, the rule is that the words "dying without children or issue" are restricted to the death of the remainderman before the termination of the particular estate. (Merchante Bank of New York v. Ballard's Ass'ee, 83 Ky., 481; Ferguson, &c. v. Thomason, &c., 87 Ky., 519; Pruitt, &c. v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641; Harvey, &c. v. Bell, &c., 118 Ky., 512.)

For the reasons given, the judgment on the appeal of Sallie F. Smith and others, is affirmed; and the judgment on the appeal of Grace Butler Bradshaw is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

SOUTH COVINGTON & CINCINNATI STREET R'Y. CO. v. QUINN.

(Filed May 21, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Street Railways—Denying Passenger a Transfer Ticket—Compelled to Walk Home—Damages Recoverable—Where a little girl eleven years old, in traveling from Ludlow to Newport, a distance of several miles, had to change cars, and was entitled to a transfer in making the exchange, which she demanded, but was refused by the conductor, and by reason thereof she was compelled to walk alone to her home late in the evening for several miles through an unfrequented part of the way, she was entitled to recover damages for being refused a transfer ticket, and a verdict for $425 was not excessive under the facts shown.

Ernst & Cassatt for appellant.

B. F. Graziani and H. D. Gregory for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court, Law and Equity Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

In October, 1903, Catherine Quinn, a little girl eleven years old, who lived at Ludlow, Ky., went to school in Newport, Ky. She took a street car in Ludlow which carried her to Fourth and Madison streets in Covington. There she was given a transfer and took the Newport car, which carried her to Newport. In the evening, when she went home, she took a car in Newport, and when she got to Fourth and Madison streets in Covington, was transferred to the other car for Ludlow. She paid her fare on the first car always and was given a transfer to the other car. She had gone to school in this way for some time when, as she was going home in October, one afternoon, after taking the car in Newport, she paid her fare and asked the conductor for a transfer to Ludlow. He said, "All right, after a while." When the car got to the Licking River bridge, and he had not yet given her the transfer, she asked for it again. He then did not make any reply, just looked at her and went on. When the car reached Fourth and Madison streets when she went to get off, she said to the conductor, "Please give me a transfer." In a loud insulting tone he said to her, "Get off, I have't time to bother with you." At this she got off the car, and not having a transfer for the Ludlow car, did not get on it. She did not know what to do. It was a dark afternoon and she undertook to walk home, following the line of the street car track. It took her about an hour and a half to get home. For a part of the way there were no houses and the way was muddy. She became frightened and ran. When she reached home, she was in a bad, nervous condition, and a doctor was sent for. She was sick in bed for a week and was unable to go to school for half the time that winter. This suit was brought to recover for her injuries. The circuit court dismissed the petition, but on appeal to this court, the petition was held sufficient. (Quinn v. South Covington & Cincinnati Street Ry. Co., 30 Ky. Law Rep., 15.) On the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced witnesses showing the facts above stated. The defendant declined to introduce any evidence. The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if the defendant carried passengers from Newport to Covington and thence by transfer on its Ludlow line to Ludlow, Ky., the passenger paying the fare on the first car, and when the fare was paid receiving a transfer to Ludlow, and that the plaintiff paid her fare and requested the transfer to Ludlow to which she was entitled, and the conductor refused to give her the transfer, and by reason of his failure to do so she was compelled to walk from Fourth and Madison streets in the city of Covington to her home in Ludlow, Ky., and in doing so became frightened and was made sick and suffered physical or mental pain, they should find for her a fair compensation for such of these things as were the direct and proximate result of the defendant's refusal to give her the transfer. The jury found for her in the sum of $425, and the defendant appeals.

It is insisted for the defendant that the proof does not show that the plaintiff was on one of its cars or paid the fare to one of its conductors. It is urged for the plaintiff that these matters are not put in issue by the answer. The circuit court seems to have taken the plaintiff's view of the pleadings, but aside from that we think the evidence is sufficient to show, prima facie, that the transaction occurred on one of defendant's cars. The plaintiff testifies that she was on one of the Covington and Newport cars; that these were the cars she always traveled on and on which she was always given a transfer. The answer of the defendant admits that it ran a line of cars between Newport and Covington and between Covington and Ludlow; and it not appearing that any other company ran cars between these points, the proof that the transaction occurred on the cars running between these points and on the line which the plaintiff traveled upon on other days, is sufficient, prima facie, evidence to show that she was on the defendant's line.

It is also insisted that no recovery should be allowed for the nervous injury to the child from her becoming frightened or for the sickness or suffering caused by her running home. From the fact that she got home about a quarter after five, it is evident that she need not have run to get home before night. But it was a dark evening and the child may not have known how long it would be before dark, and as the outskirts of any town about nightfall are usually not a safe place for a girl, we can not say that it was unreasonable that she became frightened and did not walk home leisurely. If she had been a grown person, we would not, under ordinary circumstances, approve the recovery allowed by the circuit court; but here was a child, eleven years old, set down on the street corner of a city in which she did not live, several miles from home, without any means to get home and without protection. The conductor of the car was informed several times by the child that she wished a transfer to Ludlow. He could see by her looks that she was a school girl returning home, and could not but know that she was asking a transfer to go home. She was alone and carriers are under a peculiar obligation to children traveling alone in their vehicle.

In C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Lynch, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 467, the plaintiff was a girl, fifteen years old, living at Brighton, six miles from Lexington, and went to Lexington to school on the train every morning returning about six o'clock in the afternoon. On October 1st, she took the train for home; the conductor took her ticket, but, by mistake, took it to be a ticket for Chilesburg, which is nine miles from Lexington. He did not stop the train at Brighton, and when they were about one-half way between Brighton and Chilesburg, she called his attention to the fact that he had passed her station, asking him to take her back to Brighton. This he refused to do. When the train got to Chilesburg he had her to get off and left her standing on the platform without any acquaintance, in the dark. As she had no money, she set out and walked home. She became very much frightened and was sick for some time. She sued and recovered a verdict for $250. On appeal the judgment was affirmed. The testimony of the conductor in that case was in conflict with the testimony of the passenger. He said that he told the agent, Mr. Warnock, to take care of the young lady. In affirming the judgment, the court said:

"The conductor could see that the girl, with her school books, was placed in a very embarrassing position. She did not know Warnock or know anything about him. He did not tell her at any time that he would have Warnock send her home, nor did he tell her who Warnock was, or put her in his care. If he went off and left the girl standing on the platform, where she knew nobody, without making any arrangement for her, his conduct was very reprehensible. The girl had no clothes with her for the night; she had no money; there was not, so far as appears, any hotel or boarding house there but there was a livery stable at which a vehicle could be hired though it does not appear that she knew this, and it was a question for the jury whether she acted as might be reasonably expected of one in her situation at her age."

That case is very similar to the one now before us. If the plaintiff was entitled to be carried to Ludlow for the fare which she paid the conductor, and it was the duty of the conductor to give her a transfer, the case would not be substantially different if she had had a ticket for Ludlow and the conductor, after taking up her ticket, had set her off at the corner of Fourth and Madison streets in Covington. She could not get upon the other car without any transfer as she had no money. Under the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to be carried from Newport to Ludlow. The giving of a transfer did not change the essence of the transaction. Nor was it material that she was to be carried a part of the way on one car and a part of the way on another car. When she entered the car to go to Ludlow and paid the fare to take her to Ludlow, the defendant was under obligation to carry her to Ludlow, and when it refused to give her the transfer, this was a refusal to carry her to Ludlow. There is, therefore, no substantial difference between this and the Lynch case.

The verdict here is for $425; the verdict there was for $250. The difference is not so much as to justify us in awarding a new trial on the ground that the verdict is excessive. If the plaintiff's testimony is true, and it is uncontradicted, she was in fact damaged and in fact suffered much more than the plaintiff there.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. ELLIOTT.

(Filed May 21, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Railroads—Injury to Abutting Property—Smoke—Soot and Cinders—Liability for Damages—Where a railroad throws smoke, soot and cinders upon the property of another, it is a trespass upon the property for which, under sec. 242, of the Constitution, it must make just compensation for the injury, and it can not make any difference whether the railroad is upon a street in front of the property or elsewhere.

2. Same—Unusual Currents of Wind—A railroad company is responsible for such consequence as may ordinarily be anticipated, but it is not responsible for smoke, soot or cinders carried to adjoining property by unusual currents of wind.

3. Same—Damage for Noise—In an action by the owner of a dwelling abutting on a railroad for damages against a railroad company by reason of noise, smoke, cinders and dust, all the evidence as to the noise made should have been excluded, as the running of a railroad train is a lawful business and no amount of care can prevent the making of noise.

4. Same—Obstructing Street and Alley—Measure of Damages—Removing Obstruction—In an action by the owner of a dwelling abutting a railroad for damages in obstructing a street and alley adjacent to the property, the measure of damages is the diminution of the value of the property by reason thereof, but where the obstruction is removed by putting in a proper crossing, the measure of damages is for the time the obstruction was continued.

5. Changing Line of Railroad—Damages Caused Thereby—Where the line of a railroad track has been changed so as to bring it nearer to property than it was before the change, the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the property with the cinders, soot and smoke and obstruction of a street and alley, thereby, as they are, and what it would be without the increased cinders, soot or smoke or the obstruction of the street and alley, and unless such damage has thereby been increased there can be no recovery.

Trabue, Doolan & Cox, Robbins, Thomas & Corbett and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Mrs. A. O. Elliott is the owner of two lots in the town of Wickliffe, Kentucky, at the corner of Front and Court streets, on which she resides and conducts a hotel. Prior to the year, 1904, the line of the railroad ran west of Mrs. Elliott's house, near the Mississippi River, which gradually encroached upon the railroad track; and to avoid this trouble, the railroad company built a new line further from the river and between Mrs. Elliott's house and the central part of the town of Wickliffe. The new line crosses both Front street and Court street and also crosses an alley back of her house, her land running back to the alley. This suit was brought by her to recover damages from the railroad company for the obstruction of Front street and the alley and the injury to her property from the smoke and cinders thrown upon it and the noise incidental to the running of the railroad trains. The proof on the trial showed that, in a straight line it was two hundred and thirty feet from Mrs. Elliott's house to the old line of the railroad, and that it was one hundred and eighty feet from her house to the new line. The situation is shown on the following plot:

There was proof introduced on the trial showing that by reason of the smoke and cinders and the noise of passing trains, Mrs. Elliott's house was unsuited for a hotel, and had been depreciated in value something like two or three thousand dollars by the change of the road. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"1. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that defendant constructed a railroad in such proximity to the home of the plaintiff that the noise of defendant's trains and the smoke and dirt that passes from defendant's engines to plaintiff's property, renders her house less comfortable as a residence and less valuable by reason thereof; or if you believe from the evidence that defendant, in constructing its road, obstructed, stopped up or destroyed a portion of Front or First street and a portion of the alley in the rear of plaintiff's property, and that by reason of such obstruction, stoppage or destruction of said street or alley, plaintiff's property has been damaged; then you will find for plaintiff such damages as you may believe she has sustained by either or both of the above causes not exceeding the sum of $4,000, and in measuring such damages, if any, you will consider the value of her house and lot immediately before the defendant constructed its road and began to operate over it, and the value of the same property immediately thereafter, caused, proximately, by the two causes mentioned, that is to say by any increase in dirt, noise or smoke or by diminution in value of the property through the destruction of portion of Front street and of the alley in rear of said property.

"2. The court instructs the jury to find for the defendant unless the jury believe from the evidence that, by the change of the defendant's railroad, it was placed nearer to the plaintiff's property, and that there was increased noise and smoke thrown upon and around her property from what it had formerly been subjected to and by reason of such increased noise and smoke, her property was diminished in value, the law is for the defendant and you should so find, unless you may further believe, from the evidence, that the destruction of First street or the alley in the rear of plaintiff's property was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff's property, in which latter event you should find for plaintiff the difference in value, if any, between said property immediately before said street and alley were obstructed or destroyed, and the value of same immediately afterward and unless you believe the latter proposition or the one presented above, the law is for defendant and you should so find.

"3. The court instructs the jury that the defendant had the right to move its track from the west side to the east side of the plaintiff's property, and the jury can not find any damages resulting to her property solely from the change of location of its railroad."

A great deal of evidence was admitted on the trial as to the annoyance caused by the noise from the trains; one witness said that "it seems like the train is running in at your window, if you happen to wake up at night upstairs, on the north side of the house." All the evidence as to the noise made by the trains should have been excluded and the instruction should not have allowed any recovery on account of noise. The running of a railroad train is a lawful business carried on upon the owner's own property. The noise is inseparable from the running of the trains; no amount of care can prevent it. Mrs. Elliott's property does not adjoin the right of way, and if she can maintain an action for this noise, every property owner in the town could maintain a like action, and so could all those along the right of way. That an abutting owner on a street can not recover for the noise made by the trains was held in Cosby v. Owensboro R. R. Co., 10 Bush, 294; C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Gross, 43 S. W., 203; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Kleymeier, 105 Ky., 609; and in a number of other cases, this court in defining what may be recovered for, has omitted noise from passing trains. (Combs v. R. R. Co., 10 Bush, 392; Henderson Belt Line v. Dechamp, 95 Ky., 219; Willis v. K. N. I. Bridge Co., 104 Ky., 186.)

There was proof on the trial that the railroad made a cut across Front street and across the alley in the rear of Mrs. Elliott's lot, thus entirely obstructing travel along Front street or along the alley. It is insisted that as this obstruction of the alley and of Front street is at a point not abutting the property of Mrs. Elliott, she can not recover for it. There are authorities sustaining this view, but the rule in Kentucky is otherwise. In Transylvania University v. Lexington, 3 Ben Mon., 27, the court said:

"Every owner of ground on any street in Lexington, has a right, as inviolable as it is indisputable, to the common and unobstructed use of the contiguous highway, so far as it may be necessary for affording him certain incidental easements and services, and a convenient outlet to other streets. And of this right, the Legislature can not deprive him, without his consent, or a just compensation in money. The extent of this appurtenant right, depending on circumstances, may not, in a particular case, be easily definable with mathematical precision. As far as it exists, however, it partakes of the character of private property, and is therefore protected by the fundamental law, as property. But it can not, as to each proprietor of ground, be co-extensive with all the streets and alleys of the city. As a private right, it must, like that of vicinage, be limited to its own nature and end; that is, chiefly by the necessity of convenient access to, and outlet from the ground of each proprietor."

This case was followed in Gargan v. Louisville, &c., R. R. Co., 89 Ky., 212; Bannon v. Bohmeiser, 90 Ky., 52; Wickliffe v. I. C. R. R. Co., 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1159. As far as appears from the evidence the obstructions in the street and the alley are permanent, and if the condition remains at the trial, the measure of damages for the obstruction will be the diminution in value of the property by reason of it. But the defendant has no right to obstruct the highway and if it shall remove the obstruction by putting in a proper crossing, the measure of damages will be the diminution in value of the use of Mrs. Elliott's property during the time the obstruction was continued. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Carter, 76 S. W., 364; 77 S. W., 718.)

It is also insisted that as the railroad does not run along the street adjoining the plaintiff's property she can not recover anything for the smoke and dirt thrown on her property by the trains. The contrary rule was laid down in Willis v. K. N. I. Bridge Co., 104 Ky., 186, and in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Walton, 24 Ky. Law Rep.,

9. Where a railroad throws smoke and cinders upon the property of another, it is a trespass upon the property and this is an injury to the property for which, by the express mandate of the Constitution, compensation must be made. Sec. 242 of the Constitution provides:

"Municipal or other corporations or individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for the property taken, injured or destroyed by them."

Under this provision, where private property is injured by a railroad corporation, it must make just compensation for the injury, and it can not make any difference whether the railroad is upon a street in front of the property or elsewhere.

The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that there could be no recovery for smoke or cinders carried upon the property by currents of wind; the instruction was refused and of this it complains. In Elizabethtown, &c. R. Co. v. Combs, 10 Bush, 392, the court said:

"And if his houses are damaged by having smoke, soot or fire from passing engines thrown or blown into or against them, he is entitled to recover for this also."

In Henderson Belt Line v. Dechamp, 95 Ky., 224, the circuit court instructed the jury that the railroad company was not responsible for smoke or cinders carried upon the property by currents of wind. There was a verdict for the plaintiff and the railroad company appealed. The judgment was affirmed, but the only question before the court was whether the instruction was prejudicial to the railroad company. In the subsequent case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Kleymeler, 105 Ky., 612, the judgment was reversed for other reasons and at the conclusion of the opinion it was held that the instruction should have been given. But what the court had in mind was unusual currents of wind. The air is hardly ever still. Cinders and smoke will usually float off to one side of the railroad. This may be ordinarily expected and the defendant should be responsible for such consequences as must be anticipated; but it is not responsible for the smoke, or cinders carried to adjoining property by unusual currents of wind; and on another trial the court will so instruct the jury.

The court erred in telling the jury that the measure of damages was the difference in value of the property just before and just after the road was constructed. By this measure of damages, the jury necessarily got into their minds that they should take into consideration the diminution in value of the plaintiff's property by reason of the change in the location of the railroad. On another trial the court will tell the jury that if the increased cinders, soot or smoke or the obstruction of the street or the obstruction of the alley diminishes the value of the plaintiff's property, then the measure of damages is the difference in value of the property with the cinders, soot and smoke and obstruction of the street and alley as they are and what it would be without the increased cinders, soot or smoke or the obstruction of the street or alley. The court will, in lieu of the second instruction, on another trial, tell the jury that unless the plaintiff's property has been diminished in value by reason of the increased cinders, soot and smoke thrown from the trains upon the property or by reason of the obstruction of Front street or the alley in the rear of the property, they should find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

G. B. Saufley, T. H. Shanks and T. J. Hill, Jr., for appellant.

James Breathitt and Thos. B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Lincoln Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

Appellant was tried, convicted and sentenced to serve his natural life in the penitentiary. He was charged with having willfully and maliciously shot at one person, with the intention of killing him, and missing him and wounding another. He was also charged with having been twice, previously, convicted of felonies.

It appears from the record that Stanford is a local option town, and, at the time the offense charged in the indictment was committed, there was a saloon in the town of Rowland authorized by law to sell whisky, which was situated about one mile from the town of Stanford. Appellant, a colored man, was invited by one George Smith, a white man, to go with him to Rowland to get some liquor. Another person present loaned Smith a quarter, and also furnished appellant with a quarter to get some whisky for him, and promised to give appellant some of it, when he returned, for his trouble. Smith and appellant went first to appellant's house to get some bottles to put it in, and while there Smith borrowed appellant's overcoat. They went along the railroad track, and when about one-half mile away Smith placed the overcoat on the ground near a telegraph pole. When they reached the saloon Smith gave appellant his quarter and requested him to buy the liquor, stating that they would divide it when they returned to Stanford. They entered the saloon; appellant purchased the whisky and stepped out in front of the building; Smith walked into the back room of the saloon and found Ed McCarty sitting in a chair drunk, they walked out into the saloon, took several drinks, left and started to Stanford along the railroad track. As they left, they addressed appellant saying: "nigger, come on." He started off walking behind the parties. When they reached a point about two hundred yards from the saloon they stopped and McCarty remarked to appellant: "nigger, come up and divide that whisky," and when appellant reached a point on the track opposite where they were standing near the track, McCarty said something which caused appellant to run. Smith and McCarty pursued him for about one hundred yards, when appellant left the track, ran up an embankment about eight feet high. McCarty followed him; there was a wire fence at the top of the bank that prevented appellant from going farther. We will quote what each of the three said took place at this particular time. Smith testified that:

"We were then close on to him, and when he ran up on the bank he turned around and I saw a pistol in his hands. At this time McCarty was starting up the bank towards him. Jim told him three times to 'stop, go back,' and just as he said it the third time, McCarty turned to start back, as I thought. Instantly I heard a shot and saw the fire jump in the direction of McCarty. When McCarty turned to come down off of the bank, just before the shot was fired, I saw a knife in his hands. But I do not know when he drew it from his pocket."

McCarty testified as follows:

"I went up the track after him for about one hundred yards and overtook him. He then ran off the track, and up on an embankment, and had his pistol out. I went up after him, but just as I reached the top of the bank, he pointed the pistol at me, and I turned to come back down. When I saw him point his pistol I was afraid he would shoot me, and I pulled my knife from my pocket, as I turned he fired one shot at me and another down the track."

Appellant testified as follows:

"They walked on up the track to the cattle guard at the Goshen pike crossing, about one hundred and fifty yards from the saloon, and then stopped. I walked on and just as I got even with them I saw Mr. McCarty pull something out of his pocket, and heard it click. It was a moonlight night and I could see plain that it was a dirk knife, with a long blade. McCarty said: 'skidoo, you black s—— b——,' and I started running up the track towards Stanford. They ran after me for about one hundred yards, and I was getting tired. I ran off the track, and up on a bank on the side of the track and they were close on me when I did this. I tried to get out of the way, but ran into a barbed wire fence that is on the side of the track, and they were so close on me that I did not have time to get through it. I backed up against it as far as I could, and told Mr. McCarty, who had followed me up on the bank, wife his knife in his hand, to go back. I said this to him three times, but he kept coming on me and was cutting at me. * * * I shot once into the ground right by his side and near his feet to scare him into going back. He kept pressing me and I fired again at him. He then stopped, and turned back down off the bank, and went on up the track with Smith, and I followed behind them."

Appellant assigns many grounds for a reversal of the case; but we will only consider one or two of them. His counsel claims that the instructions given by the court are erroneous and prejudicial to defendant. Instruction number one is as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that in this county, and before the finding of this indictment, namely March 6, 1907, the defendant, James Tall, willfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, shot and wounded George Smith with a pistol, with the intention of killing him or shot at Ed McCarty with the intention of killing him, and wounded said Smith, but of which wounding said Smith did not die, then you will find the defendant guilty, and fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than five years."

It is contended that this instruction submits two offenses for the consideration of the jury; one for shooting at George Smith with intent to kill him, and shooting at Ed McCarty with the intent to kill him, and missing him and wounding George Smith. We are of the opinion that this criticism of the instruction is not correct. George Smith received a slight wound in the conflict, but it is doubtful whether appellant intentionally shot at him; but there is no doubt as to whether or not he shot at Ed McCarty. The instruction referred to the same act or offense committed by appellant, and if he shot at George Smith, maliciously and with the intention of killing him and not in self-defense, he is guilty. But if he did not shoot at George Smith, but shot at Ed McCarty, without legal excuse and with a like intent, and missed him and wounded Smith, he is guilty. The instruction referred to the same act of shooting and in our opinion it is proper.

Instruction number three is as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in this county, with a pistol, and before the finding of the indictment, the defendant, in the sudden heat of passion, upon a provocation reasonably calculated to excite the passion of the defendant beyond the power of his control, and not with malice aforethought, willfully shot and wounded George Smith, with the intention of killing him, or shot at Ed McCarty, with the intention of killing him, and wounded said Smith, but of which wounding said Smith did not die, thence you will find the defendant guilty and fix his punishment at a fine of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, or confinement in the county jail for not less than six months nor more than one year, or both so fine and imprison him, and you may provide in your verdict that he work at hard labor until the fine or imprisonment is satisfied, or until both are satisfied."

This instruction is erroneous and was prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant. The court improperly inserted in the instruction language properly applicable to an instruction in a case of voluntary manslaughter, to-wit: "Upon a provocation reasonably calculated to excite the passion of the defendant beyond the power of his control, and not with malice aforethought and intention to kill." This phrase should not have been inserted in an instruction on the offense defined in section 1242, of the statutes, which is a lower degree of the offense designated in section 1166, of the statutes, for malicious shooting at and wounding another with intent to kill. Section 1242, of the statutes, is in part, as follows:

"If any person shall, in a sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice, and not in self-defense, shoot at without wounding, or shoot and wound another person, or wound a person other than the person shot at, with a gun or other instrument, loaded with ball or other hard substance, without killing such person."

The instruction given by the court omits the words, "in a sudden affray without previous malice and not in self-defense." This very question was under consideration in the case of Violett v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1720. In that case the court said:

"It will be observed that the instruction of the court defining the offense does not follow the language of the statute. By the instruction of the court the offense consists in shooting in sudden heat and passion without previous malice. By the statute it consists in shooting 'in a sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice and not in self-defense.' The words 'in sudden affray' are not synonymous with the words 'in sudden heat and passion.' The statutory offense is, therefore, different from that defined in the instruction, and, under the evidence in the case, the jury might well have concluded that the shooting was done in a sudden affray, and inasmuch as they were allowed by the statute to graduate the punishment according, as in their judgment, the defendant was in the wrong, the failure of the court to define the offense properly to the jury was prejudicial to the defendant, and, in view of the severity of the verdict, under the evidence, we are of opinion that a new trial should be had."

In the case at bar, if this instruction had been properly given, the jury might have concluded that it covered the offense committed by appellant, instead of finding him guilty under the first instruction.

The instruction on self-defense was correct with this exception; it only allowed appellant to avert the impending danger by shooting at Smith, when it should have allowed the jury to acquit him if he shot at McCarty or Smith or both of them, if it was apparently necessary to save himself from the impending danger. We are confident that this error was caused by inadvertence by the court, or the clerk in making the copy for this court.

Appellant objected and excepted to the action of the court in allowing the indictments, on which the former convictions were secured, to be read in evidence to the jury, and in permitting the Commonwealth attorney to comment upon them in his argument. These indictments stated the particular acts which constituted the felonies in the previous convictions. It also introduced in evidence the judgments of convictions and the sentences of the court for the previous felonies. Section 1130, of the Kentucky Statutes, provides, that if a person be convicted three times of a felony, he shall be confined in the penitentiary during his natural life. Judgments in such cases shall not be given for the increase and penalty, unless the jury shall find from the record and other competent evidence the fact of former convictions for felonies committed by the prisoner in or out of the State. It will be seen from this language that it is the conviction of former felonies that authorizes the life penalty and the evidence of former convictions are limited, in our opinion, to the verdict and judgment of conviction and the sentence, and also proof showing that the defendant is the same person that was convicted of the previous felonies, which is the other competent evidence referred to in the statute. If the word "recorded" as used in the statutes was intended by the General Assembly to include more than the judgment of conviction and sentence, then it must include the whole record, which would include all motions made and objections entered and the orders of the court made during the trial. The statute did not mean to place this burden upon the Commonwealth, and besides this would be prejudicial to appellant; it would place before the jury all the facts and particular circumstances with reference to the charges for which he was previously convicted, which would tend to prejudice the minds of the jurors against him; and the jury might possibly not be able to give proper consideration and weight to the testimony with reference to the offense then under investigation. The Commonwealth has no right to show the facts with reference to the previous convictions; and it is not necessary for it to show that the judgment of conviction had never been vacated, set aside or reversed. If such was the case it devolved upon the defendant to prove these facts. (Gragg v. Commonwealth, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 873.)

For the errors in the instructions the judgment is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MURRAY'S ADM'X. v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed May 21, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligently Killing Engineer—Action in this State—Killing in Tennessee—Jurisdiction of Action—A railroad engineer, who was a resident of this State, was killed while running his train in the State of Tennessee, by the negligence of the defendant railroad company. His administratrix brought suit for damages in this State. There was no averment in the pleadings and no proof as to what the law of Tennessee is. At the conclusion of the evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for defendant. Held—That this was proper.

2. Same—Law of Sister State—Absence of Allegation or Proof—Presumption—Until the contrary is alleged and proved, the courts of this State will presume that the common law is yet in force in a sister State. At common law a cause of action for injury to a person dies with the person, and no action can be maintained for his death.

3. Same—Judicial Presumption—While it is presumed that the common law prevails in a sister State, it is not presumed that the statutes of a sister State are the same as those of this State. Judicial presumption rests on the truth as shown by the usual course of things but they are not indulged as to matters which can not possibly be true.

B. F. Proctor, G. H. Herdman, J. G. Covington and Greene & VanWinkle for appellant.

Benjamin D. Warfield and Sims, DuBose & Rodes for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

John Murray was a locomotive engineer, in the service of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, pulling a train southward from Bowling Green. While he was running under orders he came suddenly in the night upon some cars standing on the main track. A collision ensued in which he was killed instantly, in the State of Tennessee. This suit was brought in the Warren Circuit Court by his administratrix, to recover for his death. There was no averment in the pleadings of the plaintiff or of the defendant as to what the law of Tennessee is, and no proof was introduced on the trial by either party on the subject. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. This was done, and the plaintiff's petition having been dismissed, she appeals.

The proof on the trial showed that the cars in question had been placed on a side track, but that the side track sloped toward the point where the cars were found and that in some way the cars had started and run out of the siding down on the main track, where they were when Murray's train ran into them. The fact that the cars were on the track is sufficient to make out for Murray a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the master, as he was running in obedience to his orders, and manifestly the master did not furnish him a safe place to work. The facts shown, therefore, were sufficient to take the case to the jury if it had not appeared that the accident took place in Tennessee.

In 6 Thompson on Negligence, sec. 6991, the rule is thus stated:

"The law of the place of the injury controls in an action for wrongful death; and the right to recover and the amount of the recovery are governed by the lex loci and not by the lex fori. These statutes have no extra-territorial effect. If the death of the deceased and the act which caused it occurred beyond the territorial limits of the State where the suit is brought, an action for wrongful death will not lie under the statute of that State, whether such act and death took place in another State or upon the high seas. It does not alter the case in this respect that both parties were citizens of the State where suit is brought; or that the wrong-doer was a corporation chartered by that State; or that the injury was occasioned by negligence which was a breach of a contract entered into in that State or that the corporation whose wrongful act inflicted the injury was chartered both in the State where the death occurred and in the State where the suit was brought; or that the person injured was brought into the State before his death, and there died."

(8 Am. & Eng. Cyc., 885, 13 Cyc., 314, Wharton on Conflict of Laws, sec. 480d.)

Murray was instantly killed. Here the whole matter occurred in Tennessee. Until the contrary is alleged and proved the courts of this State will presume that the common law is yet in force in a sister State. (Cope v. Daniel, 9 Dana, 415; Johnson v. Bank U. S., 2 B. Mon., 310; Miles v. Collins, 1 Met., 311; Honore v. Hutchins, 8 Bush, 692.)

At common law the cause of action for an injury to the person died with the person and no action could be maintained to recover for death. (Eden v. Lexington and Frankfort R. R. Co., 14 B. Mon., 165.) As it must be presumed that the common law is still in force in Tennessee, and as no right of action existed at common law to recover for the death of a person, and as Murray was killed in Tennessee, where under the record, it must be presumed that the common law is still in force, it follows that the circuit court properly held that no action could be maintained in Kentucky to recover for his death without proof of what the law in Tennessee is. It is true that since the passage of Lord Campbell's act in England, statutes have been passed in this country, in nearly all of the States, allowing a right of action in such cases. These statutes differ very much in their terms. As to who are fellow-servants, or to whom the recovery shall go, or by whom the action may be maintained or what is necessary to be shown to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the rules differ very much in the different States. The court, therefore, can not intelligently proceed in such a case as this, unless it knows the statute of the State regulating the matter.

It is insisted that it should be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the statute of another State is the same as the statute of his State, and that as the plaintiff may recover under the laws of this State on the facts shown, it should be presumed that he might recover under the laws of Tennessee. It is said that this court so laid down the rule in Chesapeake, &c. R. R. Co. v. Venable, 111 Ky., 41, but in that case Venable was not killed. That was an action which might be maintained at common law, in this case the plaintiff has no right of action at common law and can only sue by virtue of a statute. The Kentucky Statutes have no extra-territorial effect and therefore do not apply to the case. While it is presumed that the common law prevails in a sister State, it is not presumed that the statutes of a sister State are the same as the statutes of this State. To so hold would be to require us to presume that the Legislature of other States meets at the same time as the Legislature of Kentucky and changes the laws of those States simultaneously with the changes that are made in Kentucky. Judicial presumption rests on the truth as shown by the usual course of things but they are not indulged as to matters which can not possibly be true. (Moss v. Rowland, 3 Bush, 505; Klenke v. Noonan, 118 Ky., 436; Arnett v. Pinson, 108 S. W., 853; Wharton on Conflict of Laws, sec. 781c.)

Judgment affirmed.

AMERICAN-GERMAN NATIONAL BANK v. GRAY & DUDLEY
HARDWARE CO.

(Filed May 22, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Actions—Obtaining Goods by Fraud—Action for Recovery of Specific Property—Waiver of Contract—Where goods have been obtained by a party without any intention of paying for them, and with a design to cheat the vendor, the vendor, upon discovering the fraud, may elect to treat the contract of a sale as a nullity and bring his action for the recovery of the specific property or for its value.

2. Same—Innocent Purchase—Defense—In an action against one for goods alleged to have been obtained by fraud, the defendant having disposed of the goods for value, can only defend on the ground that he was an innocent purchaser for value without notice of any fraud in the party from whom he obtained them.

3. Same—Person Converting Goods—Liability to Owner—An owner of property may maintain an action for its value against a person converting it whether he be the original trespasser or not.

4. From an Action—Pleading—Claim and Delivery—Description of Goods—Forms of Action are Abolished by the Code—All that is now required in a pleading is to state the facts constituting a cause of action without reference to the form of the petition. An action for claim and delivery of property requires a particular description of the property and a statement of the separate value of each article claimed.

Bradshaw & Bradshaw, Flournoy & Reed and W. D. Greer for appellant.

Hendrick, Miller & Marble for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

The Gray & Dudley Hardware Co., a Tennessee corporation, brought this suit of claim and delivery in the McCracken Circuit Court on the 24th day of September, 1906, for a lot of merchandise, consisting of whips and lashes, valued at $348.45, claiming to be the owner of said property. The parties defendant to the original petition were E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., R. J. Barber, assignee of E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., American-German National Bank and the Cohankus Manufacturing Co. On September 25, 1906, an amended petition was filed, making W. S. O'Brien, O. B. Starks and the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. parties defendant, and claiming that said merchandise was detained by these defendants in conjunction with the other defendants in the original petition. To the original and amended petitions each of the defendants, except the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. and its assignees, filed a separate answer. The defendants, W. S. O'Brien, O. B. Starks, Cohankus Manufacturing Co. and the American-German National Bank, each denied that they had possession of, or set up any claim to, or had any control over said whips and lashes.

The Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co., in its answer, claimed that it had full possession and control over said merchandise and was the owner thereof; that it had acquired title to same in due course of trade by becoming an innocent purchaser thereof for a valuable consideration, without notice of any alleged prior rights of others thereto. Trial was had, and the jury brought in a verdict finding for plaintiff the goods sued for, and further finding them to be of the value of $348.45. Thereafter the court rendered judgment against the American-German National Bank for the recovery of said goods, or their value—$348.45. From an order overruling its motion and grounds for a new trial, the American-German National Bank prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the record that, on August 23, 1906, the Gray & Dudley Hardware Co., which had a branch establishment at Eddyville, Ky., received by mail an order for a lot of whips and lashes from the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. On Monday, September 3, 1906, the Gray & Dudley Hardware Co. (appellee) shipped to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. whips and lashes to the value of $348.45. On September 20, 1906, the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. made a deed of assignment to R. J. Barber, for the benefit of its creditors. At the time of the assignment, the assets of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. amounted to about $25,000, while its liabilities amounted to over $150,000. The goods were received by the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. on September 6, and were delivered to the Cohankus Manufacturing Co.

R. S. Mason testified that he was the general manager of the Gray & Dudley Hardware Co., at Eddyville. After detailing the facts connected with the purchase, he said that he came to Paducah on September 22, 1906. After supper he saw Mr. Rehkopf and asked him if he knew where the goods were. The latter replied that they were in the warehouse, but he did not know what warehouse. He then went and found the goods at the Cohankus Manufacturing Co.'s warehouse, which is located just across from the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. He met Mr. Starks in front of the postoffice, and Mr. Starks told him the goods were out at the warehouse, but he didn't want him to tell the old man that he (Starks) had told him. The conversation occurred about half past five or six o'clock Saturday evening. On Sunday morning Mason went and found the goods. On the following day suit was instituted. When he found the goods they were in the original packages, just as they had been shipped. There were other goods in the warehouse. The goods he saw were those ordered by the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. When he went with the sheriff to find the goods, they had been removed from where they were on Sunday, and they experienced some difficulty in finding them. Mr. Starks did not assist in the search. When the sheriff wrote on the box, Mr. Starks said they were his goods. He then told Mr. Starks that, if they were his goods, he had purchased them since Saturday night. Mr. Starks replied that he would show when they came to court that they were his goods. When looking over the papers of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. he saw a note for $6,000, signed by Oscar Harper, and payable to the American-German National Bank, or warehouse—he did not remember which. When he saw the note of Oscar Harper, Mr. Rehkopf said to him: "I made this note and put this leather in there to the bank. He wasn't satisfied with it, and put your whips in with it too, after he contended that he must have your stuff, and I put your whips in there too."

The president of the American-German National Bank testified that, on September 4, 1906, E. Rehkopf, president of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., brought to the bank for discount a note of O. C. Harper, executed to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. and endorsed by E. Rehkopf, and offered $6,200 of warehouse receipts as collateral security for same. Not being satisfied with the security, he demanded more, and Rehkopf promised to deliver to him additional collateral in a few days. With that understanding the note was accepted by the bank and the proceeds placed to the credit of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. This was a new loan, and not a renewal of any old loan. Pursuant to his agreement, Rehkopf, on September 11, 1906, offered additional security in the shape of warehouse receipt No. 21, issued to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. by W. S. O'Brien, a public warehouse of Paducah, Ky., covering a lot of whips and lashes valued at $348.45. He accepted this additional collateral, not knowing from whom or when the whips had been bought. He believed, at the time of the transaction, from the reports of commercial agencies and other sources, that the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. was entirely solvent. The E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. had for a long time been a customer of the bank and a large borrower, and had notes and bills maturing almost daily. Afterwards, on September 13, 1906, the president of the American-German National Bank notified E. Rehkopf that the bank was carrying too much of his paper, and that he must do something to reduce his loans. On September 17, 1906, the whips and lashes, covered by said warehouse receipt No. 21, together with a large lot of other merchandise, amounting to something like $23,000, were sold by the bank, with the consent and pursuant to the instructions of E. Rehkopf, the president of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., to the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co., and the proceeds credited on the indebtedness of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. Invoices of all the goods sold were delivered to the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. at the time of the sale.

O. B. Starks testified that he was the president of the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co., and that on September 17, 1906, he, as president of said company, bought the merchandise in controversy, together with other merchandise from the American-German National Bank, which held the warehouse receipts for the same, and delivered to him an invoice for the goods that were stored in the public warehouse of W. S. O'Brien at the Cohankus factory. At the time, he did not know from whom the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. had bought the property.

W. S. O'Brien testified that he was the keeper of warehouses in Paducah, Ky. He leased warehouses, issued warehouse receipts, and kept records of goods received and receipts issued. He had leased the Cohankus house where the goods were stored. He received them on September 11, 1906, and issued warehouse receipt therefor on that day to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co.

Appellant contends for a reversal on the following grounds: (1) The verdict was against the evidence. (2) There was a fatal variance between appellee's pleading and proof. (3) The court erred in rendering judgment against the appellant, American-German National Bank, because there was no proof of detention or possession by it at the time of the institution of the action, but, on the contrary, the defendant, Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. admitted the detention and possession by it at said time.

First. The law is now well settled, that where goods have been obtained by a party without any intention or reasonable expectation of paying for same, and with a design of cheating the vendor out of his goods, or to obtain them without consideration, the vendor may, upon discovering the fraud, elect to treat the contract of sale as a nullity and bring his action for the recovery of the specific property, or an action for its value. (Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 24, 1135; Dietz v. Sutcliffe, 80 Ky., 650; Brown v. Popham, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 543; Crozier's As'ee v. Cromie, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 858.)

In actions of this kind, it is difficult to prove the fraud of the purchaser except by his subsequent conduct. At the time the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. purchased the goods in question, its assets did not amount to over $25,000, and its liabilities were over $150,000. These liabilities consisted of small accounts due various parties in all parts of the United States. When the goods were received by the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., they were not opened or taken out of the original packages. They were delivered to a warehouse, and the warehouse receipt was then delivered to appellant. The goods were not sold, nor was it sought to sell them in due course of trade. A warehouse receipt was delivered to the bank, and the goods subsequently sold, along with other merchandise, to the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. The entire proceeds of this sale, including the proceeds from the whips and lashes, sold by appellee to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., were applied to the payment of the latter's indebtedness to the bank. At the time the goods were purchased the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. could not have paid to its creditors over sixteen and two-thirds cents on the dollar. The turning over of the proceeds of the sale in question to the bank shows that it did not even intend to pay this much to its general creditors, including appellee, but proposed to apply the whole proceeds to the payment of its indebtedness to the bank. From this evidence, we think the jury were authorized to conclude that the goods were obtained by fraud. The goods being obtained by fraud, and appellant having received the value of the goods, it could defend only on the ground that it was an innocent purchaser for value without notice. Counsel for appellant contend that, under the rule laid down in Union Trust Co. v. Bulkeley, 150 Fed. Rep., 510, the discounting of the note for $6,000, and the placing of the proceeds to E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co.'s credit with the understanding at the time that additional collateral was to be furnished, made it an innocent purchaser for value, and, as the president of the bank testified that he believed the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. was solvent, and did not know when or from whom it purchased the property in question, the bank certainly had no notice that the goods had been obtained by fraud. Even conceding the law to be as stated, the statements of the president of the bank are not conclusive of the character of the transaction in a case like this. It does not conclusively appear that the saddlery company really received the benefit of the proceeds of the note discounted by the bank. The president only claims that the saddlery company got the benefit of it; that it was placed to its credit. The mere deposit of that amount of money to the credit of the saddlery company does not show that the latter received the benefit of it. From all that may be gathered from the statements of the president of the bank, it may, as a matter of fact, have been used to pay an overdraft or other indebtedness on the part of the saddlery company to the bank. If, as a matter of fact, the proceeds were used to liquidate other indebtedness due the bank by the saddlery company, the money advanced by the bank on the note was, in effect, a mere payment of pre-existing indebtedness, and did not constitute the bank an innocent purchaser for value. The acts of the president in demanding more collateral, as well as in disposing of the goods for which the bank held warehouse receipts, show that the bank was, to say the least, very uneasy about the saddlery company's indebtedness to it. That the saddlery company was largely indebted to the bank, and had done its business at the bank for a number of years; that the bank demanded additional collateral and afterwards disposed of all the goods for which it held warehouse receipts for the purpose of reducing the indebtedness of the saddlery company to it; coupled with the further fact that, within a few days thereafter, the saddlery company made an assignment, show a condition of affairs from which the jury might have reasonably inferred that the officers of the bank knew of the saddlery company's insolvency, and that it was unable to pay for goods it was purchasing at that time. Owing to the many peculiar and suspicious circumstances connected with the case, we think the question, whether or not the bank was an innocent purchaser for value without notice, was one for the jury, who heard all the witnesses and knew many of them personally, and could best tell what credence to give their to statements.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"No. 1. If you shall believe from the evidence in this case, that at the time the defendant, E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., ordered and obtained from the plaintiff the goods in controversy in this action, that said defendant's officers or agents, offering or obtaining said goods, knew that said E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. was insolvent and had no reasonable expectation of being able to pay plaintiff for said goods, and made the order for said goods without any intention of paying for same, or without any reasonable expectation of paying therefor, and with the design of cheating the plaintiff out of said goods, or to obtain them without consideration, and that said officers or agents concealed said designs from the plaintiff, then in law the plaintiff is the owner of the goods sued for, and entitled to recover possession thereof, and if you shall so believe then you will find for the plaintiff the goods sued for, and in your verdict fix the value thereof, at not exceeding three hundred and forty-eight dollars and forty-five cents ($348.45), the value alleged in the petition, unless you shall believe, as stated in instruction No. 3 herein, and this instruction is given you subject to said instruction No. 3.

"No. 2. But unless you shall believe from the evidence in this case, that the goods in controversy were obtained from plaintiff by defendant, E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., under the facts and circumstances stated to you in instruction No. 1, therein, then the law is for the defendant, and you will so find.

"No. 3. Although you may believe from the evidence, that the goods in controversy were obtained from the plaintiff by defendant, E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., under the facts and circumstances stated to you in instruction No. 1 herein, yet if you shall further believe from the evidence in this case, that after the delivery of said goods by plaintiff to defendant, E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., that said saddlery company placed same in a public warehouse in the city of Paducah, Kentucky, and caused the warehouse receipt exhibited to you in evidence to be issued covering said goods, and shall further believe that said warehouse receipt was delivered and pledged by said E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. to the defendant, American-German National Bank, for money loaned to said saddlery company, or for a note or notes discounted at the instance or request of said E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., or its officers or agents by reason of the delivery to it, and upon the faith of said warehouse receipt, and without any knowledge or notice that said E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. had obtained said goods from the plaintiff, under the facts and circumstances stated to you in instruction No. 1 herein, if you shall believe that said goods had been so obtained, then the law is for the defendant, and you will so find. But unless you shall so believe from the evidence, then the law is for the plaintiff as defined to you by instruction No. 1 herein."

Instruction No. 1 properly presents the law as to whether or not the goods were obtained by fraud. Instruction No. 3 presents appellant's defense in language as favorable to it as it could reasonably contend for. In this instruction the jury were told to find for the defendant if they believed that the warehouse receipt was delivered and pledged by the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. to the American-German National Bank for money loaned to said saddlery company, or for a note or notes discounted by it at the instance or request of the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., or its officers or agents, by reason of the delivery to it, and upon the faith of said warehouse receipt, and without any knowledge or notice that the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co. had obtained the goods from the plaintiff under the facts and circumstances stated in instruction No. 1. In finding for the appellee the jury must have believed either that the bank did not buy the note in question for a valuable consideration, or that it had notice of the fact that the goods were fraudulently detained. While the bank may not have had notice of the latter fact, the circumstances surrounding the $6,000 transaction and the subsequent delivery of collateral security, are such as to lead us to the conclusion that the verdict of the jury was not flagrantly against the weight of the evidence.

Second. It is contended by counsel for appellant, that, as appellee's petition did not charge that it had been deprived of possession of, or title to, the goods by fraud, but simply sought to recover the property as its own, it could not do so under the proof in this case, appellee showing by its own witnesses, that it sold and delivered the goods in the regular course of trade to the E. Rehkopf Saddlery Co., and had, as vendor, placed said vendee in possession of, and invested it with title to said goods. In this view of the law, however, counsel are mistaken. Appellee had the right to treat the goods as its own, and sue for their recovery or their value in case of their conversion. This rule is well settled by a long line of authorities. (Dietz's Ass'ee v. Sutcliffe, 80 Ky., 650; Longdale Iron Co. v. Swift's Iron & Steel Works, 91 Ky., 191; Reager, v. Kendall, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 27.)

Third. Counsel for appellant further contend that, as the American-German National Bank did not have possession of the goods in question at the time of the institution of the suit, and, as the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. answered admitting that it had possession of the goods, judgment could not properly go against appellant.

In the early case of Pool v. Adkisson, &c., 1 Dana, 110, which was an action of detinue for the recovery of two slaves who, the proof showed, were at that time in the State of Missouri, the court, speaking through Chief Justice Robertson, said:

"But is detinue maintainable? We think it is. Since the case of Burnley v. Lambert (2 Wash., 308), it has been considered that proof of possession by the defendant at the date of the writ, is not necessary in an action of detinue. In Southcote's case (4 Co. Rep., 83), detinue was maintained against a bailee (to keep safely) after he had been robbed of the thing bailed.

"In many cases it would be difficult to ascertain the motive which induced a defendant to part with the property prior to the institution of the suit for it. And surely the right to maintain detinue, can not depend on grounds so precarious and delusive as the fact that the defendant was in the possession at the date of the writ, or at the time of its service, or the fact that, in parting with the possession prior thereto, he had acted wantonly or in bad faith. Such a metaphysical inquiry as the latter seems not to be required by principle or authority, and would, were it required, tend to the subversion of the action of detinue."

Furthermore, it has been held that the owner of property may maintain an action for its value against a person converting it, whether he be the original trespasser or not. (Ballentine, Jr. v. Joplin, &c., 105 Ky., 70; Justice v. Mendall & McLanahan, 14 B. Mon., 10; Newcomb-Buchanan Co. v. Baskett, 14 Bush, 658.)

Forms of action were abolished by the Code. All that is now required is to state the facts constituting a cause of action, without reference to the form of the petition. The present action of claim and delivery requires a particular description of the property claimed, and also the separate value of each article to be stated. The very purpose of stating the separate value of each article is to enable the court to render judgment in case the defendant fails to deliver the property. Indeed, the action of claim and delivery takes the place, and has in it all the elements of detinue, replevin and trover. If the party in possession has converted the property, and no longer has it in his possession, he is liable for the value thereof.

But counsel for appellant contend that appellee's petition was defective, and that he could only recover the value of the property in case he asked for that specific relief. Appellee's petition, however, complied with all the provisions of the statute with reference to an action for claim and delivery. It set forth the separate value of each article, and not only prayed for a recovery of the property, but for all proper relief. Assuming, as was found by the jury, that appellant was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, it necessarily, then, converted the proceeds of appellee's property to its own use. It, alone, received the proceeds of the property, when it was not entitled to receive any portion thereof. The court did not err in giving judgment against appellant.

The fact that judgment was not given against the Starks-Ullman Saddlery Co. is not assigned as ground for a new trial, and it can not, therefore, be considered. However, it may be said that judgment should not have gone against the latter company merely because it admitted possession of the property, if the evidence showed that that company bought and paid for the goods without notice of the fraud by which they had been obtained.

Perceiving no substantial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

COSTEN v. PRICE.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Partnership—Settlement of—Race Mare—This suit grows out of a partnership in a race mare. The evidence examined and held that the contract of settlement was voluntarily entered into by appellant and he is bound by it.

2. Expense of Training Mare—Absence of Contract or Agreement—In the absence of any contract or agreement as to the payment of the training of the mare, one-half of it should be paid for by each of the two partners, the ownership of the mare being joint.

John T. Shelby and B. T. Southgate for appellant.

Allen & Duncan for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

This suit involves the settlement of the partnership between appellant and appellee in the race mare "Avana." The appellant, plaintiff below, sued to recover possession of the mare, alleging that he was the owner thereof; later, by a supplemental pleading, he admitted that the defendant was claiming an interest in the mare and he asked that she be sold, the questions in dispute between himself and defendant adjudicated, and the proceeds arising from the sale disposed of according to their rights. By agreement of parties the mare was sold. The defendant answered, alleging that he and plaintiff were the joint owners of the mare, each owning a one-half interest in her; that he had cared for, boarded and trained her from the spring of 1895 to June 25, 1898, and that there was due him for moneys expended by him in the care, keep and training of said mare, over and above the moneys which had been paid to him by the plaintiff on account, and the moneys which she had won in purses, the sum of $287.20. The reply admitted the existence of an arrangement by which defendant had been entrusted with the care and training of said mare, denied the terms of the contract, and pleaded an entirely different contract, under which defendant is shown to have been indebted to plaintiff in a larger sum. The allegations of the reply were traversed and issue was finally joined, the main questions in dispute being the terms of the contract under which defendant had the care, possession and training of the mare.

It appears from the pleadings that the defendant also trained the race horse, "Peter Pan," during a part of the time covered by this account for plaintiff, but, upon motion, all items charged for the account of this horse were stricken from the pleadings of the defendant, as were all sums set up in the plaintiff's pleadings as having been paid on account of this horse, so that the case was tried out on the questions in dispute relative to the keeping, care and training of the mare "Avena" alone.

Much proof was taken in support of the respective claims and contentions of the litigants, and, upon final hearing, the trial judge found that there did exist a partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant in the mare "Avena," and he adjudged that each was entitled to one-half of the proceeds arising from the sale of said mare, and dismissed the suit, with the directions that each party pay his own costs. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, the defendant prosecutes a cross-appeal, and we are asked by each to reverse the finding and judgment of the chancellor on the sole ground that the decided weight of the evidence is against the judgment.

In April, 1895, appellant became the owner of the race mare "Avena," and under some sort of an arrangement, about the terms of which the record is not clear, he placed her in the hands of appellee to train. Appellee kept her from this time until in the early part of May, 1896, at which time appellant alleges that appellee was claiming something over $2,000 from him for having trained and boarded the mare "Avena" from April, 1895, to May 5, 1896, and the race horse, "Peter Pan," during the greater portion of said time. That appellant considered the charges made against him for this service extortionate there can be no question, and it was only after a prolonged and heated argument that an agreement or understanding was reached in regard thereto, according to the statement of appellee, while appellant insists that the so-called settlement into which he entered at that time was forced from him on an imperfect and partial showing, and under such circumstances that it should not be upheld, but that he is entitled to an accounting, a settlement and adjustment of all business transactions between himself and appellee from April, 1895, to the beginning of this litigation.

In this meeting of May 5, 1896, as claimed by appellee, appellant, in settlement and adjustment of the claims between them, gave to appellee a bill of sale for one-half interest in the mare "Avena," and $100 in cash, and that this bill of sale and the $100 settled all matters in dispute between them relative to the mare "Avena," save and except her keep for the winter months, for which he is entitled to compensation at the rate of $10 per month. Appellee admits that, during the time between April, 1895, and May 5, 1896, appellant paid him, on account, $674 in money, and it is conceded that he was chargeable with purses won by "Avena," which would increase appellant's credit to something more than $800. So that, according to his own admission, he received from appellant for the keep of the race mare, "Avena," during this time, and the race horse, "Peter Pan," during the greater portion of this time, $674, paid during the time, $100 paid May 5, 1896, and a one-half interest in the race mare, "Avena," which he estimated to be worth $700, and purses won by the mare during the season of 1895, amounting to something over $100. Appellee testifies that, on that occasion, he gave to appellant a full statement of his claim and account, this appellant denies, and it is left a question between the two. The statement of the accounts between them is not at all satisfactory. Appellee lost, or misplaced, and could not produce the books in which the original entries of the items of expense were made. Appellant asked to be relieved from the terms of the contract which he there made. He is shown, by the record, to be a man of affairs and much business experience, and, although we are of the opinion that even though the circumstances were such that he felt impelled to make a settlement on appellee's terms, which were very oppressive, rather than be subjected to the vexations and annoyances of a, perhaps, tedious litigation, still they were voluntarily accepted, made and entered into by him, and he is bound by whatever trade they made on that date. They certainly did not make a partial settlement, it was either in full or none at all. We are of opinion that it must be regarded as a full settlement of all matters relative to the keep of the mare to that date. It is agreed by the parties that on this date a new arrangement was made and entered into, by which they were to be governed and controlled thereafter, but they differ very materially as to the construction to be placed upon the terms of the contract by which appellee was to continue to keep the mare. Under the arrangement which they made on that date, whether it was as stated by appellee or appellant, appellee kept the mare from that date, May 5, 1896, to the institution of this litigation in June, 1898. During this time, according to appellee's own statement, he received from appellant $111 in money, and in purses won by said mare, $2,602.30, and when in June, 1898, he was called upon to settle his accounts with appellant, he presented a claim for services and expenses incurred in training and caring for said mare during this time, amounting to nearly $3,400, and, after giving to appellant credit for $1,301.15, one-half of the purses won and $110, which was paid to him it still leaves appellant indebted to him in the sum of $287.20.

Appellant disputes the correctness of appellee's claim for services, expenses, &c., and claims that after May 5, 1896, he paid to appellee the sum of $130 on account, and that giving to appellee every claim to which he is justly entitled, there is due him on a settlement of their accounts, $1,399. Appellant insists that after May 5, 1896, he was to pay to appellee $1 per day for caring for and driving the mare "Avana," and he was to be at no other expense excepting the cost of shipping, shoeing, doctor's bills, &c., while appellee states that appellant said he would pay no feed bills, but would allow appellee, by the month, for training his mare, that he was willing to pay $5 per month while she was not in training, in the winter, and 50 cents per day, as his share of the cost of training, and one-half of all necessary expenses, such as shoeing, doctor's bills, freight, medicine, &c. Appellee insists that it was customary and understood that this necessary expense included railroad fare and hotel charges for himself and his helper a boy whom he had with him, and it is more than likely that these items had been included in the bill which he presented for the previous year, but appellee also admits that in this conversation with appellant, appellant plainly told him that "from this time on I will know what I am doing." It is not claimed that in the conversation of May 5, 1896, appellee stated he was to be paid his railroad fare, board, &c., and like charges for his helper, as part of the necessary expenses to be charged up to their joint account and, it is quite certain from appellant's testimony, that he did not so intend or understand.

There is no material difference between appellant and appellee as to what the contract was, so far as it was stated on that occasion. The difference between them comes from appellee's construction as to what is covered by the terms "expenses," it being his contention that this term includes his railroad fare, hotel bills, helper's hire and railroad fare and hotel bills. Whereas, appellant insists that the term "expenses" should properly cover shoeing, doctor's bills, costs of shipping the mare, &c.

Much confusion seems to have occurred in the account between these litigants because of the fact that the mare in question was a partnership mare and being handled by one of the partners. There is no occasion, however, for any confusion on this account. Appellant and appellee, being the joint owners of the mare, contracted with appellee, a horse trainer by profession, to train and care for her. In the absence of any contract or agreement as to what the charges for this service should be, it being admitted that it was to be paid for, appellee would be entitled to have the fair and customary and usual charge for this character of service allowed to him, and no more, and this amount, when determined, should be paid one-half by appellant and one-half by appellee.

Appellee testifies that during a portion of the time he trained horses of his own, as well as horses belonging to other parties, and, while traveling around the circuit, he frequently drove horses for other people in races. So that, it will be seen that, in the absence of an express contract, it would be both inequitable and unjust to permit appellee to charge his railroad fare and his board bills, as well as those of his helper, to the account of this one mare, and in fact, if this be done and if the joint account, which he holds against this mare, is to be made responsible for the cost of his assistant and his traveling expenses and hotel bills, we are at a loss to understand why it should also be charged with $2 per day while around the circuit, and this is what we find it charged with, for, in the itemized account which appellee has presented, there is a charge for $2 per day for every day during the season when the mare was away from home, and $1 per day for her training while she was at home. Surely the $60 per month was intended, as appellants insist it was, to cover all expenses save the actual cost of shipping the mare, and her bills for shoeing, doctoring, medicine, &c. It is admitted that, at the time this arrangement was entered into, appellant and appellee had just been engaged in a heated discussion, and they did not enter into or discuss in detail, or at any great length, the terms under which the mare was to be continued in the possession, and under the care and control of appellee, and, from the record, it is certain that their minds did not agree on the contract as appellee understands it, and if their minds did not meet then no agreement was reached as to the charges to be made, and appellee is only entitled to receive a fair compensation from the partnership for the services which he rendered. While the record evidence on this point is quite meagre, the witness, Gus Macey, testifies that he is in the habit of handling horses for others, and that while there is no absolute and fixed price, still his custom was to charge $1 a day and necessary expenses for training, and that this necessary expense did not include either the cost of the hire of his assistants, the or his board, or their or his traveling expenses, but only the necessary expenses for transporting the horse. Such a charge, it seems to us, is ample and adequate, and when there is added to this, for appellee, the additional charge of a $1 a day for every day that the mare is on the circuit away from home, we are of opinion that appellee is well compensated for the services which he rendered. A mere statement of the account between these litigants from the time they entered into this business transaction to its termination, will show that the advantage is all on the side of appellee.

Appellee had charge of the mare "Avana" for a little over three years, and of the horse "Peter Pan" about one year. During that time he received in purses more than $2,700; in cash from appellant, according to his own admission, $885, and according to appellant's contention, about $1,000, and a one-half interest in the mare, for which he agreed to pay $700, and which he has sold for $1,000, making a total which he has received for the care and training of one horse during thirty-eight months and another horse about twelve months, making a total of fifty months for the two, of more than $4,200, and he still claims that appellant is indebted to him in the sum of $287.20. Whereas, appellant bought the horse, for which he alleges he paid $1,800; he has paid to appellee about $1,000 in money, making his outlay about $2,800, and he has left but a one-half interest in the horse with a claim against him for $287.20.

Appellee presents no book of original entry for the reason, as he testifies, that they were lost after he had his wife draw off the account on a sheet of paper, while appellant lost his memorandum for moneys paid in an earthquake. None of the claims for expenses incurred are vouched for by receipted bills or other evidence showing their correctness. Appellee denies the receipt of any moneys at the hands of appellant after May 5, 1896, save the sum of $111, paid as follows: One hundred dollars, ten dollars and one dollar, so that the correctness of the claims of each litigant rests at last upon his own statement in regard thereto.

The litigants sought to have their differences settled and their accounts adjusted, and neither is satisfied with the judgment of the chancellor. We are of the opinion that the nearest to a correct solution of this litigation is found by allowing to appellant credit for the various items of cash which he alleges he paid to appellee subsequent to the date of the settlement on May 5, 1906, and by allowing to appellee all items of expense which he has charged to their joint account save those for hire and helper, and board and railroad fare for himself and helper, witch hazel, and the items of expense charged for services rendered prior to May 5, 1896. With these items deducted from his account, there remains the sum of $1,247.15, properly charged to the account of appellant. This sum, when credited with $130, the amount which it is found appellant paid to him on account leaves appellant indebted to him for services in the sum of $1,117.15. Appellee admits that since May 5, 1896, he has collected in purses won by "Avana" the net sum of $2,602.30, and appellant is entitled to one-half of this sum, or $1,301.15; deducting from this the amount which appellant owes to appellee, as above indicated, there is a balance due appellant of $184. The mare was sold for $2,000, and this sum, less such an amount as is due for taxes thereon, is in the hands of the commissioner.

Upon a return of this case the court will enter a judgment in favor of appellant for $184, with interest from the 8th day of June, 1898, until paid, and costs, and he will direct one-half of the net proceeds of the sale paid over to appellant, and out of the remaining one-half he will direct the judgment of appellant to be paid, and the balance of said one-half, after the judgment and costs are satisfied, to be paid to appellee.

For the reasons indicated this case is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Wm. J. Steinert for appellants.

Barker & Woods for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

The question in this case is, whether or not Mary E. G. Lawson took a life estate or the fee under the following deed: "This deed made this 9th day of March, 1871, between E. D. Polk, of the first part, and my daughter, Mary E. G. Lawson, wife of Alexander Lawson, and her bodily heirs after her, parties of the second part, both of the county of Jefferson and State of Kentucky, to-wit: For and in consideration of one dollar cash in hand paid and the natural love and affection I have for my daughter, Mary E. G. Lawson, and her bodily heirs after her, do give, grant, alien, convey and confirm unto the parties of the second part forever, all of a certain tract or parcel of land in the county of Jefferson, described as follows: * * * To have and to hold to the said parties of the second part, forever, and singularly, the tracts thereunto belonging. * * * The said party of the first part covenants to and with the parties of the second part that it is free from all encumbrances whatever, and warrants and forever defends the same against all claims of all persons whatsoever."

Questions very similar to the one here involved have been before this court in a number of cases, and an examination of them discloses the fact that there is seeming conflict in the opinions; but this conflict is more apparent than real, and usually resulted from an effort upon the part of the court to arrive at the intention of the grantor gathered from the relation of the parties as well as from expressions indicating his intention that might be found in the instrument under consideration. It is a rare thing that two deeds or wills containing the expression "bodily heirs" are in other particulars precisely alike. The tendency, however, of the court is to construe deeds like the one before us as vesting the fee rather than a life estate. In favoring this construction we have followed the legislative intent, as expressed in section 2342, of the Kentucky Statutes, declaring that "unless a different purpose appear by express words, or necessary influence, every estate in land created by deed or will without words of inheritance, shall be deemed a fee-simple or such other estate as the grantor or testator had the right to dispose of," and section 2343, providing that "all estates heretofore or hereafter created, which in former times would have been deemed estates entailed, shall henceforth be held to be estates in fee-simple." As illustrating the purpose of the court and the trend of its decisions, as well as the difficulty in formulating any rule that may safely be depended upon in the construction of deeds similar to this one, we call attention to the following cases:

In Johnson v. Johnson, 2 Met., 331, the court said: "It is the settled rule, established by numerous adjudications of this court, and recognized and acted upon in several cases, that the words 'heirs of the body,' 'heirs lawfully begotten of the body,' and other similar expressions, are appropriate words of limitation, and must be construed as creating an estate tail, which, by our statute, is converted into a fee-simple, unless there be something else in the deed or will from which a reasonable inference can be drawn that the words were used in a sense different from their legal and technical signification."

This principle has been recognized and applied in the following cases. Prewitt v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641; Hall v. Moore, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 56; Handy v. Harris, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 225; Jones v. Mason, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 842; Davis v. Davis, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1132; McGennis v. McGennis, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 598; Lanham v. Wilson, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 109; Ruby v. Ruby, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 879; Short v. Terry, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 241; True v. Nichols, 2 Duv., 547.

On the other hand, there is a line of cases holding that, under a conveyance to the grantee "and the heirs of his body," or, "his bodily heirs," the grantee takes a life estate only, with remainder to his children. Among these may be noticed Prescott v. Prescott, 10 B. Mon., 56; Brann v. Elzey, 83 Ky., 440; Righter v. Forrester, 1 Bush, 278; Mitchell v. Simpson, 88 Ky., 125; Louisville Trust Co. v. Erdman, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 729, in which it was held that "bodily heirs," or "heirs of his body," were words of purchase and not of limitation, and that they were intended to be synonymous with "children."

Again, in Combs v. Eversole, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 932, where the conveyance was "to Catherine D. Bolin and the heirs of her body" * * * "to have and to hold unto the said Catherine D. Bolin and the heirs of her body, their heirs and assigns forever," with covenant of warranty unto "the parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns forever;" it was held that Catherine D. Bolin and her children took a joint estate in the land.

In view of the uncertainty in arriving at the intention of the maker of an instrument like a deed or a will, in the use of the words "heirs of his body," "bodily heirs," or the like, and when the mind is left in doubt as to the true meaning, we regard it as safer to conclude that the conveyance was designed to pass the fee and not a life estate or a joint interest. And this construction should prevail, in the absence of language indicating a purpose, to invest the person named as grantee with only a life estate or a joint interest. It is more in harmony with the legislative intent as expressed in the statute than would be a construction that only gave to the named grantee a life estate or an interest less than the fee. Where the word "children" is used, as when the estate is given to "A and his children," the uniform ruling has been that "A" will not take the fee; but, whether he will take a life estate or a joint estate with the children is to be determined from a consideration of the relationship of the parties and the language of the instrument. (McFarland v. Hatchett, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 276; Hall v. Wright, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 1187.)

And so when the intention, as manifested in the language, is to convey a life estate, with remainder over, there has been no disposition to defeat, by construction, the purpose of the grantor. But in the deed before us, the only grantee named is Mary Lawson. There is nothing in the instrument to indicate that the grantor only intended that she should take a life estate. There is no remainder over, nor are the words "children" or "child" used. On the other hand, it is manifest that, under the rules of the common law, the words "and her bodily heirs after her," would have created an estate tail, which, by our statute, is converted into the fee. (Johnson v. Johnson, 2

Met., 331; Pruitt v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641.) We do not attach serious importance to the fact that the words 'parties of the second part' are used. The words "party" or "parties" are commonly employed interchangeably in deeds, and we often find the expression "party of the first part" when there are several grantors, and the words "parties of the second part" when there is only one grantee. This deed appears to have been written by an experienced person; and if the intention had been to give to Mary Lawson only a life estate, or to give the property to her and her children jointly, it would have been so written. In our opinion she took the fee.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed, for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

False Pretenses—Money Obtained Thereby—Forging Name of Surety on Note—Errors in Instructions Corrected—This is a prosecution against Walter R. James Breathitt and Chas. H. Morris for appellee.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

The appellant, Walter R. Day, was indicted for obtaining money under false pretense; upon a plea of "not guilty," he was tried, convicted and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for one year. Conceiving that the punishment is not merited, and that there has been a miscarriage of justice in his case, he prosecutes this appeal, and, as grounds for reversal, relies upon the following: First, that there was not sufficient evidence to authorize the court to instruct on the question of the ownership of timber in Perry county; second, that the indictment not having alleged the inability of the plaintiff to produce the note, and the note itself not having been satisfactorily accounted for, it was error to admit secondary evidence of its contents, and no instruction should have been submitted on that charge in the indictment; third, the plaintiff failed to prove that the Hazard Bank was incorporated, no proof whatever was submitted on that point.

The facts, as developed in this case, are, briefly stated as follows: Sometime in the early part of March, 1904, the Hazard Deposit Bank, of Hazard, Ky., received, in the regular course of mail, the following letter:

"Frozen Creek, Ky., March 1, 1904.

"Cashier Hazard Deposit Bank,

"Hazard, Ky.

"Dear Sir—We have bought some timber in your county and want to begin operations about May 1, and we want to borrow $3,000 from you for six months, and want to keep our account with you while operating. Will give as security Floyd Day, and any one else you desire, and will pay you 8 per cent. on said loan.

"Please let us hear from you at once, and oblige

"Yours truly,

"N. B. DAY & CO."

This letter was written upon a letterhead upon which there appeared the following:

"All agreements are contingent upon strikes, accidents or other causes beyond our control.

"Floyd Day.

Walter R. Day.

Carl Day.

"General Store.

"N. B. Day & Co.

"White Oak, Cross Ties, Crossing Plank, Switch Ties, Street Rail-road Ties.

"Full Dressed Staves for Ale and Beer."

Upon receipt of this letter the cashier of the bank forwarded to Day & Co. a blank note. A few days thereafter the note was returned to the bank filled out and signed as follows:

"Six months after date we promise to pay to the order of the Hazard Bank, Hazard, Ky., three thousand one hundred and twenty dollars, value received, negotiable and payable at the office of the Hazard Bank, Hazard, Ky. And we hereby pledge first as security therefor and second as security for any other debt or liability we may now or hereafter owe or be under to said bank.

"The parties hereto agree to pay 7 per cent. from maturity of this note until paid, and they hereby authorize said bank to sell and transfer for cash any securities pledged and mentioned herein, without notice, should this note not be paid at maturity, and apply proceeds to its payment, with interest and all costs, and hereby severally waive notice of non-payment, protest and notice of protest, and sureties consent that time of payment may be extended without notice thereof.

"N. B. DAY & CO.,

CARL DAY,

"WALTER R. DAY,

FLOYD DAY."

This note was accepted by the bank, discounted and the proceeds, amounting to $3,000, placed to the credit of N. B. Day & Co., and was drawn out of the bank on five checks, four of which were signed, "N. B. Day & Co., by Walter R. Day," and the other was signed, "N. B. Day & Co." Floyd Day denied that he signed the note or authorized any one to sign it for him, and denied that he was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co.

The officers of the bank testified that they relied upon the representation that was made to them by appellant in the letter above set out that Floyd Day would sign the note as surety, and when the note was returned to the bank with the name "Floyd Day" signed thereto, they accepted it as his genuine signature. They also relied upon the statement in the letter that N. B. Day & Co. had bought timber in Perry county and were going to begin operations about May 1; they further stated that they were lead to believe by the letterhead on which the letter was written, that Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co.; that they had made investigation, and had failed to find that N. B. Day & Co., or Walter R. Day, had bought or owned any timber in said county; that Floyd Day was known to be a man of considerable wealth for that community. For the defendant, it was testified that Floyd Day had either signed the note in person, or had authorized Walter R. Day, to sign for him, and, as evidence tending to support this latter proposition, they introduced the following letter:

"Frozen Creek, Ky., March 21, 1902.

"To Whom it May Concern:

"This is to certify that I have this day given to W. R. and Carl Day, the right to use and sign my name in any way they may see fit in connection with any transaction connected with the business of the firm of N. B. Day & Co.

"Given under my hand this 21st day of March, 1902.

The defense also introduced evidence tending to show that Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co.

Appellant testified that he was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. Floyd Day is his uncle. That for years the firm of N. B. Day & Co. used the name of Floyd Day as a business partner, and that Floyd Day had, on several occasions, endorsed for the firm; that Floyd Day lived about eight miles from him; that he was elected State Treasurer on the Republican ticket in 1889, and after he lost his office was sued in Franklin Circuit Court for some $30,000; that to evade the payment of this debt he placed all of his property in the hands of his uncle, Floyd Day, and left the State; that the firm of N. B. Day & Co. had originally been composed of Nathan B. Day and his two sons, Walter R. and Carl Day. Nathan died in 1899, and Floyd Day qualified as his administrator. After the death of their father, Walter R. and Carl Day carried on the business of N. B. Day & Co. for about two years, at which time Floyd Day, who had then practically settled up the business affairs of Nathan B. Day, permitted the use of his name in the firm of N. B. Day & Co., and executed the writing of date March 21, 1902, as above set out. Floyd Day denied signing the power of attorney bearing date of March 21, 1902, although several witnesses were introduced who testified that they were familiar with his handwriting, and that in their opinion, he did sign it. A letter purporting to have been written by Floyd Day on August 31, to Walter R. Day, which is as follows:

"You will please send me a list of the staves unsold. You must get rid of them this month. Have you received any orders lately? Let me know just what you have, and I will try and get rid of them from this end of the line. Has the Clay City Lumber and Stave Co. sent you any orders?

"P. S.—Enclosed find a letter which explains itself.

was introduced for the purpose of showing that Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co.

Appellant also testified that in a letter bearing date of October, 1903, his company entered into a contract with the Continental Realty Co., by which it had sold to the said company certain lands for $57,500, and that after this contract had been entered into, he had a conversation with his uncle, Floyd Day, in which his uncle said to him that his firms were hard up for money, and that he wanted him and Carl to take sufficient interest in the contract to take care of the paper of N. B. Day & Co., and let him have the balance to use in his private business; that the lands which he had contracted to the realty company were surveyed at a considerable expense and thereafter the said company declined to take the lands, and their failure to so do resulted in a law suit.

It is shown that Floyd Day undertook the settlement of his nephews' business and agreed to buy the business of N. B. Day & Co., and Walter R. Day and Carl Day, and settle the indebtedness of the company, and turn over any surplus to appellant's wife. This agreement was entered into in the spring of 1905. It appears that many of the debts upon which Floyd Day was surety were settled and compromised by him, though he denied having signed same. When so settled he had them assigned to him without recourse. The note, which is the basis of this prosecution, was likewise taken up by him, and was not introduced in evidence on the trial, it being alleged by Floyd Day that, after he had taken it up, he filed it with the commissioner in a case in the Breathitt Circuit Court, and the clerk of the Breathitt Circuit Court testified that the report of the commissioner of the court showed that the Hazard Bank had presented a claim for $3,213, being composed of two items, $3,120 and $93, interest, but, the note was not with the report, and it is not shown what had become of it.

Appellant had no personal interview with the bank. Any misrepresentation which he made by which the bank was deceived to its prejudice was made through the correspondence above set out. For the Commonwealth, it is urged that the bank was deceived by the printed letterhead, and led to believe that Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. We fail to see how this was possible, for it was wholly immaterial to the bank whether Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. or not, for, if a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. then, he was bound to the bank by the signature of the firm, and if not a member of the firm, he was bound on the note by his individual endorsement as surety, so that in any event he was bound for the payment of this money, whether a member of the firm or not, if he in fact signed the note or authorized his nephew, the appellant, to sign it for him. It will not do to say that the bank was deceived to its prejudice by the letterhead and thereby induced to part with its money, for such was not the case, nor could it have been the case. It loaned the money on the strength of the representation that Floyd Day would sign the note and had he been a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. he could not have been more firmly bound for the payment thereof than he would have been by his signing the note as surety, nor would the security of the bank have been in the least enhanced by his having been a member of said firm, for the reason that the note, being signed by the firm, all of its assets were liable to secure its payment and being signed by Floyd Day, individually, all of his property subject to execution was likewise liable for its payment. It was immaterial to the bank whether Floyd Day was a member of the firm of N. B. Day & Co. or not, so far as this transaction was concerned.

This being true, it was error for the court to instruct the jury upon this point, for no principle is better settled than that the deception must be upon a material point, its falsity known to the maker, made for the purpose of deceiving, and must, in fact, be relied upon by, and deceive the party to whom it is made, to his prejudice.

Appellant stated in the letter in which he sought this loan, that his company had purchased timber in "your county," meaning Perry county, and expected to begin operations shortly thereafter. The officials of the bank testified that they were unable to learn of any timber which he, or his company, had bought in their county, while appellant testified that at the time this letter was written, his company had made an arrangement to close quite an extensive contract, which called for the purchase and sale of a large amount of timber land covering a portion of several counties, including Perry, but that this deal, when apparently almost completed, fell through. That at the time he wrote this letter he was expecting this deal to be completed, and had it been his company would have had the timber contract about which he wrote. The evidence upon this point, for appellant, is not quite clear, from the record, but he very positively testified that his company did own timber in Perry county, and there is no evidence whatever offered on the part of the Commonwealth which contradicts the testimony of appellant in regard to the timber, and, as it was incumbent upon the Commonwealth to make out her case, it was her duty to show that appellant did not have timber in Perry county, and the failure of the bank officials to find any timber owned by him, or his company, is not by any means conclusive of the fact that he, or they, did not own it. There being a failure of proof on this point on the part of the Commonwealth, no instruction should have been given thereon.

The appellant wrote the bank that he would give Floyd Day, his uncle, as surety on the note, and later he presented to the bank a note with the signature of Floyd Day signed to it. If, as a matter of fact, this name was not signed to the note by Floyd Day in person, or by some one who had been authorized to sign it for him, then, in procuring the money from the bank on said note which contained the forged signature of Floyd Day, appellant practiced a fraud upon the bank, but if, on the other hand, it was the genuine signature of Floyd Day, signed by himself in person, or by some one authorized to sign for him, then no fraud has been perpetrated, and this is the question in this case which should have been submitted to the jury by an appropriate instruction.

For appellant it is also insisted the Commonwealth should have been required to produce the note in order that appellant might see it and have it exhibited to the jury for their inspection. The witness, Floyd Day, testified that he filed the note with the commissioner of the Breathitt Circuit Court, and upon another trial of the case a subpoena duces tecum should be issued for said official, and he should be required to produce said note or satisfactorily account for its absence. If, upon another trial, the evidence is the same or practically the same as upon this trial, the court will instruct the jury as follows:

"1. If you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Walter R. Day, in Perry county, at any time before the finding of the indictment herein, presented to the Hazard Bank a note for $3,120, dated March 15, 1904, and due six months thereafter, for discount, intending the bank to discount it as having on it the genuine signature of Floyd Day, when in fact he knew that Floyd Day had not signed said note and had not authorized any one to sign his name for him to said note, and that he did this for the purpose of obtaining money from said bank, and that he received from said bank the sum of $3,120, or any other sum of money on said note, then you will find the defendant guilty, as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at confinement in the State penitentiary for any length of time, not less than one year nor more than five years, in your discretion.

"2. Although you may believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Walter R. Day, signed the name of Floyd Day to the note in question, yet, if you shall further believe from the evidence that the defendant, Walter R. Day, was authorized by Floyd Day to sign and use his name in connection with the business of N. B. Day & Co., then you will find the defendant 'not guilty.'

"3. If you believe from the evidence before you that Floyd Day himself signed the note in question, then you should find the defendant 'not guilty.'

"4. If, upon the whole case, you entertain a reasonable doubt of the defendant's having been proven guilty you will find him 'not guilty.'"

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

1. Pleadings—Amendments—Divorce Cases—In the matter of amendments to pleadings there is no difference between divorce causes and other actions. In this case, however, the amendment came too late—long after the parties had pleaded to an issue, and the court properly refused it to be filed.

2. Adulterous Acts—May be Shown After Date of Acts Alleged in Petition—It was error for the chancellor to sustain exceptions to depositions which tended to establish adulterous acts on the part of appellant after the dates of the acts alleged in the original petition.

3. Witnesses—Credibility of—Where evidence is introduced that a witness is a creditable person, the statutory requirements are complied with regarding the certification of depositions by the officer taking them.

4. Alimony—Wife not Entitled to When Lewd Conduct Established—It has been repeatedly held by this court that where the husband is granted a divorce because of the lewd conduct of the wife, she is not entitled to alimony.

James C. Klein for appellant.

Greene & Tilford and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This litigation deals with the sad story of the domestic infelicities of a young couple who for ten years had apparently enjoyed each others confidence and esteem. During this time three children, all boys, were born to them. The husband was a traveling salesman, and his business necessarily took him away from home a great part of the time. By thrift and economy he had saved money to purchase a small home in the city of Louisville, where his wife and their infant children resided. The title to this home was taken in the name of the wife. Sometime during the year 1905 the husband conceived the idea that his wife was not conducting herself as she should. He caused an investigation to be set on foot, which apparently verified his suspicion that all was not right, and the disclosure thereby made resulted in his filing a suit for divorce on the ground of lewd and lascivious conduct. On motion of his wife, he was required to make his pleading more specific and set out with particularity the places and dates where, and upon which the acts complained of, were committed and done.

In compliance with the ruling of the court that the pleading be made more specific in this particular, he charged that on the 25th of March, and on April 8 following, she had entered a notorious assignation house in the city of Louisville, and remained there for some hours on each occasion in company with a man, whose name was unknown to plaintiff, and that on two other occasions, set out with particularity in the pleading, his wife, during his absence, had entertained in their home unmarried men, and had been guilty of conduct unbecoming a married woman on these occasions, by drinking, smoking cigarettes and being guilty of loud, hilarious and bolsterous talk and conduct in their presence. To these charges the defendant entered a complete denial, and in a cross-petition, sought a divorce from bed and board from her husband on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, habitual drunkenness and adultery. Issue was joined upon each of these grounds for divorce set up in the cross-petition.

The plaintiff offered to file an amended pleading, setting up with particularity other acts of lewd and lascivious conduct on the part of his wife, occurring something like a year after the date of the charges upon which the original petition was based, objection was made by the wife to the filing of this amendment, the objection was sustained and the amendment was not permitted to be filed. Shortly after the suit was filed, the defendant moved for an allowance pending the litigation for the support of herself and children.

The parties agreed, and the order was so entered, that the plaintiff should pay to the wife $65 per month during the litigation. Much proof was taken by the plaintiff in support of the allegations of the original petition as amended, and of the charges preferred in the amendment which the court refused to permit to be filed.

The defendant directed her proof toward establishing an alibi, as defense to the suit of her husband, and in her own behalf proof was directed toward establishing the charges that her husband was an habitual drunkard, of an insanely jealous disposition and extremely cruel toward her.

The chancellor, on exceptions to depositions, sustained the exceptions filed by the defendant to all of the proof taken by plaintiff which tended to show and establish the particular acts of misconduct set out in the amended pleading which the court refused to permit to be filed, and also sustained exceptions to the deposition of the witness, Laura Butler, on the ground that her good character was not certified to by the officer taking the deposition, not personally known to the judge, and her general reputation was not proven. Of this ruling the plaintiff complains. However, with this evidence excluded from his consideration, the chancellor found that the proof remaining in the case supported the allegations of the petition, as originally amended, and warranted and justified him in granting to plaintiff a divorce on the ground of lewd and lascivious conduct on the part of his wife. This was done and the cross-petition of the wife was dismissed. The title to the house and lot was taken from the defendant, and ordered restored to the plaintiff, from whom it was acquired. The custody of the children, about three, six and nine years of age respectively, was left with the wife, and she was permitted to remain in the home so long as the children were left in her care and custody, and the plaintiff was required to pay to the wife, for the support of the children, until further order of the court, the sum of $65 per month; the wife was denied any alimony whatever.

From so much of this judgment as denied to the wife alimony, she has appealed. She asked that an allowance be made her pending the appeal for her own support and maintenance.

This the chancellor denied, and from his ruling upon this point, she has likewise prosecuted an appeal, and, in addition to prosecuting an appeal from his ruling, has asked that this court make an allowance for her support and maintenance pending the appeal. All of these questions are now before us and will be considered and disposed of together.

The first question for consideration is the ruling of the chancellor, in refusing to permit the amended petition to be filed. Section 134, of the Code, provides that the court may, at any time, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, cause or permit a pleading or proceeding to be amended, and, in passing upon the action of the trial court in permitting or refusing amendments, this court has held that the only limitation placed upon the discretion of the trial judge in allowing amended pleadings to be filed is, that it must be done in furtherance of justice, so that, if in the opinion of the trial judge the amendment offered would tend to secure to the party offering it a just and fair determination of his case, then the court should permit it to be filed, even though in so doing he should find it necessary to continue the case at the cost and expense of the party offering the amendment. If, on the other hand, in the exercise of his sound discretion, he should determine that the filing of the amendment would not be in furtherance of justice, then he should not permit it to be filed, and, in either event, unless it clearly appeared that his rulings had caused a miscarriage of justice, the action of the trial court would be upheld. An attempt has been made to draw a distinction in the rules of practice between divorce cases and other equity actions. There is no good reason for any difference, nor does there, in fact, any such difference exist, but in divorce as in other equity suits, where the ends of justice require it, the party should be, and is, permitted to amend his pleadings. The amendment offered in this case came long after the parties had pleaded to an issue, and we are of opinion that the court did not err in refusing to permit the proposed amendment to be filed.

We come next to a consideration of the ruling of the trial court in sustaining exceptions to certain depositions and particularly those depositions which were taken for the purpose of establishing the particular acts of lewd and lascivious conduct, set up in the amended petition which plaintiff was not permitted to file. The chancellor found that plaintiff was entitled to the relief sought without taking into consideration the evidence of any other misconduct on the part of defendant than that specifically set up and charged in the original petition, hence a determination of this question, so far as this case is concerned, is altogether unnecessary, but we are urged to pass upon this point as it is one which frequently arises, and its determination will be of benefit to the profession.

In 2 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, section 1376, the rule is thus stated: "Any conduct of a wife indicative of a disposition tending to adultery is a proper item of evidence in a case against her, when duly connected with other evidence. Thus, in the ecclesiastical practice, a husband was permitted to plead in his libel, that during his absence she had behaved so indecorously as to induce a lady, with whom she resided, to recommend her removal to her mother. In another case, where the evidence did not fully establish adultery, but her conduct had raised distinct suspicions of it, proof that, during the progress of the suit, the alleged particeps criminis had frequently visited her alone, and remained late at night, was received as sufficiently strengthening the former evidence to justify the sentence of divorce."

In the case at bar, the wife was charged with having been seen to enter an assignation house, on two distinct occasions, and remaining there on each occasion for some time, and with having entertained strange men in the home of her husband late at night, during his absence, and with having behaved in an improper manner on said occasions. These allegations, if true, tended to establish an adulterous disposition on the part of the wife, and this disposition having been established, it was entirely competent for the husband to show any act on the part of the wife, either before or after the date upon which the particular act charged in the pleading was committed, which tended to confirm and strengthen the evidence already introduced. This idea is supported by the decided weight of authority; courts of last resort and text-writers uniting in the view that acts prior to, and also subsequent to the particular acts charged, are admissible in evidence, for the purpose of showing an adulterous disposition on the part of the party charged. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, vol. 2, section 1376; Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, sections 398, 399 and 400; State v. Moore, 115 Ia., 178; Sherwood v. Tiltman, 85 Pa., 77; Rose v. Mitchell, 21 Ia., 270; Schufeldt v. Schufeldt, 86 Md., 519; Brooks v. Brooks, 145 Mass., 574; and Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass., 111.) The authorities above enumerated agree that the admission of this character of evidence is not merely for the purpose of showing the adulterous disposition between appellant and a named co-respondent, but also for the purpose of showing that the restraints, "and safe-guards of common deportment and conventionality and of the natural modesty, that is presumed to exist, have been broken through and displaced by an adulterous disposition and the habits of adulterous intercourse."

And, while as a matter of fact, in each of the cases which we have cited a co-respondent was named, yet, we are of opinion that the admission of such proof is not confined to that class of cases alone, where the adultery is charged to have been committed with a specifically named co-respondent, but may be considered in any case for the purpose of establishing an adulterous disposition on the part of the one charged.

If appellant visited an assignation house in the spring of 1906, and permitted men, other than her husband, to spend the night with her in her own house about the same time, these acts tend to establish, on the part of appellant, a sexual desire for men other than her husband, and tend to show the probability of her having committed the acts charged in the petition to have been committed in the preceding year. The chancellor erred in sustaining exceptions to those depositions which tended to establish in the appellant an adulterous disposition after the dates of the acts alleged in the original petition. Appellee was entitled to the benefit of this evidence. It strengthened his case and the chancellor erred in excluding it from his consideration.

The chancellor likewise sustained exceptions to the entire deposition of the witness, Laura Butler, because her general reputation for truth and veracity was not proven, although two witnesses testified that she had lived in their home for more than a year and that during this time they had ample opportunity to judge of her character, and that from their observation of her and acquaintance with her they believed her to be both truthful and trustworthy. This is not a new question, for in the case of McC Campbell v. McC Campbell, 103 Ky., 745, the identical question was before this court, and it was there held that where evidence is introduced to the effect that the witness is a creditable person or entitled to credit on oath or is of good character, that the statutory requirements are complied with, and a prima facie case of good character or reputation for truth and veracity is established, and that if the adverse party desires to attack the reputation of any witness whose character is thus established, he must do so in the manner provided by law.

The exceptions to the deposition of Laura Butler should have been overruled and her deposition should have been considered in determining the rights of the parties, for she not only is shown by the record to be an honest and trustworthy servant but to be of a good family of negroes, and her acceptance of employment in an assignation house was due, no doubt, to the fact that she received better wages there than she could elsewhere, and it does not militate against her credibility as a witness.

When the depositions, which were excluded by the chancellor from his consideration in determining the case, are taken into account a most damaging record of misconduct and wrong-doing on the part of appellant is made out, and the conclusion reached by the chancellor that appellee was entitled to an absolute divorce, is more than justified. It has been so repeatedly held by this court that where the husband is granted a divorce on such grounds the wife is not entitled to alimony, that a further consideration of this question is unnecessary.

Appellant's claim to alimony was based upon the idea that the divorce was improperly granted to her husband. If we had found this to be true, she would be entitled, not only to alimony, but to an allowance pending the litigation, but inasmuch as we have decided the case adversely to her contention, her claim to alimony and an allowance, as well, must fail. In permitting her to remain in the care and custody of their children, in the home of her husband, we are of opinion that the chancellor dealt more generously with appellant than the strict demands of justice required. We doubt his wisdom in so doing. However, these matters address themselves to his sound discretion, and we have no doubt but that he will, from time to time, make such orders in the case as will protect the moral interests and welfare of the children and properly regulate the burden that should be placed upon their father for their support.

The motion for an allowance is overruled, and the judgments of the lower court in denying to appellant any alimony whatever, or any allowance, pending this appeal, are affirmed.

THOMAS, &c., v. DAVIS, &c.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Writ of Prohibition—Jurisdiction—If an inferior court has jurisdiction, the circuit court has no power to grant the writ of prohibition for the purpose of denying the inferior court the right to hear and determine a case, although it is of opinion that the inferior court will decide improperly.

2. Same—Work Upon Public Roads—Therefore, the lower court properly dismissed appellant's motion for a writ of prohibition to restrain the inferior from trying him for failure to work the public road.

R. C. Burns for appellants.

H. R. Dysard for appellees.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

Appellants brought suit in the Carter Circuit Court, wherein they allege they were citizens and taxpayers of Carter county, Kentucky, and that they had paid all taxes assessed against them for State, county and road purposes for the current year, and that notwithstanding that fact, one Jack Jones, overseer in Road District No. 25, in Carter county, was trying to make them work and labor upon the public roads in said district, and that appellee, the county judge of Carter county, on complaint made by the overseer, had issued a warrant for their arrest and, unless enjoined and restrained from so doing, would fine them for their failure to work upon said roads and would commit them to jail until said fine and costs were satisfied. That the said overseer had no right or authority in law to cause them to work upon said road, and his efforts to require them to do so were wholly illegal and they asked that a writ of prohibition be issued enjoining and restraining the county judge from trying them under said warrant charging them with a refusal and failure to work upon the public roads of said county. The county judge demurred to the petition, and pending the demurrer filed an answer traversing the allegations of the petition. The circuit judge, before whom the motion was made, refused to issue the writ and dismissed the petition, from which ruling and judgment the plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

The sole question for determination is, did the county judge of Carter county have jurisdiction to try appellants for their refusal or failure to work upon the county roads of Carter county?

Section 4308, of the Kentucky Statutes, provides that: "The fiscal court of any county may require all able-bodied male citizens of the county, over eighteen and under fifty years of age, except licensed ministers of the gospel, and citizens of incorporated towns and cities to provide themselves with necessary tools and implements, and to work on the public roads of the county not exceeding two days in a week, and six days in each year. * * *

"Any one assigned to work on a public road who shall, without good cause, fail to appear with proper implements, and do good work thereon, after having been notified for two days by the officer having supervision of the road, or by some one authorized, in writing, by him, to give said notice, shall, on trial and conviction before a justice of the peace, or the county judge, be fined for each day he so fails to work."

The statute empowers the fiscal court to appoint an overseer for each road district in the county, and it is made the duty of such overseer to notify the able-bodied hands in his district, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, saving only those which the statute expressly exempts, to work upon the roads in their district a designated number of days.

The pleadings show that appellants were notified to do so, and, upon complaint being made to the county judge by the overseer, he caused the warrant of arrest to be issued for each of them. It will be observed that by express provision of the statute cited it is made the especial duty of the county judge to cause such delinquents to be arrested and brought before him for trial. A writ of prohibition is an order which is issued by the circuit court to an inferior court of limited jurisdiction, prohibiting it from proceeding in a matter out of its jurisdiction. (Civil Code, section 479.) If an inferior court has jurisdiction, the circuit court has no power to grant the writ of prohibition for the purpose of denying to the inferior court the right to hear, pass upon and determine a case, although the judge of the circuit court may be of the opinion that the judge of the inferior court will decide the case improperly. (Hughes v. Holbrook, 108 S. W., 225, and Scott v. Tully, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1734.)

Under section 4308, above referred to, it was the duty of the county judge to try appellants on the charge of their failure to work the roads when directed to do so by the overseer. If they had any good reason for their refusal to so work, when notified by the overseer, they should make this defense before the county judge, when called upon to answer the writ. The circuit court had no right, authority or power to deny to the county judge the right to try these cases, any more than it would have had the right to direct him how he should determine them.

The chancellor having so held, the judgment is affirmed.

LANE, &c. v. LLOYD, &c.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Liens—Mortgages—Executions—Priorities Determined—L. gave a mortgage on his land to Mrs. B. for $2,100 in 1903, later he gave a note to a bank for $1,200, with his brother as surety, to whom he gave a mortgage on the land as indemnity. In May, 1906, executions were levied on the land by judgment creditors of L. for $300, subject to the aforesaid debts. In August, 1906, L. borrowed from G. $4,064.80, for which he gave his note with his brother as surety, J. J. Nesbitt for appellants.

Chas. D. Grubbs and W. B. White for appellees.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

The appellant, R. H. Lane, is the owner of a tract of about one hundred and twenty acres of land, situated in Bath county, Kentucky, on which there was a mortgage lien to secure a debt in favor of Ruth Beall for two thousand one hundred dollars. This mortgage was executed in August, 1903. Later in the year, 1903, he became indebted to the Farmers' Bank of Owingsville, in the sum of one thousand two hundred dollars, for borrowed money, for which he executed his promissory note with his brother, appellant, J. W. Lane, as surety, at the same time executing a second mortgage on the land in question to his brother, to indemnify him as such surety against loss. On May 30th, 1906, the appellees, W. S. Lloyd, and Hazelrigg & Son, judgment creditors of R. H. Lane, to the extent of about three hundred dollars, caused executions to be levied upon his land, subject to the Ruth Beall debt of two thousand one hundred dollars and the Farmers' Bank debt of one thousand two hundred dollars. On August 31st, 1906, for the purpose of paying off the above mentioned mortgage liens, R. H. Lane borrowed from one, C. W. Goodpaster, the sum of four thousand and sixty-four dollars and eighty-two cents, executing his note therefor, with his brother, J. W. Lane as surety thereon, at the same time executing to Goodpaster a mortgage on the land in question as additional security.

Thereupon R. H. Lane paid off and discharged the Ruth Beall mortgage debt, which at that time amounted to two thousand two hundred and thirty-one dollars and five cents, and the Farmers' Bank note, amounting to one thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars and ninety-one cents, thus leaving the Lloyd and Hazelrigg & Son execution debts outstanding, as unpaid and unreleased liens upon the land.

Subsequently, this action was instituted for the purpose of enforcing the Lloyd and Hazelrigg & Son execution liens. The mortgagee, C. W. Goodpaster, who was made a co-defendant with R. H. Lane and J. W. Lane, filed his answer and cross-petition, setting up his mortgage for four thousand and sixty-four dollars and eighty-two cents, and asked for a sale of the land and the payment of his mortgage debt out of the proceeds of same. The defendants, R. H. Lane and J. W. Lane, filed answers, in which J. W. Lane sought to have Goodpaster subrogated to the liens of Ruth Beall and the Farmers' Bank, which R. H. Lane had discharged with the money borrowed on August 31, 1906; and R. H. Lane asserted a claim of homestead exemption as against the execution creditors.

The issues being made up, the evidence in, and the case submitted for final judgment, the chancellor ordered a sale of the land and determined that there was a first lien upon the proceeds to the extent of one thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars and ninety-one cents, the amount of the Farmers' Bank debt on which J. W. Lane was personally bound as surety; that the W. S. Lloyd and Hazelrigg & Son execution lien debts came next in point of dignity, and that the balance of the proceeds of the sale should go to the discharge of the remainder of the Goodpaster mortgage.

As the appellees, the execution creditors, are not complaining of the decree, which gives precedence over their liens of so much of the Goodpaster debt as was used to pay off the Farmer's Bank debt, the only question presented on this appeal is, whether or not the chancellor erred in giving the liens of the execution creditors priority over the balance of the Goodpaster debt, being that part which was used in paying off the mortgage of Ruth Beall; and thereby depriving R. H. Lane of his homestead in the land. It is not questioned, that the Beall debt, the Farmers' Bank debt, and the claim of R. H. Lane to homestead, were all superior to the liens of the execution creditors, and if the liens, as they originally stood, had been enforced, the Beall debt and the Farmers' Bank debt would have been paid first out of the proceeds, and then one thousand dollars set apart to R. H. Lane for a homestead, and any balance remaining paid over to the execution creditors. But when the common debtor borrowed money from Goodpaster and with it paid off and extinguished the Beall and the Farmers' Bank debts, the legal aspect of the rights of the parties was materially changed. The lien of the execution creditors is superior to that of Goodpaster, and they are entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the property before he receives anything, and the common debtor is not entitled to a homestead against the Goodpaster debt, because he has waived it by the execution of the mortgage. Goodpaster is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Miss Beall or the Farmers' Bank. He simply loaned the debtor, Lane, money to pay off those debts, and took a mortgage to secure him for what he has advanced. It is not claimed that he bought the Beall or the Farmers' Bank debts, or that there was any attempt to assign them to him. He, therefore, received by the mortgage all that he had bargained for in the way of security, so far as R. H. Lane was concerned, and has no claim against the execution creditors to be substituted to the rights of the original mortgagees, Beall and the Farmers' Bank. (Payne, &c. v. Johnson's Ex'ors, 95 Ky., 175; Griffin v. Proctor's Adm'r, 14 Bush, 571; Brougner, &c. v. Laughlin's Ex'tx, &c., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1166.)

The cases cited by appellant are not opposite to the question at issue. In the case of Ogden v. Totten, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1390, Ogden really purchased the debt of the prior lienholder, and took the subsequent mortgage as additional security. The note of the prior lienholder was assigned to him, and it was very properly held that, as he had purchased the prior debt, he was entitled to enforce it. That principle has no application to the case in hand. In Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky., 327, and Harrod v. Johnson, 5 Ky. Law Rep., 247, the questions were solely between the owners of the land and the parties advancing money to pay off prior liens. There were no intervening equities as in the case at bar.

Assuming that the property is worth more than one thousand dollars, the execution creditors have a first lien on the overplus, and the debtor could not, by giving Goodpaster a subsequent mortgage, divest them of their legal rights in this overplus. The rights of these execution creditors in the overplus became vested when the superior mortgage liens were paid off and discharged, and no action of the debtor could divest them of their fixed legal rights. Of course, this principle will not apply if there be no overplus above the one thousand dollars, for unless the sale of the property produces more than one thousand dollars, the execution creditors have no lien; but if there is an overplus, then they have a lien on it, and the debtor can not deprive them of it by mortgaging his homestead right to Goodpaster, the subsequent mortgagee, and then claiming the homestead right against the execution creditors in the overplus.

Conceding the truth of the testimony of J. W. Lane, that his brother, R. H. Lane, told him if he would get the money from Goodpaster, for the purpose of paying off the Beall and Farmers' Bank liens, he should be substituted to the liens paid off, this would not avail Goodpaster or J. W. Lane in this case. In the first place, the debtor could not give away the rights of the execution lienholders, and, in the second, a lien upon the real property could not be acquired by this verbal arrangement. In the case of Reid, &c. v. Jackson, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 743, it was held that "one who loans to another money with which to pay off a vendor's lien is not thereby substituted to the rights of the vendor, and does not acquire a lien; therefore, the sureties of the vendee in the note executed for the money borrowed for this purpose do not acquire a lien by substitution to the rights of the obligee, he having none himself. Nor is a mere parol promise by the vendee that they shall have a lien sufficient to create a lien." This principle is conclusive of the question of subrogation.

Judgment affirmed.

LOWRY & GOEBEL v. HITCH'S ASSIGNEE, &c.

(Filed May 26, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Claim and Delivery—Action For—Insolvency—In this action by the wholesale merchants for the delivery of the goods they sold the assigned merchant, under the proof of his insolvency at the time of the purchase and of his representations as to his solvency, it was error for the court to direct the jury to find against appellants.

2. Title of Goods—If the assigned merchant knew he was insolvent and fraudulently purchased the goods without intending to pay for them, the title remained in appellants and did not pass under the deed of assignment.

Worthington & Cochran for appellants.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

The appellants, Lowry & Goebel, are wholesale merchants in Cincinnati, Ohio. In September, October and November, of 1906, the appellee, C. H. Hitch, purchased certain goods from them which amounted in the aggregate to $360.68. In November, 1906, Hitch made a general assignment of all his property, for the benefit of his creditors, to J. D. Dye. Thereupon, the appellants instituted this action in the Mason Circuit Court, claiming that Hitch knew he was insolvent at the time he purchased the goods, and had no intention of paying for them, but that the purchase was fraudulently made for the purpose of cheating the appellants of their property. Without going into the details of the petition, it may be stated that it contains all of the necessary allegations to constitute a petition for claim and delivery of personal property under the provisions of the Code regulating this matter. The assignee, J. D. Dye, was made a party defendant. He answered, denying all the allegations of the petition as to the fraud, and claimed the right to hold the property under the deed of assignment to him. In a second paragraph he denied that all of the goods came into his hands under the assignment, but admitted that two hundred and fifty-two dollars and sixty-seven cents worth came into his hands, and that he held them as assignee. Afterwards the creditors of C. H. Hitch took such procedure in the Federal Court as was necessary to have him adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, and J. D. Dye, his assignee, under the deed of assignment, was appointed assignee in bankruptcy. Thereupon, J. D. Dye, as assignee in bankruptcy, tendered an amended answer, setting up the bankruptcy proceedings in bar of the jurisdiction of the State court to proceed further with this action. The motion to file this amended answer, on the objection of the plaintiffs, was overruled by the court. Afterwards the case came on regularly for trial on the issues joined, and a jury being impaneled, the evidence was heard. At the close of all the testimony, the court sustained the defendant's (appellees') motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for them, which was done; and of this ruling the plaintiffs (appellants) now complain.

We feel constrained by our views of the merits of this case to disagree with the circuit judge in his conclusion on the facts arising from the evidence adduced. C. H. Hitch had purchased the stock of goods belonging to one C. A. Hainline, in Maysville, Kentucky, in August, 1906. Afterwards, he visited Cincinnati and called on Lowry & Goebel, from whom Hainline had purchased goods. It is claimed, by appellants, that he made certain representations to them as to his solvency which induced them to extend to him the necessary credit, thus enabling him to purchase the goods involved here, without prepayment of the price. Three witnesses testify that he stated to the credit clerk of appellants, that he had inherited three thousand dollars; that he paid one thousand five hundred dollars of it cash for Hainline's stock of goods, and had a thousand of it remaining intact with which to do business, and that he was not indebted to any one. We do not understand that Hitch contends that these statements were true. He simply denies that he made them. As a matter of fact, the record shows indubitably that he was insolvent at the time he bought the goods. It is true, he says he was solvent, but was unable to state the details of his financial condition at that time. In three months after he opened up business, he made an assignment; he could have had no capital at the time he commenced. He says that he was solvent at the time he commenced, but broke afterwards, and attributes his failure to the expense of conducting his business. Taking his own figures for it—the clerk hire, store rent and advertising—he could not have laid out more than four hundred and fifty dollars during the three months intervening, between his beginning as a merchant, and his bankruptcy. He denies that he made any representations as to his credit to Lowry & Goebel at all, and states that they did not ask his financial standing. Of course, it is possible that these wholesale merchants might open up an account with an unknown man without making any inquiry as to his financial standing; but such procedure on their part, would be so unusual that it requires little testimony to convince us that it was not true. Hitch's statements as to these dubious facts, are unsupported by any other testimony, and they are overwhelmingly disproved by three witnesses. If Hitch knew he was insolvent, and fraudulently purchased the goods without an intention of paying for them, the title remained in appellants, and, therefore, it did not pass under the deed of assignment, or to the assignee in bankruptcy. (Bradberry v. Keas, 5 J. J. Mar., 446; Dietz v. Sutcliffe, 80 Ky., 650; Bridgeford v. Barbour, Id., 529; Bank of Commerce v. Payne & Viley, 86 Ky., 446; Longdale Iron Co. v. Swift's Iron & Steel Works, 91 Ky., 191; Linstroth Wagon Co. v. Ballew, 149 Fed. Rep., 960.)

It results from this conclusion as to the value of the evidence adduced, that the trial court erred in awarding a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendants, and the judgment is, therefore, reversed for a new trial consistent with the views herein expressed.

KEY v. USHER.

(Filed May 27, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Former Appeal—Instructions—Argument of Counsel—(30 Ky. Law Rep., 667)—The instructions upon the trial of this case were as directed by this court, except in a particular which did not prejudice appellant's substantial rights.

The statement of counsel in argument, did not go beyond the pale of legitimate argument. The jury are the triers of fact and counsel must be allowed some latitude in illustrating the matter before them.

Speight & Dean for appellant.

W. J. Webb, Robbins & Thomas and R. G. Robbins for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

On the first trial of this case, the plaintiff recovered a judgment; the defendant appealed to this court, and the judgment was reversed for certain errors in the instruction of the court to the jury. (Key v. Usher, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 667.) On the return of the case to the circuit court, it was tried again with the same result, and the defendant again appeals. The facts of the case are stated in the former opinion. It is insisted for the defendant that the judgment should be reversed because the court improperly instructed the jury and allowed improper argument by the plaintiff's counsel to the jury, and that the verdict is against the evidence. The instructions of the court to the jury on the last trial are as follows:

"1. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence, the plaintiff sold his stock in the Beaumont Soap Company to L. W. Key or P. Burnett, on the condition that they, together with T. J. Murphey, were to execute their note for the purchase of the price thereof, and that they failed or refused to execute and deliver it to the plaintiff, and if the jury further believe, from the evidence, that the said Murphey was ready and willing and offered to execute said note and to consummate the trade, and that he was prevented from doing so, by the wrongful act or acts, of the defendant, L. W. Key, the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should find for him the sum of twenty-one hundred dollars, with interest thereon, at 6 per cent. per annum, from the thirteenth day of September, 1904.

"2. The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the alleged sale of stock in said company was made with the plaintiff, upon the condition that said sale was not to be consummated, until P. Burnett should have procured a majority of all the stock in said company, and if the jury further believe from the evidence, that said Burnett failed to procure a majority of said stock, after he had, in good faith, made efforts to procure it, and if the jury further believe from the evidence, the conditions named above were known to the plaintiff, W. A. Usher, at the time he contracted to sell his stock to the defendant, Key, or to Burnett, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find.

"3. The court further instructs the jury that there was to be no sale of the stock to defendant, Key and P. Burnett, unless and until the note executed therefor was signed by T. J. Murphey; and unless the jury believe from the evidence, said Murphey failed or refused to sign it, through some wrongful act on the part of the defendant, Key, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury will so find."

Instructions 1 and 3 are literally in compliance with the directions given by this court on the former appeal. It is insisted for the appellant that the following words in instruction 2 were condemned as erroneous on the former appeal: "At the time he contracted to sell his stock to defendant, Key or to Burnett." It is true that this court on the former appeal, held in effect that instead of these words, the following words should be used, "At the time the note in controversy was signed." But when instruction 2 is read in connection with instructions 1 and 3, it is manifest that the jury could not have misunderstood it; for by instruction 1, there could be no recovery unless Murphey was ready and willing to consummate the trade; and by instruction 3 the jury were told peremptorily, that there was to be no sale of the stock until the note was signed by Murphey. There could have been no finding for the defendant under instruction 2, if it had been worded as insisted by the defendant, unless a good faith effort was made to procure a majority of the stock. The evidence shows conclusively that they made no effort at all to procure a majority of the stock after signing the note in controversy, and that when Burnett, Key and Murphey disagreed among themselves, they abandoned the whole thing without making any effort to get the other stock. As under the evidence there could have been no finding for the defendant under this instruction, if worded as insisted by the defendant, the omission of the court to make the change indicated by this court on the former appeal, was not prejudicial to his substantial rights on the whole case.

During the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, he used this language: "Any condition imposed by defendant, Key, that did not previously exist, by which Murphey was prevented from signing the note, was in law a wrongful act." The defendant objected to the argument and moved the court to exclude it from the jury. The court overruled the motion and of this he complains. We are not favored with the argument of the defendant's counsel, but as the court had peremptorily told the jury that they should find for the defendant unless Murphey failed to sign the note through some wrongful act on the part of the defendant, Key, the question before the jury was whether the conduct of Key in preventing Murphey from signing the note, was rightful or wrongful, and the counsel on each side had a right to present the facts to the jury to maintain his view of the question. The jury are the triers of fact in matters of this sort and counsel must be allowed some latitude in illustrating the matter before the jury. The statement of counsel did not go beyond the pale of legitimate argument. The court did not err in refusing the two instructions asked by the defendant on the trial as this court had, on the former appeal, indicated what instructions should be given, and the instructions asked by the defendant, so far as they were proper, were included in those given.

The verdict of the jury is not palpably against the evidence. There have been two convicts for the plaintiff on the same evidence. The jury evidently came to the conclusion, from the evidence, that the reason the note was not signed by Murphey, was that Key locked it up in the drawer, and would not let him sign it; and that Key did this because he wanted Murphey and Burnett to furnish him certain security before the transaction was consummated, a matter which was entirely outside of the contract with Usher.

Judgment affirmed.

SUTTON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Filed May 27, 1908—To be reported.)

Telegram—Funeral Notice—Delay in Delivery—Action for Damages—Accident to Train—Negligence—Presumptions—A telegram announcing his mother's death, was sent to plaintiff in time for him to have attended her funeral, but by failure to deliver the telegram he was delayed a day. The train he took the next day was delayed by earth sliding on the track so that he failed to see her before her burial. In an action for damages against the telegraph company, Held—The presumption is, that the plaintiff would have taken the first train on receiving the telegram, and the company can not be excused for its negligence in failing to deliver it, thereby causing plaintiff to miss two trains, on the ground that he would have been able to attend the funeral if the accident had not happened to the railroad track on the following day.

Roscoe Vanover for appellant.

Richards & Ronald, Geo. H. Fearons and York & Johnson for appellee.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

Appellant resided in Pikeville, Kentucky, and his parents in East Radford, Virginia. Appellant's mother died in her home on December 27, 1906, and on that day his father directed to him the following telegram:

"East Radford, Vr., December 27, '06.

"To W. D. SUTTON,

"Pikeville, Kentucky.

"Mother dead, come at once.

(Signed) "G. W. SUTTON."

It appears from the evidence, that this telegram reached Pikeville, Friday morning, December 28th. It was not delivered to appellant until Saturday morning, after ten o'clock; and he boarded the first train leaving for East Radford, which was a few minutes after twelve o'clock that day, and would have reached his destination about the same hour on Sunday, but for an accident, the slip of earth onto the track in a cut, but he did not reach his destination until about eight o'clock Sunday evening. His mother was buried about two o'clock in the afternoon.

During the trial it developed that this message was not received in Pikeville, by appellee, until 10:10 o'clock Friday morning, December 28th. Appellant, in his petition, had only charged negligence in failing to deliver it promptly after it was received at that office; but offered an amended petition in which he alleged that the defendant was also guilty of negligence in transmitting the message to Pikeville. The court refused to allow him to file this amended petition, to which he excepted. When the telegram was received at appellee's office in Pikeville, appellant was about eleven miles from home at one of his lumber mills, and did not return to his home until ten o'clock on Saturday, the 29th of December. Appellant does not contend that the telegraph company was under any duty to deliver the message to him while he was in the country; but claims that it should have delivered it at his home or his office in the city, which were near to appellee's place of business. Apappellee concedes that the law required it to so deliver the telegram. But it proved by its agent that it made repeated efforts to do this; that its agent went in person to the residence of appellant and also to his office, and made an effort to call up both places by telephone for the purpose of giving him information of the contents of the telegram. Appellant introduced testimony contradicting this—that is that the agent made no call for the residence or place of business of appellant. Persons who were at appellant's office and residence during the day, testified that the agent did not make a visit to either of the places during the day. Appellee concedes that the evidence upon this point was sufficient to have warranted the submission of the case to the jury.

The testimony shows that on Saturday morning, the 29th, a friend of appellant's, J. L. Morgan, was in the telegraph office and accidentally saw this telegram, and upon his request the same was given to him and he delivered it to the wife of appellant, who immediately started a person to deliver it to her husband at the mill. Her husband left the mill, however, before the messenger arrived, and received the information of his mother's death from his wife, when he reached Pikeville. Appellee's counsel claims that there was no competent evidence that the wife started this messenger to her husband in the country. This is true. However, appellant gave testimony to this effect, and it was not objected to. We have no doubt, if there had been an objection, that the court would have excluded it, but there being none, the testimony was properly before the jury for its consideration. If there had been objection appellant would, most probably, have introduced the messenger or some other person who knew the fact. The evidence also shows, without contradiction, that a train passed Pikeville, going to East Radford, in the evening of Friday, December 28th, that reached East Radford about ten o'clock Saturday morning, and also another left Pikeville at 6:20 a. m. on Saturday, the 29th, that reached East Radford at ten o'clock that night. Both of these trains passed through the cut before the slip of earth onto the track. Appellee says that there is no positive proof that appellant would have taken either of these trains if he had received the telegram in time. It is true that there was no direct statement made that he would have taken the first train after receiving the message; but the whole case was conducted upon that idea. Both appellant's and appellee's counsel seem to have assumed, by their manner of conducting the case, and the answers of appellant to questions, that he would have responded to the telegram and have gone at the first opportunity to see his dead mother; and from the evidence the reasonable presumption is that he would have gone on the first train after receiving the telegram. This court in the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Caldwell, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 497, said:

"But what appellee would have done upon the receipt of this message, when measured by the ordinary rule of human experience, and judged by the standards that regulate the conduct of people generally, is not of doubtful or uncertain import. * * * In a case like this, appellant, confessedly guilty of negligence, will not be permitted to escape responsibility for its acts upon the theory that what appellee might have done, was too remote to entitle her to compensation."

The real question to be determined in the case, is whether the negligence of appellee in the failure to deliver the message within a reasonable time, was the proximate cause of appellant's injury and suffering, or whether the slip in the earth ahead of the train, upon which he took passage, was the proximate cause. It appears that the lower court took the latter view of it and gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find in behalf of appellee. There are some few authorities in other States that tend to coincide with this view, but this court has invariably held to the contrary. It will not do to say that a public service corporation may be guilty of negligence, as in this case, withholding a telegram for a very unreasonable length of time, which caused appellant to miss two trains, either of which he would have gone on and which reached East Radford before the slip in the cut, and by its negligence, force him to take the last chance, and by reason of the slip was deprived of seeing his mother, and be exonerated from its negligence by reason of the accidental slip which prevented the train, on which he was forced to start by reason of the negligence of appellee, from reaching East Radford in time for the burial.

The case of Cassilay, &c. v. Young, &c., 4 B. Mon., 265, was one where Cassilay, &c., agreed to deliver a cargo of goods in Vicksburg without delay. But for some reason, satisfactory to themselves, they stopped the cargo and tied it up to the bank at Paducah for a few days. A storm arose which caused the cargo to sink, and the action was brought to recover the value of it. They were compelled to pay the value of the cargo by reason of their negligence in tying it up to the bank at Paducah. The court said: "By reason of the disregard of their duty and of their conduct, we are of the opinion that they are liable for the loss." The storm in that case, was as much the proximate cause of the loss of the cargo as the slip in the earth, which covered the track, was in the case at bar.

The case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Brownlee, &c., 14 Bush, 590, was one in which appellee delivered several hogsheads of tobacco at appellant's depot in Rowlett's Station, to be carried as freight by appellant to market. This tobacco was destroyed by fire, together with the station house in which it was placed. The proof showed that if appellant's agent had exercised ordinary care he could have shipped several of the hogsheads before the fire. Appellant in that case claimed that the destruction of the tobacco by fire was the proximate cause of the loss.

The court said:

"We think the appellant was only bound to use ordinary care and prudence in providing a depository for appellees' tobacco, and also such care and prudence in shipping it;" and continued by saying that certain instructions were proper, and said:

"If the appellant could, by the use of ordinary diligence, and in the regular course of its freight business, have shipped the tobacco before its consumption by the fire, it is responsible for its failure to do so."

In the case of Hersheim Bros. & Co. v. Newport News & Mississippi Valley Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 227, appellants delivered to appellee, the railroad company, thirty-five hogsheads of tobacco for shipment. In the petition it was alleged that the railroad company carelessly and negligently failed to ship the thirty-five hogsheads of tobacco within a reasonable time; that by the use of ordinary diligence, defendant could have shipped all of said tobacco before its destruction by the fire, on October 8, 1891. The court said:

"It seems to us that the allegations of the petition clearly show that the loss was the direct result of the negligence and carelessness of appellee. If appellee had shipped the tobacco immediately as it agreed to do, the loss by the fire could not have occurred, and as they had taken it into custody and agreed to immediately ship the same and could have done so, it seems to us that appellee is liable for the damages sustained by the appellants."

And referred to the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Brownlee, supra, with approval. There was no claim in that case that the fire which destroyed the tobacco was started by the negligence of appellee or its servants. The question turned upon the negligence of appellee in failing to ship the tobacco as it had agreed to do. If it had lived up to its agreement, the tobacco would not have been in the depot and have been destroyed when the depot was burned. According to appellee's contention, the loss of the tobacco by fire was the proximate cause of the loss to appellant, and not the railroad's negligence in failing to ship it.

Appellee's counsel cites the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Briscoe, 18 Ind. App., 22, in support of his contention. The facts of that case were, in substance, as follows: A message was sent from Morganfield, Kentucky to Bloomington, Indiana, where it arrived at eight o'clock a. m., and was delivered to appellee about one o'clock in the afternoon. Appellee boarded the first train going the most direct route to Morganfield. His train was delayed in Vincennes, Indiana, which caused the train he was on to miss connections at other points, and appellee was delayed ten or twelve hours, and did not arrive in Morganfield until after his mother was buried. The proof showed that if the telegram had been delivered to him before ten o'clock of the day on which it reached Bloomington, he could have taken a train on another road and have gone to Goshen and there taken another train and made several other changes and have reached Morganfield in time for the burial; but the proof showed that he had never traveled this route, but had always gone over the one he did take. The proof also showed that this Goshen route was from twelve to fourteen hours longer than the one he did take, and on the one he did take, if he had not been delayed, he would have reached Morganfield several hours in advance of the other. The court said:

"Is it not reasonable to suppose that appellee, knowing this, would most certainly prefer that route which would take him to his destination the soonest, and the route over which he was accustomed to travel?"

The case was turned upon the fact that appellee, under the facts and circumstances proven, would have gone on the same train that he did go on; that he would not have gone by Goshen, even if the telegram had been delivered to him within a few minutes after it was received in Bloomington. It does not decide that if, by the negligence of appellant in delivering the message to appellee, he had missed a train in the morning going to Morganfield on the route which he afterwards took, he would have been barred from recovering, but the intimation is otherwise.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and on the return of the case, if appellant so desires, he should be allowed to file his amended petition.

Whole court sitting.

STAMPER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 22, 1908--Not to be reported.)

1. Continuances—Affidavit For—Instruction of Court—Failure to Except—It was the duty of appellant to ask the court to instruct the jury that the statements in the affidavit for a continuance, as to what the witnesses would testify, were to be taken as true, and if the court failed to instruct them, then it was the duty of appellant to except to the ruling. His failure to so except was a waiver of the error, and he can not now be heard to complain of it.

2. Instruction Omitted from Record—Presumption—It was appellant's duty to bring up the whole record, and in the absence of the instruction mentioned, it will be presumed that it was given.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg, R. A. Hurst, W. H. Blanton and Wm. Kash for appellant.

James Breathitt for appellee.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

The appellant, Siduel Stamper, was indicted by the grand jury of Breathitt county, Kentucky, charged with the murder of Curt Smith, and, having been tried by a jury, was found guilty as charged, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for the term of his natural life. From the judgment based upon this verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

It is not questioned that there was sufficient evidence in behalf of the Commonwealth to authorize a submission of the guilt or innocence of the accused to the jury, and the only complaint of the appellant is based upon the ruling of the trial court in regard to an affidavit which he filed for a continuance, and which the Commonwealth agreed should be read to the jury as true. The complaint as to this is two-fold: First, it is said that, while the Commonwealth's attorney agreed that the statements in the affidavit, as to what the absent witnesses would state, if present, were to be taken as true, the court did not formally so instruct the jury; second, that the court erred in refusing to allow all the statements of the affidavit to which an absent witness, Susan Fugate, would depose if present, to be read to the jury.

Before entering into a discussion of these mooted questions, it is necessary to state that the quarrel out of which the tragedy involved here arose, originated over a game of cards between the defendant and decedent. The evidence of the Commonwealth tended to show that the defendant murdered the decedent in cold blood, and then robbed him; whereas the evidence of the defendant was to the effect that he won the decedent's money fairly, and that having refused to refund it, the decedent, Curt Smith, drew his revolver and fired upon appellant at such close range as to set his shirt on fire, the ball going through his shirt and barely missing the body of the defendant; that, thereupon, the defendant drew his own pistol and killed his assailant.

As to the first error complained of, that the court did not formally instruct the jury that they must accept the statements of the affidavit for a continuance as true, it may be admitted that this would have been the better mode of procedure; but the bill of exceptions shows that the Commonwealth's attorney admitted that the affidavit should be read with the admission that the facts therein stated were true; and this is ordinarily the plan adopted. But conceding, as we do, that the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury as to the evidential value of the affidavit was error, the appellant is not in position to complain of it on this appeal. In the case of Ochsner v. Commonwealth, 109 S. W., 326, a similar question to the one we have here, arose. Certain evidence was introduced for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of a witness, and the trial court failed to instruct the jury that the evidence was only admitted for the purpose named, and could not be received or weighed by them as substantive testimony. Upon complaint here of this failure, we held that it was the duty of the defendant to request the court so to rule, and, if this was refused, to except to the adverse ruling of the court; and that, in the absence of this action on the part of the complainant we would not reverse the judgment for the error of the trial court. Applying this principle to the case in hand, it was the duty of the appellant to ask the court to instruct the jury that the statements in the affidavit for a continuance, of what the witnesses would testify, were to be taken as true, and if the court failed so to instruct them, then it was the duty of the appellant to except to the adverse ruling. His failure to do this was a waiver of the error, and he can not now be heard to complain of it.

The part of Susan Fugate's affidavit refused to be read was that wherein the statements tended to contradict the evidence of Stephen Crawford, a witness for the Commonwealth. Crawford testified that he saw the defendant shoot down the decedent, take from the body of the prostrate man his pistol and fire it twice in the ground, and then replace it in the holster. Now, when Crawford was asked if he did not make a statement different from this in the presence of Mrs. Fugate, he admitted that he had, and undertook to explain his inconsistent statements by saying that his first statement was made under fear of his life. The witness having thus admitted that he had, before the trial, made the very statements which the affidavit of Mrs. Fugate would have established, there was no basis for the contradiction, there being nothing to contradict. The court, therefore, properly ruled as to the affidavit, precisely, as if the witness had been present. If Mrs. Fugate had been on the witness stand, she could not have been asked to contradict Crawford, he having admitted making the inconsistent statements claimed by defendant. Conceding that the court should have allowed her affidavit as to the prior possession of money by the defendant to be read, all of this had been shown by the statements of the affidavit as to what other witnesses would have said if present, and admitted to be true by the Commonwealth. It having been thus admitted that the defendant had, prior to the time of the tragedy, even more money than Mrs. Fugate would have said he had, he was not injured by the court's refusal to allow that part of her affidavit to be read to the jury.

There is no complaint of the instructions given by the court, but instruction No. 2, which relates to voluntary manslaughter, is absent, and the clerk certifies that the reason it was not copied in the transcript is that it had been lost. It was appellant's duty to bring up the whole record, and in the absence of the instruction mentioned, we must assume that, as given, it was correct, and supports the judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN, BY, &c. v. SMITH, &c.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Action of Widow for the Killing of Her Husband—Can not Control so as to Defeat Recovery by Children—A widow may dismiss an action for the killing of her husband, as provided by section 4, Kentucky Statutes, in so far as she is concerned, but she can not do so as to defeat the action of her children; nor will it bar an action instituted by them within the proper time.

2. Same—Design of Statute—The statute was designed to benefit the children as well as the widow.

3. Attorneys—Claim Of—The petition of the attorneys of Mrs. Martin presented a good cause of action and the court should have permitted it to be filed. (29 Ky. Law Rep., 804.)

R. S. Rose for appellants.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

America Martin, as the widow of Demps Martin, filed her petition in the Whitley Circuit Court against appellee, Burrel Smith, and his sureties, in the bond executed by him as marshal of the City of Corbin. The action was brought under section 4, of the Kentucky Statutes, providing that:

"The widow and minor child, or either or both, of a person killed by the careless, wanton, or malicious use of fire arms, * * * not in self-defense, may have an action against the person who committed the killing; and all others aiding or promoting or any one or more of them; and in such actions the jury may give vindictive damages."

It was averred in the petition that Burrel Smith shot and killed Demps Martin, and that the shooting and wounding was done unlawfully, wantonly, maliciously and not in the necessary or apparently necessary self-defense of Smith. That Martin, at the time, was not suspected of having committed a felony in this State or out of it; and was not guilty of any violation of the laws. She asked judgment for $20,000.

At the first term after the petition was filed, the infant children of Demps Martin by their next friend, filed an amended petition against the parties sued by America Martin, in which they sought the same relief as she did.

On the day the amended petition was filed, the defendants in the petition of America Martin filed the following verified writing, and moved the court to dismiss the action:

"The plaintiff, America Martin, states that since the filing of this action, she has thoroughly investigated the same, and finds that she has no cause of action which she desires to prosecute; that she has directed her attorney, R. M. Rose, to dismiss this action; that she now directs said attorney to dismiss same. She further states that she made this statement without any consideration whatever from the defendant, Burrel Smith, or any of his sureties, named in said action, or any other person; that no offer of compromise has been made or accepted by either this plaintiff or either of the defendants in this action, and she now moves the court to dismiss said action, provided her said attorney does not do so."

On another day of the term, and before this motion was disposed of, the infant children appeared in court, and asked that they be made parties plaintiff and be permitted to prosecute the action in the name of their next friend.

The court overruled the motion of the infant children to permit them to prosecute the action in the name of their next friend, and also overruled the motion of the attorneys of Mrs. Martin, who tendered a petition to be made parties, that will be presently noticed, and sustained the motion of America Martin, and dismissed the action. From this ruling the infants and the attorneys of America Martin prosecute this appeal.

The petition of the attorneys of America Martin, which was tendered after the writing signed by her was filed, asking that her petition be dismissed, set up in substance that America Martin had placed her claim for damages in their hands to bring suit thereon—that in obedience to her direction they had filed the petition before mentioned in her name—that under the contract of employment they were to be paid a reasonable fee for their services, which would be $2,500—that after summons issued on the petition had been executed, the writing that resulted in the order of dismissal was executed. They further averred that, by the terms of the settlement, which was made without their knowledge or consent, America Martin was to and did receive from the defendants, money and other things of value, or that the defendants and America Martin fraudulently agreed between themselves, to compromise the suit with the fraudulent purpose of depriving them of their fee, and that the settlement was not made in good faith. That one of these states of case was true, but they did not know which one was true. They asked that they be made parties to the action, and that their petition be treated as a cross-petition against the defendants, and that they recover of them $2,500.

Taking up first the appeal of the infants. Under the statute supra, the action may be brought by the widow and minor child, or children, jointly; or, by the widow alone; or, by the minor child or children, alone; or, if there be neither widow, child nor children, by the personal representative of the intestate. (Howard v. Hunter, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 1092.) If the action is brought by the widow alone, the minor child or children, appearing by their guardian or next friend, have the right to be made parties plaintiff. The widow can not control the action so as to defeat a recovery by the minor child or children. She may, of course, dismiss it in so far as she is concerned, but the dismissal as to her will not be permitted to interfere with its prosecution by the child or children, if they are parties to it; nor will it bar an action instituted by them within the proper time. The statute was designed to benefit the children as well as the widow—the recovery, if any, being for their joint benefit. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the court erred in refusing to permit the infants to prosecute the action in their name.

In respect to the claim of the attorneys of America Martin, their petition stated a good cause of action against the defendants, and under the authority of Proctor Coal Co. v. Tye & Denham, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 804, the court should have permitted it to be filed, as it was offered before the action had been dismissed.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

CUMMINGS' ADM'R v. I. C. R. R. CO.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Killing of Trespasser—Lookout Duty—This case is, in its essential facts, identical with N., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Bean's Executor, ante, which is conclusive of this. The judgment, is therefore, affirmed.

H. F. Turner and Lucas & Gilbert for appellant.

Trabue, Doolan & Cox, J. M. Dickinson, Corbett & White and Robbins & Thomas for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

John D. Cummings, while walking across a trestle of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, situated in Ballard county, Kentucky, was run over and killed by one of its trains. His son, Chester Cummings, qualified as his administrator and instituted this action to recover damages for the death of his father.

The accident occurred in the country, and not at a place where the decedent had a right to be. He was, therefore, a trespasser, and, under the principle well settled by this court in many cases, the employes of the corporation owed him no duty except to exercise ordinary diligence to prevent injuring him after his peril was discovered. There was no evidence adduced to show that the employes in charge of the train, after the decedent was seen upon the trestle, failed in the performance of any duty which they owed to him. On the contrary, the engineer, who was put upon the stand by the plaintiff, testified positively that, immediately upon seeing the decedent upon the trestle, he reversed his engine, sanded the track, and did everything that was possible to prevent the accident. He said that his vision was much obstructed by a hard driving snow, which was falling at the time. There was some testimony in addition, which tended to establish the fact that it was not snowing. The witnesses who testified as to this did not see the decedent, and were some distance from the railroad, and their testimony, if true, would not contradict the engineer on the essential point. The real question was, whether or not, after the engineer actually saw the decedent, did he fail to exercise ordinary diligence to prevent his injury? Whether his failure to see him was from inattention or from blinding snow, was entirely immaterial. The engineer owed the decedent no lookout duty, and was not, therefore, chargeable with negligence for not seeing him or not looking down the track so that he might have seen him. The engineer, who was a witness for the plaintiff, says that, after he saw the decedent, he did everything in his power to prevent the accident, and nothing in this record contradicts him on this point.

This case, in principle and in all essential facts, is identical with that of N., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Bean's Ex'or, decided May 8th, 1908, and the opinion in that case is conclusive of this.

Upon the close of the testimony for plaintiff, the trial judge awarded a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant. This ruling was correct, and the judgment is, therefore affirmed.

BRANDENBURGH v. ROSE.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Homestead—Rule as to—The rule is well settled that where the owner of a homestead sells it, and with the proceeds buys another, the right to a homestead in the second tract is good against intervening creditors.

2. Same—Pleading—But in this action to be adjudged a homestead in the land in controversy, the petition does not state a cause of action and the demurrer to it should have been sustained, for the reason that it does not allege that he was occupying the property at the time of the levy of the execution and sale of the land, as a homestead, or that at that time it constituted his homestead.

S. P. Stamper for appellant.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg and J. K. Roberts for appellee.

Appeal from Lee Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

Appellee, G. B. Rose, obtained judgment against appellant, Thomas Brandenburg, for $108.35. Execution issued on the judgment and was levied upon a tract of land containing seventy-five acres, situated in Lee county, Kentucky, and, at sheriff's sale, was bought in by the execution plaintiff for the sum of $186.68, that being the amount of the debt, interest and cost upon the judgment. Afterwards, the appellant (execution defendant) instituted this action against the appellee (execution plaintiff), describing the land and alleging it to be worth less than one thousand dollars, and that the appellant was a bona fide housekeeper with a family, using and occupying the land as a homestead, and praying that he be adjudged a homestead therein. A general demurrer was filed to the petition and overruled, whereupon appellee filed an answer, controverting all of the allegations of the petition. Upon the trial of the issues thus formed, the chancellor dismissed the petition; and of this the appellant is complaining.

The evidence shows that, while the particular tract of land involved here, was acquired after the creation of the debt to pay which it was sold, the execution defendant, prior to its creation, owned and occupied a homestead in Owsley county, Kentucky, and with the proceeds of the sale of that homestead, he purchased the land involved here; therefore, in contemplation of law, the right to the homestead, so far as the purchase of the land is concerned, antedates the creation of the debt, as the rule is well settled, that, where the owner of a homestead sells it and with the proceeds buys another, the right to a homestead in the second tract of land is good against intervening creditors.

Nor do we think the position of appellee is sound, that appellant abandoned his home by temporarily removing to Beattyville, for the purpose of educating his children, with the fixed purpose of returning again to his home. The facts shown do not constitute an abandonment, and the debtor did not lose his right to a homestead by his temporary removal. He left a tenant in possession to occupy the homestead for him, and with the proceeds supported his family in Beattyville while he was educating his children. This was a laudable purpose, and it is not the policy of the law to strain a principle in order to make a debtor lose the benefit of his homestead exemption. (Herring v. Johnson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1940; Galloway v. Rowlett, Id., 2503.)

But the difficulty with appellant's case is that his petition does not state a cause of action. After alleging the ownership of the property which is described by metes and bounds, he says: "That he is a bona fide housekeeper with a family, using and occupying said tract of land as a homestead; that said tract of land is worth less than $1,000, and the only real estate owned by plaintiff, and that the same is exempt from execution sale." * * * He then sets forth the procedure under the execution leading up to the sale of the property and the purchase by the judgment-debtor; but he nowhere alleges that he was occupying the property, at the time of the levy of the execution and the sale of the land, as a homestead, or that it constituted at that time, his homestead. The allegations of the petition with reference to appellant's being a bona fide housekeeper with a family, all relate to the present—i. e., to the time of the filing of the petition—and can not, by the intendment, be made to relate back to the time of the execution levy and sale. The court should have sustained the general demurrer, and, upon failure to amend, dismissed the petition.

For this reason, alone, the judgment is affirmed, but this will not prejudice appellant's right to institute another action for the recovery of his homestead.

KENTUCKY UNION CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 22, 1908—To be reported.)

Revenue and Taxation—Act of 1906—Delinquent Taxes—Liability of Taxpayer—For Subsequent Years—Construction of Act—There can be no objection to article 3, of chapter 22, of the acts of the Kentucky Legislature of 1906, relating to revenue and taxation, on the ground that it is an ex post facto law, in so far as said article applies to the years subsequent to 1906. The delinquent's liabilities for those years are to be measured by his liabilities if he has volunteered to list and pay his taxes, and it follows that the article, in so far as it requires the payment of interest and penalties for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, is inoperative, and the delinquent for those years would be required to pay only taxes without interest or penalties, but the elimination of the interest and penalties for those years does not affect the other provisions of the article with respect to those years or years subsequent thereto.

W. B. Dixon, L. B. Wehle and C. K. Calvert for appellant.

James H. Jeffries and Ira Fields for appellee.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Judge Lassing delivered the following response to petition for re-hearing:

Complaint is made in the petition for re-hearing that the opinion herein fails to state whether or not article 3, of chapter 22, of the acts of 1906, violates the Constitution of the United States. This question was fully considered and passed upon in the recent case of the Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 129, and it was there held that the said article was not violative of any of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. It is specifically urged that article 3 violates section 10, of article 1, of the Federal Constitution, in that it impairs the obligations of a contract, and the compact with Virginia is cited as the contract claimed to have been impaired.

Complaint is also made that said article violates section 1, of the Fourteenth Amendment, in that it deprives the owner of his property without due process of law, or that it denies to some persons the equal protection of the law, and also that it is violative of clause 1, section 10, article 1, of the Federal Constitution, which denies the right of any State to pass an ex post facto law. In none of these contentions do we concur. We see no reason for receding from the conclusions reached upon these several points in the case of the Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth, above cited.

There can be no serious objection to article 3 on the ground that it is an ex post facto law, in so far as the said article applies to years subsequent to 1906. But, it is insisted that as the act declares that delinquency for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, shall be cause for forfeiture, which might have been removed on or before January 1, 1907, by the payment of the taxes and interest and penalties provided by law for the redemption of land sold for the non-payment of taxes, it visits upon the delinquent greater penalties than he was subject to prior to the passage of the act.

This would be true if the delinquent had voluntarily paid the taxes for those years; but the result is not necessarily the same had the delinquent been proceeded against by an officer authorized by law to collect back taxes; however, we are of opinion that the delinquent's liabilities for those years are to be measured by his liabilities had he volunteered to list and pay his taxes. It, therefore, follows that the article, in so far as it requires the payment of interest and penalties for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, is inoperative, and the delinquent for those years would be required to pay only taxes, without interest or penalties. But, for the reasons and upon the authorities cited in the opinion and consistent with the rulings of this court, the elimination of the interest and penalties for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, does not affect the other provisions of the article with respect to those years, or years subsequent thereto.

As the appellant is under no disability, does not claim under a grant from the State of Virginia, and did not seek to list its property, or offer to pay the taxes for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, either with or without interest and penalties, we hesitated in the opinion to pass specifically upon these questions raised by it. However, out of the consideration entertained for the eminent counsel presenting them, we have expressed our views upon these points, in order that he may have the benefit of specific adjudication thereon.

The petition for re-hearing is overruled.

WOBBLE, &c. v. FINCH, &c.

(Filed May 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

New Trials—Motion For—Provision of Civil Code—The judgment complained of was rendered at the May term, and the motion to set it aside and grant a new trial was made the following September term. Under section 340, Civil Code, the motion came too late. However, it appears from the affidavits that a case was made out under section 518, of the Civil Code; but the lower court was authorized to grant the relief sought under section 340, of the Code.

R. T. Colston for appellants.

J. B. White for appellees.

Appeal from Wolfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

In February, 1907, appellants, who are citizens of Louisville, Ky., brought this action in the Wolfe Circuit Court against the appellees, to recover an undivided one-eighth interest in a tract of land, situated in Wolfe county. They averred that the appellant, Ida Wobble, was entitled to it by inheritance from her father, George W. Asburry, who died, leaving surviving him eight children.

At the following May term of the court, the defendants filed an answer, denying that appellant, Ida Wobble, was entitled to any interest in the land. No reply being filed, or other motion made by the plaintiff, when the case was called for trial at the May term of court, a jury was empaneled to try the issue, and a verdict was returned for the defendants, now appellees. Upon this verdict a judgment was rendered in conformity thereto.

At the September term, 1907, the appellants, who were plaintiffs below, appeared in court, and, after tendering a reply, moved the court to set aside the judgment and grant them a new trial. The grounds relied upon being first, that they and their attorney were prevented by accident and surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, from attending the May term of court, or being present at the trial of the action; second, that they had a just and meritorious cause of action against the defendants. In addition to these grounds, others of a purely technical nature were relied upon. In support of the ground first mentioned, R. T. Colston and J. D. Atkinson filed their affidavits.

After considering the motion, the court overruled the same, and from that ruling this appeal is prosecuted.

Under the Code provisions with reference to a new trial, the application came too late. It is provided in section 342 that:

"The application for a new trial must be made at the term at which the verdict or decision is rendered, and, except for the cause mentioned in section 340, sub-section 7, shall be within three days after the verdict or decision is rendered, unless unavoidably prevented."

If a person making the motion is "unavoidably prevented" from making the same within the three days, it may be made at any time during the term. But the words "unavoidably prevented" do not extend the time for making the application beyond the term. If a party lets the term at which the judgment is rendered go by, then he must look to other provisions of the Code for relief. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Paynter, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 163.)

In the case before us, it appears from the affidavits filed that the appellant has made out a case authorizing the granting of a new trial under section 518, of the Code, providing that the "court in which a judgment has been rendered shall have power after the expiration of the term to vacate or modify * * * for unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from appearing or defending." But the lower court was not authorized by motion for a new trial, under section 340, to grant the relief sought.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

MANN BROTHERS v. JENKINS.

(Filed May 26, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Homestead—Adjoining Tracts—Husband and Wife—Where a husband and wife own adjoining tracts of land, which are cultivated as one farm, the fact that the dwelling house in which they reside is located upon the wife's part does not deprive the husband of the right of homestead in the part owned by him, as they are regarded as living upon his land within the meaning of the homestead law.

Vance & Heilbronner for appellants.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

The Nelson Manufacturing Company, of St. Louis, Missouri, obtained judgment against T. M. Jenkins & Son and the appellants, Mann Brothers, in the Henderson Circuit Court. Thereafter the judgment was assigned to appellants. The latter caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, and the sheriff levied the execution upon a certain lot of ground, the property of T. M. Jenkins, in the city of Henderson, Kentucky, fronting 25 feet on Third street and extending back a distance of 185 feet. On April 14, 1903, appellee filed his petition in the Henderson Circuit Court, claiming the property levied on as his homestead, and seeking to enjoin the sale under appellant's execution. The petition alleges that plaintiff is a bona fide housekeeper with a family, a resident of this Commonwealth; that he now resides and for many years has resided with his family, upon the parcel of land in question; that the house and lot levied upon by the defendant are not worth, and are not of the value of $1,000, and that said property is exempt to him as a housekeeper with a family. On September 9th, 1903, appellants filed an answer to the effect that there had never been a residence upon the lot of ground mentioned in plaintiff's petition and upon which the execution was levied, and denying that the plaintiff or his family had ever resided upon said parcel of ground, or that it was exempt to him as a housekeeper with a family. Proof was taken and the cause submitted to the chancellor, who adjudged that the property levied upon was not worth $1,000, and that appellee was entitled to a homestead therein. The court also entered judgment enjoining the appellants from selling the property. From this judgment Mann Brothers appealed.

It appears from the record that the 25 feet levied on as the property of appellee, adjoins a lot fronting 75 feet on the same street, belonging to appellee's wife. Upon this lot of 75 feet, is a house which is occupied by appellee and his wife. Both the 75 feet and the 25 feet are in one enclosure. Appellee uses the 25 feet as a garden. It does not appear exactly when appellee conveyed the 75 feet to his wife. When asked when the conveyance was made, he stated he could not remember—that the deed would show. He does state, however, that the two pieces of property had been listed separately by him and his wife for several years. Appellee and his wife had resided upon the 100 feet of land for fully 40 years.

The law is well settled in this State, that, where a husband and wife own adjoining tracts of land which are cultivated as one farm, the fact that the dwelling-house in which they reside is located upon the wife's part of the land does not deprive the husband of the right to homestead exemption out of that part of the land owned by him, as they are to be regarded as residing upon his land within the meaning of the homestead law. (Mason v. Columbia Finance & Trust Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 40.) And in the case of Summers v. Sprigg, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 206, it was held that, where a debtor moved from the tract of land owned and occupied by him as a homestead, to a tract owned by his wife, which was separated from his land, only by a public road, and used both tracts as though they were contiguous, it could not be said that he had abandoned his homestead; but his land being worth less than $1,000, he was entitled to have it set aside to him as a homestead.

Appellants contend that appellee did not fix the time of the conveyance of the 75 feet to his wife, and that if the conveyance was made after the execution levy—the two pieces of property being worth more than $1,000—appellee would not be entitled to homestead in the 25-foot lot. While it is true, that appellee did not state the time, and said he did not remember when the deed was made, but that the deed itself, which was lodged in the clerk's office, would show, it does appear from his testimony that he had listed the two tracts—the 75 feet to his wife and the 25 feet to himself—for a number of years. We think this testimony was sufficient to make out a prima facie case for appellee, and it was then incumbent upon appellants to show that the conveyance had, as a matter of fact, been made after the levy of the execution. Furthermore, the evidence fully showed that the only property owned by appellee was the 25 feet in question, and if appellants intended to rely upon a fraudulent conveyance by him to his wife, such fraud should have been pleaded and proved.

Judgment affirmed.

BOLTON v. AYERS, &c.

(Filed May 26, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Office and Officer—Action Against for Killing Person—Who May Maintain—As the right of action, under section 4, Kentucky Statutes, is made to vest in the widow or minor child, or in both, the appellant in this case, being one of the real parties in interest, it was not necessary to join either the town of Jellico or the Commonwealth, as plaintiff, and in this action against the marshal for the killing of deceased, the trial court erred in sustaining a special demurrer to the petition.

R. S. Rose for appellant.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellee, James Ayers, who was marshal of the town of Jellico, Kentucky, shot and killed Sampson Bolton. Thereafter, Martha Bolton, instituted this action for damages against appellee, James Ayers, and also appellees, Richard Perkins and B. M. Rose, sureties on the bond which said Ayers had executed to the town of Jellico for the faithful performance of his duties as marshal. Appellees filed a special demurrer to the petition, which was sustained. Subsequently appellant offered to file an amended petition, making the Commonwealth of Kentucky a party plaintiff, and asking that the action be prosecuted in the name of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, for her use. The court declined to permit the amended petition to be filed. To reverse the ruling of the court, Martha Bolton prosecutes this appeal.

By section 4, of the Kentucky Statutes, the widow and minor child, or either or both of them, of a person killed by the careless, wanton or malicious use of fire arms or other deadly weapon, are given a right of action against the person who committed the killing. By section 3690, the marshal of a sixth class town is required, before he enters upon the duties of his office, to execute a bond with approved sureties, to such town, in the sum of $1,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties; and for any unlawful arrest and unnecessary or cruel beating or assault upon any person in making an arrest, he and his sureties shall be liable to the person so injured on said bond. Section 18, of the Code, provides that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in section 21. As section 3690, of the statutes, provides that the sureties on the bond shall be liable, in case of unnecessary or cruel beating or assault upon any person by the marshal of the town, to the person so injured, and, as the right of action, where the injury is such as to result in death is, by section 4, supra, made to vest in the widow or minor child, or in both, and, as the appellant in this case is one of the real parties in interest, we conclude that it is not necessary to join as plaintiff either the town of Jellico or the Commonwealth of Kentucky. The trial court, therefore, erred in sustaining the special demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

DENHAM, EX PARTE, ON PETITION.

(Filed May 26, 1908—Not to be reported.)

This appeal from an order of the judge of the lower court, overruling Denham's motion to qualify as Commonwealth's attorney, must be dismissed because neither the judge of the court below nor the acting Commonwealth's attorney is before the court, and no reason is shown for holding that the ruling of the court below was incorrect.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for petitioner Denham.

Greene & VanWinkle for Circuit Judge Moss.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, dismissing appeal.

On the 5th day of December, 1907, G. A. Denham appeared in the Whitley Circuit Court with a commission of the then Governor of the Commonwealth, J. C. W. Beckham, appointing him to fill a supposed vacancy in the office of Commonwealth's attorney for the 26th judicial district of Kentucky, and requested that his commission be spread upon the records of the court, and he be allowed to discharge the duties of the office. His motion was overruled by the circuit judge, who gave several reasons for so doing, and, among them, that there was no vacancy in the office to be filled by the Governor's appointment, as an election had been held in the district, at the regular election in November, 1907, and one, Joseph B. Snyder had been elected to the office of Commonwealth's attorney, and was then filling the duties thereof. From the order overruling his motion, G. A. Denham prosecutes this appeal.

We know of no authority for such a procedure on the part of the ex parte petitioner. If he is entitled to the office of Commonwealth's attorney for the 26th judicial district and is prevented by any one from discharging the duties thereof, then he should institute a proper action against them, and create such issue or issues of law or fact as may be necessary to enable the court judicially to pass upon his legal rights. Neither the circuit judge, M. J. Moss, nor Joseph B. Snyder, the acting incumbent of the office, is before the court. Certainly we can not determine in this proceeding anything that would be detrimental to the title of Mr. Snyder as to his claim to the office in question, under his election; and no reason whatever is shown for holding that the ruling of the circuit judge was incorrect. Every intendment must be taken to support the validity of the judgment appealed from.

For these reasons, the appeal is dismissed.

PACE v. CAWOOD.

(Filed May 26, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Vendor—Age Of—Where Obtained Purchase Price—Appellant sold the land and received the purchase price upon the faith and credit of his verified statement that he was 21 years of age, and in view of this he will not be permitted to controvert the statements of his affidavit to the prejudice of the person dealing with him.

Isham G. Leabow for appellant.

H. C. Clay and J. B. Carter for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The only question in this case is whether or not the appellant was twenty-one years old in April, 1903, when he conveyed to the vendor of appellee, a tract of land.

In his petition, seeking to have the conveyance cancelled and be restored to the possession of the land, appellant avers he was born in March, 1884, and consequently did not become twenty-one until March, 1905, some two years subsequent to the execution of the conveyance. On the other hand, appellee's contention is that he was born in February or March, 1882, and was more than twenty-one years of age when he made the deed. The evidence as to his age is not entirely satisfactory.

Before the deed was made, the purchaser required appellant and his mother to make affidavits as to his age, and both of them signed and swore to statements that he was twenty-one years old on the 22d day of March, 1903. Appellee says he was induced to adopt this course, because Pace had previously repudiated a contract upon the ground that he was an infant, and he desired the affidavits to protect himself in the event Pace attempted to avoid the contract with him.

Pace and his mother, in their evidence, say they did not know how old he was in 1903, or in what year he was born.

In the county clerk's office there is kept a record book known as the "Marriage Bond Record," containing the names of persons who obtain license to marry, and other evidence touching their age and residence. The county clerk testified that pages 102, 104 and 106 of this record book contained records relating to marriage licenses issued on May 2d, May 3d, and May 5th, 1883. Page 108 of the book was torn out, as was also the index page containing the letter "P." The inference drawn from this book by the attorney for appellant, is that page 108 contained a record of the marriage of the parents of appellant, and that following pages, 102, 104 and 106, page 108 would establish that they were married sometime in May, 1883. It is also in evidence that page 108 was in the book about the time this action was instituted, and contained a record showing that appellant's parents obtained a license to marry on the 9th of May, 1883; but that a few months afterwards, when the record was again inspected, page 108 was missing, as was the index page devoted to the letter "P."

If appellant's parents were married in May, 1883, he was only twenty years of age in April, 1903, when the deed was executed; and the conclusion is drawn that the missing pages were taken from the book by some person interested in concealing the date of the marriage of the parents of appellant. But the evidential force of this record book is materially weakened by that fact that on page 110, there is an entry dated December 1, 1882. on page 112, one dated December 13, 1882, and on page 114 one dated December 26, 1882. Thus, demonstrating that the marriage entries were not recorded in the book in regular order of time. If they had been, the 1882 records on pages 110, 112 and 114 would have preceded the 1883 records on pages 102, 104 and 106. If, however, Pace was in fact only twenty when he executed the deed, his minority would not avail him in this case. He made an affidavit that he was twenty-one years of age at the time he executed and delivered the deed he is now seeking to cancel, and received the purchase price which he claims to have spent before reaching the age of twenty-one, and upon the faith of his sworn statement, the vendee was induced to make the purchase. In addition to the affidavit there is evidence that Pace was permitted to vote at the regular election in 1903, upon his statement that he was more than twenty-one.

The evidence is not sufficient to justify us in saying that the purchaser knew that Pace was not of age; and having obtained the purchase Price upon the faith and credit of his verified statement that he was twenty-one years of age, he will not be permitted to controvert it to the prejudice of the person dealing with him. (Harris v. Ronk, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 967; Schmitheimer v. Elseman, 7 Bush, 298; Ingram v. Isom, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 48.)

Without further extending this opinion in repeating the conflicting evidence introduced for and against the proposition that appellant was twenty-one years of age when he executed the deed, we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the lower court that he was twenty-one or if not, that under the circumstances, he is estopped from depending on his infancy to practice a fraud.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

TOLER'S HEIRS v. TOLER.

(Filed May 26th, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Suit to Divide—Pleading—The petition in this action fails to conform to section 499 of the Code. The statements are mere conclusions of the pleader and are not sufficient to show title.

2. Dismissal of Action—Does Not Preclude Another Action—In certain State of Case—The petition having been dismissed because it does not state a cause of action, plaintiffs are not precluded by the judgment from bringing another action to divide the land.

Stone & Wallace for appellants.

Appeal from Wayne Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

O. U. Toler instituted this action against G. C. Toler, for a division of a certain tract of land situated in Wayne county, Kentucky. Thereafter, O. U. Toler died and the action was revived in the name of his heirs, J. W. Toler, R. H. Toler, U. W. Toler and Sarah Toler. The petition states that one, A. J. Toler died the owner of, and in possession of, the tract of land in question; that after the death of said A. J. Toler, and within ten months from the time of his death, there was born to him a child, James Jackson Toler, who lived but a short time, and died in Wayne county, Kentucky, under twenty-one years of age, and who inherited said tract of land from his father, A. J. Toler; that at the death of said James Jackson Toler, the title to said tract of land descended to, and vested in O. U. Toler and G. C. Toler, brothers of A. J. Toler, deceased, and Arcy Toler and Sarah Toler, sisters of said A. J. Toler—they being the uncles and aunts of said James Jackson Toler—subject to the homestead rights of James Jackson Toler's mother, Minerva Jane Toler; that some time thereafter, Minerva Jane Toler, widow of said A. J. Toler, sold and by deed conveyed her life interest in said tract of land to defendant Granville C. Toler; that Arcy Toler and Sarah Toler, aunts of James Jackson Toler, deceased, sold and conveyed to the defendant, Granville C. Toler, their undivided interests in said tract of land; that plaintiffs are entitled to only one-fourth of the tract of land, and the defendant, Granville C. Toler, to three-fourths of said tract. The petition then concludes with a prayer for a division of the tract of land according to the respective interests of the plaintiffs and defendant. To the petition the defendant, G. C. Toler, filed an answer denying that the plaintiff or his heirs owned any interest in the property in question, and also pleading the fifteen years' statute of limitation. Upon final submission of the case, the court held that the defendant had failed to sustain his plea of limitation, but dismissed the petition of plaintiffs upon the ground that it did not state a good cause of action. From a judgment so entered, both the plaintiffs and defendant appealed.

Counsel for appellants earnestly contend that their pleadings conform to the provision of section 499, of the Civil Code. That provision, however, requires that the written evidence of the title to the land, or copies thereof, if there be any, must be filed with the petition. In attempting to comply with this provision, appellants had filed certain deeds, but these deeds, in and of themselves, fail to show title in appellants. The petition further failed to show that James Jackson Toler left no issue; and also failed to state that the deceased left no brothers or sisters or other heirs who, by the law of descent and distribution, would have inherited before appellants. In an action brought pursuant to section 499, either written evidence of the title should be filed or the petition must state facts which show title, and these facts must be proved. In this case the allegation that the tract of land descended to, and vested in the plaintiff and defendant, brothers of said A. J. Toler, and Arcy Toler and Sarah Toler, sisters of said A. J. Toler, and the further allegation that plaintiff was one of the legal representatives and heirs at law of said James Jackson Toler, deceased, are simply conclusions of law, and do not state facts sufficient to show title. This very question was before this court in the case of Larue, &c. v. Hays, &c., 7 Bush, 50, wherein a division of land was sought. The court said:

"It is insisted for the appellants that although the relationship of Phoebe Larue to Isaac Larue was not alleged or proved, and her title was expressly denied by the defendants, yet as it was alleged in the petition, and not admitted or denied by the defense, that she was 'one of the heirs' of the patentee, and as it was not controverted that some of the defendants held under the heirs of Isaac Larue through Neill and others, and it does not appear that they acquired the interest of Phoebe Larue and her husband in any other mode than through their deed to Neill and Rust, they must now, since the termination of such estate as James Larue had, be regarded as holding the land as the co-parceners of the plaintiffs, and subject to their right to a partition.

"But we are of opinion not only that the plaintiffs have failed to manifest their right to any recovery by any sufficient evidence of title, but that the petition is fatally defective, so far as it purports to allege the derivation of title by Phoebe Larue by inheritance from Isaac Larue—the averment that she was one of his heirs being but a conclusion of law, as this court has repeatedly decided, in effect, in passing upon the competency of evidence adduced to prove heirship. (Banks v. Johnson, 4 J. J. Mar., 649; Currie, &c. v. Fowler, 5 J. J. Mar., 145.)"

The petition of plaintiffs having been dismissed solely on the ground that it did not state a cause of action, they will not be precluded by the judgment from bringing another action.

No brief has been filed for appellee, and we are unable to find upon what ground he seeks a reversal of the judgment below. Suffice it to say, however, that we have examined the pleadings and evidence, upon which his adverse possession is based, and are not inclined to disturb the finding of the chancellor.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed, both on the original and cross-appeal.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO. v. EVANS, ADM'R.

(Filed May 27, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Trial—Statement of Case to Jury—Discretion of Counsel—Review on Appeal—In making a statement of the case to a jury, the matter is to be determined by counsel, and while the court in its discretion, might direct counsel to make a statement, or a fuller statement, when the court deemed it necessary, the court's discretion in a matter of this sort will not be reviewed on appeal.

2. Railroads—Negligently Causing Death of Brakeman—Statement of Conductor—Part of Res Gestae—Competency—A brakeman who was on a freight car, in discharge of his duty, was thrown therefrom by a sudden jerk of the train by the engineer, and run over by the car and killed. In an action by his administrator for damages, a witness stated that in a minute after the accident he went to the engineer and told him he had killed his brakeman, when he replied: "that is the way, whenever I get mad, I either hurt or kill somebody." Held—That the statement of the engineer to the witness was competent evidence as part of the res gestae.

3. Same—Non-resident Railroad—Resident Conductor—Trial—Evidence Heard—Dismissal as to Conductor—Motion for Removal—Delay in Motion—In an action for damages against a non-resident railroad company and its resident conductor, by the administrator of a deceased brakeman for causing the death of the decedent, where, on the conclusion of the evidence, the court, on motion of the defendants, dismissed the action against the conductor, it was too late then for the railroad company to ask that the case be moved to the federal court. A non-resident defendant can not answer without objection, and go through a large part of the trial and then, for the first time, make a motion for such transfer.

4. Same—Defective Petition—Amending Prayer—Discretion of Court—In an action against a railroad company for damage for the alleged killing of a brakeman, where the petition contained no prayer for relief, it was in the discretion of the trial court, after the evidence was heard, on the motion of the defendant for a peremptory instruction, to allow the plaintiff to file an amended petition praying judgment for the sum sued for and all proper relief.

5. Same—Instructions to Jury—Submitting Law and Facts—On the trial of an action against a railroad company by the administrator of a deceased brakeman, for causing decedent's death, it was error in the trial court to instruct the jury that "if the death of the deceased was caused by the gross negligence of the engineer they should find for the plaintiff, provided deceased was at the time in the performance of his duty as brakeman and exercising ordinary care for his own safety," as such instruction fails to inform the jury what the law of the case was as to gross negligence, and thereby the court submits both the law and facts to the jury.

O. H. Waddle & Son, John Galvin and Galvin & Galvin for appellant.

Sharp, Bethurum & Cooper, Catron & Tartar, Hazelrigg, Chénault & Hazelrigg and Wm. M. Catron for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Logan Evans was a brakeman on a freight train in the service of the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Co.

When the train reached a station called Flat Rock, the conductor was notified by the station agent, to move a car, which stood on the side track, and put it at another point for loading. There were ten or twelve cars in front of this car. So to do what was wanted, they cut the engine off from the train, and went in with it on the side track and coupled to the cars. They then pulled out these cars, having the car they wanted to move at the rear, and backed in on the main track, where Evans cut off this car from the others, the plan being to put the other ten cars back on the side-track and then to come back with the engine and get this car and put it at the place where it was needed. After Evans had cut off the car the engine pulled up the main track with the other ten cars beyond the switch and the brakeman, who was still at the switch, turned it and signaled the engineer to back down on the side-track. This he did, and when the cars were backed in on the side-track, and reached the point where Evans was standing, he got up on the car furthest from the engine and was standing about the middle of the car when a man named Williams, who was loading a car a little lower down, called to him not to let those cars bump against the car he was loading. At this Evans started to the brake at the rear end of the car, and when he was within ten or fifteen feet of the brake, the engineer stopped the engine, giving the car on which Evans was, such a jerk that he was thrown over the end of the car, although he was ten or fifteen feet from it. He tried to catch on the brake, but his hold broke and he fell over the end of the car and was run over and killed. This suit was filed by his administrator against the railroad company and the conductor of the train on the ground that his death was caused by their negligence. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff the court instructed the jury to find a verdict for the conductor, and the case being submitted as to the railroad company on all the evidence, the jury found a verdict against the railroad company for $7,500. From the judgment entered on the verdict, the railroad company appeals.

When the case was called for trial the plaintiff's attorney declined to make a statement to the jury of the facts which he expected to prove. The defendant's attorney objected to this and asked the court to require the plaintiff to make a statement. The court declined to do so and the defendant excepted. Section 317, of the Civil Code, is as follows:

"When the jury has been sworn the trial shall proceed in the following order, unless the court, for special reasons, direct otherwise:

"1. The plaintiff must briefly state his claim and the evidence which he expects to sustain it.

"2. The defendant must then briefly state his defense and the evidence he expects to offer in support of it.

"3. The party on whom rests the burden of proof, in the whole action, must first produce his evidence; the adverse party will then produce his evidence.

"4. The parties will then be confined to rebutting evidence, unless the court, for good reasons, in furtherance of justice, permit them to offer evidence in chief."

What statement of facts the plaintiff's counsel will make is necessarily a matter for him to decide. He can make it more or less elaborate as he sees proper. Often in practice the statement is made by simply reading the petition to the jury or by stating the substance of it. The court will not usually control the brevity of the statement the council may make; that is, he may make it as brief as he pleases and, therefore, the making of the statement is ordinarily a matter left entirely within the discretion of counsel. Our observation is that in practice the making of the statement is a matter to be determined by counsel, and that the section of the Code is regarded as prescribing the order of the proceeding rather than as requiring a full statement of the facts to be made by counsel. At any rate, it is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, and we do not see how the defendant's substantial rights were injured by the action of the court in refusing to require the counsel to make a statement of the facts which he expected to prove. It is provided in the section that the party on whom rests the burden of proof in the whole action must first produce his evidence. But manifestly, if he declined to introduce evidence, the court would not require him to do so. The purpose of the Code in providing that the parties should each state his case to the jury, is to aid the jury in understanding the facts of the case. The court, in its discretion, might direct the counsel to make a statement, or to make a more full statement, when he deemed it necessary. But his discretion in a matter of this sort, will not be reviewed by this court unless abused.

The plaintiff introduced, as a witness on the trial, Fred C. Crouch, who said that he was sitting about thirty feet from the track and saw Evans thrown from the car and run over; that he at once went to the engine, reaching the engineer in about a minute, and told him he had killed one of his brakemen back there; that the engineer then said: "That is the way whenever I get mad, I either hurt or kill somebody." The defendants objected to this evidence and moved the court to exclude it from the consideration of the jury. The court refused to exclude the evidence and to this they excepted. In McLeod v. Ginther, 80 Ky., 399, there was a collision between two passenger trains. To the first man who met him, the conductor of one of the trains said, "I had until 10:10 to make Beards." The evidence was held competent. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Shaw, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1041, Shaw had fallen from a passenger train. A man near by heard his cries and went to him. What he then said to this man, the first person to reach him while the departing train was still in sight was held admissible as res gestae. In Brown v. Louisville R. R. Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 995, the declarations of the plaintiff at the place where she fell were admitted, but her declarations while passing down the street on her way home, were rejected. In Floyd v. Paducah R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1077, the declarations of the motor-man at the place of the collision, just after the accident, were admitted. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Molloy, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1113, a passenger train struck a vehicle at a public crossing. What the driver of the vehicle said to the first man who got to him, and who ran to him as soon as he could, was allowed as res gestae. In Rex v. Foster, 6 C. P., 325, a statement made by the deceased as to the cause of the accident as soon as he was picked up after he had been run over was admitted as res gestae. In Insurance Co. v. Moseley, 8 Wal., 379, the deceased went down stairs and when he returned to his room, complained of his head hurting him, and said that he had fallen down the steps. The evidence was admitted as part of the res gestae. We do not see how this case can be distinguished from those cited. The statement of the engineer was, in effect, a declaration that he was mad, and that the jerk of the train which threw Evans off was due to this fact. It was not a bare expression of opinion, for the engineer was in charge of the engine and the engine had given the jerk which threw Evans off. The thing that he was explaining was how he came to give the train such a jerk. It is earnestly insisted that the evidence is wholly incredible, but the credibility of the witnesses is for the jury. If the evidence was competent it was properly admitted.

At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the conductor, John Bowman, moved the court to instruct the jury to find for him. The court sustained the motion, and when this had been done, the railroad company filed its petition and moved the court to transfer the case to the circuit court of the United States. The court overruled the motion on the ground that it came too late. The act of Congress provides that the motion may be made in the State court "at the time, or at any time before," the defendant is required to answer. The defendant had filed its answer at the previous terms and by not making the motion then, to transfer the case to the United States Court, had waived its right to such transfer. Although the conductor was made a defendant, the railroad company might then have filed its petition, and if it appeared later, that there was no reasonable ground for uniting the conductor in the suit, the court would have ordered the action transferred. But the defendant can not answer without objection and go through a large part of the trial, and then for the first time make a motion of this sort. The case of Whitcombe v. Smithson, 175 U. S., 675, is conclusive on this point. The conductor was evidently joined as a defendant on the ground that Evans would not have been hurt if the engine had been cut off from the cars before it was started back, and that the conductor should have done this. But the proof on the trial showed that the conductor had simply told the brakeman what to do, and that he was taking no part in the movement of the train. There was a failure of proof as to the conductor, but the railroad company should have made its motion to transfer the case at the proper time. In that way it would have preserved its rights. (Dudley v. I. C. R. R. Co., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 1029; Underwood v. I. C. R. R. Co., 31 Ky. Law Rep., 595.) But it could not, without objection to the jurisdiction of the State court, file answer to the merits, and after obtaining the judgment of that court on all the questions arising in the case down to the close of the plaintiff's testimony, then ask the removal of the case to another court that it might there relitigate all the questions on which the judgment of the State court had been unfavorable to it. If the objections to the testimony which were made by the defendant had all been sustained, little would have been left of the plaintiff's case. Without asking a removal from the State court it went to trial in that court and attempted to win its case there. When the rulings of the court were unfavorable to it, it could not withdraw the appearance it had entered unequivocally, and ask a removal of the case to the United States Court, to retry these matters there.

When the motion to remove the case to the circuit court of the United States was overruled, the railroad company moved the court to instruct the jury peremptorily for it. This motion was properly overruled by the circuit court, as there was evidence tending to show that Evans, while in discharge of his duty on the top of the car, was, by a sudden jerk of the train, thrown ten or fifteen feet and over the end of the car; that such a jerk is unusual and that there was nothing in the situation to require any such handling of the train by the engineer. After its motion for a peremptory instruction was overruled the defendant introduced its evidence which tended to show that there was no unusual jerk of the train; that the movements of the train were directed by the head brakeman who was the fellow-servant of Evans; that the train was stopped in obedience to his signals, and when the engineer did not know that Evans was on it. There was evidence also tending to show that Evans was under the impression that the engine had been cut loose from the cars, and that the cars were simply being kicked in by the engine; that he was under the impression that the cars would run until he stopped them with the brake; and that he was not on the lookout for the engine to stop them; that there is always more or less slack in a train, and that when the slack is taken up there is more or less jerk in the cars furthest from the engine. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant renewed its motion for a peremptory instruction, and then called the court's attention to the fact that the plaintiff's petition contained no prayer for relief. The petition showed that the estate of the deceased was damaged in the sum of $20,000. It then concluded with these words: "For all proper and general relief." No objection had been made to the petition on the ground that it did not contain a prayer for relief. The reply contained a sufficient prayer. As defense had been made and the proof had been heard, it might well be argued, under section 90, of the Civil Code, that the omission in the petition was not material. But it is not necessary for us to determine this question. The court allowed the plaintiff to file an amended petition, in which he prayed judgment for $20,000. In this there was no error. The amended petition corrected what was apparently a clerical error in the petition, made perhaps by the copyist. It was not in any sense a material change. The cause of action was the same before it was filed as after. After the amended petition was filed the defendant renewed its motion to remove the case to the circuit court of the United States. This motion was properly overruled, as the amended petition in no way affected the appearance which the defendant had entered to the action.

The court instructed the jury in substance that if Evans' death was caused by the gross negligence of the engineer, they should find for the plaintiff, provided Evans was at the time in performance of his duty as brakeman, and exercising ordinary care for his own safety. In requiring gross negligence on the part of the engineer the court was in error. Where a person does not die, and sues to recover on account of the negligence of his superior servant who is engaged in the work with him, under the rule laid down in this State, gross negligence must be shown. But this action was brought to recover for the death of Evans under the statute, and the statute authorizes a recovery for negligence, although it may not be gross. (Kentucky Statutes, section 6; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Coleman, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 878; Southern Railway Co. v. Otis, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1686; Cincinnati R. R. Co. v. Cook, 113 Ky., 167.) In this respect the instructions are more favorable to the railroad company than they should have been. But the instructions are subject to this objection that they submit both the law and the facts to the jury. The law of the case is to be determined by the court; the jury are simply to find the facts. The instructions of the court here fail to inform the jury what the law of the case is. In lieu of instructions 1, 3, 4, A and B given, the court should, by its instruction, in substance, have laid down to the jury these propositions.

1. If the engineer negligently gave the cars a jerk which was unusual, unnecessary and so violent as to show a want of ordinary care on his part for the safety of the brakeman in charge of the train, or on it, and by reason of this Evans, while in the performance of his duty as brakeman and exercising ordinary care for his own safety, was thrown from the car and run over and killed, they should find for the plaintiff.

2. Ordinary care is such as a person of ordinary prudence usually exercises under like circumstances. Negligence is the want of such care.

3. If the engineer received a signal from the head brakeman to stop the train, and in obedience to this signal, and as required by it, he stopped the train in the usual manner where such a signal was given; or if Evans was under the impression that the engine had been cut off from the cars and the accident to him was due to this misunderstanding on his part, and not to the negligence of the engineer, as defined in No. 1, or if he was not on the car in the performance of his duty as brakeman, then in any of these events the jury should find for the defendant.

4. Evans, when he entered the service of the railroad company as a brakeman, assumed all the risks of the employment as usually conducted, including the negligence of his fellow brakemen and such jerks of the cars as resulted from the taking up of the slack in the movements of the cars made with ordinary care by the engineer.

The instructions given on the trial do not sufficiently present the defendant's side of the case. The defendant is not liable to Evans for the negligence of his fellow brakeman, and if the stop was made at his direction, and as required by him, the plaintiff can not recover. So too, if Evans thought the engine had been cut off from the cars, and, acting under this mistake, was off his guard and thus brought about the accident, there can be no recovery; for the engineer was in nowise responsible for this and it is only for his negligence that the plaintiff may recover, as there is no negligence on the part of the conductor.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

BROWN v. BROWN'S ADM'RS.

(Filed May 26, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Trusts and Trust Estates—Investment of Wife's Money by Husband—Deed to Husband—Death of Wife—Claim of Child—A husband, in 1848, with the consent of his wife, sold two slaves belonging to her for $500, which he invested in land and took the deed to himself. After the wife's death her daughter sued her father, claiming that he held the land as trustee for her. Held—That the money for which the land was sold in 1848 belonged to the father, as the law then stood, and the fact that the father sometimes gave it out in oral statements that he recognized the $500 as a trust in his hands, first for the benefit of the mother, and afterwards for the daughter, amounts to an unexecuted promise which can not be enforced as a trust.

2. Same — Establishment of Trust — Definite Ascertainment — The rule is well settled that the subject of a supposed trust, as well as the cestui que trust must be definitely ascertained in order to be enforceable, and if this is not done no trust is established. A mere declaration of a purpose to create a trust is of no value unless carried into effect.

B. S. Grannis for appellant.

John P. McCartney for appellees.

Appeal from Fleming Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

The appellant's cause of action is stated in the following excerpt from her petition:

"Plaintiff says that the estate of David Brown (her father) is indebted to this plaintiff in the sum of $500; that the claim arises in this wise: That, during the lifetime of plaintiff's mother, now deceased, her said mother was the owner of two slaves; that, with her consent, David Brown sold said slaves, about 1847 to 1848, for the sum of $500 and invested the proceeds thereof for the use and benefit of this plaintiff's mother, in a tract of land, taking the deed to himself; that, during the lifetime of plaintiff's mother, the decedent, David Brown, recognized the claim of his wife, this plaintiff's mother, for the said sum of $500, and claimed to hold the same in trust for her; that this plaintiff's mother died, many years ago, intestate, leaving this child as her only heir at law, and, after her death, her father, David Brown, chose to, and did, recognize said claim of $500 as belonging to this plaintiff, and claimed to hold said $500 in trust for this plaintiff; that he recognized said claim of $500 up to the time of his death, and claimed to be holding said sum of $500 in trust for this plaintiff."

Subsequently the plaintiff amended her petition, but, in our opinion, the amendment adds nothing to the value of the pleading. A general demurrer was filed to the petition as amended, and sustained by the court, whereupon the appellant (plaintiff) declined to plead further, and her petition was dismissed. From this judgment she has prosecuted an appeal.

We are of opinion that the trial court was correct in sustaining the demurrer. Appellant's father, David Brown, died in 1905. He sold two slaves, belonging to his wife, in 1847 or 1848, for $500, which he invested in land, taking the title to himself. The money belonged to him as the law then stood. We think the allegations of the existence of a trust in regard to the money are entirely too vague to be enforceable. It had been a part of the estate of the father for fifty-seven years. It does not appear that he accounted either to the mother or daughter for any interest on the money invested, and the fact that he gave it out in oral statements that he recognized the five hundred dollars as constituting a trust fund in his hands, first for the benefit of the mother, and afterwards for the daughter, at best amounts to a verbal promise to pay that sum to them at some future time; and thus constitutes an unexecuted promise, which can not be enforced as a trust.

The rule is well settled, that the subject of the supposed trust, as well as the cestui que trust, must be definitely ascertained in order to be enforceable; and if this is not done, no trust is established. In the case of Barkley, &c. v. Lane's Ex'or, &c., 6 Bush, 587, it is said: "But the authorities all agree that to fasten a trust on property by mere parol declaration the language used must be clear and explicit, manifesting the owner's purpose to transfer the right, and pointing out with certainty both the subject of the trust and the person who is to take the beneficial interest."

In the case of Krankel's Ex'tx v. Krankel, By, &c., 104 Ky., 745, it is said: "If there is a mere intention to create a trust, or a mere voluntary agreement to do so, and the donor contemplates some further act to be done by him to give it effect, the trust is not perfect, and equity will not lend its aid to enforce it." (Citing 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., section 997; Williamson v. Yager, 91 Ky., 282; Roche v. George's Ex'or, 93 Ky., 609.) In Perry on Trusts, 5 edition, volume 1, section 86, it is said: "The subject-matter of the trust must be clearly ascertained, as well as the purposes of the trust and the persons who are to take the beneficial interests. Loose, vague, and indefinite expressions are insufficient to create the trust. A mere declaration of a purpose to create a trust is of no value unless carried into effect. A simple promise of a future donation, without consideration good or valuable, creates no trust that equity can enforce." In the case of Allen v. Withrow, 110 U. S., 119, the Supreme Court of the United States, said: "So far as the personal property conveyed to Withrow is concerned, it must be admitted that a trust may be established by parol evidence; but such evidence must be clear and convincing, not doubtful, uncertain, and contradictory, as in this case."

In the light of these authorities, giving the allegations of the petition the fullest effect, we are of opinion that they do not state facts which show a complete and enforceable trust. As said before, at best they merely show an intention at some future time to set apart five hundred dollars of the settler's money for the benefit of the plaintiff (appellant). Such an imperfect contract can not be enforced as a trust.

Judgment affirmed.

BUCKNER'S EX'OR v. KIRKLAND'S EX'OR, &c.

(Filed May 27, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Patents—Right of entry—The patent to the vendor of appellant did not have the effect to oust or disturb appellees in their possession, without an entry by the patentee or some one for him in the disputed territory, and this right of entry was not exercised.

2. Presumption—Long Continued Claim and Possession—The persons who made the entries and marked the boundaries claimed by appellees are long since dead. Considering their acts, their long-continued claim and possession without being disturbed, the presumption is that their acts were lawfully and intentions proper.

J. J. C. Bach and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellant.

Hugh Riddell, Edward S. Jouett, John S. Goodwin, W. M. Beckner and G. W. Fleenor for appellees.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellant instituted this action against appellees to enjoin them from cutting and removing timber from two patent boundaries of land, which were issued by the Commonwealth of Kentucky to M. J. Amyx on the 21st of February, 1868. Appellants are the remote vendees of Amyx. The two patent boundaries lay on the waters of Quicksand Creek. Appellees claim the timber trees in controversy by virtue of conveyances from the vendees of Green Howard and James Bradley. That is, they claim that one of the patents to Amyx is included within a boundary of land once owned by Green Howard, and that he, his vendees and descendants, have claimed and held, by actual adverse possession all the land to a well marked and defined boundary, for a period prior to the year 1844; and have continuously so held and claimed the land down to the time when this suit was instituted. Appellees present the same plea with reference to that part of the boundary in dispute owned by James Bradley. The timber on both pieces of land is claimed in the same manner by appellees, to-wit: That they bought, from the actual owner, the trees for a valuable consideration.

The facts, as they appear in the record are, in substance, as follows: Prior to the year 1844, one Thomas Higgins and three or four other persons, each entered and obtained patents for a small boundary of land lying on Quicksand Creek. The boundaries of these patents included about all the tillable land on the creek. Higgins bought two or three of these small patents adjoining his, and James Bradley became the owner of one or two of them. They settled and made improvements upon the patents, and about the year 1844, or prior thereto, they entered and extended their upper and lower lines, crossing the creek, from ridge to ridge, above and below the land. These cross lines, as well as the ridge lines, were clearly marked, and Howard and Bradley and their vendors and descendants lived on the land and claimed to the marked lines, and the land within the boundaries named were universally regarded after that as belonging to Bradley and Howard to the time of the institution of this action. These lands were thus held and claimed by appellees' vendors when, in 1868, the Amyx patents, under which appellants claim, were issued. It is agreed that neither Amyx nor any one claiming for him ever took actual possession of the lands included in the Amyx patent, or any part thereof. Appellees' vendors continued to hold and claim to their boundaries as described, notwithstanding the issue of the Amyx patent; but, as stated, their improvements did not extend beyond the boundaries of their small patents. Higgins made a deed of conveyance to Green Howard in 1844, and the boundary contained in the deed extended from ridge to ridge. In other words, included all the lands within the well-defined marked boundary referred to. Bradley divided his survey and conveyed it to his two sons. These deeds also included all the lands between the two ridges. The date of these deeds is not shown, but it appears that they were executed prior to the year 1865. His sons took their father's part and Green Howard the Higgins portion under these conveyances.

As we understand the facts in the case the only question to be determined is, whether the issual of the patents to Amyx, in 1868, ousted appellees' vendors from the possession of the lands included within the Amyx patent, other than the lands within the small patents referred to. It is unnecessary to enter into an extended discussion of the question, as the cases of Beeler v. Coy, 9 B. M., 312, and Keaton v. Sublett, 109 Ky., 106 (22 Ky. Law Rep., 631), settle it. The act of the General Assembly allowing limitations to run in such cases against the Commonwealth was not passed until the year 1873, therefore, the possession of Howard and Bradley from the year 1844 to 1868, did not toll the Commonwealth's right of entry. The patents gave Amyx a right to enter upon the land within his patents not theretofore granted by the Commonwealth; but he did not exercise this right of entry, as neither he nor any one for him took possession of the lands within his patents. At the time that the Amyx patents were issued the vendors of appellees were in the possession of the boundaries claimed by them, and the mere issual of the patents to Amyx did not have the effect to oust or disturb them in their possession, without an entry by the patentee, or some one for him, within the disputed territory. This is expressly decided in the cases referred to. In the case of Keaton v. Sublett, supra, this court said: "Many questions are raised by counsel for appellee as to the effect of a deed which Keaton obtained from Lykins, among others, that the appellants have not connected themselves with the James Reynolds patent, and have not shown that that patent covers the land in controversy. It must be admitted that the appellants' father entered upon this land under a color of title, and claimed it as his own until this action was instituted. We will not enter into a discussion of the question as to whether he had a perfect title before a patent was issued to the Crafts. He was in the actual, adverse possession of the land, claiming it as his own, until and at the time the patents were issued to the Crafts, in 1876, and that possession continued until this action was brought. The theory of the appellee is that it was vacant land at the time the patents under which he claims were issued, and that an actual, adverse holding, if there was one, did not toll the Commonwealth's right of entry. Assuming this to be true, still the same holding which constitutes actual possession of an individual's land will constitute actual possession of that belonging to the Commonwealth. Having entered upon the land and claimed to a well-defined boundary, although the land was vacant and unappropriated at the time he took possession, and during the time he held it, his actual possession was co-extensive with the boundary claimed. He may not have acquired a pre-emptive right by his settlement, the land being subject to appropriation by other persons when the patents issued to the Crafts, therefore, the previous possession could not affect the interest which the Crafts acquired from the Commonwealth. Assuming this to be true, still their father's possession became adverse to the Crafts as soon as they obtained patents, and having continued uninterrupted until this action was brought in 1896, without entry by the Crafts, it forms a complete bar to the right of entry and recovery.

"In Beeler v. Coy, 9 Ben Mon., 312, the court held that the issue of a patent at the instance of a patentee is not a direct assertion of title on the part of the Commonwealth, but a mere grant of her right, as it exists. If one, therefore, has acquired a right by possession and lapse of time, or the patentee permits the possessory right to ripen into a perfect title, the possession can not be recovered by the patentee."

Appellants also claim that there was no evidence introduced showing that Higgins, Howard and Bradley entered and took possession of these lands in good faith, and with the intention of obtaining patents from the Commonwealth. The persons who made these entries and marked the boundaries are all dead. It occurred about sixty years ago. Considering their acts, their long continued claim and possession without being disturbed, the presumption is that their acts were lawful and intentions proper. In the case of Beeler v. Coy, supra, this court said: "The principle of these presumptions, from long continued enjoyments, is that where possession, without a grant, would be unlawful, its long continuance being evidence that it was not lawful, affords ground for presuming a grant, by which it was lawful in its commencement; so that where a grant is presumed merely from long possession, it is presumed to have been coeval with the commencement of the possession, or at least to have been of that period at which the possession without a grant, would have been unlawful, and of course the grant thus presumed will overreach a grant made after its presumed date."

The facts of this last case were very similar to the facts of the case at bar, and the principles therein decided are conclusive of this case.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO. v. ELLERHORST.

(Filed May 27, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Street Car Collision—Injury to Lady Passenger—Action for Damages—Allegations—Manifestation of Condition—Specific Injury Sued For—In an action by a lady passenger for damages caused by a collision between two street cars in which she alleged that she was injured in her womb, in her ovaries and in her bowels, and that she had frequent micturition and had sustained a shock to her nervous system, Held—That a diseased condition must be manifested by outward symptoms. Where specific injuries are sued for, any external symptoms which are evidence of the injury, may properly be admitted, for it is only by the external symptoms that an internal injury may be judged.

2. Pleading—Notice of Injury Sustained—Relevant Facts—Evidence Admissible—The plaintiff should, by his pleading, apprise the defendant what injury he seeks to recover for, but the evidence by which he will establish the injury need not be indicated by the pleading. A fact, though not in issue, is relevant when it is, or probably may have been, the cause of a fact in issue or the effect of it. Evidence which conduces though but slightly, to prove a fact in issue, or to repel a presumption which might otherwise arise favorable to the opposite party is admissible, and in a case of doubt the evidence should not be excluded.

Greene & VanWinkle, Fairleigh Strauss & Fairleigh and Robt. L. Greene for appellant.

W. O. Bradley and J. L. Richardson for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Catherine Ellerhorst was a passenger on a street car of the Louisville Railway Co. going north on Second street. At the corner of Second and Broadway the car collided violently with an East Broadway car, throwing Mrs. Ellerhorst upon the seat in front of her. She filed this suit to recover for her injuries, and a verdict and judgment having been entered in her favor in the sum of $2,000, the defendant appeals.

The only ground relied on for reversal is, that the court erred in the admission of evidence. The plaintiff alleged in her petition that she was painfully injured by being thrown from the seat which she occupied against the seat opposite her; that she had suffered great bodily pain and mental anguish; and that she was so injured as to greatly reduce her power to earn money for months to come. In an amended petition she averred that she was thrown violently against the car seat, her abdomen striking it, and was seriously and permanently injured in her bowels and the regions thereof, and suffered a severe nervous shock from which she has not recovered, and that she had, and would have, recurrent pains in her bowels and the regions thereof on account of the injuries. The defendant, without asking that the petition be made more certain, filed an answer controverting its allegations. In a second amended petition she alleged that, in addition to the injuries theretofore alleged, she received a rupture in the right groin. In still another amended petition she alleged that her right ovary was enlarged and tender; her womb retroverted and she had frequent micturition; and that she was permanently injured. This amended petition was taken as controverted of record. During the progress of the action the court directed a personal examination of the plaintiff by a physician named by the court, and provided in the order that the plaintiff and defendant might both have a physician present during the examination. The examination was made as provided in the order. On the trial the plaintiff introduced Dr. F. L. Cessna, who was allowed, over the objection of the defendant, to testify as follows:

"Q. Has she any other injury except the lower part of the abdomen for which you have been treating her?"

"A. She has had trouble with her head and nervous system. She is a very nervous woman—very much so."

The defendant objected to the answer on the ground that no specific injury to the head is alleged in the petition, and moved the court to exclude the answer.

By the court: "It seems to me that the nervous system—he had a right to say if she complains about the nervous system, and if the condition of the head is only a symptom of that, he would have a right to show it. Yet he cannot undertake to show any specific injury to the head."

By the witness: "This nervousness is due to the injury in the abdomen. I should think, largely. Her nervous system is considerably shattered. She is very nervous indeed. I attribute a great deal of that to this injury that she sustained."

Q. "State whether or not this suffering in the head is a symptom of the nervous shock that she had sustained."

A. "That, many times, would cause trouble to the head."

Q. "Will you describe the symptom of her suffering in the head?"

A. "She complains of vertigo, or quite a lot of swimming in the head, and pains through the head, especially in the top and back parts. She complains a great deal of her head at times; not continuously, but it is periodical that these troubles occur. It seemed to me she would be better at times, and then she would be worse again. It seemed like her nervous system gave down. She would have these sinking or weak spells—prostration rather."

She also introduced Dr. Curran Pope, who was allowed to testify as follows:

"I also examined the pupils of both eyes, and the pupil of the right eye moves very little."

The defendant, by counsel, objected to any evidence concerning the eye.

By Mr. Bradley. "I will ask you the question: 'Did you find anything about the head or eyes indicating a nervous shock?'"

Objected to by counsel for defendant; objection overruled; exception for defendant.

By the court: "If there is any condition of the eyes or head that would be a symptom of nervous shock, it is competent."

A. "The symptoms I found are absolutely indicative of nervous shock and nervous disease."

The defendant excepted to the ruling of the court and to the last answer.

By the witness: "I found the right pupil would hardly move at all, what we call immobility, and in looking back into the back of the eye, the optic nerve, or the nerve of vision, shows beginning wasting."

Objected to by counsel for defendant; objection overruled; exception for defendant.

Dr. Dudley Reynolds was introduced as a witness for her and testified as follows:

Q. "Did you find anything indicating a nervous shock?"

A. "I did."

Q. "What was it?"

A. "In the irregularity of the pulse and unnatural throbs of the pulse and of the breathing, and in the second place the pupils of the eye are irregular in their contraction on exposure to the light. The pupil of the right eye scarcely moved at all, and the left one contracted irregularly. The contraction was irregular all round. What we call eccentric pupillary contraction. This indicates an injury to the base of the brain, disturbing the breathing and disturbing the pulse rate. It is due to an injury of that character, shock to the central nervous system, which is the brain and spinal cord."

Q. "What will be the probable result of this shock and this injury to the eye?"

A. "It interferes with the steadiness of her movements and with her strength and with her ability to sit quietly and observe new scenes, and a little noise in an unexpected quarter will throw her out of condition. The nervous manifestations would show also in the exaggerated muscular reflexes."

Q. "You were speaking of the contraction of the eye, etc. What danger, if any, would there be of loss or impairment of the sight?"

A. "There is already impairment of the sight from that cause in the right eye, shrinkage of the optic nerve, which is by some called wasting, but what I would call atrophy—that has already set in."

The evidence of this witness as to the injury to the eye objected to by counsel for defendant on the ground that there is no allegation of injury to the eye in the petition or amended petitions; objection overruled; exception for defendant.

By the court: "The record speaks for itself on that."

By the witness: "I have not said that there was any injury to the eye."

By the court: "I understand your testimony."

The defendant, after this testimony was admitted, moved for a continuance on the ground of surprise as no injury to the eye was alleged in the petition. The court overruled the motion, but offered to allow the defendant to have an expert surgeon and physician to make further examination of the plaintiff, which the defendant declined. The court, at the conclusion of the evidence, gave the jury this instruction:

"In estimating the damages to the plaintiff the jury are not to consider any specific injury to the head or eyes of the plaintiff, and the evidence in relation thereto should only be considered by the jury to whatever extent it may bear on the nervous shock, which the plaintiff claims to have sustained by reason of the collision."

It is insisted for the defendant that the court erred in admitting the evidence referred to and that the error was not cured by the instruction which the court gave. In L. & N. R. Co. v. Richmond, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2395, the plaintiff was a passenger on a railroad train and was injured in a collision. She alleged in her petition that in the collision she was greatly injured in her person; the muscles of her shoulders were greatly torn and lacerated and she was greatly bruised in her person, especially in her arms and side. On the trial she was permitted to show, over the objection of the defendant, that her spinal cord and eyes were injured. The court told the jury, when the testimony was given, that they could not consider any injury to her eyes as an item on which to fix damages, but might consider that fact only to show an injury to the spine. When the case was finally submitted to the jury, the court, by a written instruction, eliminated any compensation for the injury to the eyes. On appeal to this court the judgment was affirmed. The court said:

"The spinal cord might be reasonably expected to be injured on complaint of injury to the back. It is evident that the theory of the court in admitting proof of injury to the eyes, and then excluding that injury from the consideration of the jury in estimating damages, was that it might be shown, reasoning from effect back to cause, that the spinal cord was injured, as was demonstrated by proof of the resultant defect to the eyes shown. There was not claimed a direct injury to the eyes, but this was a resultant injury from the injury to the spinal cord, located in the back, of which the appellant's counsel had notice, as is shown by the affidavit filed some time before the trial."

In International and Great Northern Railroad Co. v. Thompson, 37 S. W., 24, the plaintiff charged an injury to the spine, and on the trial, was allowed to show an impairment of vision as part of the injury. The court instructed the jury that they might consider the injury to the eye in fixing the damages. The judgment was reversed on the ground that the instruction was erroneous, but the opinion in effect holds that the evidence was admissible; at least it does not hold that the evidence was improperly admitted, and only holds that the instruction was erroneous.

In the case of Wilkins v. Nassau Newspaper Co., 90 N. Y. S., 678, evidence was admitted that the plaintiff had locomotor ataxia, and the instructions of the court to the jury were in substance the same as in the Thompson case; the judgment was reversed for the error in the charge to the jury, and to this the attention of the court was mainly directed. In Chesapeake, &c., R. R. Co. v. Hanmer, 66 S. W., 375, and L. & N. R. Co. v. Roney, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1326, the court had before it what the plaintiff might recover for under the allegations of the petition, but that is not the question in this case. The question is what evidence was competent to sustain the allegations of the plaintiff's petition. She alleged, in her petition, that she was injured in her womb; in her ovaries; in her bowels; that she had frequent micturition, and that she had sustained a shock to her nervous system. A diseased condition must be manifested by outward symptoms. If the plaintiff had been unable to show any external manifestations of the injuries of which she complains, the jury would reasonably conclude that she was not as badly hurt as she alleged. If she had shown that she had suffered from insomnia since the accident, and had been a healthy woman up to that time, it would have been some evidence of a nervous derangement. A nervous shock often shows itself in the eyes; and if the plaintiff's eyes had remained normal it would have been some evidence that the nervous shock was not very serious. Where specific injuries are sued for, any external symptoms which are evidence of the injury may properly be admitted, for it is only by the external symptoms that an internal injury may be judged. As the injury to the eye was not sued for the court properly excluded it from the consideration of the jury in fixing damages; but as it furnished some evidence of the internal injury of which she complains, the proof was properly allowed to go to the jury.

The plaintiff should, by his pleadings, apprise the defendant what injury he seeks to recover for; but the evidence by which he will establish the injury need not be indicated by the pleading. A fact, though not in issue is relevant when it is or probably may have been the cause of a fact in issue or the effect of it. (Stephens on Evidence, art. 2.) Evidence which conduces, though but slightly, to prove a fact in issue or to repel a presumption which might otherwise arise favorable to the opposite party is admissible, and in case of doubt the evidence should not be excluded. (Shannon v. Kinney, 1 Mar., 3; Holt v. Crume, Litt. Sel. Cas., 500.) The record shows that the defendant filed affidavit on the ground of surprise, but the affidavit is not in the transcript and we must presume that the court ruled correctly in refusing to continue the case in the absence of the evidence; and as the testimony related to a condition then discoverable by a physician, we cannot see that the court's offer to allow a further examination of the plaintiff by a physician did not afford the defendant a full opportunity to get the truth before the jury. After declining this offer the defendant introduced on the trial a physician who had examined her and testified that he could see nothing wrong with her eyes.

Judgment affirmed.

FISHER v. LOTT, &c.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Construction of—By Court of Last Resort—The appellee was one of ten children who took the land in question from a will by her father, which excluded, by expression, her husband, she being vested with a life estate, with remainder to her children. Her father died in 1857. The controversy arises over the expression in the will, "should any of the children of W. W. Southgate die without issue and unmarried, their part to go to the remaining brothers and sisters and their descendants."

2. Same—This clause was construed by this court, in 1865, in precisely the same state of case as this, in the matter of another child of Southgate, who took under the will. In that case the court held that upon the birth of a child, the remainder then vested, and upon his death it passed to his heir-at-law; that the condition in the devise above quoted should be construed to mean that, upon her marriage and subsequent issue, the contingency happened, and the estate was no longer de'feasible.

3. Same—Deed—Mrs. L's conveyance of the property in which her husband and only child joined, was sufficient to pass title.

F. M. Tracy for appellant.

Sidney Arthur for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court, Common Law and Equity Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellant, Nannie S. Lott, is a daughter of W. W. Southgate, deceased, who was a son of Richard Southgate, Sr., of Covington. The latter died testate, in Kenton county, about July, 1857. By his will, which was duly probated, he devised a large estate to his children and grandchildren, by names or classes, among the latter being a devise to each of the ten children of his deceased son, W. W. Southgate. This devise was to some of the ten by name, as to whom he specified the estate they took, and as to others, who were then infants, the devise was to them in severalty as a class. The clause, which has now become the subject of this suit for construction, reads as follows:

"I give and bequeath to Thomas D. Kennedy and George M. Southgate one-sixth part of said real estate for the use and benefit of the children of William W. Southgate, my deceased son, to be equally divided between them, but subject to the following restrictions:

"That said trustees will hold one-tenth part of said real estate for the use and benefit of Laura Walker for her life, and at her death remainder to her children. That said trustees will hold one-tenth of said real estate in trust for the children of Samuel J. Walker, by his wife Martha. That said trustees will hold one-tenth of said real estate for said Adeliza Arthur for life, remainder to her children, paying over to said Laura Grant and Adeliza Arthur the rents and profits of said real estate for their separate, sole and exclusive use. The real estate herein conveyed to said Laura and Adeliza to be free from all right to curtesy or control of their husbands. One-tenth in trust for Richard Southgate, one-tenth in trust for each of the other children (one of whom is the appellee, Nannie S. Lott), to be conveyed to them on their arrival at age. The conveyance to the daughters for life, remainder to their children, and to their sole and separate use. * * * Should any of the children of W. W. Southgate die without issue and unmarried, their part to go to their remaining brothers and sisters and their descendants."

Nannie Southgate, one of the ten children of W. W. Southgate, arrived at age, was married to appellee, George G. Lott, by whom she has had one child, the appellee, George S. Lott. The proceeds of the devise to her were invested in a parcel of ground in Covington, described in the petition and contract herein. She and her husband and son contracted to sell the lot to appellant, and tendered their general warranty deed signed by all three of the Lotts. The purchaser declined to accept the deed, under the fear that Mrs. Lott's interest being only a life estate, and her husband being excluded by the expression in the will impressing this devise as sole estate of the female devisee, the fee would be only contingently vested until her death, when if she should survive her son, the deed tendered would not convey the complete title. The circuit court held that the deed was sufficient to pass the whole estate, and the purchaser appeals.

It is admitted that Mrs. Lott took only a life estate under the will, with remainder to her children. But the principal ground of contention lies in the clause "should any of the children of W. W. Southgate die without issue and unmarried, their part to go to their remaining brothers and sisters and their descendants."

The item of the will above copied was before this court for construction in 1865. (Kennedy v. Arthur, 3 Ky. Opin., 466.) There the daughter of W. W. Southgate, Mrs. Adeliza Arthur, had died, but having been married, and having had a child born of that marriage, who preceded her in death, the question was what became of the title to the lot devised to her. This court held that, upon the birth of her child, the remainder then vested, and upon his death it passed to his heir-at-law; that the condition in the devise "die without issue and unmarried," should be construed to mean that upon her marriage and subsequent issue the contingency happened, and the estate was no longer defeasible.

Mrs. Lott's relation is precisely that of Mrs. Arthur, and Mrs. Arthur's son and George S. Lott occupy also the same relation in ownership of the devised parcels of land.

Without the benefit of the learned opinion above cited we might have had great difficulty in reaching the same conclusion as was there attained by the court. The court then said of its own conclusions:

"While we admit that we feel with neither mathematical certainty nor full assurance, that we have followed the true clue to this testamentary labyrinth, we are satisfied that it is the best which we could adopt with any assurance approaching judicial confidence. The construction we have adharmonizes the whole will—any other would make some of its provisions motionless, inconsistent and absurd."

The court, in construing the language set out in this opinion recourses, as will be inferred from the foregoing excerpt, to other provisions of somewhat similar nature, wherein it was thought a general, uniform purpose of the testator was discoverable with reference to all his children, including grandchildren.

If Mrs. Lott were now deceased, there would be no difficulty at all in following identically the opinion in Kennedy v. Arthur, supra. Nor do we experience any in so far as that opinion went, or could go. The deed tendered would convey Mrs. Lott's life estate—her interest being no longer contingent. It would also convey the vested remainder of George S. Lott.

The foregoing objection is the only one raised in the circuit court or in this court. Appellant seems content with the title, if the trouble raised by his fears respecting the defeasibility of Mrs. Lott's estate and the consequent danger of her sisters or brothers taking as reversionsers, is dispelled. Deciding only the question presented, and which was the only one raised in and decided by the circuit court, we hold that appellant's objection is not well taken.

Whatever doubt we may have had concerning the construction placed upon this clause of the will is resolved in favor of that consistency which ought to prevail in the opinions of the court concerning identical matters, particularly where the title to real estate is involved, and upon the faith of which previous opinion the public may have been led into a sense of security in trafficking in these titles, relying upon the presumption that when once authoritatively construed by the court of last resort of the State, that construction is conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

BROUGHTON v. SAYLOR, &c.

(Filed May 28, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Co-Sureties—Indemnity—Contribution—Obstruction of Rights—Release of Liability—Where a co-surety in a forthcoming bond became a surety in the supersedeas bond, he thereby obstructed the right of his co-surety in the forthcoming bond to take steps to protect himself as such surety, and by this act relieved the co-surety in the forthcoming bond from all liability to him for indemnity or contribution.

2. Same—Rights of Co-Sureties—Interference Therewith—There is no substantial difference between the legal effect of an obstruction of, or interference with, the rights of the surety by the creditor, and an obstruction or interference with the rights of the surety by the act of another person, who might otherwise have looked to the surety for contribution or indemnity if there had been no obstruction.

N. J. Weller and Weller & Points for appellant.

Wm. Low and E. N. Ingram for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellant and appellee, Ingram, were the sureties in a forthcoming bond executed by S. W. Saylor and Andy Broughton in February, 1904, in a suit of J. J. Durham against them. In October, 1904, judgment was rendered in the action in which the bond was executed against the defendants Saylor and Andy Broughton, who were the principals in the forthcoming bond. The defendants prosecuted an appeal from that judgment to this court, and executed, in January, 1905, a supersedeas bond with the appellant, Henry Broughton and one Knuckles, as sureties therein. Subsequently, the appeal was dismissed by this court, and, therefore, in proceedings against the sureties in the forthcoming bond, Henry Broughton was required to pay the value of the property for which the forthcoming bond was executed. After Broughton satisfied the damages growing out of his suretyship in the forthcoming bond, he brought this action for contribution against his co-surety Ingram. From a judgment dismissing his petition, this appeal is prosecuted.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether or not S. W. Saylor and Andy Broughton, the defendants in the action in which the forthcoming bond was executed, had any property subject to execution at the time the judgment against them was rendered in October, 1904, or at the time the supersedeas bond was executed in January, 1905. But the weight of the evidence supports the conclusion that soon after the execution of the forthcoming bond, they disposed of the property released by its execution, and had little or no property subject to execution, either in October, 1904, or January, 1905. So that, if the judgment had not been superseded, it is fair to assume that Broughton and Ingram, as sureties in the forthcoming bond, would have been compelled to satisfy the same, and that neither of them could have collected the amount paid from the principals in the bond. If the principals in the forthcoming bond had been solvent when the supersedeas bond was executed, it is conceded that Broughton, as surety in the supersedeas bond, could not look for contribution to Ingram as co-surety in the forthcoming bond; because the execution of the supersedeas bond would have been prejudicial to Ingram in that it prevented him from looking to the principals for indemnity or from having their property subjected to the payment of the amount due on the forthcoming bond. But, as this state of case is not presented, the question may be disposed of as if Ingram was not prejudiced, looking at the matter from a financial standpoint, by the execution of the supersedeas bond. The controversy then narrows down to the single question, whether or not, under these circumstances, Broughton, by enabling the judgment defendant to stay proceedings upon the judgment, rendered himself liable for the full amount of the forthcoming bond. If the supersedeas bond had not been executed, it is of course clear that Broughton, as surety in the forthcoming bond, could recover from his co-surety, Ingram, one-half the amount that he was required to pay. When the judgment was rendered in the lower court, the judgment creditor, except for the execution of the supersedeas bond, could have at once proceeded to collect his debt from the sureties in the forthcoming bond. And the sureties, if they had then satisfied the bond, could at once have proceeded against the sureties for indemnity; but the execution of the supersedeas bond stayed all proceedings upon the judgment. It prevented any steps being taken to enforce its collection. Nor could the sureties in the forthcoming bond thereafter, or while the supersedeas was in force, take any action to protect their interests. And when, by the execution of the supersedeas bond, Broughton obstructed the right of his co-surety in the forthcoming bond, to take any steps to protect himself, he thereupon and by this act relieved the co-surety in the forthcoming bond from all liability to him for indemnity or contribution. The fact that Broughton was surety in the forthcoming bond, and that as such surety he was obliged to satisfy the judgment, does not affect the question, because if Ingram had been required to pay it, he might have recovered from Henry Broughton the amount he was compelled to pay. And so it follows that having paid the bond, Broughton can not look to Ingram for contribution. If the judgment creditor had made any arrangement with the judgment debtors, by which an extension of time was granted to them, or had placed himself in a position by which he was prevented from enforcing the collection of his debt, or had in any way interfered with the right of the sureties to protect themselves, his action would have released the sureties. Thus, it is said in Sneed v. White, 3 J. J. Mar., 525:

"Any settled agreement or active interference by the obligee whereby the surety may be injured or subjected to increased risk, or deprived of or suspended in the assertion of his equitable right to force the obligee to sue the principal, or of his right to pay the debt and occupy the attitude in equity of the obligee, will release the surety. Any act of the creditor which entitles the principal obligor to indulgence, after the debt shall have become due according to the terms of the original contract, will in equity discharge a surety who has not consented to the indulgence; and his consent can not be inferred from his silence or neutrality; but must be evinced by some positive act. A stay of execution by the creditor after a levy of it on the property of the principal debtor will exonerate the surety. * * * It is not material whether the property so exempted was sufficient to discharge the whole debt or not. It is the fact that the creditor interfered and thereby increased the risk of the surety, and not the extent of the injury resulting from his act which will relieve the surety from his liability in equity.

"To make the right to relief depend on the degree of injury, would, in the language of Loughborough, in Rees v. Barrington, 'lead to a vast variety of speculations upon which no sound principle could be built.'"

The principle announced in this case has been approved in a long line of decisions, among which may be noticed: Preston v. Henning & Speed, 6 Bush, 556; Mays v. Lane, 116 Ky., 566; Struss v. Masonic Savings Bank, 89 Ky., 61; Tudor v. Goodloe, 1 B. Mon., 322; Ross v. Clore, 3 Dana, 189; Sparks v. Hall, 4 J. J. Mar., 35.

In our opinion, when Broughton, by the execution of the supersedeas bond, prevented the judgment creditor from collecting, or attempting to collect, his judgment, it had the same effect on the sureties in the forthcoming bond as similar conduct on the part of the judgment creditor would have, and resulted in releasing, so far as Broughton was concerned, the surety in the forthcoming bond. We are unable to perceive any substantial difference between the legal effect of an obstruction of, or interference with, the rights of the surety by the creditor and an obstruction or interference with the rights of the surety by the act of another person who might otherwise have looked to the surety for contribution or indemnity if there had been no obstruction.

In either case the injury to the surety is the same.

In Brandenburg v. Flynn, 12 B. Mon., 397, an execution against Tracy was replevied with Hulsey and Joseph Brandenburg as sureties. Afterwards, the execution defendant, Tracy, enjoined the collection of the debt, and executed an injunction bond with Flynn as surety. Flynn being compelled to pay the debt, brought an action against Brandenburg, the surety in the replevin bond, seeking either re-imbusement or contribution. In considering the case, and denying the relief sought, the court said:

"We know of no case in which, on the ground of either contribution among co-sureties or of substitution to the securities of the creditor, a subsequent surety, coming in aid of the debtor alone, without request or concurrence of the original sureties, and in the regular course of the remedy for coercing the debt from him alone, or for the purpose of obstructing its collection by his own separate proceeding, and for his own benefit, has obtained in equity either partial or full re-imbusement from the prior sureties. On the contrary the doctrine established by the adjudged cases, and as we think in conformity with the true principles of equity, is, that if under such circumstances a prior surety is compelled to pay the debt, he thereby becomes entitled by substitution to the rights of the creditor against the subsequent surety to the whole extent of the payment made and of the obligation of the subsequent surety; which precludes all right on the part of the subsequent surety, should the debt be coerced from him, to claim re-imbusement from the prior surety."

In Kellar v. Williams, 10 Bush, 216, an execution against Mount was replevied by him with Williams as surety. Upon the maturity of the bond, and after an execution had issued thereon, Mount prosecuted an appeal from the judgment upon which the execution issued and executed a supersedeas bond with Kellar as surety. The judgment of the lower court having been affirmed, Williams was required to pay the debt, and thereupon brought an action against Kellar to recover the full amount so paid. In the opinion holding that Williams was entitled to the relief, the court said:

"The doctrine of substitution is founded alone upon principles of equity and justice; and when this debt was in a condition to be made out of the property of the principal debtor, Kellar interposed his conditional obligation to pay the money, thereby causing this loss to Williams; and there is no reason why equity should not intervene by substituting Williams to the rights of the original creditor, so as to enable him to compel Kellar to pay only what he had undertaken by his conditional obligation to pay."

It is true that in these cases the rights of the prior sureties were prejudiced by the execution of the bonds delaying the collection of the debts; as when the delay bonds were executed the principal debtors had property out of which all or a part of the debts might have been paid. But the decisions are not rested distinctly upon this ground, but more particularly upon the ground that the rights of prior sureties were obstructed by the execution of the subsequent bonds.

The solvency or insolvency of the judgment debtors, who were principals in the forthcoming bond, does not enter into the case.

It is not material whether they were solvent or not. We think this case should be governed by the same principles that apply as between a creditor and a surety. If the judgment creditor in this case had put it out of his power to collect or attempt to collect his judgment, it is manifest that his act would have released the sureties in the forthcoming bond, and this, without reference to the solvency or insolvency of the principals in the bond. And so when Broughton executed the supersedeas bond, the extension of time that was granted the judgment debtors by the execution of this bond released from liability as to him the sureties in the forthcoming bond. His act effectually stayed all proceedings upon the judgment and prevented the judgment creditor from collecting his judgment and also hindered the sureties in taking any steps to protect their interests. The execution of the supersedeas bond was an independent act upon his part by which he assumed unequivocally the payment of the debt in the event the judgment should be affirmed, Ingram did not request or procure the execution of the supersedeas bond, or waive his right to insist that its execution relieved him from liability. Ingram was one of the attorneys for the defendants in the judgment, and there is evidence tending to show that as such attorney, he believed the judgment should be reversed, and entertaining this opinion he advised an appeal and probably the execution of a bond to stay proceedings upon the judgment pending the appeal. This advice was tendered in his capacity as attorney. He did not request or urge the execution of the supersedeas bond in his relation as surety on the forthcoming bond, and his action as attorney did not have the effect of estopping him from interposing the defense that the execution of the supersedeas bond released him from liability on the forthcoming bond. If, as surety in the forthcoming bond, he had requested or procured Broughton to execute the supersedeas bond, it might be urged with great force that he would be jointly and equally liable with Broughton, upon the principle announced in the Brandenburg and Keller cases supra that "all persons who are bound, although by different instruments, executed at different times, for the same debt or duties of the same individuals, are bound as co-sureties to contribute to any loss which either may sustain." But this rule has no application to the facts of this case; nor does the circumstance that Broughton was a surety in the forthcoming bond, enter into it in considering the rights and liabilities of either Ingram or Broughton, because Broughton, in signing the supersedeas bond, occupied as to the forthcoming bond the same relation as a stranger would, and is in no better position than any other person would be who had signed as surety the supersedeas bond.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

WINN, AS SHERIFF, &c. v. SCHENCK, &c.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Inheritance Tax—Liability of Devisee Therefor—A will was made in 1899 by a son devising to his mother one-half his entire estate, under a contract made at the time with his mother to keep a valid will at all times devising to her son's god-son one-half of the property she received from him, which she made, and under which the god-son received the property so devised by the mother. The mother died after the inheritance tax law of 1906 was enacted in this State. Held—That at the time the contract between the son and mother was made, there was no inheritance tax law in force in this State and the property received by the god-son under the will was not subject to the payment of such tax.

Will D. Jesse for appellant.

Field McLeod for appellee.

Appeal from Woodford Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This appeal involves the right of the Commonwealth to collect an inheritance tax under the act of the General Assembly, approved March 15, 1906, on certain property to which the appellee, Robert C. Schenck became entitled upon the death of Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse, in 1906, after the act in question became operative. Several minor objections are made by appellant, the sheriff of Woodford county, who was attempting to collect the tax, but a disposition of the real question in the case necessarily renders a determination of these minor questions unnecessary. Had the State the right to impose and collect this tax. The history of the transactions, through and under which appellee became entitled to the property in question, is as follows: Clarence R. Greathouse was a man of considerable wealth. In 1899, while in Korea, he was stricken with what was regarded as a mortal disease; while in this condition, and recognizing that his recovery was unlikely, he made a will, devising to his mother his entire estate. At the same time, it appears that he desired to make some provision for the appellee, who was his god-son. He and his mother thereupon, simultaneous with the execution of the will by him, entered into a written contract, by the terms of which she obligated and bound herself to make and keep on hand at all times during her life a valid will, by which she devised to appellee one-half of the property which she received from her son. It was provided in this contract that, should it become necessary, Mrs. Greathouse might use as much of the principal as might be necessary to enable her to live in comfort and that style becoming a woman of her years and station in life. She made the will, as she agreed to, and, upon her death, appellee asserted title to one-half of the property to which he was entitled thereunder.

For appellant it is claimed that appellee is the beneficiary of the bounty of Mrs. Greathouse, and that, therefore, the property is subject to the tax; while, on the other hand, it is urged for appellee that he receives this property through the provisions made for him by his god-father in the contract with Mrs. Greathouse in 1899.

If Clarence R. Greathouse, instead of disposing of his property by will, and the contract with his mother that she should make provision for his god-son, as he did, had made a will giving his estate to his mother for life, with power to use such of the principal as might be necessary for her welfare and support, and with a provision that at her death one-half of the remainder should go to appellee, he would have reached the same result as that which he did by the methods employed. Had he pursued the plan suggested there can be no doubt but that the property would not be subject to the inheritance tax, for it would have gone to him under the will of Clarence R. Greathouse, and not through the bounty of Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse. The question is further simplified by determining what would have been the rights of appellee if Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse had violated the contract which she made with her son, and failed to make provision, by will, for appellee, as she had agreed to do. If, under these circumstances, he would not have had any enforceable right against the property which she received, then it comes to him under the will of Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse and is liable for the payment of the tax. If, on the other hand, he had a right to and could look to the contract lien to coerce from the estate of Mrs. Greathouse, the payment of this money, then the source from which he derived title, is clearly not the will of Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse. That one may enforce a contract made for his benefit, though not made with him or to him, has been too often decided by this court to need further consideration here. (Allen v. Thomas, 3 Met., 178; Smith v. Smith, 5 Bush, 625, and Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Schmidt, 112 Ky., 717.) So that, had Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse violated her contract which she made with her son for the benefit of appellee, the latter would have had a perfect right, after she had accepted the estate of her son, under the terms of his will, to have enforced the contract which she had violated. Reading the will and contract together, as they must be read, Mrs. Mary E. Greathouse took in the property of her son a life estate, with the power to use any part of the principal that might become necessary, and with the express agreement that she should devise to appellee one-half of such portion as should not be consumed by her in maintaining and supporting herself in the style and manner in which her son desired that she should live. This obligation, on her part, was mandatory, and she could not avoid it if she would. We have been unable to find any case directly in point, nor are we referred to any such, but questions somewhat similar have arisen in other jurisdictions where the inheritance tax laws have been longer in force.

In the case of Nathaniel H. Emmons v. Shaw, 171 Mass., 410, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts passed upon a question somewhat similar. There one Thomas B. Wales had devised certain property to his son, George W. Wales, for life, subject to his disposition by will, but in the event that he died intestate, with further limitations as to the fee, the son disposed of the property by will, under the power, and an inheritance tax law having been adopted after the death of his father, but before his death, an effort was made to collect the tax from his property. The court declined to enforce it, and in so doing said: "What is done under a power of appointment is to be referred to the instrument by which the power is created and operates as a disposition of the estate of the donor."

And the Supreme Court of New York, in the case of In Re Lansing's Estate, 182 N. Y., 238, in passing upon a similar question, held that where property was devised by a man to his daughter for life, and after her to her heirs at law, with the power to devise the remainder, by will, in such manner, and under such limitations, as she might desire, and the daughter, in the exercise of this power, devised the property to her own daughter absolutely, the daughter's will operated to transfer nothing that was not given to the heir at law by the grandfather's will, and, as at the time the will of the grandfather took effect, there was no law imposing a transfer tax, the property was not subject to said tax.

So with the case at bar. At the time that the contract was entered into between Clarence R. Greathouse and his mother, which secured to appellee one-half of the estate of Clarence R. Greathouse, there was no inheritance tax in force in this State, and, consequently, the trial court did not err in holding that the property which appellee received was not subject to the payment of said taxes.

Judgment affirmed.

BRADLEY & GILBERT v. JACQUES.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Municipalities—Members of City Council—Contracts with City—Validity—Injunction by Taxpayer—Under Kentucky Statutes, sec. 2768, part of the charter of cities of the first class, providing that "councilmen shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any contract with the city," &c., any citizen and taxpayer of such city may maintain an action to enjoin the payment of any claim sought to be enforced against the city for supplies furnished the city under a contract with one of whom is a member of the city council.

Carroll & Middleton for appellants.

A. T. Burgevin for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

This action was instituted by the appellee, Charles N. Jacques, to enjoin the payment by the city of Louisville, of a bill, amounting to three hundred and fifty dollars and eighty cents, claimed by the Bradley & Gilbert Company, a corporation, to be due for supplies sold and delivered to the city. The Bradley & Gilbert Company intervened and filed a petition, which was taken as its answer to the allegations of the petition of the appellee. In sustaining a general demurrer to the answer of the Bradley & Gilbert Company, the chancellor delivered an opinion, which clearly and lucidly states the facts and the proper conclusions of law arising therefrom, and we adopt it, as written, as a part of our opinion in this case. It is as follows:

"The plaintiff, Jacques, a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Louisville, seeks to restrain the city and its officers from paying three hundred and fifty dollars and eighty cents to the Bradley & Gilbert Company for supplies furnished the city by said company, upon the ground that one of the defendants, George B. Coder, a member of the general council of the city of Louisville, is a salaried bookkeeper of the Bradley & Gilbert Company. The answer further shows that said Coder is in effect a stockholder in the Bradley & Gilbert Company. His stock has not yet been paid for or delivered to him, though it has been set aside and held for him.

"The case is now submitted upon plaintiff's motion for a restraining order as prayed for in the petition, and also upon plaintiff's demurrer to the answer of the Bradley & Gilbert Company, which shows that its bill is for ordinary office supplies furnished by it to the city for the month of January (with the exception of one item) upon oral orders as and when needed by the city, and at the usual prices charged the public. It does not appear that Coder had anything to do with making the sales, or that he even knew of them. No charge of bad faith is made against any of the defendants; on the contrary, the entire good faith of all the defendants is not only conceded by the plaintiffs, but is fully concurred in and adjudged to be true by the court. It has, however, been expressly decided by the Court of Appeals that the fact of the good faith of the transaction is immaterial under the statute.

"After prescribing the qualifications of councilmen the city charter provides:

"They (councilmen) shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any contract with said city, or in any application therefor, or a candidate for or hold any office or employment for pay in any company or corporation which holds or is an applicant for any contract with the city. Stockholders in corporations may be eligible, but shall not vote on or interfere, directly or indirectly, with any matter, or questions, affecting a contract between such company and the city or its right or duty under the same.' (Ky. Stats., sec. 2768.)

"When this statute came up for construction in Nunemacher v. City of Louisville, &c., 98 Ky., 334, it was contended that it referred only to the question of the councilman's eligibility to hold his office, and that it did not affect the validity of the contract. The Court of Appeals, however, overruled that contention in the following explicit language:

"In our opinion the effect of this section is to render void contracts between the city and any person who is a member of the council, or between the city and any corporation which has a member of the council for one of its officers or paid employes. When so construed it becomes, in fact, merely declaratory of common law principles on this subject.'

"It is, however, contended by the defendant company that the term 'contract,' as used in the statute, does not embrace a case of this character, where the goods have not been ordered or bought under a formal pre-existing contract between the city and the corporation for the furnishing of supplies, but that this is simply a case where the city goes out on the market and buys its daily supplies as it needs them, without any previous contract having been made therefor. And in this connection, attention has been called to other provisions of the statute, which apply to expenditures and contracts on behalf of the city. Among them, and the principal one, is section 2822, of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Whenever it becomes necessary for either of said boards to make an expenditure by a contract, written or oral, of an amount less than two thousand dollars, said contract must be made with the approval of the mayor unless otherwise provided by ordinance. When the expenditure is to exceed two thousand dollars, the contract shall not be made without the approval of the mayor and the general council. If supplies and other forms of personal property are to be purchased, they shall be purchased by the city buyer, subject to the provisions of this act.'

"It will be noticed, however, that this section merely provides a business regulation for expenditures based upon their size; and further, that it, by its terms, applies to all contracts—both oral and written. Furthermore, it would seem that the last sentence of the section was intended to cover such a case as we have here; for after throwing certain safeguards around the larger expenditures to be made 'by a contract written or oral,' it then says: 'If supplies and other forms of personal property are to be purchased, they shall be purchased by the city buyer, subject to the provisions of this act.'

"The plaintiff contends that certainly one of the provisions here referred to is the general one affecting public policy as pointed out in the Nunemacher case. I am of opinion that this position is well founded, for there is clearly no good reason why the principle so carefully inserted in the statute should apply to large expenditures and not to small ones—even though section 2822 did not contain the final saving clause applicable to the purchase of 'supplies and other forms of personal property.' If the prohibition here invoked did not apply to small purchases of supplies, many larger cases could be brought into that class by cutting large purchases into many small ones and thus wholly defeat the intention and operation of the statute. The statute prohibits 'contracts' in the broadest sense of that term; and when it is recalled that every allowance or payment for goods or services, whether it be for services rendered or goods furnished under a formal, written contract, or for ordinary supplies as in this case, must be voted by the general council, it must be admitted that the prohibition applies in principle equally to all transactions, or it applies to none.

"Moreover, a verbal order for supplies creates a contract for the city and imposes an obligation upon it as fully as a written contract, or a contract wherein the price is agreed upon in advance. I assume that the prices of these goods were agreed upon in advance between the city buyer and the Bradley & Gilbert Company, or, what is practically the same thing, that they were ordered with the tacit understanding, usual in such cases, that they were to be furnished at the market prices. That being true—and it is the view most favorable to the company—it can not take the case out of the terms of the statute, for the transaction constitutes, in law, a contract on the part of both parties, and may be enforced, if not declared to be void by the statute. In the Nunemacher case above quoted from, the Court of Appeals expressly held that the effect of the statute is to render the contract void, not that it rendered the councilman ineligible to hold the office to which he has been elected. The latter question was not decided. Upon the former point the court said:

"'It is a matter of small concern, comparatively, who may or may not retain a seat in the council, but the public is vitally interested in the execution of the contracts of the city.'

"It will be seen, therefore, that the chief purpose of the statute was, in the opinion of the court, to protect the city against this class of prohibited contracts, which is accomplished by making the contract void and unenforcible. Relief was denied Nunemacher because he did not ask the proper relief. He asked the court to reject the bid of another, and further that the city be compelled to accept his bid, though it appeared there was a third bid lower than Nunemacher's bid. Nunemacher was suing solely for himself and not for the public. He did not ask that the city be enjoined from paying out the money, as is here asked. Upon that point, the court said:

"'In the case at bar the appellant, by his petition, sought, by mandamus, to compel the mayor of the city and its comptroller, to reject the bid of the Courier-Journal Job Printing Company, for printing certain municipal reports, although that bid was the lowest made, upon the ground that it could not be accepted, and to compel those officers to accept the appellant's bid because it was next lowest. Under the advertisement for bids, the mayor was authorized to reject any or all of them, and as it appeared that another was willing to do the work for a less price than the appellant was, his bid was properly rejected. The manifest purpose of the action was to compel the city authorities to award the contract to the appellant, and, while he amended his petition by stating that he was a taxpayer and citizen of the city, he does not change or enlarge his prayer for relief. He does not now insist, however, on the right to have the contract awarded to himself. We do not doubt the right of a citizen and taxpayer to enjoin the authorities of the city from paying out money on a void contract, but this is not such an action.'

"The statute expressly provides as follows:

"'Before any member-elect shall take his seat in either board he shall make an oath or affirmation that he has the qualifications and is free from the disqualifications prescribed herein.'

"If a member, eligible at the time he takes his office, could subsequently be rendered ineligible by the unknown act of his employer in making a contract with the city, we would have an unusual application of a statute primarily intended to accomplish a different purpose.

"It would seem plain, therefore, under the broad language of the opinion of the Court of Appeals, that the purpose of the statute was to prohibit all contracts of this character. It would hardly be contended that the city charter could, or that it intended to, prevent the defendant, Coder, from continuing in his position as bookkeeper with the Bradley & Gilbert Company if he were eligible when he took office; but it can declare void and non-enforcible any subsequent contract the corporation may make with the city and in doing that the city is effectually protected. This is the result of the opinion in the Nunemacher case, supra, in so far as it applies to this case; and it, therefore, follows that the plaintiff's demurrer to the answer of the Bradley & Gilbert Company will have to be sustained, and that plaintiff's motion for a temporary injunction will also have to be sustained, upon giving bond as required by law."

Since the opinion of the chancellor in this case was rendered, we delivered an opinion on a similar question between the same parties, the style of which is Jacques v. City of Louisville, 106 S. W., 308, in which we re-asserted the principles enunciated in Nunemacher v. City of Louisville, 98 Ky., 334, and which fully sustains the judgment of the chancellor herein.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. ALLEN, &c.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Roads and Passways—Use of as Matter of Right—Appellant has claimed the use of the passway, as a matter of right, for more than twenty years; moreover, appellant and the remote vendor of appellees. in 1885, entered into an agreement by which each gave the other a passway over the land, a good and valuable consideration moving from one to the other.

2. Same—The fact that a country road has been opened which gives appellant another outlet, can not militate against the outlet already acquired. (104 Ky., 144.)

Kash & Kash and J. J. C. Bach for appellant.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

This appeal involves the right of George Johnson, the appellant herein, to a passway over the lands of appellees. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows:

Prior to 1885, one Thomas Johnson, was the owner of a considerable body of land on Lick Branch, in Breathitt county, Kentucky. In 1885 he sold and conveyed a portion of said farm to appellant. At that time there was no convenient way of reaching the land purchased by appellant except to pass over the remaining portion of the land which was owned by Thomas Johnson. Appellant testifies that he discussed the question of an outlet with his brother, Thomas, before he made the purchase, and that on the same day on which the deed conveying him the land in question was executed, he entered into a written agreement with his brother by which each was to have a twelve-foot road over the land of the other. That appellant continued to use this passway from that time uninterruptedly until about the first of January, 1906, at which time appellees, having come into possession, by purchase, of the land which Thomas Johnson owned in 1885, and adjoining the lands of appellant, closed up the passway.

It appears from the record that Thomas Johnson, in 1897, sold and conveyed the land through which the passway runs, and which is now owned by appellees, to one, Buck McIntosh, and in this deed made reservation for an outlet in the following language:

"I, Thomas Johnson, in conveying the within described land, hereby except a twelve-foot road beginning at George Johnson's corner at the mouth of Big Fork, said road is to run the way the old road ran to the river."

The same land was sold by Buck McIntosh and wife to Mrs. Hense Short and Mrs. Hense Short and husband sold and conveyed it to appellees. There was no mention of the reservation of this passway in the deed from McIntosh to Short or from Short to appellees, so far as the record shows.

During the years that George Johnson, appellant, has owned this land he resided on another tract of land situate on Snake Branch, a tributary of the Kentucky River above the mouth of Lick Branch. His only way, which was at all convenient, of reaching the farm which he bought from his brother, Thomas, was over the land now owned by appellees. Some two or three years ago a new county road was opened up which ran almost parallel to appellant's passway, over the land of appellees, and after this new county road was opened up appellant could reach his farm by going over the new county road, and this was, according to the proof in the case, almost, if not quite, as convenient a way to reach said farm as over the passway in question. All of the witnesses in the case, practically, for both appellant and appellees, testify that this passway in question was used uninterruptedly by appellant in going to and from the farm which he bought from his brother Thomas, from 1885 until it was closed in 1903 by appellees.

Appellant and his brother Thomas testify positively that at the date upon which the deed was executed they entered into an agreement, by which each gave to the other a passway through his farm twelve feet in width, and the magistrate, who took the acknowledgment to the deed, and who was introduced as a witness by appellees, testifies that there was such a writing drawn up between them on that date. Appellant also testified that but for the fact that he received this outlet from his brother, he would not have made the purchase of this land at all. Many witnesses who testified for appellees, showed that the new road which had been opened up provided appellant with as convenient a way of reaching his farm as the passway afforded him. From the testimony of a number of witnesses it appears that the passway over the land of appellees is now in the same place that it was in 1885, except at one point, where it was changed by appellant and Mrs. Hense Short, by agreement, when it was taken out of a low place in the bottom and put up near the foot of the hill. The trial judge, with this evidence before him, denied appellant the right to the use of the passway in question, and dismissed his suit, from which judgment he appeals.

The chancellor does not state the ground upon which he bases his finding and judgment, but it must have been upon the idea that the new road which was opened up offered to appellant practically as convenient an outlet to and from the farm as the passway afforded him, and for this reason, the passway being no longer a necessity, he denied to appellant the right to further use it. There is much merit in this course of reasoning, but, if appellant had, either by contract or adverse use, acquired a right to the passway in question, could he be deprived of this right simply because, by the opening up of a new road, he had been provided with another means of reaching the property? We think not.

The evidence in this case establishes beyond question three proposition. First, that at the time that Thomas Johnson sold and conveyed the land to George Johnson there was no suitable or convenient way of reaching said land save over the remaining lands of Thomas Johnson; second, that on the date upon which Thomas Johnson executed the deed to George Johnson they drew up an agreement, by the terms of which each was to have a passway over the lands of the other, twelve feet in width; and, third, that George Johnson from that time until in January, 1906, had and enjoyed the free, uninterrupted and unquestioned use of this passway over the lands which are now owned by appellees. The fact that the passway has been changed at one point since appellant commenced to use it does not militate against the rights of appellant thereto, for the reason that, in establishing the fact that such change had been made it was developed that it had been made by mutual consent between appellant and the then owner of the land. There can be no doubt whatever but that appellant, from the date of the purchase of the land which he bought of Thomas Johnson, in 1885, regarded this passway as his own, and, that it was so regarded by the neighborhood is evidenced by the fact that it is testified to by some of the witnesses that it was known as "George Johnson's passway."

We are of the opinion that the evidence clearly shows that appellant claimed, as a matter of right, the use of this passway for more than twenty years, and in this way acquired a right thereto which can not now be taken from him, but, aside from this, the fact is established and by no one denied, that at the time of the purchase and sale of the farm in question, in 1885, appellant and his brother, the remote vendor of appellees, made and entered into an agreement, by which each gave to the other a passway over his land, twelve feet in width. The consideration moving from the one to the other was the right to the use of the passway over the other's farm, and this was certainly a good, valuable and sufficient consideration to uphold the contract. The execution of the contract being fully established by appellant and three other witnesses, one of whom was the magistrate who took the acknowledgment to the deed, and the consideration being ample to support it, appellant acquired thereunder an unquestioned right to the use and enjoyment of this passway. There is no intimation in the record that the passway through appellant's land has not at all times been open for the benefit of the owners of the land now owned by appellees. The fact that a county road has been opened up which gives to appellant another outlet can not militate against or take from him the outlet which he has already acquired, as was expressly decided in Estop v. Hammons, 104 Ky., 144, wherein this court held that a right of way or easement acquired over the land of another was not lost or affected by the purchase of another and different outlet.

This being true, we are of opinion that appellant was entitled to the relief sought, and the trial judge erred in refusing to grant same.

The case is reversed and remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of appellant in conformity with the prayer of the petition.

COMMONWEALTH v. LEDFORD.

(Filed May 28, 1908—To be reported.)

Intoxicating Liquors — Merchants — License, to Sell — Bond to Observe the Law—Validity of Bond—A county court is authorized to grant a license to one who is a bona fide merchant, to retail liquors at his storehouse in quantities not less than a quart, not to be drunk on his premises or adjacent thereto, but the court is not authorized to exact a bond of such merchant, conditioned that he will faithfully observe the law in conducting his business, and such bond being unauthorized, is not good as a common law bond.

James Breathitt, Thos. B. McGregor, Chas. H. Morris and Denny P. Smith for appellant.

C. H. Anderson and C. H. Bush for appellee.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

The county court is alone authorized to grant merchant's license to retail liquors in quantities not less than a quart and not to be drunk on the premises. (4224, Kentucky Statutes.) The procedure required by the statute is that the applicant shall first post notices of his intention to apply for the license for so many days before the application is heard; then the residents of the neighborhood may protest against the license being granted, the neighborhood to be defined by the court. If a majority of the legal voters protest, the license must be refused. Nor shall a license be granted to a person of bad character, or who keeps a disorderly house. However, if the applicant is a person of good character, keeps an orderly house, has complied as to posting notices of his application, and a majority of the voters of the neighborhood do not protest, the county court has but little discretion left as to whether the license shall be granted. (Hodges v. Metcalfe County Court, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 772.) But in Christian county the county court exacted as a condition precedent to the granting of a merchant's license to Ledford that he enter into bond with the Commonwealth in the penal sum of $500, conditioned that he would faithfully observe the law with respect to conducting his business. And appellee, Ledford, with his suerty, entered into such covenant. This suit was brought upon the bond by the Commonwealth, charging its breach in that Ledford sold to inebriates, to minors and in quantities less than a quart, as well as in other quantities to be drunk on the premises; and that he kept a disorderly house. A recovery of the penal sum named in the bond was asked for. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition. We think properly so. It is conceded by the State's attorney that there is no provision of the statute authorizing the taking of such bond. Unless, it is said, the statute applicable to tavern keepers should be held to apply. While in olden times a tavernkeeper may have been deemed a retailer of liquor, or a merchant retailer, we think the Legislature of this State, by naming them separately and providing different conditions as to each, intended that they should not be any longer regarded as synonymous employments. And as bond is expressly required of tavernkeepers, but not of merchants, the county court was without authority to exact or to receive such bonds of the latter. They are without consideration besides. It amounts to this: A. is concededly entitled to have a certain license granted to him upon his paying the fees. But, in addition, he is required to execute a covenant not to violate the law. The requiring the covenant was as much unauthorized as if in addition to the toll legally exactable by a ferryman, he should also require a bond of the traveler to keep the peace. In neither event is it a voluntary bond. And not being such, it is not good as a common law bond. (Perry v. Hensley, 14 B. Mon., 381.)

Judgment affirmed.

STILES, GADDIE & STILES v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAIL-ROAD CO.

(Filed May 28, 1908—To be reported.)

Carriers—Injury to Live Stock—Absence of Infirmary in Stock—Common Law Liability—Applicability—The common law liability of a common carrier for injury to freight applies in this State to live stock the same as to inanimate freight. Where horses were burned by a conflagration in the city of Louisville, while in charge of the carrier, the loss being one not growing out of the infirmity of the animals themselves, the carrier is liable to the owner for their value.

Geo. S. & John A. Fulton for appellants.

John S. Kelley, R. C. Cherry and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

This action was instituted for the purpose of recovering the value of thirty head of horses shipped from East St. Louis, Illinois, to New Haven, Ky., over the railroad of defendant, and which were destroyed by fire in Louisville, Ky. There is no allegation in the petition of any negligence on the part of the carrier, and a general demurrer to the petition was sustained by the court. The plaintiffs declining to amend their petition, it was dismissed; from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The sole question arising on the record is, whether or not, in Kentucky, the common-law rule as to the liability of a common carrier for inanimate freight delivered to it prevails as to live stock; it being conceded that if this rule does prevail the petition states a cause of action, and if it does not the judgment of the trial court is correct.

It is not denied that, at common law, the common carrier of inanimate freight was an insurer of its safe delivery, except where the loss was from the act of God or the public enemy, or resulted from the inherent infirmity of the goods; that this rule prevails in Kentucky is quite beyond question. The question for adjudication is: Does the same rule apply as to consignments of live stock? In the case of Hall & Co. v. Renfro, 3 Met., 51, there was involved the loss of a jack by a public ferryman while it was being transported across a river. After stating that the keeper of the ferry was a common carrier, his responsibility for the loss of the jack was thus stated:

"Did he thereby subject himself to the obligations and liabilities of a common carrier? The authorities are conclusive of this question. * * *

"The general rule is, that common carriers are responsible for the goods which they undertake to carry unless the loss or damage is the result of inevitable accident, as lightning, tempests, and the like (which are usually termed the acts of God), or is occasioned by the public enemies. (See the authorities cited.) This rule, however, must be understood with certain qualifications. For instance, it is said that the liability of the carrier would not cover losses arising from the ordinary deterioration of goods, in quantity or quality, in the course of transportation, or from their inherent infirmity or tendency to decay.

"So, although a carrier is liable for the safety of animals delivered to him for transportation, yet, if an animal is injured by the peculiar risks to which it is exposed, the carrier is clearly excusable. He would not be liable for any accident arising from the animal's own viciousness or want of temper. (Angell on Carriers, section 210, 214, and the cases there cited.) 'Such a case,' says the author, 'would seem to be analogous to the case of the loss of merchandise, owing to some inherent defect which caused the destruction of it while in transit.'"

The court then goes on to clearly recognize the exception to the general rule as above stated, that the carrier was not liable for the loss of the jack if it, without negligence on the part of the carrier, fell out of the boat, or was thrown out of it in consequence of its own restiveness or viciousness of temper, or the restiveness or viciousness of the other animals on board with it at the time.

In the case of C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Sanders & Russell, 80 S. W., 488, the following rule is quoted with approval as being the law in Kentucky: "And the rule as now established by the great weight of modern authority is that railroad companies are common carriers of live stock with substantially the same duties and responsibilities that existed at common law with respect to the carriage of goods, except that they are not liable as insurers against loss and injury resulting from the inherent nature, propensities, or proper vices of the animals themselves."

And in Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Drulen, Id., 778, in discussing the loss of live stock by fire, we said: "At the common law, which obtains in Illinois as well as in this State, a common carrier is liable for loss of freight in its charge occurring by fire, whether or not caused by its own negligence; its liability being that of an insurer."

The cases cited by the appellee in support of the judgment of the court are not apposite to the question before us. They are cases where the stock was killed or injured by reason of its inherent propensity, and the loss may be said to have resulted from the infirmity or vice of the animals; and while the court, perhaps, used general language in regard to the negligence or non-negligence of the carrier which, if disassociated from the particular loss that was being discussed, might seem to modify the general rule; yet it was clearly not the intention of the court so to do. Undoubtedly, where the result may have arisen from the natural infirmity or vice of the animal, then the question of the negligence or care of the carrier arises; but that principle has no application here. Appellants' horses were burned by a conflagration in Louisville, Ky., while in charge of the carrier. This was a loss in no wise connected with or growing out of the infirmity of the animals themselves, but falls under the common-law rule which makes the carrier an insurer of the safe delivery of the goods committed to it for transportation.

It results, therefore, that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to appellant's petition, and the judgment is reversed, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FOLEY v. GRAHAM'S GUARDIAN, &c.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Divisibility of—Code Provisions—The Code does not require that the indivisibility of property shall be required by proof other than that furnished by the pleadings and exhibits, nor must it be established as a condition prerequisite that the sale would be in the interest of the infant. The best interests of the infant must be looked to, and in some cases a sale can not be avoided.

2. Duty of Administrator—Sale in Entirety—If in the judgment of the administrator it would impair the property to divide it, his duty to the estate would require that he ask the court for a sale of the entire tract.

3. Bond—Section of Code Sale is Under—The sale in this case was under section 497, of the Code, therefore, no bond was required before the sale.

4. Judgment of Chancellor—The proof establishes a state of case where the chancellor was authorized to conclude that the land was indivisible, therefore, he did not err in ordering a sale of the entire tract.

Bertram & Phelps for appellant.

J. T. Montgomery for appellees.

Appeal from Russell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

Appellant became the purchaser of a small parcel of land ordered sold in the judgment in this case and because of certain alleged defects in the title he filed exceptions to the report of sale, and the circuit judge having decided adversely to his contention, he appeals.

Some twelve years or more ago a suit was instituted in the Russell Circuit Court for the purpose of settling the estate of A. M. Vaughn, and such proceedings were had in that suit that a tract of land owned by him containing about two hundred acres was sold. The parcel of land, which was bought by appellant in this action, is a small portion of the two hundred acres above referred to. The record in the suit to settle the estate of A. M. Vaughn is made a part of the record in this case. It appears from the record in the old suit of Vaughn's administrator, that he left surviving him his widow and one infant child. That he owed many debts, some of which were liens upon the real estate. That his land, the 200 acres above referred to, was valuable chiefly because a spring (the waters of which possessed certain medicinal qualities), was located thereon; buildings had been erected conveniently near by, and it had been converted into a health resort. In this property the widow held a dower interest, subject to the lien debt. It was alleged that the land was not susceptible of division without materially impairing its value, and that it was necessary to sell the entire tract to pay the debts and settle the estate.

The case was referred to the commissioner of the court to settle the accounts of the administrator and report on claims. His report was filed in due time and showed an indebtedness against the estate of something like $1,600 more than the amount of the personal assets which came to his hands. A guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant child, and he resisted a sale on the ground that A. M. Vaughn, a short time before his death, had entered into a verbal contract and agreement with one, G. Graham, by the terms of which the said Graham was to pay him $1,700 for a one-half interest in the property including the personal property, household effects, &c., and furnishings of the hotel building at the spring. He asked that this contract be enforced and the indebtedness in this way discharged and the remaining one-half of the property saved from sale. After the filing of this answer, the case was submitted for judgment on the pleadings, exhibits, commissioner's report, &c., and the court rendered a judgment directing a sale of all of the land and personal property, as a whole. The land was appraised at $2,700. It and the personal property were purchased by the widow, M. S. Vaughan, and G. Graham, jointly for $3,400. This sale was, in the course of time, confirmed, the debts were paid and the remainder was apportioned between the widow and her infant chi'd, according to their rights thereto. It is not claimed that the land did not bring its full value, and the only question is as to whether or not the proceedings were so irregular as to render the sale void.

The first, second, third and fifth exceptions to the report of sale are substantially the same. The first being because the whole tract was sold without division, when it should have been divided and sold in lots. Second, because there is no proof that said land is not susceptible of division without materially impairing its value. Third, because more land was sold than was necessary to pay the indebtedness of the estate and cost of administration. Fifth, because there was no proof to show that it would redound to the interest of the infant to have the land sold. The proceeding to sell this land was under sub-section 2, of section 694, of the Code, and sub-section 2, of section 490, of the Code.

For appellees, it is urged that the land and its condition and uses appear from the petition and exhibits on file, and that these clearly show that it could not be divided without materially impairing its value. That the chief value of the property, and in fact the only substantial value that it had, was in the spring and the buildings, surrounding it. There is much force in this argument when it is considered that Vaughn in his life, and just a short while before his death, contracted to sell a half interest in the entire property, personal as well as real estate, for $1,700. If the buildings on said land are given anything like their real value the land itself was practically worthless. A general description, location and boundary of property, together with the uses to which it is put, frequently provide the judge with information sufficient to enable him to determine whether or not the land is susceptible of division without impairing its value. (Foley v. Fuller, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 591, and Friddle v. Kohn, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 312.)

So that the trial judge, from the pleadings and exhibits, having determined that the land in question was indivisible, and it being necessary to sell a portion thereof, he was, by express statutory provision, (sub-section 2, section 694, and sub-section 2, section 490), authorized to direct a sale of the whole, and thereafter make the proper order for the distribution of the surplus fund.

The provisions of the Code, do not require that the indivisibility of the property should be established by proof other than such as may be furnished by the pleadings and exhibits, nor must it be established by proof as a condition prerequisite that the sale would be to the interest of the infant. In fact, where the land is indivisible and a sale is necessary it might happen that it would not be to the best interests of the infant that the land should be sold, and yet a sale can not be avoided in such cases; even though the court should be of opinion that it was not to the best interests of the infant that the whole be sold, he would be bound to so direct. Having so found, the trial judge did not err in directing a sale of the entire tract and, in our judgment, by so doing the best interests of the widow and infant defendant were subserved.

The fourth exception to the sale is that an administrator has no right to prosecute a suit for a sale of real estate for any purpose other than the payment of debts against the estate. It was his duty to seek a sale of a sufficient amount of the land to pay the debts (sections 428 and 429 of the Code), and if the nature of the land was such that it could not be divided without materially impairing its value, then it becomes his duty to ask for a sale of the entire tract. It quite frequently happens, in the settlement of an estate that it would be impossible for the administrator to determine whether or not a sale of the entire tract is necessary for the payment of debts, and in such a case it is the duty of the administrator to present the facts to the court and leave it for the court to decide this point, and, while it is customary and usual for the prayer of the petition to ask for a sale of enough of the real estate only to satisfy the debts, still, if, in the judgment of the administrator, it would impair the value of the property to have it divided, his duty to preserve the estate would require that he should ask for a sale of the entire tract, as was done in this case.

Complaint is also made that no bond was executed, as required by section 493, of the Code, before a sale was ordered. We are of opinion that this sale is governed by the provisions of section 497, of the Code, and no bond is, therefore, required before the sale, but the share of the purchase money found to be due the infant would remain a lien upon the land until the infant arrived at age or until the bond, as provided by section 493, had been executed, but in no event would the sale be void. It appears that, before the sale in the present suit was ordered, the guardian of the infant, Marie Vaughn, executed the necessary bond and the purchase money found to be due her was paid over to him as such guardian, and thus the title of the infant children of G. Graham in the land purchased by appellant was perfected, and the trial judge properly so held.

For appellant it is urged that under the rule of law announced in the case of Elliott v. Fowler, 112 Ky., 376, the sale of the 200 acres in the suit to settle the Vaughn estate was absolutely void because no proof was taken showing that the land could not be divided without materially impairing its value. We are of opinion, however, that this case differs from that case in the following particulars. There is no allegation in the pleading in that case that the land was indivisible but, on the contrary, the petition alleged that it was necessary to sell some part or all of the real estate, which consisted of some 900 acres of land, and, before the amount of the indebtedness had been ascertained, and without any allegation as to the amount thereof, a sale of all the land had been decreed. The land was sold in two tracts for something more than $11,000. The indebtedness, including cost of administration, proved to be about $7,000. Although the judgment ordering a sale provided that so much of the purchase money as was going to the infant should not be collected, but should remain a lien upon the land, the whole of the purchase money was paid into court and the infant's share thereof was entirely lost. There was nothing in the record in that case to show that the land could not be divided without materially impairing its value, but, on the contrary, the very manner in which it was sold furnished the best evidence of the fact that it could be divided and sold advantageously, in fact one of the parcels so sold brought a sum almost sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness. It not appearing in that case that the land was indivisible, this court held that the sale of same in excess of enough to pay the indebtedness of the decedent was void. That finding, under the facts in that case, was correct, and the principles of law announced in that opinion are now adhered to, but, in the same opinion it was said:

"Where the lot of land sought to be sold is indivisible without impairment of its value, the Code furnishes ample and exclusive provision for proceedings to sell it as an entirety. Where the lot is indivisible, and some part of it is necessary to pay the ancestor's debts, * * * the provisions of the Code as to suits to settle decedents' estates, and those provisions applicable to the sale of infants' lands under circumstances of indivisibility, must be read and applied together."

The proof, as furnished by the pleadings and exhibits in this case, demonstrates, to a reasonable degree of certainty, that the chancellor was correct in his conclusion that the land in question was indivisible, and that no part thereof could be sold without materially impairing the value of the remainder or of the whole. Hence, he did not err in directing a sale of the entire tract, and his finding and judgment in so doing is in perfect harmony with the rule announced by this court in the Elliott case above cited.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BROCK v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Trial—Motion by Defendant for Continuance—Absent Witnesses—Corroborating Evidence—On the trial of one for murder, in which the jury found the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fixed his punishment at 21 years in the penitentiary, where the case had been continued for the defendant at a former term of the court, it was not error in the court to refuse a second continuance where the defendant had ten witnesses present who swore to facts tending to show that the shooting was accidental, and the court permitted the affidavit of nine absent witnesses to be read as their depositions whose testimony was substantially the same as that of the ten who were present.

2. Same—Evidence of Commonwealth—Duty to Apprise Defendant Thereof—Allegations of Indictment—On the trial of one indicted for murder the Commonwealth does not owe the defendant the duty to apprise him of what it expects to prove further than the information set out in the charge in the indictment.

3. Conflicting Evidence—Absence of Errors—Refusal of New Trial—On the trial of one for murder where the evidence is conflicting, that is if the defendant and his witnesses are to be believed the killing was an accident and the defendant should have been acquitted, but if the Commonwealth's witnesses are to be believed it was a deliberate and unprovoked murder, and, in the absence of any irregularity or error in the trial, the verdict of a properly instructed jury should not be disturbed.

B. B. Golden, Cleon K. Calvert, J. G. Forrester and J. G. Begley for appellant.

James Breathitt and T. B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

Appellant, Riley Brock, was tried in the Leslie Circuit Court upon the charge of having murdered "Thee" Brown, found guilty and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for the period of 21 years. Because of this judgment he appeals, and assigns numerous reasons why the judgment should be reversed. The principal grounds for reversal are that the trial court erred in refusing to grant him a continuance because of the absence of certain witnesses. That it erred in refusing to set aside the swearing of the jury and continue the case on the ground that he and his counsel were taken by surprise by certain testimony which was given by two witnesses for the Commonwealth; and because the court did not properly instruct the jury.

The killing for which the accused was prosecuted took place at a voting place at Marrowbone, in Leslie county, Kentucky, in the summer of 1907, about mid-day, while appellant and Grant Sizemore, who had been specially deputized for that purpose, were attempting to quiet deceased, whom they had arrested for being drunk and disorderly on the ground. There were present at this voting place at the time of the killing a large number of men and some women, the witnesses stating the number from 75 to 200. About the time the killing occurred several men in the crowd became boisterous, many of them were drinking and at least two fights were in progress, and considerable excitement prevailed. A justice of the peace and a deputy sheriff, who were present, were using their best endeavors to preserve order. When the disturbance had increased to such an extent that the justice of the peace could not control the situation, he issued a proclamation and deputized every sober man on the ground to assist in keeping the peace. The deceased, though unarmed, was very drunk and was creating much disturbance by cursing and hallooing.

The deputy, sheriff, one Z. R. Colwell, specially deputized appellant and Grant Sizemore to arrest deceased and take him off the grounds. They proceeded to do so, Sizemore taking hold of him on his left side and appellant on his right side, appellant catching hold of his right hand with his left hand and in this way they proceeded to take him off the grounds. He offered such resistance as a drunken man could by pulling back and talking. While pushing and jerking him along his feet became entangled in some weeds and he fell to the ground. At the time that he stumbled and fell appellant had hold of him with his left hand and had a pistol in his right hand, and almost immediately following his fall upon the ground the pistol was fired, the ball entering the deceased's left breast above heart and passing out above the hip in the back.

Up to this point all of the witnesses for the Commonwealth and the accused agree. Appellant insists that when the deceased fell he, having hold of him by the arm or hand, it jerked him around and caused his right hand, in which he had the pistol, to swing around over the body of deceased, and that in some way it was caused to fire the shot which killed deceased. That he did not intend to do so. That he did not intend to fire it at all but that it was purely an accident. That he thinks that someone struck the barrel of the pistol before it fired and that this caused it to fire. He introduced many witnesses whose testimony tends to support his theory as to the manner in which the killing occurred, while the Commonwealth contends and introduced a large number of witnesses in support of this contention, that appellant became angered because deceased did not yield readily when placed under arrest and did not accompany him and Sizemore off the grounds as they desired him to do, but continued to pull back and offer all the resistance that he could to being taken off the grounds, and that when he fell appellant jerked his arm one or more times, and when he did not arise, deliberately aimed the pistol at him and fired, saying, according to two witnesses, after he had fired the shot, "Now, God damn you, I guess you will get up," or "give up," the witnesses were not clear as to which expression was used. The Commonwealth also proved that, after the shot was fired, appellant was in the act of firing a second shot when they asked him to desist, as he had already killed deceased. Appellant testified that there never had been any trouble between himself and deceased and that they had always been good friends. After the shot was fired appellant said that his pistol had been accidentally discharged. The deceased lived until some time during the following night.

Appellant admits firing the shot, but claims that it was an accident. The Commonwealth claims that it was deliberately and intentionally done, and there being proof tending to support each of these respective theories it was proper for the jury to say which of the theories presented was correct. They decided against the contention of appellant and, under the well established rule, their finding will not be disturbed unless some prejudicial error was committed by the court in the conduct of the trial.

The indictment was returned at the October term, 1907, of the Leslie Circuit Court. At the same term of court the case was called for trial, the Commonwealth announced ready, and the case was set for the 8th day of the October term, which was the 16th of October. On this day the defendant moved the court for a continuance, and filed in support of his motion his own affidavit. The motion was sustained and the case was continued and set for trial on the 4th day of the next term of court. The bond of the defendant was fixed at $15,000, which he gave. The witnesses for the Commonwealth, some twenty odd, were recognized and permitted to go, and, on motion, certain witnesses for the defendant were likewise recognized in the sum of $200 each for their appearance as witnesses in this case on the fourth day of the next term of court. When the case was called for trial on the fourth day of the next term of court, which was the 6th of February, 1908, the Commonwealth again announced ready for trial, the defendant moved for a continuance and in support of his motion filed his affidavit. The attorney for the Commonwealth thereupon agreed that the affidavit might be read to the jury as the evidence of the absent witnesses, should the court be unable to procure the attendance of such absent witnesses to testify before the jury. The motion for a continuance was overruled and a forthwith warrant of arrest was ordered to be issued for the absent witnesses mentioned in the affidavit, and all other witnesses the defendant desired. The trial was proceeded with.

The defendant complains that his case was prejudiced by this ruling of the trial judge. That the affidavit should either have been admitted as true or else the case continued. Section 189, of the Criminal Code, provides that, when an application shall be made for a continuance by a defendant, based upon affidavits stating the absence of one or more material witnesses, and the facts which such absent witnesses would, if present, prove, the attorney for the Commonwealth shall not be compelled, in order to prevent a continuance, to admit the truth of the matter which it is alleged in the affidavit such absent witness or witnesses would prove, but, only that such absent witness or witnesses would, if present, testify as alleged in the affidavit. It is further provided in this section that it does not apply to a motion for a continuance made at the term at which the indictment was found, and this court, in the case of Hardesty v. Commonwealth, 88 Ky., 537, held that where a motion is made for a continuance at the same term at which the indictment is found, upon the ground of the absence of material witnesses, the Commonwealth can not force the accused into a trial unless it admits the facts stated in the affidavit to be true, provided, the affidavit shows the materiality of the testimony of the absent witnesses.

The indictment in this case had been found at a former term of court, hence, the Commonwealth was not called upon nor required to admit the affidavit as true, but, under the provisions of section 189, above quoted, it was only called upon to admit the affidavit as the deposition of the absent witnesses, and the court did not err in so holding.

It has been repeatedly held that while the trial judge has a large discretion in determining when a continuance should be granted because of the absence of witnesses whose testimony is alleged to be material, still where proper diligence has been shown to procure their attendance, and it is shown that there are reasonable grounds to believe that their attendance can be procured at the next succeeding term of court, the continuance should be granted (White v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 480), but where other witnesses have testified to the same facts which it is alleged the absent witnesses, if present, would testify to, it is not error on the part of the court to refuse to grant a continuance. (Williams v. Commonwealth, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 753; Simmons v. Commonwealth, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 839; and Roberts v. Commonwealth, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 341.)

In the case at bar, appellant moved for a continuance on the ground of the absence of nine witnesses, each of whom he alleges were present at the time of the difficulty and saw all that transpired, and that if they were present at the trial they would testify that the killing occurred substantially under the circumstances and as he alleges it did occur. He introduced some ten witnesses who testified to substantially these same facts, and the evidence of the absent witnesses, whose presence he desired to procure, would have been but cumulative, as it is not alleged in the affidavit that any one of them would have testified to facts which were not brought out in the trial, either by the witnesses for the Commonwealth or for the accused. Besides, the court offered to have a forthwith warrant of arrest issued for each and all of said witnesses and any other which the accused desired, and no complaint was made during the progress of the trial that any request of his in this particular was not being complied with, or carried out by the court and its officers. In our judgment, the court did not abuse its sound discretion in refusing to continue the case and permit the affidavit to be read as the deposition of the absent witnesses.

In the case of Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 2117, a similar question was before this court, and it was there held that the court did not err in refusing to continue the case when an affidavit as to what the absent witness would testify to was read to the jury as the deposition of such absent witness. The same rule was announced in the case of Aiken v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 523. After the jury was sworn and much of the testimony had been introduced for the Commonwealth, appellant filed an affidavit in which he alleged that he and his attorneys were greatly disconcerted and taken by surprise by the testimony of certain of the Commonwealth's witnesses, because said witnesses had testified in substance that after his pistol was discharged and the deceased was shot, he made a demonstration and effort as if to shoot again, when, as a matter of fact, he says that he and his counsel had talked with said witnesses and had not been advised by them that they would make such statements. That he was also surprised at certain other statements which said witnesses made, and which they had not indicated to him they would make. That, by reason of their having testified to what they had not notified him they would testify to, he was prevented from procuring other witnesses, who would have contradicted them upon this point. We are of opinion, that this objection on the part of appellant is not well taken, for two reasons. In the first place, the Commonwealth owed to appellant no duty to apprise him of what she expected to prove, further than that information which was conveyed to him through the charge set out in the indictment. If, in his efforts to learn from the witnesses of the Commonwealth what they would testify to upon the trial, they failed to disclose to him all of the facts to which they would testify, he may have cause to feel aggrieved against the witnesses, but certainly not against the Commonwealth. The point, in our opinion, is not well taken for the further reason that the absent witnesses, by which appellant hoped to have contradicted the statements made by these witnesses for the Commonwealth, were not shown to have been any nearer the killing, if as near, as many of the witnesses who did testify. It is more than probable that if all of the absent witnesses whose names are set up in the affidavit for a continuance had been present, their testimony would have thrown no additional light upon what was said and done on that occasion, to that which was given in evidence by the witnesses who were present, and did testify.

This tragedy, as above stated, occurred in the broad day light, at a place where a large crowd of people were gathered together in a reasonably small place. There is no material difference between the testimony of the witnesses for the Commonwealth and for the accused as to the manner in which it occurred. They differ, as is always the case, upon the exact language that was used by the participants in the difficulty and their respective friends. They likewise differ as to the motions and maneuvers of appellant just before and just after the killing. Appellant's witnesses, who were present, were interrogated along this line for the purpose of contradicting the witnesses for the Commonwealth, who gave the damaging evidence against appellant of which he complains. Had the absent witnesses for him been present and testified as he says they would have testified, their evidence upon this point would have been merely cumulative. He did not ask the court to use its compulsory process to procure the presence of these witnesses, although the court had previously proffered such service had it been desired. In our opinion, the court would not have been justified in setting aside the swearing of the jury and continuing the case upon the grounds set up in the affidavit.

Appellant also complains of the instruction given by the court and especially of that instruction in which the court told the jury that if the killing was the result of an accidental discharge of appellant's pistol, then they should acquit him. A close examination of this instruction shows that it is not subject to criticism. The instructions, as a whole, are remarkably clear and simple, presenting to the jury the whole law of the case—defining the rights of appellant as a citizen and officer—and are certainly as favorable to appellant as he was entitled to have them. We have carefully read and re-read this record and fail to find a single ruling of the court which was prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant. This is, in some particulars, a remarkable case. If appellant and his witnesses are to be believed, this killing was an accident, pure and simple, and appellant should have been acquitted on the ground of accidental killing. If, on the other hand the witnesses for the Commonwealth are to be believed, it was a deliberate, unprovoked and wanton murder of a helpless man. Under proper instructions, a jury of his countrymen have heard the facts as detailed by the witnesses and they have rejected the theory of appellant that it was an accidental killing and found him guilty.

In the absence of any irregularity or error in the trial, their finding and verdict should not be disturbed and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

NAPIER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal Law—Joint Indictment—Separate Trial—Election by Commonwealth—Mistrial—Second Trial—Second Election by Commonwealth—Where several persons are jointly indicted and a separate trial as to one or more of them is demanded, the Commonwealth has the right to elect which one he will try, and if there is a mistrial as to the one selected, or if there is a conviction and a new trial is granted, the Commonwealth may, when the prosecution is again called for trial, elect to try the one previously convicted or either of the other defendants.

2. Trial—Absent Witnesses—Failure of Defendants to Object—Subsequent Objection—Where a defendant, indicted for a felony, announces ready and goes into trial without making any suggestion to the court as to the absence of any witness, he assumes the risk of their attendance, and it is too late after the trial has begun to ask a continuance to procure the attendance of his witnesses.

3. Joint Indictment—Proof of Confederation—Evidence Admissible—Where, on a trial of one defendant, jointly indicted with others, charged with confederating and banding together to alarm, disturb and injure Martha S., proof of the fact that all of the defendants appeared together at her house in the middle of the night and all of them assisted in the outrage there committed, was, in and of itself, sufficient evidence of a confederation and conspiracy, and this fact being established, it was competent to prove the unfriendly relations or enmity that existed between any of the conspirators and the persons they assaulted.

Wootton & Morgan, Jesse Morgan, Bailey P. Wootton and H. C. Davidson for appellant.

James Breathitt and J. F. Lockett for appellee.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellant, Napier, in connection with John Hensley, William Miller, and other persons, was indicted under section 1241a of the Kentucky Statutes, charged with the offense of confederating and banding themselves together for the purpose of alarming, disturbing and injuring Martra Stidham. Upon a trial before a jury, appellant was found guilty and his punishment fixed at four years confinement in the State penitentiary.

John Hensley, one of the defendants in the indictment, was tried and convicted in 1907. Upon appeal to this court, the judgment was reversed and the prosecution as to him remanded for a new trial. Afterwards, in March, 1908, when the prosecution was again called for trial, the defendants having theretofore demanded separate trials, the Commonwealth elected to try appellant.

Appellant insists that the Commonwealth, having elected, in the first place when separate trials were demanded, to try Hensley, that it could not try the other defendants until the prosecution against Hensley had terminated. It is said that when the Commonwealth elects to try one of several persons jointly charged in an indictment that the trial as to him must be prosecuted until it is finally disposed of before either of the other defendants can be tried. We are unable to perceive any reason why this procedure should be adopted, and counsel for appellant has not furnished us any authority in support of his position. When several persons are jointly indicted, and a separate trial as to one or more of them is demanded, the Commonwealth has the right to elect which one it will try; and if there is a mistrial as to the one selected, or if there is a conviction and a new trial is granted, the Commonwealth may, when the prosecution is again called for trial, elect to try the one previously convicted, or either of the other defendants. Persons jointly indicted have a right to demand a separate trial, but they can not regulate the order of the trials, or determine for the Commonwealth which one shall be first tried.

It is next insisted that the court erred in failing to grant appellant a continuance. The record shows that, on the 7th day of the term, the trial was commenced without any request upon the part of appellant for a continuance. On this day the evidence was partially heard, and on the following day it was concluded. After all the evidence had been introduced for both the Commonwealth and the accused, appellant entered a motion for a continuance, which was overruled. In support of the motion he filed his own affidavit, in which it was stated that Martha Moore, and Lillie Bell Allen, important witnesses for him, and whose attendance he had exercised proper diligence to obtain, failed to appear on account of sickness—that except for sickness they would have been present and testified on the trial. A state of case might arise where the defendant would be entitled to a continuance on account of the absence of a witness or witnesses who were present when the accused announced ready for trial, but we have not before us a question of that kind. Neither of these witnesses was present when the case was called for trial, and appellant announced ready for trial without making any suggestion to the court concerning the absence of these witnesses. He should not have announced ready for trial until satisfied that he could obtain the presence of the witnesses he desired to introduce in his behalf. When he went into the trial in the absence of these witnesses, he assumed the risk of their attendance; and it was too late after the trial had been commenced to ask a continuance to procure their presence. The Code of Practice, section 188, provides that: "When an indictment is called for trial, or at any time previous thereto, the court, upon sufficient cause shown by either party, may direct the trial to be postponed to any time in the same term or to another term." This section regulates the practice in respect to asking a continuance, and affords the accused ample opportunity to apply for a postponement of the trial if he desires it continued. To permit a defendant in a criminal prosecution to have a continuance in the midst of a trial he had gone into without asking its postponement would involve the trial of all criminal cases in uncertainty. It would encourage persons charged with crime to go into trial when they were not ready, and give them the advantage of obtaining a continuance at any time during the trial when it appeared that a continuance might be to their interest. This practice, aside from being in direct violation of the Code, would often result in a miscarriage of justice, and tend to obstruct the orderly administration of criminal procedure.

During the examination of the prosecuting witness, she was allowed to testify that she and James Napier, one of the defendants, had some trouble a few months before she was assaulted and that it had continued up to the time of the assault. Her evidence upon this point was very trivial, but is objected to upon the ground that no conspiracy had been proven between James Napier and the accused to commit the crime they were charged with. All of the defendants were identified as being present, aiding and assisting each other in the assault made upon Martha Stidham and her family. The fact that all of them appeared together at her home in the middle of the night, and that all of them assisted in the outrages there committed, was, in and of itself, sufficient evidence of a confederation and conspiracy between them within the meaning of the statute. And when this fact was established, it was competent to prove the unfriendly relations or the enmity that existed between any of the conspirators and the persons they assaulted, for the purpose of showing their feeling of hostility towards the person assaulted, and furnishing a motive for the commission of the crime.

It is further objected that the Commonwealth was permitted to prove by one, John Miller, that the defendant, Hensley, endeavored to get him to intercede with the prosecuting witness for the purpose of adjusting in some way the prosecution. While John Hensley, who was one of the defendants, was on the witness-stand, he was asked by the attorney for the Commonwealth, who fixed the time and place, if he had not requested Miller to effect a compromise with the Stidhams. Upon his denial, Miller was introduced by the Commonwealth as a witness for the purpose of proving that Hensley had requested him to intercede with the Stidhams, with a view of adjusting the trouble between them. This evidence was introduced to impeach Hensley and was competent for this purpose alone. It was not offered for the purpose of proving a conspiracy, because the object of the conspiracy had been accomplished, and any statements then made by Hensley would not be competent against his associates; but, it was admissible for the purpose of impeaching the credibility and veracity of Hensley.

It is further complained that one of the attorneys employed to assist in the prosecution made an improper argument to the jury. The alleged improper argument was not in our opinion open to criticism or objection. But, if it had been, no exception or objection was taken to it, and therefore, it would not be available error upon this appeal.

The instructions are also the subject of criticism, but they fairly presented the law of the case.

In connection with the motion for a new trial, appellant filed his affidavit, setting out that the jury had boarded, during the trial, at the home of the county attorney. The affidavit does not disclose any improper conduct on the part of the jury or the county attorney, but if it did we would be powerless to interfere as it has been repeatedly held that when an alleged error in the trial of a case is presented for the first time in a motion for a new trial, this court, under section 281, of the Criminal Code, has no jurisdiction to review it. We may, however, observe that when a jury selected to try a criminal case boards at the home of one of the attorneys engaged in the prosecution, it has a tendency to excite suspicion and create unfavorable comment, and for these reasons, if none others were presented, it would be better for the jury to engage board at some other place. We have no doubt that if, during the trial, the attention of the court had been called to the fact that the jury were boarding with the county attorney, who was actively engaged in the prosecution, he would have suggested to the sheriff in charge of them the propriety of selecting some other boarding house for the jury.

It is also insisted that there is no evidence to support the verdict. This ground is wholly lacking in merit. The appellant, and others of the accused, were positively identified as parties engaged in the unprovoked and brutal assault upon the prosecuting witness. All of the defendants attempted to establish an alibi, but the jury evidently accepted the statements of the prosecuting witnesses in preference to the testimony of the accused and the persons who corroborated their evidence.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the rights of the accused, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

MAY, &c. v. MAY.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Statute of Frauds—Parol Contract for the Sale of Land—A parol contract for the sale of land is not binding and after demanding possession, the vendor may institute an action to rescind the contract and recover possession of the land upon equitable terms.

2. Same—Petition—Memorandum of Writing—The petition seeking the rescission does not take the place of the memorandum required by the statute, constituting a ratification of the sale. The signing of a petition to rescind an invalid contract of sale does not have the effect of making the contract valid.

D. D. Sublett for appellants.

John H. Gardner for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Some time in the year 1895, appellee, S. D. May, sold, by parol contract, a small piece of land situated in Magoffin county, Kentucky, to appellants, Abel May and James May, and put them in possession of same. Appellants remained in possession of the property for a period of about ten years, when appellee demanded possession of same, and, upon appellants' declining to give him possession, he instituted this action. Appellants defended on the ground that they had fully paid the purchase price of the land, and that appellee was now estopped to claim possession; also on the ground that the petition signed by appellee was such writing or memorandum as amounted to a confirmation and ratification of the parol contract of sale. Appellants further asked, in case the contract of sale was rescinded, that they be allowed the purchase money with interest; also the value of the improvements which they made on the land and the natural increase of its value. The court below entered judgment rescinding the contract of sale, and further held that the rents and profits were about equal to the amount of purchase money and interest and the value of the improvements, and that these two claims be off-set against each other. From this judgment, Abel May and James May prosecute this appeal.

While the statute of frauds in some cases works a hardship—and doubtless worked a hardship in this case—it is nevertheless true, that a parol contract for the sale of land is not binding, and that the vendor may, after demanding possession from his vendee, institute an action to rescind the contract and recover possession of the land upon equitable terms. (Dean v. Cassiday, 88 Ky., 572.)

Nor is there anything in appellants' contention, that the petition which was signed and sworn to by appellee took the place of the memorandum of writing required by the statute of frauds, or constituted a ratification or confirmation of the parol contract of sale. We can not hold that the signing of a petition to rescind an invalid contract of sale has the effect of making the contract valid. In other words, a party does not lose his legal rights by the use of the methods prescribed by law for their enforcement.

It appears from the record that appellants paid to appellee, the sum of $59.25, for the land. It further appears that they cleared about six acres of land, and, according to their contention, this was worth $8 per acre, or a total of $48. They also made and laid up about 300 rails and about 100 panels of fence, a portion of the rails of which appellee furnished. Placing upon the latter work a value of about $12, which is really in excess of its value according to the testimony of disinterested witnesses, the whole value of the improvements made by appellants amounted to about $60. According to the testimony, the profits and use of the land to appellants were worth from $15 to $20 per year, which, for a period of ten years, would amount to from $150 to $200. It is manifest, therefore, that the value of the improvements added to the purchase money, with interest, did not exceed the lowest estimate placed upon the value of the profits and use of the land to appellants. That being the case, the appellants have no cause to complain of the judgment of the lower court in offsetting the value of the improvements, purchase price and interest against the value of the profits and use of the land.

Judgment affirmed.

L. & N. R. R. CO. v. MARSHALL.

(Filed May 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligence in the Operation of Trains—Evidence—Injury to Passenger—Extent Of—The evidence shows that the trains that collided, in which collision appellee was injured, were recklessly run by those in charge of them, showing such lack of regard for the safety of the passengers as to amount to gross negligence.

In view of the extent and character of the injuries as disclosed by the evidence, and their permanent character, the verdict herein complained of can not be said to be excessive.

2. Instructions—Measure of Damages—In defining the measure of damages the court, in telling the jury that they might find for her "for the loss of time, if any, which she has sustained, and for the loss of time in the future which the jury may believe from the evidence it is reasonably certain she will suffer, if any, and for the loss or impairment of her ability to earn money, if any," the court meant that they were authorized to compensate her for loss of time, when she was unable to work, but when she became able to work, and her power to earn money was impaired, she should be compensated for the difference in her earning power in her impaired condition and what it was before the injury.

S. D. Rouse and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

Myers & Howard and J. W. Lilly for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellee, a widow twenty-nine years of age, with one child, was injured while a passenger upon one of appellant's trains, which collided with another passenger train. She brought this action for $20,000 damages, and recovered $12,500. Appellant asks for a reversal; first, because, as its counsel claims, there was an entire absence of testimony as to the cause of the wreck, or that it was due to gross negligence on its part, therefore, the court erred in giving the jury an instruction authorizing them to find punitive damages; second, because the evidence as to appellee's permanent injury is wholly unsatisfactory, the jury could do no more than guess as to whether or not the injuries were permanent; and, therefore, the amount of recovery is excessive; third, because the court erred in its instruction on the measure of damages.

We will consider these questions in the order stated. Appellant's contention is that there was absence of testimony as to the cause of the wreck, and, therefore, a punitive damage instruction should not have been given; and cites, as authority supporting this proposition, the cases of Southern Railway Company in Kentucky v. Lee, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1360, and the same against Brewer, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1374, and other cases. Lee and Mrs. Brewer were injured in the same wreck, and the court said the punitive damage instruction should not have been given; because there was no evidence showing how the collision occurred; that it may have occurred, so far as the evidence showed, by reason of some accident, over which the persons in charge of the train had no control. In the Lee case, the action of the court was certainly correct, and the majority of the court was of the opinion that the facts as presented in the record were the same in the Brewer case, as in the Lee case. But the facts of this case, as they appear in the record, show conclusively the cause of the wreck. It occurred between Independence and Latonia, the distance between the places being about eight miles. There was only a single track between the two places. There was a switch about three miles from Latonia, where trains could pass. The trains which collided were number eight, a heavy passenger train going north, and number nine, a local passenger going south. According to the time card they should have passed in Latonia; but that day number eight, the through train, was fifteen minutes late. Number nine, the local passenger train, should have left Latonia at 3:56 o'clock, but did not leave until 4:03 o'clock, and those in charge of it undertook to reach Maurice switch, about three miles from Latonia, and there enter it for number eight to pass. When number nine left Latonia, for the switch it had only eight minutes in which to reach it and enter. When it left the station in Latonia it had about one mile to travel within the city limits where it had to keep its train under control, and then to go to the switch, throw it, enter and close it, but about the time it reached a point one thousand feet from the end of the switch, the collision occurred. The impact was so great that it turned the engines end for end. Several persons were killed and many injured.

Butler, the section boss, testified that he saw the collision, and looked at his watch and it was 4:08½ o'clock. The telegraph operator at Independence testified that number eight, the through train, passed his station at 4:04 o'clock; that it was traveling at the rate of forty-five or fifty miles an hour. Butler testified that it made no check when it arrived at Maurice switch, but about the time it passed the switch it put on more steam and ran faster. The testimony shows, without contradiction, that it should have stopped at Maurice switch, when those in charge of it saw that number nine was not on the siding, and remained there until number nine arrived, or at least three minutes. These uncontradicted facts show that those in charge of both trains were operating them without any care; that their conduct was reckless, and without regard for the safety of the passengers in their charge, and shows gross negligence on their part.

Appellant's counsel spent much time in his brief trying to induce the court to say that the principle of allowing punitive damages, in any case, is wrong. All the common law writers, on the subject and the highest courts of every State in the Union, and this court for one hundred years, have recognized the principle that punitive or exemplary damages are a proper element of recovery. For these reasons it is too late now, even if we felt inclined to do so, to change the rule with respect thereto.

The second proposition made by appellant's counsel is that there is no satisfactory proof of the permanency of appellee's injury; and, therefore, the verdict is excessive. The testimony shows that appellee, prior to her injuries, was a healthy person; that she lived in Glencoe, Kentucky; that she was then and had been for a long time, employed as an expert seamstress in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the price of two dollars a day over and above all expenses. The trial took place fifteen months after the collision of the trains. She had not been able to walk since the collision; had only been out of the house twice—once when she was carried to the hospital in Cincinnati, where she remained for several weeks, and once when she was carried to the courthouse as a witness in this case. At the time of the trial she had not been able to straighten her body. She had a tendency to lean forward and to one side. She had suffered intensely since receiving her injuries—had convulsions. She had not been able to rest without taking an opiate. The witnesses differ as to the probable duration of her suffering, they vary from one to five years. The evidence tended to show that if there ever was a complete recovery it would only be accomplished by other surgical operations. There were two operations performed on her while she was in the hospital in Cincinnati. The nature and extent of these can better be understood in the language of the surgeon, which is as follows:

"The operation was two-fold. In other words, there were two operations at one time. The first operation was made by making an incision in the median line of the abdominal wall, large enough to admit my hand, by which I seized the uterus, brought it forward and then shortened the ligaments or guy ropes which nature intended as the natural means of support for this uterus. In other words, by this means I restored the uterus to its normal position, and then with my hand in the abdominal cavity, and this operation complete, I explored the displacement of the kidney, the region of the left kidney, and found the kidney displaced, and it had seemed perfectly obvious through the abdominal wall, that it was. I put it back in its position and then turned the patient on the side and made a long, oblique incision along the margin of the lower ribs, cut down upon the kidney, lifted it out entirely, but leaving it, of course, attached to its blood vessels, inspected it carefully, subjected it to a certain amount of friction, for the purpose of securing its adhesion after it was replaced; I cleaned out and removed some of the super-abundant fat—not super-abundant, because it was not super-abundant; but the fat that is generally found in the nest that is occupied by the kidney—I removed that—I then took advantage of the ligament which grows from the lower end of the kidney, and I switched that into the angle of the womb, very much as I indicate by my finger. This ligament stitched in the lower angle of the womb, made a permanent fixation by means of which the kidney was held and is still held in its normal position. These incisions were then closed, and the patient made a very satisfactory recovery, as surgical recoveries go."

This surgeon stated, from the evidence introduced on the trial, and his examination of appellee a few days before the trial, that his opinion was, that her recovery would not take place without, in all probability, these operations were repeated. The proof was that she had already expended and incurred $1,500 for doctor's bills, paid considerable sums for nurses and board in the hospital, and for nurses for herself and child after returning from the hospital to the time of the trial, and the loss of time from her employment to the time of the trial, and, of course, it could not have been positively known at the time of the trial, when she would be able to resume her work, if ever. It was also a matter of conjecture as to the amount that would necessarily have to be expended by her in the future, for other surgical operations, and other expenses necessary in attempting to effect a cure.

The jury had a right, under the evidence, to consider all these things, and in addition to compensate her for the mental and physical suffering which she had endured as a result of her injuries, and the mental and physical suffering that was reasonably certain, from the evidence, she would endure in the future as a result of her injuries. The physician testified that her left kidney, at the time of the trial, was what they call a "floater;" and it may waste away and give her relief from pain, but she would be minus a kidney; that if she could not get rid of it in that way, other operations would have to be performed. In view of the evidence, we are of the opinion that the jury had the right to conclude that she could never recover her healthy, robust condition that she enjoyed before the injuries were received, and that her injuries were permanent. In view of these facts do not feel authorized to say that the verdict is excessive.

The instruction on the measure of damages, complained of by appellant, is as follows:

"If the jury find for plaintiff under instruction number one, the measure of her damage will be such a sum of money as, governed by the proof, will fairly and reasonably compensate her for the pain and suffering of both body and mind, if any, which she has suffered, and such as the jury believe it is reasonably certain she will suffer in the future, if any, as the direct and proximate result of said injury, if any, and for the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred, or which may be incurred by her in the future, if any, for medical and surgical attention, and medicine, as the direct and proximate result of the injury; for the loss of time, if any, which she has sustained, and for such loss of time in the future which the jury may believe from all the evidence it is reasonably certain she will suffer, if any, and for the loss or impairment of her ability to earn money, if any, as the direct and proximate result of her injuries in the evidence described, not exceeding in all, however, the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the amount claimed in the petition."

That part of the instruction to which objection is made is as follows:

"For the loss of time, if any, which she has sustained, and for such loss of time in the future which the jury may believe, from the evidence it is reasonably certain she will suffer, if any, and for the loss or impairment of her ability to earn money, if any."

Appellant's counsel claims that this language in the instruction authorized the jury to find double damages for the future loss of time—allowing a recovery both on the score of loss of time and also for loss or impairment of appellee's ability to earn money. The criticism of the instruction is incorrect. It does not bear the construction placed upon it by appellant's counsel. What the court meant, and the jury must have so understood it, was that they were authorized to compensate her for her loss of time, that is when she was unable to work, but when she became able to work, if ever, and her power to earn money was impaired, then the jury was directed to compensate her for the difference in her earning power in her impaired condition and what her earning power was before the injury. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Logsdon, 114 Ky., 746, and the authorities therein cited.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

GRAND LODGE ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN OF KENTUCKY v. DENZER.

(Filed May 29, 1908—To be reported.)

Life Insurance—Benefit Society—Policy by Father for Son—Change in Beneficiary—Withdrawal of Father from Society—Death—Rights of Son—A. D. took out a $2,000 certificate in a benefit society payable to his son, H. D., which he subsequently transferred to his said son, upon his payment of the annual dues thereon, which he paid as long as the company would accept same. Later, the father changed the beneficiary, and then withdrew from the society and died. In an action by the son against the company to recover the insurance, Held—That under the laws of the company, the beneficiary named in the certificate had no vested right therein until the death of the member, that the member had the right to change the beneficiary without the consent of the named beneficiary, and the father having withdrawn from the society, the certificate was thereby forfeited.

Caruth, Chatterson & Blitz for appellant.

Pryor, Sapkinsky & Castleman for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

It appears that one Adolph Denzer, became a member of the order of the Ancient Order of United Workmen in the year 1877. He joined Antiquity Lodge, No. 30, in Louisville, Kentucky, on July 23, 1877. A certificate of insurance was issued to him wherein it was agreed that the Grand Lodge would pay, at his death, the sum of $2,000 to his wife, Mary Denzer. Appellee, Henry Denzer, at that time was a small boy. It appears that in March, 1886, Adolph Denzer had the above benefit certificate changed so as to read as follows:

"To Mary and Henry Denzer bearing relationship to me of wife and son, $1,000 each."

This certificate remained in the possession of Adolph Denzer until August 15, 1890. His wife died August 13, 1890. Appellee at that time was living with his parents, being then a young man about twenty-two years of age. After Adolph Denzer's wife died, he took the last mentioned certificate to the home office of the recorder of the lodge and requested that the certificate be changed, and a new one issued making his son, appellee, the sole beneficiary of the entire sum of $2,000. This request was granted, and the recorder of the lodge, living near Mr. Denzer, carried the same to his house and delivered it. Adolph Denzer then, in the presence of the recorder, gave the certificate to appellee, with the understanding that he (appellee) would pay, thereafter, all the dues, assessments and charges against same. Appellee faithfully complied with this agreement, and out of his own money and estate paid the grand lodge, through its subordinate lodge, all the charges against same. These payments continued until July, 1896, when the lodge refused to receive any further payments from appellee. Appellee repeatedly tendered to the officers of the lodge the dues and assessments which were refused, and he was ordered not to return to the office, as they would not receive same from him. The reason the lodge refused any further payments from Henry Denzer, as it appears in the record, was that at about this time appellee and his father became estranged, they were engaged in a law suit, and just prior to that time, Adolph Denzer had married again; and he made an affidavit that the former certificate of insurance was not in his possession and that he could not obtain it, and asked that it be cancelled and that another certificate be issued, and that his last wife and four grandchildren, naming them, be made the beneficiaries of it. Soon after this, Adolph Denzer made application to the lodge for a final card withdrawing his membership, which was accepted and the card issued; and from that time to his death, in 1905, he was not a member, in any sense of the order, and the last certificate payable to his wife and grandchildren lapsed, and became of no effect after the date of his withdrawal from the lodge. After his father died, in 1905, appellee instituted this action upon the certificate of insurance of date, July, 1890, the one in which he was made the sole beneficiary. He claimed that he received the certificate under a valid gift from his father upon the consideration that he would pay all the dues and assessments due the lodge by his father; that appellant, through its agents and officers, knew of this gift at the time it was made, and knew that appellee had paid all the dues and assessments from that time until 1896, and by reason thereof he had a vested interest in the certificate of insurance of which his father, Adolph Denzer, had no power or right to divest him, and the acts of Adolph Denzer and the officers of defendant, in attempting to divest him of his rights under the certificate sued on by issuing another payable to Adolph Denzer's last wife, and grandchildren, and by finally issuing to him a withdrawal card as a member of the lodge, were wrongful and void and did not have the effect to divest appellee of his interest in the certificate sued on.

Appellant, by answer, put in issue all the affirmative allegations of the petition, and by a second paragraph set forth the change in the certificate by Adolph Denzer, and the fact that he ceased to be a member of the lodge in October, 1896, and asked that appellee's petition be dismissed.

The parties tried the case before a jury, and the court instructed it as follows:

"If you shall believe from the evidence that at the time mentioned in the petition, Adolph Denzer gave the policy or certificate of insurance sued on herein, to his son, Henry Denzer, and put him in possession of it on the condition that Henry Denzer should pay the charges, assessments and dues on the said certificate, and that the said Henry Denzer did thereafter, pay the charges, dues and assessments on the said certificate as long as the defendant would accept the dues, charges and assessments, and that the defendant, by its officers or agents, knew that Adolph Denzer had given the policy to his son and that the son paid the dues, &c., mentioned, then the law is for the plaintiff, and you should so find."

A second instruction gave the converse of the first.

The jury returned a verdict in behalf of appellee for the full amount of the certificate less the charges, assessments and dues which would have been due and payable on the certificate, considering Adolph Denzer, a member of the lodge until his death.

The jury found in favor of appellee, on the issue of facts, therefore, the only question to be considered on this appeal is: Did appellee, under the facts referred to, obtain a vested interest in the certificate of insurance, which his father had no power thereafter to cancel or change? In the certificate sued on is this language:

"This certificate is issued subject to and is controlled by the laws of the order."

This was the only reference to the laws of the order; they were not copied into the certificate, nor were they attached thereto. They were, however, filed and made a part of the pleadings in the action. We copy the following:

"Sec. 4. In the portion of this fund to which the beneficiaries of the deceased member are entitled, the members themselves have no individual property right; it does not constitute a part of their estate to be administered, nor have they any right in or control over the same except the power to designate the person or persons to whom, as beneficiaries, the sale shall be paid at the death of the member. The beneficiaries thus designated, have no vested right in said sum, until the death of the member gives such right and the designation may be changed by the member in the method prescribed by the laws of the order at any time before his death.

"Sec. 5. No liability for the payment of any money from this fund shall arise by virtue of any beneficiary certificate, or otherwise, unless the member of the order named in such certificate shall, in every particular while a member of the order, comply with all the laws, rules and requirements thereof; and shall, at the time of death, be a member of said order in good standing; and that the certificate, by virtue of which the demand is made, shall not have been surrendered, or the rights thereunder surrendered by the member, or said certificate or his rights thereunder cancelled at his request.

"Sec. 6. Any member desiring to change his beneficiaries may do so without the consent of the beneficiary, &c.

"Sec. 7. Any member in good standing may sever his connection with the order by paying all dues, fines and assessments charged against him, surrendering his beneficiary certificate in writing, together with all rights, benefits and privileges that he may have acquired by virtue of his membership in the order, when a final card shall be issued to him without the payment of any fee for such final card."

It appears from the laws of the order, which are a part of the contract as stated in the certificate, that Adolph Denzer had no property right in the fund named in the certificate, nor did it form any part of his estate to be administered; that the beneficiary named in the certificate had no vested right therein until the death of the member gave him such right; that the member had the right at any time to change the beneficiary without the consent of the named beneficiary. It is further provided that the society should not be liable for the payment of the sum named in the certificate, unless the member of the order named in such certificate should, in every particular, while a member of the order, comply with all the laws, rules and requirements thereof, and at the time of his death be a member of the order in good standing. It is clear, under these provisions of the contract, that appellee did not and could not take a vested interest in the certificate of insurance. He took it subject to the rights of his father who, at any time, with the consent of appellant could change the beneficiary. Appellee claims, however, that under section 679, of the Kentucky Statutes, the laws of the order, copied above, can not be considered a part of the certificate, or contract, because the same were not written in the certificate nor attached thereto. The statute, so far as applicable to the question at issue, is as follows:

"All policies or certificates hereafter issued to persons within the Commonwealth by corporations transacting business therein under this law, which policies or certificates contain any reference to the application of the insured, or the constitution, by-laws or other rules of the corporation, either as forming part of the policy or contract between the parties thereto or having any bearing on said contract, shall contain or have attached to said policy or certificate a correct copy of the application as signed by the applicant, and the portion of the constitution, by-laws or other rules referred to; and unless so attached and accompanying the policy, no such application, constitution, by-laws or other rules shall be received as evidence in any controversy between the parties to or interested in said policy or certificate, and shall not be considered a part of the policy or of the contract between the parties." (This statute has been repealed as to benevolent societies.)

It will be noticed that the certificate sued on was issued in July, 1890. The statute just quoted became a law after that date, and it expressly states that it applies to "all policies or certificates hereafter issued," and consequently it could have no application to the case at bar. To adjudge that appellee, under the facts stated, obtained a vested interest in this certificate; that his father, the member of the order, was thereafter prevented from making any change in the beneficiary or from withdrawing his membership from the order, and to adjudge that the order was prevented from expelling him as a member for improper conduct, which, of course, would cancel the certificate, would, in the nature of things, thwart the order from carrying out the benevolent purposes for which it was organized, as shown by its by-laws. It would sometimes compel a person to remain a member of the order against his will, and compel the order to retain a member after he had violated all the rules and regulations of the order, and after he had become unfit to remain a member of any organization.

In the case of Schillinger v. Boes, &c., 85 Ky., 357, this court, commenting upon the right of a member to change a beneficiary, said:

"The member as well as the beneficiary acquires his rights under the act of incorporation, and when the law of the association, as well as the certificate of benefit, empowers the member to change the beneficiary, there is no question of public policy involved, and the change being authorized by an express law or statute of the order, the right to make the change can not be questioned. * * * He had the right to cancel the certificate or decline to pay the dues, and thereby forfeit his right to the insurance."

In the case of Masonic Benefit Association v. Bunch, 109 Mo., 561, the court said:

"All the authorities agree that the right of members of benefit societies in the sums agreed to be paid at the death is simply power to appoint the beneficiary, and that the constitution or charter and the by-laws are the foundation and source of such power. * * *

"And it is equally well settled that the beneficiary acquires no vested interest, nor has he any property in the certificate. He has simply an expectancy which may be divested by the member by changing the beneficiary. * * *

"Nor is the right to change the benefit affected by the fact that the first beneficiary paid the assessments. * * *

"Nor does the possession of the certificate by the beneficiary deprive the member of the right to make the change. * * *

"This right to change has generally been held analogous to a testamentary disposition of the benefit. It, like a will, is revocable at any time during the life of the testator."

See further the case of Fiske v. Eq. Aid Union, 11 Atl. Rep., 84, wherein the court said:

"Notwithstanding the fact that the certificate was delivered to the plaintiff, and the assessments thereon were paid by him, his wife had the right, on presenting it to the supreme secretary, to apply for and effect a change in the designation of the beneficiary named therein. When plaintiff accepted the original certificate, and paid the assessments thereon, he knew, or ought to have known, that he held it subject to the right of his wife, to change the designation of those to whom the insurance money should be paid upon her death."

It is true that there are respectable authorities sustaining appellee's contention, but the weight of authority is to the contrary. (Fisher v. Fisher, 42 S. W. Rep., 448.) It was there said:

"It is held in a number of cases, principally in New York and California, following the New York cases, that the beneficiary who pays the assessments does acquire an interest which can not be divested without his consent, when there is a special agreement to that effect, or that no substitution shall be made. (3 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 2 ed., 993, and note 4.)

But these cases are not in accord with the weight of authority. (Id. 990, and notes.) The rule approved in the majority of the cases, is based upon the provisions and reservations contained in the charter and by-laws of the society, and this furnishes the distinction between ordinary life and mutual benefit insurance policies, (Id. 990.) This rule adopted in the majority of the cases is in accord with the objects and purposes of beneficial orders in which the benevolent feature prevails largely. * * * The laws, articles of association, and certificates of membership of the order determine the rights of the members, and these laws, articles and provisions of membership will be respected and enforced by the courts. * * * The beneficiary, during the life of the member, can have no more than a mere expectancy, resting entirely upon the volition of the member; and this can not, during the member's life, rise to the dignity of a vested property right. It is no more than the mere expectancy of a legatee or devisee, which, although it may be recognized by one will, it may be defeated and extinguished by the execution of a subsequent will. The final power of disposition rests in the testator or member, so long as he lives. The laws and regulations of the order enter into and become a part of every certificate issued to a member. Nor can it alter the rule that the expectant beneficiary has paid assessments or incurred expense upon the faith of the provisions in his behalf in a certificate which is afterwards cancelled and changed. * * * But under the prevailing rule as laid down: and recognized by the current of authority, and by our own cases, the member's right to dispose of the insurance exists, notwithstanding the beneficiary originally named, has paid assessments or incurred expense."

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CARLTON v. SMITH.

(Filed May 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Parties to Appeals—Persons who are not named in the statement are not parties to an appeal and no relief can be given against them. (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1738; 23 Ky. Law Rep., 831, and 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1566.)

2. Pleading—A paragraph in an answer was not sufficient to prevent a recovery on a note, its payment being averred, when no proof was made showing its payment.

3. Land—Sale of Enough to Pay Debt—The judgment was erroneous in not limiting the amount of land to be sold to only enough to pay the debt sued on.

C. C. Williams for appellant.

Bethurum & Bethurum for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

On November 19, 1902, Henry Carlton bought of J. W. Marler and his wife, Serena Marler, a tract of 135 acres of land, for $200, and they executed to him a title bond. He paid all of the purchase money except a note for $32.40. This note was assigned by Marler to W. F. Smith, on May 23, 1905, and Smith brought this suit on April 17, 1906, to obtain a judgment on the note and to enforce a lien on the land, alleging that the note was wholly unpaid and that Marler and wife had, on Dec. 31, 1903, made a deed to Carlton for the land, but that he had declined to accept it. The deed was tendered with the petition. Carlton filed an answer, in the first paragraph of which he alleged that he had paid the note. In the second paragraph he pleaded that Marler had entered upon the land after he had sold it to him and after January 1, 1904, and cut a lot of timber off the land of value, $200, which he had converted to his own use. By the third paragraph he alleged that Marler had trespassed upon the land to his damage in the sum of $50. In the fourth paragraph he alleged that Marler had collected $13.50 a year which was paid on an oil lease on the land for three years and that the $40.50 thus collected more than paid the note. He made the second, third, and fourth paragraph of his answer a cross-petition against Marler and wife. They entered their appearance to the cross-petition and filed a demurrer to it. The court sustained the demurrer, and, he failing to amend, the cross-petition, was dismissed. The action was then submitted as between him and Smith; and the court entered a judgment in favor of Smith and directed a sale of the land to pay the note subject to a credit of $10 which was endorsed on the back of the note.

Marler and wife are not made parties to this appeal. We can not therefore, consider whether the court acted properly in sustaining their demurrer to the cross-petition against them. The statute requires the appellant to endorse on the record the names of the appellant and appellees. Persons who are not named in the statement as appellees are not parties to the appeal; and no relief can be given against them. (Board of Councilmen v. Farmers Bank, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1738; Bordie v. Parsons, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 831; Chinn v. Curtis, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1566.)

The allegation in the answer that the note was paid was but an affirmative denial of the allegation of the petition, that the note was unpaid. No reply was necessary and the burden of proof was on the defendant to show that he had paid the note. (Ermert v. Dietz, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1639; Logan Co. Bank v. Barkley, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 773.) As Carlton had taken no proof to show that the note was paid and as the burden of proof was on him, the note making out a prima facie case for the plaintiff, the first paragraph of the answer was not sufficient to prevent a recovery.

The second paragraph of the answer setting up that Marler had cut from the land timber after January 1, 1904, and after his right to remove the timber, under the bond, has ceased, is not sufficient to prevent a recovery by Smith as it is not averred that the timber was cut by Marler before the note was assigned to Smith or he had notice of it. The timber standing on the land was a part of it. The timber passed to Carlton with the land and if Marler took off the land timber which formed a part of the consideration of the note, to this extent Carlton should not be required to pay the note to Marler, and if he had this defense against Marler in May, 1905, when Marler assigned the note to Smith, as Smith took it subject to all defenses which Carlton had against the note, in the hands of Marler, he may make the defense against Smith. But for the reason indicated, the answer is not good against Smith, as it does not appear from the answer that Carlton had this defense against Marler at the time the note was assigned to Smith or before he had notice of the assignment.

The third paragraph of the answer is also insufficient for the reason that no trespass which Marler committed on the land could be pleaded against Smith in the absence of a showing that the cause of action accrued before the assignment of the note by Marler to Smith and that Marler was insolvent at the time of the assignment or before Carlton had notice of it. (Newman on Pleading, sec. 475, E. New Edition, and cases cited.)

The fourth paragraph of the answer, however, seems to us sufficient. The oil on the land was a part of it. By the bond which Marler made to Carlton, he sold him the land and agreed to make him a good deed to it. There was no reservation of the oil or the oil lease, which had been made to the New Domain Oil and Gas Company. Carlton is entitled to a reduction of the price to the extent that the oil lease diminishes the value of the property. In other words he must have the whole property or he can not be compelled to pay the whole purchase money. This paragraph of the answer which shows that Marler was collecting the royalty and not paying it to Carlton showed that Carlton had not received all that the bond bound Marler to convey to him.

The judgment of the circuit court is also erroneous in this, that it orders a sale of the entire tract of land. It must be presumed that a tract of 135 acres of land is divisible; and therefore, a sale should have been ordered of only so much of the land as was necessary to pay Smith's debt.

On the return of the case to the circuit court, the defendant will be allowed to amend his answer if he desires to do so. He can not have any judgment over against Smith, but he should not be required to pay the note in the hands of Smith, if he could not have been required to pay it in the hands of Marler, at the date of the assignment to Smith, or when he had notice of it.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

CITY OF COVINGTON v. WEBSTER.

(Filed May 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Towns and Cities—Defective Sidewalk—Notice to City—Appellee, in his action for damages for injuries occasioned by a defective sidewalk, stated his case in the alternative, setting up that he was injured either by stepping into a hole which appellant could have discovered by ordinary care, or by stepping through the crust of ordinary cinders which appellant had not properly supported. Held—It was not necessary to prove notice of the defects in the construction of the walk in order to hold the city liable under that theory of the case.

2. Instructions—Appellee was entitled to have these two theories submitted to the jury for it matters not which condition caused the injury, the city being negligent in either event.

John E. Shepard for appellant.

R. C. Simmons for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellee, Thomas W. Webster, was injured by falling through an opening in a cinder sidewalk on the south side of West Third street, in the city of Covington. The accident occurred about 6 o'clock p. m., early in November, and the darkness was intensified by an unusually heavy fog. It appears that the plank walk had been partly removed and its place supplied by a cinder fill, supported on the south by a wall constructed out of the wooden planks and beams which had previously constituted the plank walk. In some places this wall supporting the fill contained openings of such size that the cinders escaped through same and left holes in the path, or hollowed out the space beneath the crust of cinders. While appellee was passing along the walk his left foot went down through the surface of the walk and was caught in an opening in the wooden retaining wall. His back struck a post, and his right leg remained above the surface of the ground. He was painfully injured. Appellee stated his cause of action in the alternative, claiming that he was injured either by stepping into a hole in the sidewalk, which appellant could have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care, or by stepping through the crust of the cinders, which appellant had negligently failed to properly support. Upon the trial of the case, appellee recovered judgment in the sum of $775. From that judgment the city of Covington appeals.

It is insisted by counsel for appellant, that appellee based his action upon two theories, one of which showed negligence, while the other did not, and that, under the rule laid down by this court in the case of Louisville Gas Co. v. Kaufman, Straus & Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1069, the court should not have submitted the case to the jury. Counsel takes the position that it was necessary to prove that the city had notice of the defective construction of the cinder walk in order to hold the city liable under that theory of the case. The evidence conducted to show that the boards had not been placed close enough together to keep the cinders from running through. As the cinders from beneath the crust ran through the opening in the supporting wall, there were places beneath where there was nothing to support the crust of the walk. The city having constructed the walk and put up the retaining wall, we do not think it was necessary to prove notice of the defects in the construction thereof. The defect in the retaining wall was apparent when the city built it, and no subsequent notice of this defect was necessary.

The only complaint made of the instructions is that both theories of appellee's cause of action were submitted to the jury; i. e., the court authorized a recovery in case the sidewalk was unsafe, either from a hole therein which appellant could have discovered by ordinary care, or from the negligent and defective construction thereof. We think appellee was entitled to have these two theories submitted to the jury. It matters not which of the conditions caused appellee's injury; the city was negligent in either event.

The instructions fairly presented the law of the case, and, as there was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict, we are of opinion the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

INDIAN HEAD COAL CO. v. MILLER.

(Filed May 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Mines and Mining—Falling of Roof of Mine—Injury to Servant—Action for Damages—Instructions to Jury—In an action by a coal miner against the company for an injury by the falling of coal on him from the roof of the mine which had not been sufficiently propped, there was evidence by the foreman that he told plaintiff and another hand that they must "timber" the roof. The court should have instructed the jury that if it was the duty of the plaintiff and his fellow-servant to prop the roof, and they failed to do so, and but for this the injury would not have occurred, or if the foreman, when plaintiff called his attention to the roof told him he must "timber" it and he failed to do so, and but for this the injury would not have incurred, then in either of these events the jury should find for the defendant.

O. H. Waddill & Son for appellant.

James Denton for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Juge Hobson, reversing.

Charles Miller was a miner in the service of the Indian Head Coal Co., and was injured by a lot of slate falling on him. He brought this suit to recover for his injuries and recovered a judgment for $1,400. The defendant appeals.

Miller had worked in the coal mine ten or twelve years as a driver. He had worked as a miner only two or three months, up to the time that he was hurt. He and a man named Columbus King worked together. Their duties were to shoot down the coal and load it after two other men had cut under it with a machine. The machine required nine feet to work in, and no props were usually put nearer the edge of the coal than nine feet. It was the duty of Miller and King to prop the roof and keep it propped within nine feet of the coal as they blew it down. The props were furnished by the company at the mouth of the mine. Miller and King selected there what props they wanted and they were then brought in to them on the cars and put up by them. The mine boss was named Heaps. There was a horse-back in the room in which Miller was working. On the morning of the accident Miller and King called Heaps' attention to the horse-back, saying that they were afraid to work there; that the room was unsafe. They complained of this no less than three times. Heaps took a pick and slapped the horse-back with it and said to them, as Miller and King testified, that he thought it was all right. Thereupon they went on to work and shortly afterwards the slate fell on Miller. On the other hand, Heaps testified that when he was there in the morning the props had not been set within nine feet of the bank of coal, but that there was a space of eighteen feet. His testimony as to what took place between him and Miller is as follows:

"Q. Explain to the jury how that room was worked."

"A. It was mined by machinery; the machine was in on Friday, and they would do the drilling and shoot the room down that night, and Monday morning they went in to loading their coal; I went down that morning in the room next to that and Miller called me and said he wanted me to show him how to fix some slate that was in there right along here; and I went and showed him and told him where to set his timbers so that it would not interfere with the air, and I was under this piece of slate and he called my attention to the horse-back where this loose coal was lying; I looked it over and said there is no danger, it is not showing itself, but I said: 'You must timber your room,' and he said, 'I will go out and get some timbers as soon as I load this coal,' and I said: 'It ought to be timbered now,' and he said 'it ought,' and said: 'I will go as soon as I load this car' or coal,' I do not know which,"

On this evidence the court gave the jury the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Charles Miller, while engaged, by the defendant in its mines, received the injuries complained of, by the falling of slate from the roof of said mines upon him, and that he called the attention of the mine foreman to the condition of said roof and had been assured by said mine foreman that same was safe and directed to continue at work therein by said foreman, when the said foreman knew, or could have known, by the use of reasonable care, that the roof of said mine was in an unsafe and dangerous condition, and that the plaintiff continued to work at said place because he depended and relied upon the said foreman's superior knowledge, you will find for the plaintiff, unless you believe that the danger was so obvious and the risk such that a prudent man would have refused to do the work under the circumstances because of the danger, in which case you will find for defendant."

This was the only instruction given by the court, except one defining the measure of damages and telling the jury that nine jurors might find a verdict. The instruction presented the plaintiff's side of the case, but the defendant's side of the case was not presented at all. We do not find in the record that either Miller or King anywhere denied Heaps' testimony to the effect that he directed them to prop the room; although there was testimony on Miller's behalf tending to show that the slate fell next to the coal, and that if the props had been put up it would not have been prevented the slate from falling if they had been set in the usual way, nine feet from the coal bank. Under the evidence the court should have instructed the jury that if it was the duty of Miller and King to prop the roof and to keep it propped within nine feet of the bank of coal, and they failed to do so, and but for this the injury would not have occurred; or if Heaps, when Miller called his attention to the roof, told him that he must timber the roof and Miller had not timbered the room, as he was directed to do by Heaps, and but for this the injury would not have occurred; then in either of these events the jury should find for the defendant.

King was introduced as a witness for Miller. He was asked on cross-examination if he had not, at a certain time and place, made certain statements to Heaps and to Corey, the superintendent, as to the matters about which he had testified, and inconsistent with his testimony. He denied making the statements. The defendant then offered to prove by Heaps and Corey that he had made these statements. The court refused to allow the evidence, which should have been admitted, with an admonition to the jury that it was not to be considered by them as substantive evidence, but only for the purpose of contradicting King.

The court did not err in refusing to give a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant. Miller was not an experienced miner. He had only worked in the mine a short time, and had a right to rely on the superior judgment of Heaps. The case of Breckinridge Syndicate v. Murphy, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 915, is unlike this case. There Murphy was an experienced miner, and knew as much about the matter as the boss. He did not rely upon the judgment of the boss. The case turns on the facts and is not in conflict with the many other cases holding that the servant may recover where he acts under the order of his superior, relying on his judgment. There is much in the evidence to show that the accident was due to the failure of Miller and King to prop the roof as they should have done, but there is some evidence that the fall of the slate was from that part of the roof which they were not expected to prop at that time, and that the fall of the slate was from bad condition of the roof which was indicated by the horse-back to which Heaps' attention was called. But it is shown from the evidence that Miller himself had sounded the roof with his pick and found that the slate was loose. This he did not tell Heaps. Under this and other evidence in the case the court should also instruct the jury that it was incumbent upon Miller to use ordinary care for his own safety in view of the facts known to him, and that if he failed to use such care and but for this would not have been injured, the jury should find for the defendant. This case differs from Big Hill Coal Co. v. Abney, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1304. In that case there had been no assurance of safety. Here there was evidence showing that the servant relied on the assurance and superior knowledge of the foreman.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

HARRISON v. STROUD.

(Filed May 29, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Elections—Contested Elections—Irregularities—Extent—Effect—While it is the general rule that irregularities, in an election the result of which can be shown with reasonable certainty not to have been prejudicial, may be disregarded, yet where such irregularities are so widespread or general as to leave the judicial mind in doubt as to how the election did go, or would have gone but for them, then they can not be eliminated.

2. Same—Voters—Disregard of Secret Ballot—Materially Affecting Result—Election Void—Our system of government contemplates the filling of elective offices by elections held by authority of law, at which the qualified voters may fairly and by secret ballot express their choice, and when the officers of an election permit such numbers of voters to violate the secrecy of the ballot as to materially affect the result of the election, it is not a lawful election and will be held void on that account.

3. Same—Certificate of Election—Injunction Against—Jurisdiction of Courts—It is error to grant a restraining order or a temporary or permanent injunction, in an election contest, to prevent the one holding the certificate of election from qualifying pending the contest. The certificate gives to him to whom it is issued a prima facie right to the office. Courts of equity have not the inherent jurisdiction to try contests over elections to office. In the absence of statutory authority they have no jurisdiction in the matter.

4. Circuit Courts—Statutory Authority Conferred—Judgment on the Merits—The statute of this State has conferred upon the circuit court the jurisdiction to try certain election contests, but it is not given power to disturb the legal status of the claimants as fixed by law pending the decision, and the incumbency of the office should be left where the law has placed it, until such time as upon a final determination, by judgment on the merits, the court may say whether the contestant is entitled to the possession of the office.

A. G. DeJarnett, M. D. Gray, E. K. Wilson and W. E. Clay for appellant.

C. H. Beasley, Clore, Dickerson & Clayton and Overton S. Hogan for appellee.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, reversing.

Appellant and appellee were rival candidates for the office of Marshal of Williamstown (a sixth class city), voted for at the November election, of 1907, to fill a vacancy in that office. The officers of the election, as well as the county canvassing board, certified that appellant had received 95 votes and appellee 94 votes at that election. Appellant was consequently awarded the certificate of election, and executed the bond and took the oath required by law. Within ten days after the election, appellee instituted this contest in the Grant Circuit Court. He charged that the election was irregularly conducted in a number of particulars. He charged especially that the polls were not opened on time, but that the voting was delayed because the officers of election present, to gain an undue advantage in the matter, refused to appoint any one of several eligible persons present as sheriff of the election, nominated by appellant (the person originally appointed to that place being a partisan of appellant, but refusing, for business reasons, to serve); that the election was held in a room with a glass front fronting directly upon the street, where a great number of interested and curious persons were congregated and throughout the day witnessed the voting and used the intelligence so obtained in settling with floaters who it was charged voted openly upon the table in plain view of the spectators and the officers of election; that whisky and money were freely used by appellant and his partisans in influencing the result of the election; that some 50 or 60 persons, out of a total of less than 200 voters, were allowed to expose their ballots by voting or marking them openly upon the table in plain view of the election officers and others, and without having been examined under oath or otherwise as to their disability to understand or mark their ballots as required by the statute; that as many as eight, who were named in the petition, had so voted for appellant, and as many as 20 more not named also voted for him in the same manner; that the officers of election had wrongfully counted one ballot for contestee, which was marked by the voter fraudulently with a distinguishing mark, and had refused to count one ballot for contestant which was voted for him and so marked; that a number of persons not legal voters, had voted for contestee. The prayer of the petition was to have the returns purged of the illegal votes charged as above, if that were possible, and that contestant be adjudged to have been elected; or if that could not have been done that the election be declared void. Another feature of the petition will be noticed in its appropriate place further along.

The answer denied the most of the allegations of irregular proceedings in the election, but it expressly admitted that of the eight persons named in the petition as having voted for contestee openly and not by secret ballot, seven had so voted, but alleged that the other voters had voted for contestant. The answer then charged that some eight or ten persons, naming them, had been suffered by the election officers to vote openly (i. e., by marking their ballots in public and thereby disclosing their votes) for contestant, and many more not named had voted the same way. Issue was joined by the reply. The proof shows that as many as eight persons voted openly for contestant, and as many as nine so voted for contestee. All these seventeen voters were legal voters. Some of them were aged men and of unquestioned probity; some, whose characters are not at all brought in question, and about whose ability to have properly and legally marked their ballots no suggestion is made, were permitted to vote openly, whether in ignorance or by design of the election officers is not sufficiently disclosed. Some so voted, we think, from the motive to purposely disclose how they had voted so that others might act on that knowledge. In addition to the seventeen named, there is evidence that probably as many as 40 others, whose names are claimed by the officers and other witnesses to be forgotten, voted similarly. Two men are shown to have been permitted to vote who were not registered, and therefore not legal voters at that election.

The circuit court deducted 13 votes from contestee (appellant) and nine from contestant (appellee) leaving the latter winner by a majority of three. There was but little direct evidence of bribery to sustain that charge. There was considerable drunkenness and some treating shown.

Just what conclusion we may have reached on these points is immaterial, because, without pursuing that inquiry to its end, we have become convinced that upon other grounds, coupled alone with the mildest judgment that might be reached on the charges of bribery and the other irregularities charged, the election ought not to stand. The other grounds of contest alleged were indifferently sustained by the proof or not at all. This election was one only in form. The Constitution and statutes require all elections (save that of school trustees) to be by secret ballot. Here about 80 per cent. of the voters observed the required course of voting, while the officers of election suffered about 20 per cent., far more than enough to have changed the result either way, to ignore the constitutional and statutory requirements, and to that extent conduct the election in open violation of the law. While it is the general rule, and a good one, that irregularities, the result of which upon the election can be shown with reasonable certainty to have been not prejudicial, may be disregarded, and the result of legal votes cast in the manner authorized by law to be allowed to stand; yet, when such irregularities are so widespread or general as to leave the judicial mind in doubt as to how the election did go, or would have gone but for them, then they can not be eliminated. And such is the statute of this State (sub-sec. 12, sec. 1596, Ky. Statutes), which on this subject reads:

"In case it shall appear from the whole record that there has been such fraud, intimidation, bribery, or violence in the conduct of the election that neither contestant nor contestee can be adjudged to have been fairly elected, the circuit court subject, to revision by appeal, or the Court of Appeals finally, may adjudge that there has been no election."

Our system of government contemplates the filling of elective offices by elections held by authority of law, at which the qualified electors may fairly and by secret ballot express their choice. All should be and are given the same right to vote. Officers of election, who purposely ignore the regulations made by the statutes, or who do so through gross ignorance, so that the result is so materially affected as that it can not be determined with reasonable certainty, that their irregularities did not control the result, may vitiate an election by such conduct. And when the officers permit such numbers of voters to violate the secrecy of the ballot, as was done in this case, as to materially affect the result of the election, it is not a lawful election, and will be held void on that account. (Atty. Gen'l v. Stillson, 108 Mich., 419; Sproule v. Fredericks, 69 Miss., 898.) Such an election is but a partial election. Instead of ascertaining the popular will it frustrates its legal expression; it would substitute the result of fraud or gross official ignorance and misconduct for the result of legal votes legally cast. That which is the citizen's shield and weapon of defense in popular government is set aside, and he is undone in the disregard of the law.

In the case at bar all who were permitted to vote openly as it is called, had not a bad purpose. They intended to vote. They had the legal right to vote. They attempted to exercise that right. They were misled by the officers of election so that their suffrage in this instance was destroyed. Had such voters been permitted to vote properly, the result may have been quite different from that found by the judgment of the circuit court. Or, for that matter, it may have been in accord with it. But the point is, it takes votes to make an election; not some votes, but all that are entitled and offered to be cast, and which if cast, comply with the requirements of the law. Judgments of courts and of contest boards are not substitutes for the elector's votes. Immaterial derelictions, not influencing the result, may be and ought to be disregarded; but transgressions of the election law which practically disfranchise enough voters offering to vote, so that the result might have been different but for the illegal acts, would simply substitute an election by some, for the election contemplated by law, which is by all. The law deems it better that such elections should not stand. When it becomes known that they will not, the main incentive to those who indulge such practices is removed. When they can no longer profit by them, though otherwise unpunished, they will quit them from motives of interest.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to determine how some three or four disputed votes should have been counted, as in no event could the decision upon this point influence the result.

In the petition in this case, contestant charged that contestee was insolvent, and was about to enter into the office in contest by virtue of the certificate issued to him, and that as the contestant was elected (as he claims) the contestee should be enjoined from discharging the duties of the office pending the hearing. A temporary restraining order was granted by the clerk, which, upon motion, the circuit court refused to dissolve, thereby converting it into a temporary injunction. And on the final hearing the injunction was perpetuated.

It was error to have granted the restraining order, as well as in granting the temporary and permanent injunctions. This writ can not be used in an election contest to prevent the one holding the certificate of election, from qualifying and discharging the duties of the office, pending the contest. The certificate gives to him to whom it is issued a prima facie right to the office. In the Law of Elections (Paine), 943, it is said:

"The title to a public office can not be tried on an application for an injunction," citing Jones v. Commissioners, 77 N. C., 208; Kilpatrick v. Smith, 77 Va., 349.

The same author, section 944, lays it down that "Courts of equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain defendants, who have no right to an office, from assuming to exercise the functions on the ground of damage occasioned to the plaintiff, by exclusion therefrom, nor on the ground of fraud in the inspectors in counting the votes and awarding the certificate of election to the defendants." (Hartt v. Harvey, 19 How. Pr., 245.) So the general rule is stated in 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 761, thus:

"As in cases of contest the office ought to be filled by one of the claimants while the action is pending, it frequently becomes a matter of importance to determine what evidence is sufficient to show which one should hold the possession of the office until the question of the right is settled. * * * It is, however, well settled, that when it is made the duty of certain officers to canvass the votes, and issue a certificate of election in favor of the successful candidate, a certificate of such officers, regular upon its face, is sufficient to entitle the person holding it to the possession of the office during the action to contest the right, and is conclusive as to third parties and in collateral matters."

And such seems to us is the reason of the matter and the weight of the authorities. (People v. Miller, 16 Mich., 56; State v. Churchill, 15 Minn., 455; Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. St., 292.)

Courts of equity have not the inherent jurisdiction to try contests over elections to office. In the absence of statutory authority they have no jurisdiction at all in the matter. The statute of this State has simply conferred upon the circuit court the jurisdiction to try certain election contests. But there is no intimation in the statute that they may go further, and in addition to such trial disturb the legal status of the claimants as fixed by law pending the decision. As that power has not been given to the courts, it should not be exercised, but the incumbency of the office should be left where the law has placed it until such time as upon a final determination by judgment on the merits the court may say, as it is then permitted to do, that the contestant is entitled to the possession of the office.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, to the circuit court, with directions to dissolve the restraining order and injunction issued against contestants, and to adjudge that there was no election held on Nov. 6, 1907, to fill the vacancy in the office of marshal of Williamstown.

ZENTZSHELL v. RICHIE.

Slander—Variance—In this case there is simply a charge that appellant uttered the slanderous words and a denial in the answer. The jury were properly instructed. The variance complained of is not material, the language being proved in substance as alleged in the petition.

Bradburn & Basham and J. H. Gilliam for appellant.

Goad & Olliver for appellee.

Appeal from Allen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellee recovered a judgment against appellant for $300 in damages for slander. It was alleged in the petition that he maliciously, falsely and wickedly spoke of and concerning appellee, with the intention to injure the good name and reputation of appellee, these words:

"Capt. Moore, I want to see you a minute. Charlie Richie came to my store and got me to cash a check on R. Y. Austin for $36. He stole the check (meaning the plaintiff) back from me and took it away. If he don't pay the money back, I am going to prosecute him in three cases—forgery, obtaining money by false pretenses and for stealing the check—and send him where George Haines is. Go and scare him (meaning this plaintiff) into paying me the $36."

Appellant filed an answer, specifically denying every allegation in the petition, and alleged that what he did say to Captain Moore at the time and place alleged was as follows:

"Captain I want to talk to you as a Mason; these people (meaning the plaintiff's family) are in the same family you are, and I want you to help me out. Charlie Richie brought me a check for $36. drawn by Rus Austin (meaning R. Y. Astin) and I cashed it for him, but the check has been lost, stolen or mis-laid. He then said to said Moore, Captain, Rus Austin says, he did not sign the check, but if he did not, it is the cleverest forgery I ever saw."

The words charged in the petition are per se slanderous and actionable, but the words just copied from the answer are not, and the court should have sustained appellee's motion to strike same from the answer.

This case is unlike the case of Shipp v. Patten, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 480. In that case the court said that Shipp, appellant, should have been permitted to deny some of the alleged slanderous words that indicated malice on his part, and then plead the qualified privilege, provided he confessed enough of the slanderous words charged to give "color" to appellee's petition—that is left uncontradicted enough to give a cause of action.

In the case of Whittaker v. McQueen, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1094, appellant denied the speaking of the words in one paragraph and alleged in another that they were true, and the court said this was permissible under the Code.

The issue in the case at bar, as made by the pleading, was simply a charge in the petition that appellant spoke the slanderous words, and appellant denied speaking them. This issue was tried by a jury properly instructed. Instruction number four, complained of by appellant, was not pertinent to the issue being tried, and could not have prejudiced the substantial rights of appellant.

Appellant contends that there was a variance of the proof of the charge and the words stated in the petition. Appellee's witness, Captain Moore, proved the language alleged in the petition, except the words "on R. Y. Austin." This was not a material variance. The language proved is in substance and effect the same as was alleged in the petition.

It appears from the record that appellant has had a fair trial, at least there was no substantial error committed to his prejudice.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MAUPIN, &c. v. MAUPIN'S GUARDIAN, &c.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Devise of Land to Daughter—Subject to Control of Widow—Prior Death of Daughter—Estate of Daughter—Curtesy of Husband—Where a father by his will devised a tract of land to his daughter, subject to the use and control thereof by his widow, during her life, if the mother outlived the daughter, the latter, not being seized and possessed of the land in her lifetime, her husband was not entitled to curtesy therein upon her death.

2. Parent and Child—Supplies to Infant Child—Recovery Therefor By Parent—A father is not entitled to recover a claim for board, education and clothing furnished to his daughter during her minority, as this duty is imposed on him by law.

Ed Thomas for appellants.

Shelbourne & Smith for appellees.

Appeal from Fulton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellee. Mary McClanahan, is a daughter of appellant, Maupin. She instituted this action against him and his tenant, Ferguson, to recover the possession of about seventy-one acres of land which she described in her petition, and alleged that they were wrongfully withholding possession of it from her, and had been in the wrongful possession of it for about seven years, and prayed for $750 as a reasonable rental value for such time. Appellants answered; and in the first place it is alleged that Ferguson was only a tenant of his co-defendant and had no interest in the litigation, except that he had a right to the use of the place for one year. Maupin alleged that, prior to the year 1904, he married the daughter of S. J. Little, who was the mother of appellee, Mary McClanahan; that S. J. Little departed this life in the year 1881, and left a will, which was duly probated, wherein he devised to his three children, Sallie, the wife of Maupin, being one of them, a tract of one hundred and fifty acres of land. The third and fourth clauses thereof are as follows:

"3a. I will and bequeath to my three beloved children, Sallie, Willie and Neal Little, my homestead upon which I now reside, the same being about one hundred and fifty acres of land, in Fulton county, Ky.

"4th. I wish my wife, Ann Mary Little, to have the use and control of my homestead before mentioned and bequeathed to my children, during her natural life."

He further alleged that issue was born alive to him and his wife, Sallie, before the year 1904, and that this land was "owned" by her of which she was seized and possessed, or which was in the possession of another for her, and that said Sallie Maupin owned the fee simple title and was seized of said land in her lifetime and same was held by her under the last will of S. J. Little, and that he, M. P. Maupin, thereby owns and is entitled to a life estate by curtesy under the law of Kentucky, in the whole of his deceased wife's lands and in the land sued for, and he has been occupying same as such and with the belief that he owned and held such an estate in said land. He alleged that his wife died in 1896. By another paragraph, in substance the same, he alleged that if he was not entitled to the life estate in the whole of the lands of his deceased wife, by reason of the fact that she died after the year 1894, he was entitled to an estate for life in one-third of all the real estate of which his wife was seized in fee simple, or any one for her use, at her death. By another paragraph he alleged that when this land sued for came into his possession, the fencing was down and rotten, the whole place was grown up with briars and bushes and that many gullies had been washed into it; that he rebuilt the fences, removed the briars and bushes, filled the gullies and manured the land, all at a cost of $689, and received but a small rental for the land; that he controlled and cared for the land during the time he had it so as to greatly improve same and increase its value. He also alleged that:

"He had expended for the use of the plaintiff for her support and maintenance, education, travel and other necessary expenses, and for proper clothing all of which were suitable, proper and necessary for him to have expended on her to enable her to associate in circles proper for her, large sums of money, namely $1,450."

He averred that after his wife died and in 1900, he expended for her $65 in the payment of cost and attorney fees in the division of the lands, which descended from his wife, their mother, between appellee and her brother, Willis Maupin; and also expended in defense of an action, by which one, J. C. Grove, sought to establish a lien upon her land, $50. He averred that he had no property and was unable to make these expenditures for his daughter, a part of which he still owed.

The court sustained a demurrer to appellant's pleading, and he declined to plead further, whereupon the court entered the following judgment:

"The demurrer heretofore filed and sustained as to a part and overruled as to part coming on and the court being advised, it is now sustained as to each and every paragraph of defendant's answer and counter-claim, and amended answer to which the defendants objected and excepted, and defendants declining to plead further, it is adjudged by the court that the plaintiff is entitled to the land described in plaintiff's petition, and she is hereby awarded a writ of possession against the defendants for enough of said land to build a house at once, and to issue by the first day of November, 1907, for balance of the land, if necessary, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Fulton county, for execution, and the plaintiff recover of the defendant her cost herein expended, for which execution may issue, to all of which the defendants objected and excepted at the time and still object and except and pray an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted."

Appellant contends that this case should be reversed because it is shown by the pleadings that he is entitled to the whole of the land left by his wife for life, or at least one-third thereof by virtue of section 2132 of the Kentucky Statutes. This question is somewhat difficult to determine for the reason that it is not stated in positive terms when Mrs. Little, the widow of S. J. Little, died—that is, it is not shown whether she outlived her daughter, Sallie Maupin, or not. If she did, appellant was not entitled to any interest in the land, for the reason that his wife, Sallie, was never seized or possessed of the land. (Stewart v. Barclay, 2 Bush, 550.) In that case the court said:

"As, therefore, no one was seized of the lands of testator to the use of the wife of appellee at the time of her death, and as she only had an estate in remainder, or an estate in fee, to take effect after the death of her mother, and as her mother survived her, she did not have such seizin or actual possession as would entitle her surviving husband, the appellee, to curtesy."

The facts of that case were very similar to the facts of the case at bar. In that case, Stewart, the father of appellee's wife, left a will in which he gave to his wife the sole control, management and use of the income arising from his estate "without accountability to any one." The court said, if the provision made by Willis Stewart for his widow, giving her the income of his whole estate, was not a devise of the estate itself to her in fee, it certainly invested her with a life estate.

The will of S. J. Little expressly left to his widow the use and control of his land mentioned, during her natural life, consequently she was seized and possessed of the land in her own right while she lived. and, as stated, if she outlived her daughter, Sallie Maupin, Sallie Maupin was not seized and possessed of the land during her lifetime. and, consequently, appellant, M. P. Maupin, could not have any curtesy in it. We have arrived at the conclusion, under the facts presented in this case, that the burden rested upon appellant, M. P. Maupin, to show the state of facts entitling him to the curtesy. Appellees filed with their petition the deed from the commissioner appointed by the court to convey to her the title in the case brought to divide the land between appellee and her brother. This conveyance gave her the fee simple title with no reservation in behalf of appellant or any one. If appellant had been entitled to a life estate in the whole, or even one-third of the estate he could have presented his claims in that action and had his rights protected, and if he had such interest, the division ought not to have been made at that time, for the reason that the life use of it by appellant might so change the character of the land as to make the division unequal at his death. We are of opinion that it devolved upon appellant to allege and show that Mrs. Little died before his wife. In such state of case he would have been entitled to a life estate in the land; but he failed to do this. On the contrary he made averments which, in our opinion, show that she died after his wife. The language referred to is as follows (referring to his wife):

"In all land owned by her, or of which she was seized, and possessed or which was in the possession of others for her, and that said Sallie Maupin owned the fee, was seized of said land in her lifetime, and same was held by another for her, as by said last will of S. J. Little."

Evidently he meant that his wife was seized and possessed of this land by her mother, Mrs. Little, under the will of S. J. Little; that he only claimed the seizin and possession was by reason of the fact that her mother held it for her under the will. As before stated, under these facts, Mrs. Little was in possession of the land in her own right. (Stewart v. Barclay, supra, and Moore, &c. v. Carvert. &c., 6 Bush, 356.) In the last named case, the court said:

"As the tenant for life survived the devisee in remainder, Mr. Lindsay, her husband, could not be tenant by the curtesy, because the seizin was in the life tenant and not the husband of the devisee in remainder."

That part of the statute referring to some one holding for the use of the wife, has reference to holding by a guardian, committee or some one holding in trust for her. (Phillips v. Ditto, 2 Duvall, 549.)

Section 1, article 4, chapter 47, Revised Statutes, (2nd volume), section 1, article 4, chapter 52, of the General Statutes, and section 2132, of the Kentucky Statutes, all provide under what conditions a husband of a deceased wife may have curtesy in their lands, and upon the question at issue in this case are the same.

Upon the question of the rents claimed by appellee and the sums claimed by appellant for improvements upon the land, clothing, educating the child, &c., cost and attorney fees expended for her, the lower court did not directly pass upon, but it may be inferred from the judgment that it was the intention of the court to set-off the claims, one against the other. Construing the judgment in this way we are of the opinion that the court committed no error, for in our opinion the improvements placed upon the land by appellant, the cost and attorney fees expended by him for her would about equal the use of the land. As to his claim for board, education and clothing of her, he is not entitled to, because the law imposed upon him this duty.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

HATCHER, &c. v. HACKNEY. &c.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Sale Of—Redemption—Payment to Clerk—Under section 2264, Kentucky Statutes, the defendant may pay the redemption money to the clerk, if the purchaser, his agent or attorney, is not in the county. The redemption money having been so paid, the deed that appellant took to himself was properly vacated by the order of the lower court.

Yerk & Johnson for appellants.

Roscoe Vanover for appellees.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Rolland T. Elswick recovered judgment in the Pike Circuit Court against Ephriam Hackney for the sale of a tract of land to satisfy a lien on it for $110; the land was sold and James Hatcher purchased it for the amount of the debt on April 16, 1906; the value of the land was about $1,000. On April 16, 1907, Ephriam Hackney went to redeem the land which had sold for less than two-thirds of its appraised value. Hatcher was not at home so he paid the amount, $172.62, to the circuit clerk and took his receipt, filing with the clerk the necessary affidavit. Afterwards, Hatcher had a deed made to himself for the land, and Hackney brought this suit to have the deed vacated. Hatcher demurred to the petition and his demurrer being overruled, declined to plead further. Thereupon judgment was entered as prayed, cancelling the deed to Hatcher and he appeals.

The affidavit made by Hackney shows prima facie that Hatcher was not in the county and presents a state of case authorizing the payment of the money to the clerk under section 2364, Kentucky Statutes, which among other things, provides as follows:

"The defendant may tender the redemption money to the purchaser, his agent or attorney, if in the county where the land lies, or in the county in which the judgment is obtained or order of sale made: and if the same is refused, or if the purchaser does not reside in either of said counties, the defendant may, before the expiration of the year, go to the clerk of the court in which the judgment is rendered or the order made and make affidavit of such tender and refusal or that the purchaser, his agent or attorney, does not reside in either of the said counties. Thereupon he may pay to such clerk the redemption money for the purchaser, and the clerk shall give a receipt therefor, and file said affidavit among the papers of the cause."

The clerk receipted to Hackney "in full land sale T. L. Elswick v. Eph. Hackney," and it must be presumed that this was the proper amount of the redemption money as it is presumed the officer did his duty. If the fact were otherwise, the defendant should have shown it by plea. In view of the fact that the amount of the debt was $110 we think it may be presumed that as the money was paid to the clerk as the redemption money for the land, and he gave a receipt in full, the sum so paid, $172.62, was sufficient to cover the amount of the purchaser's bid at the sale with interest at ten per cent. The fact that the clerk accepted a check which was afterwards paid is not material. He accepted the check as cash and is responsible on his bond for the money. Under the statute the defendant may pay the redemption money to the clerk if the purchaser, his agent or attorney is not in the county.

Judgment affirmed.

BRASHEARS v. FRAZIER.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Malicious Prosecution—Wrongful Prosecution of Action—Action For Damages—Defective Petition—This is an action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful prosecution of action to sell a parcel of land. The petition does not state a cause of action. It fails to state that the action was maliciously prosecuted; that it was determined in appellant's favor, or against appellee, nor is the averment of probable cause sufficient. Malice should have been averred, as should want of probable cause. The demurrer to the petition was properly sustained.

R. O. Brashears for appellant.

S. B. Dishman for appellee.

Appeal from Letcher Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

By the institution of this action, appellant attempted to recover of appellee, in the Letcher Circuit Court, damages for the alleged wrongful prosecution by appellee of an action against him in the same court to obtain a sale of a parcel of real estate in Whitesburg, claimed by appellant as a homestead.

Appellee filed a demurrer to the petition which was sustained by the lower court, and the action dismissed. Appellant complains of that judgment, hence this appeal.

The petition does not state a cause of action. It fails to allege that the action maintained by appellee, against appellant, was maliciously prosecuted by the former; that it was determined in appellant's favor, or adversely to appellee. The averment of want of probable cause found in the petition is not of itself sufficient to authorize a recovery. In order to constitute a good cause of action, the petition should have alleged malice on the part of appellee in the institution and prosecution of the action against appellant; that it was without probable cause, and that it was disposed of in the circuit court favorably to appellant.

The foregoing principles are so universally recognized and enforced by the courts, that neither argument nor authority is needed to demonstrate their applicability in the case under consideration.

In point of fact the circuit court, in the action complained of, granted the prayer of appellee's petition, by decreeing a sale of the property in question for the payment of a lien debt held against it by appellee, created by virtue of his previous purchase of it at execution sale. That if it was adjudged that neither appellant nor his wife, who was also a party to the action, had a homestead or other right to the lot as against appellee's lien debt, and the judgment thus rendered was affirmed by this court on appeal. (Brashears v. Frazier, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 647.) So at the time of the institution of the present action for damages, there had been a determination of the previous action in favor of appellee and adversely to appellant, which was judicially known to the court, when the demurrer to the petition was sustained, and is also judicially known to this court.

Manifestly, the circuit court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

KALFUS v. DAVIE, &c.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Land--Sale For Reinvestment—Present or Vested Interest Required—Under section 491, Civil Code, providing for the sale of real estate for reinvestment, it was not contemplated that a mere assignee of a part of the rents thereof, to cease at the death of the assignor, should be allowed to maintain an action for its sale and reinvestment, as under the statutes and Code, such sale can only be had upon the petition of one having "a present or vested interest" in the estate to be sold.

W. Pratt Dale for appellant.

Chas. H. Shield and Davis W. Edwards for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

This appeal presents for review a judgment of the court below sustaining a demurrer to the appellant's petition and dismissing her action, which was brought to obtain a decree for the sale of certain valuable real estate in the city of Louisville for the alleged purpose of re-investing its proceeds. The interest asserted by appellant in the property being an alleged life estate in one-half of the net income derived from her former husband's undivided half thereof.

The property in controversy was devised to the present owners by the will of James Kalfus, deceased. The will was construed by this court in the case of Davie v. Davie, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 312. According to which construction, the title to the property vested in the devisees as follows: 1st. An undivided one-half interest in James S. Kalfus for life, with remainder to his issue, if any; if none to Addie K. Davie. 2nd. A one-half interest to Addie K. Davie for life, with remainder to her issue; if none, then to James S. Kalfus.

James S. Kalfus, who is the divorced husband of the appellant, Caroline W. Kalfus, is now 65 years of age, unmarried and childless. Addie K. Davie is about 67 years of age, her children are dead, but she has two grandchildren, Jessie B. Davie, and Ada Belle Davie, who are the children of her deceased son, Southern Davie, both being infants over 13 years of age. James S. Kalfus, Addie K. Davie, her infant grandchildren, and the guardian of the latter, were all made defendants to the action.

Exhibit No. 1, filed with and made a part of her petition, shows the only interest appellant has in the property in question. Its language is as follows:

"This agreement made between James S. Kalfus and C. W. Kalfus, his wife, both of Louisville, Kentucky, Witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, cash in hand paid, and for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which I bear my said wife, I hereby assign, transfer and convey to said C. W. Kalfus, during her natural life, one-half of the net income derived from my interest in the house and lot in Louisville, on Fourth street, between Walnut and Chestnut; said lot being about 64 feet by 200 feet and being the same property owned jointly by J. S. Kalfus and Mrs. A. K. Davie. Said income hereby conveyed is to be the separate estate of the said C. W. Kalfus, and is to be paid over to her in person and her receipt therefor is to be valid to any agent who may have said property in his charge for the purpose of renting the same.

"In testimony whereof witness my hand this 8th day of October, 1885. JAMES S. KALFUS."

It is the appellant's contention that this paper conveys her an estate for life in the real estate described therein, and as the property does not afford her an income sufficient for her support, she is entitled to have it sold and the proceeds re-invested in like manner and upon the same terms. Is this contention well founded? We think not. It will be observed 1st. That James S. Kalfus does not relinquish his right to control the property. 2nd. That he in no respect divests himself of the right of occupancy. 3rd. The assignment to appellant only carries with it one-half of the net proceeds arising from his undivided half of the property. 4th. The instrument does not deprive James S. Kalfus of the right of appointing agents to control the property or his interest therein. 5th. Appellant is not liable for taxes that may be assessed against the real property, nor can it be assessed for taxation in her name as owner. 6th. The paper simply assigns one-half of such net sum as might be collected as rents or profits upon the property as would go to James S. Kalfus after all taxes, insurance and repairs had been paid. 7th. If James S. Kalfus should die, appellant's rights to one-half of his part of the income, arising from the estate upon the happening of that event, ceases. In brief, appellant has neither possession nor control of the real estate, and no obligation is imposed upon her by the instrument in question. The only right it gives her is to receive one-fourth of the net rents from the land, and, as said by the chancellor, to hold that such an interest gives her the right under the Code to sell the entire property (which is divisible) for the purpose of increasing the income assigned to her and against the wishes of the real owners of the land, would be a clear perversion of the meaning and purpose of the Code."

All the appellees resist the sale. A sale of real estate for reinvestment must be had as required by section 491, Civil Code, which provides:

"In an equitable action by the owner of a particular estate of freehold in possession, or by his guardian or committee, if he be an infant or of unsound mind, against the owner of the reversion or remainder, though he be an infant or of unsound mind, and against the owner of the particular estate if he be an infant, or of unsound mind; or, if the remainder be contingent, against the person, if in being, in whom it would have vested if the contingency had happened before commencement of the action, though he be an infant or of unsound mind, and against the owner of the particular estate if he be an infant or of unsound mind—real property may be sold for investment of the proceeds in other real property."

It is patent that to authorize a sale under this section, the action must be brought by the owner of "a particular estate of freehold in possession." Appellant does not own an estate in the property at all. Her interest is restricted to net rents of a part of the property. Instead of owning a particular estate, she owns only an interest in the net profits of a particular estate, of which she has neither possession nor control; the entire possession and control of the property being in the life tenants, Jas. S. Kalfus and Mrs. Davie. It was not contemplated by the framers of the Code that a mere assignee of a part of the rents of real estate, to cease at the death of the assignor, a life tenant of the property, should be allowed upon the basis of such an interest to maintain an action for its sale and reinvestment. We can not agree with counsel for appellant, that she is entitled to a sale of the real estate under the case of Scheirick v. Maxwell, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 173, in which it was held that article 6, chapter 63, General Statutes, is still in force.

The statute in question reads as follows:

"1. Remainder and contingent interest in real estate may be sold upon petition of any person having a present or vested interest, all persons in being having any interest in such estate being made parties to the action. If the court shall be satisfied that the interests of all concerned would be subserved by such sale, it shall adjudge accordingly, which judgment and sale thereunder shall invest the purchaser with all title of the present and future contingent claimants to the said real estate.

"2. The proceedings in the case provided for in the preceding section shall be the same in all respects, as far as necessary, as those provided for in article four, of this chapter; and any defendant refusing to have the sale made may have partition according to his interest, if he so desire, unless in a case such as is provided for in section six, article five. of this chapter.

"3. The proceeds of sale shall be, by the court, reinvested in the same kind of property, to be conveyed and held in the same manner, subject to like limitation, trust and conditions, as the property, which was sold; Provided, however, That the court shall cause all just claims for taxes, or other lawful assessments for public improvements upon the property, to be first paid, and only the balance of the proceeds may be invested in suitable improvements upon the remaining land, under the direction of the court, or it shall be lawful for the court to cause the proceeds to be reinvested as provided in section two, article five, of this chapter."

Under this statute, as well as under the provisions of the Code, supra, the sale can only be had upon the petition of a person having "a present or vested interest." One having a mere interest by assignment in a part of the rents is not the owner of "a present or vested interest." The intent of the statute seems to be the same as that of the Code; neither embraces such an interest as is owned by appellant.

Moreover, it may be said that under section 2, of the statute, supra, Mrs. Davie, who has a vested interest in the property, has a right to object to the sale on the ground alone, that the property being susceptible of division, her interest should be allotted her. It is, however, sufficient to say that appellant can not maintain this action because she does not own a particular estate or a present vested interest in the property.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD CO. v. MARTIN.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads--Frightening Teams on Public Highway—Injury to Driver—Contributory Negligence of Driver—Where the driver of a team which he knew was easily frightened at a railroad train was injured by the running off of his team on the approach of a train, the evidence showing that the driver knew of the approach of the train, by his failure to unhitch his team, before the train came up to him which he could have done, he was guilty of contributory negligence which the court should have submitted to the jury on the question of his right to recover damages against the railroad company for his injuries caused thereby.

2. Same—Care Required of Employes—Duty to Traveler on Highway—Knowledge of Danger—Where those in charge of a railroad train see that a team is frightened on an abutting highway, they should use such care as may be usually expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances for the safety of the traveler on the highway. They are not required to watch the highway, but when they do perceive the danger of the traveler they may not recklessly disregard his safety and sound the whistle unnecessarily when they know that to do so will increase his peril.

3. Same—Negligence of Servant—Imputed to Company—In running a railroad train the servants of the railroad company are its agents and their negligence is the negligence of the company. If the servant's act is within the scope of his authority it is immaterial whether he acts negligently or wantonly.

Blue & Nunn, Trabue, Doolan & Cox and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

A. C. Moore, Jas. A. and John A. Moore and James & James for appellee.

Appeal from Crittenden Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

John Martin was driving over the Blackford and Sullivan road, with a two horse wagon loaded with household goods, near the town of Sullivan, Ky. The road at this point ran along the side of the right of way of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., a wire fence being between the right of way and the road. The road was forty feet from the railroad track. Martin saw that a train was coming. He stopped his team, and dropped the traces and stood by the side of the wagon, holding the lines. He was driving a mule and a horse. The train stopped at the tipple, to take coal as it approached Sullivan. Near where Martin stopped, there was a whistling post for a public crossing. It was a heavy freight train going up grade. As the train pulled up from the tipple it made a good deal of noise and when it got near the whistling post it whistled. It also whistled after passing the whistling post for the station at Sullivan. Martin's team became frightened and ran off about the time that the engine passed them, running back in the direction the train was coming from. The team jerked him down and ran the wagon over him breaking his left arm, spraining his ankle, cutting a place in his head and bruising his legs, arms and shoulders. From the injury to the arm it became stiff. He brought this suit to recover for his injuries on the ground that the servants of the company, in charge of the locomotive, were looking at him and seeing that his team was frightened, and perceiving the danger in which he was placed, continued to blow the whistle until they made the team run off. The evidence of the defendant was to the effect, in substance, that only the usual signals were given: that the team became frightened at the train and not at the whistling of the locomotive. It also showed that the plaintiff had said that the team he was driving consisted of a young mule and a horse, which ran away every chance it got. The jury found for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500, and the defendant appeals from the judgment entered on the verdict.

The defendant pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and at the conclusion of all the evidence asked an instruction submitting the issue to the jury. The court refused the instruction and of this it complains. We think there was some evidence that the plaintiff knew his team was liable to run off. He had stopped and asked the track walker if a train was coming, and as soon as he learned it was coming, he had gotten out of the wagon and unhitched the traces. The train had stopped at the tipple, and he had had plenty of time to take his horses out before the train reached him. It was, therefore, a question for the jury whether he exercised ordinary care under the circumstances; and instruction B, asked by the defendant on the trial, submitting this issue to the jury, should have been given. The court gave no instruction on contributory negligence. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"1. The court instructs the jury, that if they believe from the evidence that the agents and servants of the defendant in charge of its engine, saw the plaintiff and his team and saw that the team had taken fright and then negligently sounded the whistle and thereby caused the team to run away and injure and damage the plaintiff, they will find for the plaintiff.

"2. The court instructs the jury that the defendant in operating its engine has the right to make all noises usual and necessary in the operation of its engine and cars, and to make such signals with the whistle and at such times, as may be necessary, for the proper protection of the lives and property in its charge, and if the jury believe from the evidence that the whistling, which plaintiff complains of, was usual and necessary in the operation of its trains, or such as was necessary for the protection of the lives and property in its charge you should find for defendant, unless you should further believe that, after discovering the plaintiff's team was frightened, those in charge of the engine negligently caused unusual and unnecessary whistling and thereby caused the team to run and injure plaintiff."

"3. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence, that, at the time of the whistling complained of by the plaintiff, the agents and servants of the defendant had not discovered plaintiff's team and its fright, they will find for the defendant.

"4. The court instructs the jury that the law requires the defendant to ring its bell or sound its whistle, on its engine, continually, for not less than 825 feet, just before reaching a public crossing; and if the jury believe from the evidence, that the whistling complained of by the plaintiff, was done in obedience to this law, you will find for the defendant, unless you further believe from the evidence that those in charge of the engine saw the fright of plaintiff's team and after seeing it knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care, would have known, that such whistling would cause the team to take additional or increased fright, yet negligently blew or continued to blow the whistle and thereby caused the team to run and injure the plaintiff."

As there was some evidence that the men on the engine were looking at Martin and saw the danger in which he was placed, the motion of the defendant that the jury be instructed peremptorily to find for it, was properly overruled. When those in charge of a railroad train see that a team is frightened on an abutting highway, they should use such care as may be usually expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances for the safety of the traveler on the highway. They are not required to watch the highway, but when they do perceive the danger in which a traveler has been placed, they may not recklessly disregard his safety and sound the whistle unnecessarily, when they know that to do so will increase his peril. In running the train they are the agents of the defendant, and their negligence in running the train is the negligence of the defendant. All the facts of the men in charge of the locomotive shown here were done in the line of their employment. If the servants act is within the scope of his authority, it is immaterial whether he acts negligently or wantonly. (Licking Rolling Mills v. Fisher, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 89; Williams Adm'r v. Southern R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2214, 115 Ky., 320.)

The case of Louisville and Nashville R. R. Co. v. Smith, 107 Ky., 178, was very similar to this case. It was there held that although the employees of the railroad company were under no obligation to look out for the team on the highway yet, if they, in fact, saw the danger in which the traveler was placed, then they should, if necessary in the exercise of ordinary care, cease blowing the whistle as a signal for the crossing and should resort to the bell as the statute provides either mode of giving warning for the crossing. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. McCandless, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 653, the question was reviewed and the rule before announced was adhered to.

In Instruction 1, on another trial, after the words "negligently sounded the whistle," the court will insert the words "or negligently made noises which were not reasonably necessary in the operation of the train and could have been avoided by ordinary care."

In instruction 2, in place of the word "necessary," the court will use the words "reasonably necessary."

In lieu of instruction 3, on another trial, the court will instruct the jury that the defendant is not liable for any whistling that was done or for any noise that was made before those in charge of the train discovered plaintiff's team and its fright; and that if the plaintiff's team took fright and ran off, not because of the whistling that was done by those in charge of the engine, but because of the train and the noise that was reasonably necessary in its operation, and that those in charge of the train could not, by ordinary care, have averted the running away of the team after they perceived the team and its fright, they should find for the defendant.

In instruction 4, after the words "just before reaching a public crossing," the court will add these words "but if those in charge of the engine saw Martin's team and saw that it was frightened, then it was incumbent on them to use ordinary care for his safety and they should not have used the whistle, but should have used the bell, if in the exercise of such care this was necessary. The remainder of instruction 4 should be omitted.

On another trial the court will permit the defendant to show by its witnesses what whistling the train did and why these whistles were blown. It will also permit it to prove by its witnesses what noises the train made, and, where the witnesses are acquainted with the running of trains and know what noises are reasonably necessary in the operation of trains, they may be permitted to testify whether or not the whistling and noises which are shown were usual and reasonably necessary in the operation of the train. The court, on the trial, erred in refusing such evidence offered by the defendant.

The engineer being dead, the plaintiff can not testify as to anything the engineer did or omitted to do, as under section 606, of the Code no person may testify for himself concerning any act done or omitted to be done by one who is dead, and it has been repeatedly held that where the agent, with whom a transaction occurred, is dead, the other party may not testify for himself as to the transaction. What the status of the case would be if we leave out of view the plaintiff's testimony as to the engineer we need not consider, as there was no objection to the testimony, and if objection had been made, the plaintiff might have offered other evidence on the subject. (Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. O'Neil, 116 Ky., 742; Park Commissioner v. Merritt, 80 S. W., 166.)

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

SANDERS & WALKER v. HERNDON.

(Filed June 3, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Lewis L. Walker and J. W. Alcorn for appellants.

M. C. Saufley, R. H. Tomlinson, J. M. Rothwell, C. B. Swineboard and William Herndon for appellees.

Appeal from Garrard Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing.

Those who were originally the promoters and stockholders in the Lancaster Oil Company, and Sanders & Walker, are all to be treated as partners in the adventure. It was in law a partnership when Sanders & Walker entered it. They simply purchased an interest in a partnership and became partners with the original members. They are all to be treated as partners and as principals. Sanders & Walker can not be treated as the sureties of the original partners.

By section 194, of the Code, the plaintiff may take out an attachment in an action for the recovery of money. This seems to be broad enough to cover an action by one partner against another for the amount due him on a settlement. While there is some conflict of authority on the question, we agree with the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Humphries v. Matthews, 11 Ill., 171:

"The law was designed to furnish a creditor with means of collecting his debt, in any case where he would be unable to do so in the ordinary mode of proceeding, and we can see no reason why it should not be applicable to actions of account as to any other class of cases. The claim of a joint tenant, tenant in common or co-parcener, is just as sacred as that of any other creditor; and because he cannot resort to the more usual common law actions to enforce his rights, affords no reason why he should be deprived of the benefit of the attachment act when he presents a case that would authorize an attachment were he permitted to sue in debt or assumpsit."

In Garrott v. Jaffray & Co., 10 Bush, 413, it was held that an attachment may be taken out in an action to recover money due upon an implied contract.

In every partnership there is an implied obligation on each partner to repay to each of his partners what may be justly owing by him on account of advances to the firm or money paid out for the firm. And where the plaintiff can state in an affidavit that he sought to recover at least a certain sum, we see no reason why he should not be allowed to secure his debt by an attachment, which would not apply in every other case of mutual accounts.

The opinion is extended as above indicated.

The petition for re-hearing is overruled.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion on the former appeal may be found in 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1044.

In December, 1901, the appellant, by deed of general warranty, conveyed to appellee 11 acres of land; the consideration therefor was $70 in cash and a conveyance by appellee to appellant of a house and lot valued at $230. After obtaining the conveyance to the 11 acres of land, appellee sold some trees that were standing on the property. When the purchasers attempted to cut the timber the agent of the Mt. Morgan Coal Company refused to let the timber be cut and carried away, claiming that the land belonged to the coal company. Appellee then instituted an action in ejectment against the coal company, and the coal company succeeded in recovering the land. Thereafter appellee instituted this action against appellant to recover the purchase price of the land, together with his attorney's fees and costs incurred in the suit against the Mt. Morgan Coal Company.

It is the contention of appellant that appellee was not lawfully evicted; that he voluntarily surrendered possession of the land to the coal company, and that he can not, therefore, maintain this action to recover the purchase price on a breach of the covenant of warranty in the deed which appellant executed to appellee. The evidence shows that, after appellee was notified by the Mt. Morgan Coal Company that the latter claimed to own the property, he demanded that appellant make him a good title to the land. This appellant failed to do. After waiting some time on appellant, appellee filed suit in ejectment against the coal company, and notified appellant of the suit. Appellant, instead of furnishing appellee title to the land, or assisting him in the prosecution of the ejectment suit, urged appellee to dismiss the suit. In the former opinion of this court, it was held that appellee was not bound to await the pleasure of appellant in the matter; that he was entitled to a speedy settlement, and either a return of the land or the recovery of his money from appellant. The court also held that the judgment in behalf of the coal company was a sufficient eviction to authorize this action. Manifestly any other ruling would work a great hardship on the vendee of property. If he purchased the property under a general warranty deed he is entitled not only to the possession of the property, but to a good legal title. He should not be required to wait until some person with a superior title evicts him, and run the risk of the vendor's becoming insolvent or moving out of the State. When, upon demand, his vendor refuses to perfect the title to the property, or to return the purchase money, he may maintain an action against the third party claiming to own the land, and, upon his eviction, may sue for the recovery of the purchase price and his attorney's fees and costs.

On the trial of this case appellant could have defended either on the ground that the judgment of eviction was obtained by collusion and fraud, or that he had furnished to appellee a good title to the property. There is nothing in the record to show any collusion or fraud. Appellee waited a long time for appellant to perfect the title to the property. This action was instituted in the year 1903. The first trial took place in 1905; the last trial in 1907. Appellant has never yet furnished, or offered to appellee, a good title to the property in question. The evidence fails to disclose any real defense to this action on the part of appellant. We, therefore, conclude that the judgment in favor of appellee was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

FEDERAL CHEMICAL CO. v. GREEN & SONS.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Instructions—Contracts—(30 Ky. Law Rep., 223.) It appears that the lower court tried this case upon the theory that appellees could not be required to sustain the loss unless it was shown that the fire was occasioned by their negligence. This was error in view of the contract which made appellees insurers of the property although this was unusual, but it is not shown that any fraud or deception was practiced by appellant in obtaining the contract.

Milton Clark and James R. Duffin for appellant.

M. M. Logan and Ora E. Hazelip for appellees.

Appeal from Edmonson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion on the first appeal can be found in 30 Ky. Law Rep., 223. That action and this were instituted upon the same contracts, one of which was copied in the former opinion. On the return of the case appellant obtained from the clerk the original contracts, which were filed among the papers of the first suit, and instituted this action upon them. Appellees contend that it had no right to do this. It was irregular; they should have obtained copies from the clerk, or by motion in court, obtained the permission to withdraw the originals from the first suit by leaving copies therein. But this irregularity upon the part of appellant can not avail appellees, it is no defense to this action. Appellee also pleaded the former judgment in bar of this action. This can not be sustained. There was no judgment upon the merits in the first case, the question involved being whether or not the lower court properly sustained a demurrer to the petition. The material differences between the allegations of the petition in the first action and in this action are these: It is alleged in the petition in the present action, which was not in the former petition, that, by the written contract, appellee agreed to furnish free storage for the fertilizers unsold, until sold by them or removed by appellant, and agreed to be responsible for its loss for any cause. It was also alleged in the petition in this case, which was not in the other, that the building, in which appellee had the fertilizers stored, and the fertilizers, while in appellees' possession, were destroyed by fire. Appellees, in their answer to this part of the petition, in substance, denied that the fertilizers delivered to them under the contract referred to, had been destroyed or wasted to the amount of $209.65, or any other sum, or that, under the terms of the contract, appellees were bound to appellant for the value of such fertilizers as were wasted or destroyed. This did not make an issue with appellant. By the very terms of the printed contract appellees agreed to furnish free storage for the goods and assume the responsibility for their loss for any cause. It was admitted and proven by one of the appellees that, while the goods were stored in their building, under the contract, they were destroyed by fire.

It appears from the brief of counsel that the lower court tried the case upon the theory that appellees could not be required to sustain this loss, unless it was shown that the destruction of the goods by fire was caused by want of care and diligence upon the part of appellees in protecting them from destruction. In other words, that the fire must have been caused by the negligence of appellees. This was error. The contract stated that they should be responsible for the loss of the goods for any cause. There is no exception, or reservation in it. The contract made appellees insurers of the property, and is an unusual one. Appellees did not interpose any plea of mistake, fraud or deception upon the part of appellant in obtaining these contracts. By their answer, they merely denied their responsibility under the contract, and did not plead anything showing that they were not responsible under the positive terms of their contracts.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

ACTIONS—	Page.
1. Obtaining Goods by Fraud—Action for Recovery of Specific Property—Waiver of Contract—Where goods have been obtained by a party without any intention of paying for them, and with a design to cheat the vendor, the vendor, upon discovering the fraud, may elect to treat the contract of sale as a nullity and bring his action for the recovery of the specific property or for its value. Am.-German Nat. Bank v. Gray & Dudley Hardware Co.	547
2. Same—Innocent Purchase—Defense—In an action against one for goods alleged to have been obtained by fraud, the defendant, having disposed of the goods for value, can only defend on the ground that he was an innocent purchaser for value without notice of any fraud in the party from whom he obtained them. Idem	547
3. Same—Person Converting Goods—Liability to Owner—An owner of property may maintain an action for its value against a person converting it whether he be the original trespasser or not. Idem	547
4. From an Action—Pleading—Claim and Delivery—Description of Goods—Forms of Action are Abolished by the Code—All that is now required in a pleading is to state the facts constituting a cause of action without reference to the form of the petition. A action for claim and delivery of property requires a particular description of the property and a statement of the separate value of each article claimed. Idem	547
5. Action of Widow for the Killing of Her Husband—Can not Control so as to Defeat Recovery by Children—A widow may dismiss an action for the killing of her husband, as provided by section 4, Kentucky Statutes, in so far as she is concerned, but she can not do so as to defeat the action of her children; nor will it bar an action instituted by them within the proper time. Martin, By, &c. v. Smith, &c.	582
6. Same—Design of Statute—The statute was designed to benefit the children as well as the widow. Idem	582
7. Attorneys—Claim of—The petition of the attorneys of Mrs. Martin presented a good cause of action and the court should have permitted it to be filed. (29 Ky. Law Rep., 809.) Idem	582
8. Office and Officer—Action Against for Killing Person—Who May Maintain—As the right of action, under section 4, Kentucky Statutes, is made to vest in the widow or minor child, or in both, the appellant in this case, being one of the real parties in interest, it was not necessary to join either the town of Jellico or the Commonwealth, as plaintiff, and in this action against the marshal for the killing of deceased, the trial court erred in sustaining a special demurrer to the petition. Bolton v. Ayers, &c ...	591

9. This appeal from an order of the judge of the lower court, overruling Denham's motion to qualify as Commonwealth's attorney, must be dismissed because neither the judge of the court below nor the acting Commonwealth's attorney is before the court, and no reason is shown for holding that the ruling of the court below was incorrect. Denham Ex Parte 592
10. Slander—Variance—In this case there is simply a charge that appellant uttered the slanderous words and a denial in the answer. The jury were properly instructed. The variance complained of is not material, the language being proved in substance as alleged in the petition. Zentzhell v. Richie 557

AMENDING PRAYER OF PETITION—See Railroads, 6.APPEALS—

1. Former Appeal—Instructions—Argument of Counsel—(30 Ky. Law Rep., 667)—The instructions upon the trial of this case were as directed by this court, except in a particular which did not prejudice appellant's substantial rights. The statement of counsel in argument, did not go beyond the pale of legitimate argument. The jury are the triers of fact and counsel must be allowed some latitude in illustrating the matter before them. Key v. Usher 575
2. Continuances—Affidavit For—Instruction of Court—Failure to Except—It was the duty of appellant to ask the court to instruct the jury that the statements in the affidavit for a continuance, as to what the witnesses would testify, were to be taken as true, and if the court failed to instruct them, then it was the duty of appellant to except to the ruling. His failure to so except was a waiver of the error, and he can not now be heard to complain of it. Stamper v. Commonwealth 580
3. Instruction Omitted from Record—Presumption—It was appellant's duty to bring up the whole record, and in the absence of the instruction mentioned, it will be presumed that it was given. Idem 580
4. Parties to Appeals—Persons who are not named in the statement are not parties to an appeal and no relief can be given against them. (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1738; 23 Ky. Law Rep., 831, and 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1566.) Carlton v. Smith 647
5. Pleading—A paragraph in an answer was not sufficient to prevent a recovery on a note, its payment being averred, when no proof was made showing its payment. Idem... 647
6. Land—Sale of Enough to Pay Debt—The judgment was erroneous in not limiting the amount of land to be sold to only enough to pay the debt sued on. Idem 647

1. Action For—Insolvency—In this action by the wholesale merchants for the delivery of the goods they sold the assigned merchant, under the proof of his insolvency at the time of the purchase and of his representations as to his solvency it was error for the court to direct the jury to find against appellants. Lowry & Goebel v. Hitch's Ass'ee, &c 573
2. Title of Goods—If the assigned merchant knew he was insolvent and fraudulently purchased the goods without intending to pay for them, the title remained in appellants and did not pass under the deed of assignment. Idem... 573

CONTRACTS—

1. Action to Enforce—Striking Case from Docket—Agreed Order—Leave to Reinstate Without Notice—Effect of Order—In an action to enforce a contract for the development of certain minerals on a tract of land "of any kind except oil, gas and salt," to which an answer was filed controverting the allegations of the petition, an agreed order was entered that "the plaintiff hereby agreed to have the case dismissed at the March term, of 1906, of said court, with leave to re-instate same at any time without notice to defendant and the defendant to pay all cost;" such agreement was not a final order that terminated the case, and the plaintiff had a right, at the following September term of the court, to have the case redocketed without notice. McGoodwin v. Lusterine M. H. Co. 521
2. Leasing Mineral Rights—Transfer of Contract—Rights Acquired—Where a contract was made by W. with McG. leasing him the right to all minerals on his land "of any kind except oil, gas and salt, which McG. transferred to B. and B. transferred it to the L. M. & P. Co., the company took the place of B., and assumed the obligations that B. entered into which McG., and McG. had the right to proceed directly against the L. M. & P. Co., for a breach of the contract. Idem 522
3. Land—Oral Contract to Convey—Validity of Contract—An oral contract made by a father with his daughter to convey land to her is within the statute of frauds and not enforceable. Myers v. Brown, &c. 525
4. Sale of Land to Daughter—Deed Made but Not Delivered—Effect—Where a deed made by a father to his daughter was never delivered to the daughter, but remained in his possession until his death, no estate passed by virtue of such deed. Idem 525
5. Services of Daughter—Nursing Father and Grandchildren—Allowances—Lien of Land not Conveyed—Where a married daughter went to her father's home and performed valuable services in nursing and caring for his two grandchildren, who had tuberculosis, she was entitled to compensation for such services, and an allowance by the lower court of $1,250 was proper, and to secure this sum she has a lien on the 205 acres of land which her father put her in possession of under an oral promise to make her a deed. Idem 526
6. Instructions—Contracts—(30 Ky. Law Rep., 223.) It appears that the lower court tried this case upon the theory that appellees could not be required to sustain the loss unless it was shown that the fire was occasioned by their negligence. This was error in view of the contract which made appellees insurers of the property although this was unusual, but it is not shown that any fraud or deception was practiced by appellant in obtaining the contract. Federal Chemical Co. v. Green & Sons 571

CRIMINAL LAW—

2. Former Conviction—Action of Commonwealth's Attorney in Matter of Former Conviction—Evidence of—Evidence of former conviction is limited to the verdict and judgment of conviction and the sentence, and proof showing defendant to be the same person that was formerly convicted. The Commonwealth has no right to show the facts with reference to previous convictions. Idem....	541
3. False Pretenses—Money Obtainly Thereby—Forging Name of Surety on Note—Errors in Instructions Corrected—This is a prosecution against Walter R. Day for obtaining money under false pretenses, by signing the name of Floyd Day to a note, without authority, which he discounted in bank, and is reversed on erroneous instructions given to the jury, the correct instructions being set out in the opinion. Day v. Commonwealth	560
4. Homicide—Trial—Motion by Defendant for Continuance—Absent Witnesses—Corroborating Evidence—On the trial of one for murder, in which the jury found the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fixed his punishment at 21 years in the penitentiary, where the case had been continued for the defendant at a former term of the court, it was not error in the court to refuse a second continuance where the defendant had ten witnesses present who swore to facts tending to show that the shooting was accidental, and the court permitted the affidavit of nine absent witnesses to be read as their depositions whose testimony was substantially the same as the ten who were present. Brock v. Commonwealth..	630
5. Same—Evidence of Commonwealth—Duty to Apprise Defendant Thereof—Allegations of Indictment—On the trial of one indicted for murder the Commonwealth does not owe the defendant the duty to apprise him of what it expects to prove further than the information set out in the charge in the indictment. Idem.....	630
6. Conflicting Evidence—Absence of Errors—Refusal of New Trial—On the trial of one for murder where the evidence is conflicting, that is if the defendant and his witnesses are to be believed, the killing was an accident, and the defendant should have been acquitted, but if the Commonwealth's witnesses are to be believed it was a deliberate and unprovoked murder, and, in the absence of any irregularity or error in the trial, the verdict of a properly instructed jury should not be disturbed. Idem	630
7. Joint Indictment—Separate Trial—Election by Commonwealth—Mistrial—Second Trial—Second Election by Commonwealth—Where several persons are jointly indicted and a separate trial as to one or more of them is demanded, the Commonwealth has the right to elect which one he will try, and if there is a mistrial as to the one selected, or if there is a conviction and a new trial is granted, the Commonwealth may, when the prosecution is again called for trial, elect to try the one previously convicted or either of the other defendants. 8. Trial—Absent Witnesses—Failure of defendants to Object—Subsequent Objection—Where a defendant, indicted for a felony, announces ready and goes into trial without making any suggestion to the court as to the absence of any witness, he assumes the risk of their attendance, and it is too late after the trial has begun to ask a continuance to procure the attendance of his witnesses. Idem 635
9. Joint Indictment—Proof of Confederation—Evidence Admissible—Where, on a trial of one defendant, jointly with others, charged with confederating and banding together to alarm, disturb and injure Martha S., proof of the fact that all of the defendants appeared together at her house in the middle of the night and all of them assisted in the outrage there committed, was, in and of itself, sufficient evidence of a confederation and conspiracy, and this fact being established, it was competent to prove the unfriendly relations or enmity that existed between any of the conspirators and the persons they assaulted. Idem 635

DEEDS—see Contracts, 4—

1. Use of Words "Heirs of His Body"—"Bodily Heirs"—Title Conveyed—In view of the uncertainty in arriving at the intention of the maker of a deed or will in the use of the words, "heirs of his body," "bodily heirs," or the like, when the mind is left in doubt as to the true meaning, it is safer to conclude that the conveyance was designed to pass the fee and not a life estate or a joint interest. Lawson, &c. v. Todd, &c. 557
2. Same—Deed by Father to Married Daughter—Conveyance to Her and Her Bodily Heirs—Fee Vested in Daughter—A deed to land was made by a father to his married daughter, Mary L., "and her bodily heirs after her" in consideration of one dollar and natural love and affection, in which he covenants to and with the parties of the second part to forever warrant and defend the same against all claims of all persons whatever, Held—That the only grantee named in the deed is Mary L.; there is no remainder over nor are the words "children" or "child" used, and under the rules of the common law the words "and her bodily heirs after her," would have created an estate tail which, by our statute, is converted into the fee. Idem 558

DIVORCE AND ALIMONY—

1. Pleadings—Amendments—Divorce Cases—In the matter of amendments to pleadings there is no difference between divorce causes and other actions. In this case, however, the amendment came too late—long after the parties had pleaded to an issue, and the court properly refused it to be filed. Robards v. Robards. 565
2. Adulterous Acts—May Be Shown After Date of Acts Alleged in Petition—It was error for the chancellor to sustain exceptions to depositions which tended to establish adulterous acts on the part of appellant after the dates of the acts alleged in the original petition. Idem 565
3. Witnesses—Credibility of—Where evidence is introduced that a witness is a creditable person, the statutory requirements are complied with regarding the certification of depositions by the officer taking them. Idem. . 566

4. Alimony—Wife not Entitled to When Lewd Conduct Established—It has been repeatedly held by this court that where the husband is granted a divorce because of the lewd conduct of the wife, she is not entitled to alimony. Idem	565
ELECTIONS—
1. Contested Elections—Irregularities — Extent — Effect — While it is the general rule that irregularities, in an election the result of which can be shown with reasonable certainty not to have been prejudicial, may be disregarded, yet where such irregularities are so widespread or general as to leave the judicial mind in doubt as to how the election did go, or would have gone but for them, then they can not be eliminated. Harrison v. Strond.	653
2. Same—Voters—Disregard, of Secret Ballot—Materially Affecting Result—Election Void—Our system of government contemplates the filling of elective offices by elections held by authority of law, at which the qualified voters may fairly and by secret ballot express their choice, and when the officers of an election permit such numbers of voters to violate the secrecy of the ballot as to materially affect the result of the election, it is not a lawful election and will be held void on that account. Idem	653
3. Same—Certificate of Election—Injunction Against—Jurisdiction of Courts—It is error to grant a restraining order or a temporary or permanent injunction, in an election contest, to prevent the one holding the certificate of election from qualifying pending the contest. The certificate gives to him to whom it is issued a prima facie right to the office. Courts of equity have not the inherent jurisdiction to try contests over elections to office. In the absence of statutory authority they have no jurisdiction in the matter. Idem.	653
4. Circuit Courts—Statutory Authority Conferred—Judgment on the Merits—The statute of this State has conferred upon the circuit court the jurisdiction to try certain election contests, but it is not given power to disturb the legal status of the claimants as fixed by law pending the decision, and the incumbency of the office should be left where the law has placed it, until such time as a final determination, by judgment on the merits, the court may say whether the contestant is entitled to the possession of the office. The persons who made the entries and marked the boundaries claimed by appellees are long since dead. Considering their acts, their long-continued claim and possession without being disturbed, the presumption is that their acts were lawful and intentions proper. Idem... 603
8. Divisibility of—Code Provisions—The Code does not require that the indivisibility of property shall be required by proof other than that furnished by the pleadings and exhibits, nor must it be established as a condition pre-requisite that the sale would be in the interest of the infant. The best interests of the infant must be looked to, and in some cases a sale can not be avoided. Foley v. Graham's Guardian, &c...... 627
9. Duty of Administrator—Sale in Entirety—If in the judgment of the administrator it would impair the property to divide it, his duty to the estate would require that he ask the court for a sale of the entire tract. Idem... 627

15. Sale for Reinvestment—Present or Vested Interest Required—Under section 491, Civil Code, providing for the sale of real estate for reinvestment, it was not contemplated that a mere assignee of a part of the rents thereof, to cease at the death of the assignor, should be allowed to maintain an action for its sale and reinvestment, as under the Statutes and Code, such sale can only be had upon the petition of one having "a present or vested interest" in the estate to be sold. *Kal-fus v. 17. Same—Action Against Third Party—Recovery—Attorney's Fees and Costs—Where, upon demand, the vendor refuses to perfect the title to the property sold, or to return the purchase money, the vendee may maintain an action against a third party claiming to own the land, and, upon his eviction, may sue for the recovery of the purchase price and his attorney's fees and costs in the suit against the third party. Idem..... 670

In May, 1906, executions were levied on the land by judgment creditors of L. for $300, subject to the aforesaid debts. In August, 1906, L. borrowed from G. $4,064.80, for which he gave his note with his brother as surety, and gave mortgage on the land as additional security, and with this money paid off the debts to Mrs. B. and the bank, leaving the execution debts outstanding. LIFE INSURANCE—

Benefit Society—Policy by Father for Son—Change in Beneficiary—Withdrawal of Father from Society—Death—Rights of Son—A. D. took out a $2,000 certificate in a benefit society payable to his son, H. D., which he subsequently transferred to his said son, upon his payment of the annual dues thereon, which he paid as long as the company would accept same. Later, the father changed the beneficiary, and then withdrew from the society and died. In an action by the son against the company to recover the insurance, Held—That under the laws of the company, the beneficiary named in the certificate had no vested right therein until the death of the member; that the member had the right to change the beneficiary without the consent of the named beneficiary, and the father having withdrawn from the society, the certificate was thereby forfeited. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. of Ky. v. Denzer..... 643

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—

Wrongful Prosecution of Action—Action For Damages—Defective Petition—This is an action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful prosecution of action to sell a parcel of land. The petition does not state a cause of action. It fails to state that the action was maliciously prosecuted; that it was determined in appellant's favor, or against appellee, nor is the averment of probable cause sufficient. Malice should have been averred, as should want of probable cause. The demurrer to the petition was properly sustained. Brashears v. Frazier, 662

MASTER AND SERVANT—See Mines and Mining. Page.
MINERAL RIGHTS—See Contracts, 2.

MINES AND MINING—

Falling of Roof of Mine—Injury to Servant—Action for Damages—In an action by a coal miner against the company for an injury by the falling of coal on him from the roof of the mine, which had not been sufficiently propped, there was evidence by the foreman that he told plaintiff and another hand that they must "timber" the roof. The court should have instructed the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff and fellow-servant to prop the roof, and they failed to do so, and but for this the injury would not have occurred, or if the foreman, when plaintiff called his attention to the roof told him he must "timber" it and he failed to do so, and but for this the injury would not have occurred, then, in either of these events, the jury should find for the defendant. Indian Head Coal Co. v. Miller..... 650

MUNICIPALITIES—

1. Members of City Council—Contracts with City—Validity—Injunction by Taxpayer—Under Kentucky Statutes, sec. 2768, part of the charter of cities of the first class, providing that "councilmen shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any contract with the city," &c., any citizen and taxpayer of such city may maintain an action to enjoin the payment of any claim sought to be enforced against the city for supplies furnished the city under a contract with one of whom is a member of the city council. Bradley & Gilbert Co. v. Jacques. 618
2. Defective Sidewalk—Notice to City—Appellee, in his action for damages for injuries occasioned by a defective sidewalk, stated his case in the alternative, setting up that he was injured either by stepping into a hole which appellant could have discovered by ordinary care, or by stepping through the crust of ordinary cinders which appellant had not properly supported. Held—It was not necessary to prove notice of the defects in the construction of the walk in order to hold the city liable under that theory of the case. City of Covington v. Webster.. 649
3. Instructions—Appellee was entitled to have these two theories submitted to the jury for it matters not which condition caused the injury, the city being negligent in either event. Idem 649

NEW TRIALS—

Motion For—Provision of Civil Code—The judgment complained of was rendered at the May term, and the motion to set it aside and grant a new trial was made the following September term. Under section 340, Civil Code, the motion came too late. However, it appears from the affidavits that a case was made out under section 518, of the Civil Code; but the lower court was authorized to grant the relief sought under section 340, of the Code. Wobble, &c. v. Finch, &c...... 588

2. Expense of Training Mare—Absence of Contract or Agreement—In the absence of any contract or agreement as to the payment of the training of the mare, one-half of it should be paid for by each of the two partners, the ownership of the mare being joint. Idem	553

RAILROADS—
1. Injury to Traveler at a Crossing—Action for Damages—Conflicting Evidence—Slight Evidence for Plaintiff—Refusal of Peremptory Instruction—In an action for damages by one injured at a railroad crossing by a collision with a train, in crossing the track in a buggy, where there is any evidence, however slight, that the usual signals of the approach of the train were not given as compared with the positive evidence of the railroad's witnesses that they were given, it was not error in the trial court to refuse to give a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant Company. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Joshlin	513
2. Same—Proof of Admissions by Plaintiff—Denial—Question for Jury—In an action for damages by a woman for injuries received by being struck by a train in crossing a railroad track in a buggy, evidence was admitted that she said to the physician who treated her injuries, soon after the collision, that "she heard the train whistle and undertook to cross, and it ran into her, and that she was to blame," which she denied, the question of whether she made the admission or was in such a state of mind as to know what she was at the time saying, was for the jury. Idem	513
3. Instructions on False Issue—Prejudicial Error—An instruction on a false issue in a case, and upon which no evidence was introduced, is misleading and prejudicial. Idem	513
4. Injury to Abutting Property—Smoke—Soot and Cinders—Liability for Damages—Where a railroad throws smoke, soot and cinders upon the property of another, it is a trespass upon the property for which, under section 242, of the Constitution, it must make just compensation for the injury, and it can not make any difference whether the railroad is upon a street in front of the property or elsewhere. I. C. Ry. Co. v. Elliott	537
5. Same—Unusual Currents of Wind—A railroad company is responsible for such consequences as may ordinarily be anticipated, but it is not responsible for smoke, soot or cinders carried to adjoining property by unusual currents of wind. Idem	537
6. Same—Damage for Noise—In an action by the owner of a dwelling abutting on a railroad for damages against a railroad company by reason of noise, smoke, cinders and dust, all the evidence as to the noise made should have been excluded, as the running of a railroad train is a lawful business and no amount of care can prevent the making of noise. Idem	537

7. Same—Obstructing Street and Alley—Measure of Damages—Removing Obstruction—In an action by the owner of a dwelling abutting a railroad for damages in obstructing a street and alley adjacent to the property, the measure of damages is the diminution of the value of the property by reason thereof, but where the obstruction is removed by putting in a proper crossing, the measure of damages is for the time the obstruction was continued. Idem 537
8. Changing Line of Railroad—Damages Caused Thereby—Where the line of a railroad track has been changed so as to bring it nearer to property than it was before the change, the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the property with the cinders, soot and smoke and obstruction of a street and alley, thereby, as they are, and what it would be without the increased cinders, soot or smoke or the obstruction of the street and alley, and unless such damage has thereby been increased there can be no recovery. Idem 537
9. Negligently Killing Engineer—Action in this State—Killing in Tennessee—Jurisdiction of Action—A railroad engineer, who was a resident of this State, was killed while running his train in the State of Tennessee, by the negligence of the defendant railroad company. His administratrix brought suit for damages in this State. There was no averment in the pleadings and no proof as to what the law of Tennessee is. At the conclusion of the evidence the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for defendant. Held—That this was proper. Murray's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co. 545
10. Same—Law of Sister State—Absence of Allegation or Proof—Presumption—Until the contrary is alleged and proved, the courts of this State will presume that the common law is yet in force in a sister State. At common law a cause of action for injury to a person dies with the person, and no action can be maintained for his death. Idem 545
11. Same—Judicial Presumption—While it is presumed that the common law prevails in a sister State, it is not presumed that the statutes of a sister State are the same as those of this State. Judicial presumption rests on the truth as shown by the usual course of things, but they are not indulged as to matters which can not possibly be true. Idem 545
12. Killing of Trespasser—Lookout Duty—This case is, in its essential facts, identical with N., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Bean's Executor, ante, which is conclusive of this. The judgment is, therefore, affirmed. Cummins' Adm'r v. I. C. R. R. Co. 584
13. Trial—Statement of Case to Jury—Discretion of Counsel—Review on Appeal—In making a statement of the case to a jury, the matter is to be determined by counsel, and while the court in its discretion, might direct counsel to make a statement, or a fuller statement, when the court deemed it necessary, the court's discretion in a matter of this sort will not be reviewed on appeal. Cln., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Evans' Adm'r 596
14. Negligently Causing Death of Brakeman—Statement of Conductor—Part of Res Gestae—Competency—A brakeman who was on a freight car, in discharge of his duty, was thrown therefrom by a sudden jerk of the train by the

- engineer, and run over by the car and killed. In an action by his administrator for damages, a witness stated that in a minute after the accident he went to the engineer and told him he had killed his brakeman, when he replied: "That is the way, whenever I get mad, I either hurt or kill somebody." Held—That the statement of the engineer to the witness was competent evidence as part of the res gestae. Idem 596
15. Same—Non-resident Railroad—Resident Conductor—Trial—Evidence Heard—Dismissal as to Conductor—Motion for Removal—Delay in Motion—In an action for damages against a non-resident railroad company and its resident conductor, by the administrator of a deceased brakeman for causing the death of the decedent, where, on the conclusion of the evidence, the court, on motion of the defendants, dismissed the action against the conductor, it was too late then for the railroad company to ask that the case be moved to the Federal court. A non-resident defendant can not answer without objection, and go through a large part of the trial and then, for the first time, make a motion for such transfer. Idem 596
16. Same—Defective Petition—Amending Prayer—Discretion of Court—In an action against a railroad company for damage for the alleged killing of a brakeman, where the petition contained no prayer for relief, it was in the discretion of the trial court, after the evidence was heard, on the motion of the defendant for a peremptory instruction, to allow the plaintiff to file an amended petition praying judgment for the sum sued for and all proper relief. Idem 596
17. Same—Instructions to Jury—Submitting Law and Facts—On the trial of an action against a railroad company by the administrator of a deceased brakeman, for causing decedent's death, it was error in the trial court to instruct the jury that "if the death of the deceased was caused by the gross negligence of the engineer they should find for the plaintiff, provided deceased was at the time in the performance of his duty as brakeman and exercising ordinary care for his own safety," as such instruction fails to inform the jury what the law of the case was as to gross negligence, and thereby the court submits both the law and facts to the jury. Idem 596
18. Carriers—Injury to Live Stock—Absence of Infirmity in Stock—Common Law Liability—Applicability—The common law liability of a common carrier for injury to freight applies in this State to live stock the same as to inanimate freight. Where horses were burned by a conflagration in the city of Louisville, while in charge of the carrier, the loss being one not growing out of the infirmity of the animals themselves, the carrier is liable to the owner for their value. Stiles, &c. v. L. & N. R. R. Co. 625
19. Negligence in the Operation of Trains—Evidence—Injury to Passenger—Extent of—The Evidence shows that the trains that collided, in which collision appellee was injured, were recklessly run by those in charge of them, showing such lack of regard for the safety of the passengers as to amount to gross negligence. In view of the extent and character of the injuries as disclosed by the evidence, and their permanent character, the verdict herein complained of can not be said to be excessive. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Marshall 639

20. Instructions—Measure of Damages—In defining the measure of damages the court, in telling the jury that they might find for her "for the loss of time, if any, which she has sustained, and for the loss of time in the future which the jury may believe from the evidence it is reasonably certain she will suffer, if any, and for the loss or impairment of her ability to earn money, if any," the court meant that they were authorized to compensate her for loss of time, when she was unable to work, but when she became able to work, and her power to earn money was impaired, she should be compensated for the difference in her earning power in her impaired condition and what it was before the injury. Idem 639
21. Railroads—Frightening Teams on Public Highway—Injury to Driver—Contributory Negligence of Driver—Where the driver of a team which he knew was easily frightened at a railroad train was injured by the running off of his team on the approach of a train, the evidence showing that the driver knew of the approach of the train, by his failure to unhitch his team, before the train came up to him which he could have done, he was guilty of contributory negligence which the court should have submitted to the jury on the question of his right to recover damages against the railroad company for his injuries caused thereby. I. C. Ry. Co. v. Martin 666
22. Same—Care Required of Employes—Duty to Traveler on Highway—Knowledge of Danger—Where those in charge of a railroad train see that a team is frightened on an abutting highway, they should use such care as may be usually expected of an ordinary prudent person under the circumstances for the safety of the traveler on the highway. They are not required to watch the highway, but when they do perceive the danger of the traveler they may not recklessly disregard his safety and sound the whistle unnecessarily when they know that to do so will increase his peril. Idem 666
23. Same—Negligence of Servant—Imputed to Company—In running a railroad train the servants of the railroad company are its agents and their negligence is the negligence of the company. If the servant's act is within the scope of his authority it is immaterial whether he acts negligently or wantonly. Idem 666

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—See Railroads, 15.REVENUE AND TAXATION—

- Act of 1906—Delinquent Taxes—Liability of Taxpayer—For Subsequent Years—Construction of Act—There can be no objection to article 3, of chapter 22, of the acts of the Kentucky Legislature of 1906, relating to revenue and taxation, on the ground that it is an ex post facto law, in so far as said article applies to the years subsequent to 1905. The delinquent's liabilities for those years are to be measured by his liabilities if he has volunteered to list and pay his taxes, and it follows that the article, in so far as it requires the payment of interest and penalties for the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905 and 1906, is inoperative, and the delinquent for those years would be required to pay only taxes without interest or penalties, but the elimination of the interest and penalties for those years does not affect the other provisions of the articles with respect to those years or years subsequent thereto. Ky. Union Co. v. Commonwealth 587

ROADS AND PASSWAYS—

1. Use of as Matter of Right—Appellant has claimed the use of the passway, as a matter of right, for more than twenty years; moreover, appellant and the remote vendor of appellees, in 1885, entered into an agreement by which each gave the other a passway over the land, a good and valuable consideration moving from one to the other. Johnson v. Allen, &c 621
2. Same—The fact that a country road has been opened which gives appellant another outlet, can not militate against the outlet already acquired. (104 Ky., 144.) Idem..... 621

1. Street Cars—Injury to Passengers in Alighting Therefrom—Action for Damages—Error in Instructions—In an action by a passenger injured in alighting from a street car, it was error in the trial court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff attempted to alight from the car before it was brought to a standstill and while it was in motion, and in so attempting to alight was thrown upon the ground. Sandlin v. Lex. Ry. Co...... 518
2. Same—Per Se Negligence—Intention to Alight—Notice to Conductor—Sudden Increase of Speed—Actional Negligence—It is not per se negligence for a passenger in a street car to make preparations to alight therefrom before it comes to a standstill or to get off before it actually stops. When a car has slackened its speed to enable a passenger to alight therefrom, upon notice by him of his purpose to those in charge thereof, and it is then running at a rate of speed that a reasonably prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, might attempt to alight, it is negligence to suddenly and violently increase the speed of the car until the passenger has had reasonable opportunity to alight. Idem 518
3. Denying Passenger a Transfer Ticket—Compelled to Walk Home—Damages Recoverable—Where a little girl eleven years old, in traveling from Ludlow to Newport, a distance of several miles, had to change cars, and was entitled to a transfer in making the exchange, which she demanded, but was refused by the conductor, and by reason thereof she was compelled to walk alone to her home late in the evening for several miles through an unfrequented part of the way, she was entitled to recover damages for being refused a transfer ticket, and a verdict for $425 was not excessive under the facts shown. South Cov. & Cin. St. Ry. Co. v. Quinn 534
4. Street Car Collision—Injury to Lady Passenger—Action for Damages—Allegations—Manifestation of Condition—Specific Injury Sued for—In an action by a lady passenger for damages caused by a collision between two street cars in which she alleged that she was injured in her womb, in her ovaries and in her bowels, and that she had frequent micturition and had sustained a shock to her nervous system, Held—That a diseased condition must be manifested by outward symptoms. Where specific injuries are sued for, any external symptoms which are evidence of the injury, may properly be admitted, for it is only by the external symptoms that an internal injury may be judged. Louisville Ry. Co. v. Ellerhorst..... 605

5. Pleading—Notice of Injury Sustained—Relevant Facts—
Evidence Admissible—The plaintiff should, by his pleading, apprise the defendant what injury he seeks to recover for, but the evidence by which he will establish the injury need not be indicated by the pleading. A fact, though not in issue, is relevant when it is, or probably may have been, the cause of a fact in issue or the effect of it. Evidence which conduces, though but slightly, to prove a fact in issue, or to repel a presumption which might otherwise arise favorable to the opposite party is admissible, and in a case of doubt the evidence should not be excluded. Idem 605

STRIKING CASE FROM DOCKET—See Contracts, 1.SUBROGATION—See Liens.*SURETIES—

1. Co-Sureties—Indemnity—Contribution—Obstruction of Rights—Release of Liability—Where a co-surety in a forthcoming bond became a surety in the supersedeas bond, he thereby obstructed the right of his co-surety in the forthcoming bond to take steps to protect himself as such surety, and by this act relieved the co-surety in the forthcoming bond from all liability to him for indemnity or contribution. Broughton v. Saylor, &c. 611
2. Same—Rights of Co-Sureties—Interference Therewith—There is no substantial difference between the legal effect of an obstruction of, or interference with, the rights of the surety by the creditor, and an obstruction or interference with the rights of the surety by the act of another person, who might otherwise have looked to the surety for contribution or indemnity if there had been no obstruction. Idem 612

TELEGRAMS—

- Funeral Notice—Delay in Delivery—Action for Damages—Accident to Train—Negligence—Presumption—A telegram announcing his mother's death, was sent to plaintiff in time for him to have attended her funeral, but by failure to deliver the telegram he was delayed a day. The train he took the next day was delayed by earth sliding on the track so that he failed to see her before her burial. In an action for damages against the telegraph company, Held—The presumption is, that the plaintiff would have taken the first train on receiving the telegram, and the company can not be excused for its negligence in failing to deliver it, thereby causing plaintiff to miss two trains, on the ground that he would have been able to attend the funeral if the accident had not happened to the railroad track on the following day. Sutton v. Western Union Telg. Co. 577

TRUSTS AND TRUST ESTATES—

1. Investment of Wife's Money by Husband—Deed to Husband—Death of Wife—Claim of Child—A husband, in 1848, with the consent of his wife, sold two slaves belonging to her for $500, which he invested in land and took the deed to himself. After the wife's death her daughter sued her father, claiming that he held the land as trustee for her. Held—That the money for which the land was sold, in 1848, belonged to the father, as the law then stood, and the fact that the father sometimes gave it out in oral statements that he recognized the $500 as a trust in his hands, first for the benefit of the mother, and afterwards for the daughter, amounts to an unexecuted promise which can not be enforced as a trust. Brown v. Brown's Adm'r 601

2. Same—Establishment of Trust—Definite Ascertainment—The rule is well settled that the subject of a supposed trust, as well as the cestui que trust must be definitely ascertained in order to be enforcible, and if this is not done no trust is established. A mere declaration of a purpose to create a trust is of no value unless carried into effect. Idem 601

1. Devisee—Claiming For and Against the Will—One can not claim property under a will and also claim compensation for improvements against the will. Having elected to take under the will the devisee can not claim contrary to the will. Bradshaw v. Butler 531

2. Same—Life Estate—What Remains—Construction—Testator, by his will, devised (1) that his debts be paid; (2) that $5,000 of his estate be divided equally to his ten brothers and sisters; and (3) all the remainder of his estate of every kind to his wife for and during her life, and at her death to his daughter Grace; but should Grace die without issue, then what remains of his estate shall go one-half to his brothers and sisters and one-half to the brothers and sisters of his wife; (4) "I authorize my wife to sell and convey any or all of my real estate, and to pass the fee-simple title to same." Held—That the expression "what remains on my estate" can not be held to amplify the estate given to his wife nor can the power of sale confer upon the wife the right to encroach upon the principal of the estate. Idem 531

3. Same—"Dying Without Children"—Estate for Life—Restriction—Where an estate is devised to one for life, with remainder to another, with the provision that if the remainderman should die without children, or issue, then to a third person, the rule is that the words "dying without children or issue," are restricted to the death of the remainderman before the determination of the particular estate. Idem 531

4. Construction of—By Court of Last Resort—The appellee was one of ten children who took the land in question from a will by her father, which excluded, by expression, her husband, she being vested with a life estate, with remainder to her children. Her father died in 1857. The controversy arises over the expression in the will "should any of the children of W. W. Southgate die without issue and unmarried, their part to go to the remaining brothers and sisters and their descendants." Fisher v. Lott, &c. 609

- 5 Same—This clause was construed by this court, in 1865, in precisely the same state of case as this, in the matter of another child of Southgate, who took under the will. In that case the court held that, upon the birth of a child, the remainder then vested, and upon his death it passed to his heir-at-law; that the condition in the devise above quoted should be construed to mean that, upon her marriage and subsequent issue, the contingency happened, and the estate was no longer defeasible. Idem	609

6. Same—Deed—Mrs. L's conveyance of the property in which her husband and only child joined, was sufficient to pass title. Idem	609
7. Inheritance Tax—Liability of Devisee Therefor—A will was made in 1899 by a son devising to his mother one-half his entire estate, under a contract made at the time with his mother to keep a valid will at all times devising to her son's god-son one-half of the property she received from him, which she made, and under which the god-son received the property so devised by the mother. The mother died after the inheritance tax law of 1906 was enacted in this State. Held—That at the time the contract between the son and mother was made, there was no inheritance tax law in force in this State and the property received by the god-son under the will was not subject to the payment of such tax. Winn, as Sheriff, &c. v. Schenck, &c	615
8. Devise of Land—Subject to Control of Widow—Prior Death of Daughter—Estate of Daughter—Curtesy of Husband—Where a father by his will devised a tract of land to his daughter, subject to the use and control thereof by his widow, during her life, if the mother outlived the daughter, the latter, not being seized and possessed of the land in her lifetime, her husband was not entitled to curtesy therein upon her death. Maupin, &c. v. Maupin's Gd'n, &c	658
9. Parent and Child—Supplies to Infant Child—Recovery Therefor by Parent—A father is not entitled to recover a claim for board, education and clothing furnished to his daughter during her minority, as this duty is imposed on him by law. Idem	658
WRIT OF PROHIBITION—
1. Jurisdiction—If an inferior court has jurisdiction, the circuit court has no power to grant the writ of prohibition for the purpose of denying the inferior court the right to hear and determine a case, although it is of opinion that the inferior court will decide improperly. Thomas, &c. v. Davis, &c	569
2. Same—Work Upon Public Roads—Therefore, the lower court properly dismissed appellant's motion for a writ of prohibition to restrain the inferior from trying him for failure to work the public road. Idem	569

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

EWELL, &c. v. JACKSON, &c.

(Filed June 3, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Judgments—Unsigned by Judge—Validity—Under section 390, of Civil Code, requiring the judgments of the court to be entered in the order book and section 378, Kentucky Statutes, requiring that the proceedings of each day shall be drawn up and read by the clerk, and signed by the presiding judge, it is indispensable to the validity of a judgment that it shall be entered on the order book of the court and signed by the judge who rendered the judgment, or by his successor or by the regular judge unless he is disqualified.

2. Same—Delivery to Clerk—Entry of Record—Effect—A paper signed by a judge, although it contained the entire judgment and be delivered to the clerk of the court to enter upon the order book, is not a judgment in fact until it has been entered upon the order book of the court and signed by a judge.

3. Same—Special Judge—Failure to Sign Record—Signature by Disqualified Judge—Validity—Section 977, Kentucky Statutes providing that "upon the death of a circuit judge, or when for any cause the office is vacant or when the judge is absent, his successor, no matter how chosen, may sign any orders left unsigned by his predecessor the same as his predecessor might have done," applies to special as well as to regular judges.

If a special judge on account of death or absence from the court or retirement from the case, should fail to sign the orders in a case in which he presided they may be signed by the special judge who succeeds him in the case or by the regular judge unless he was disqualified. But if the regular judge be disqualified to preside in the case, then his signature would not validate such judgment.

4. Unsigned Judgment—Execution Thereon—Validity—The defendants to an unsigned judgment may enjoin the sheriff from seizure and selling their property under an execution issued thereon.

Ewell & Smith for appellants.

Henry C. Hazelwood and E. H. Johnson for appellees.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This action was brought to enjoin the collection of an execution issued upon what purported to be a judgment of the Laurel Circuit Court, in the case of Ewell & Smith v. J. C. Jackson's Heirs, upon two grounds, first: that the judgment was never signed on the order book by the judge who delivered it; and second, that the judgment disposed of a material question not presented by the pleadings in the action.

H. C. Faulkner, the regular judge of the Laurel Circuit Court, could not sit in the case in which the judgment was rendered, and D. K. Rawlings was selected as special judge by agreement of parties. Judge Rawlings, after hearing the case, took it under advisement, and in due time returned or had delivered to the clerk a written judgment signed by him. The clerk recorded the judgment, omitting the name of the judge; and the recorded judgment was never signed by Rawlings. The judgment rendered by Rawlings was entered upon the order book of the Laurel Circuit Court, on a day of the regular term of the court, and was recorded with the orders and judgments made and entered by the regular judge in cases pending before him. The orders of the day made by the regular judge, and which included the judgment rendered by Rawlings, were signed at the end of the day's business by the regular judge in the usual and customary manner.

Upon this condition of the record, three questions are presented: first, is it necessary to the validity of a judgment rendered by a special judge that it should be signed by him on the order book; second, if he fails to sign the judgment on the order book, can the judgment be signed by the regular judge with the same effect as if it had been signed by the special judge; and third, if the regular judge could not sit in the case, and for that reason a special judge was selected, can the regular judge sign the judgment or orders made by the special judge?

Section 390, of the Civil Code, provides:

"The judgment must be entered on the order book and specify clearly the relief granted or other determination of the action."

Section 378, of the Kentucky Statutes, relating to the duties of clerks of courts, provides that:

"The proceedings of each day shall be drawn up by the clerk from his minutes in a plain legible manner, which, after being corrected as ordered by the court, and read in an audible voice, shall be signed by the presiding judge."

It will thus be seen that, under the Code and Statute, it is indispensable to the validity of a judgment that it shall be entered upon the order book of the court and signed by the judge who rendered the judgment, or his successor in the disposal of the case or by the regular judge unless he is disqualified. These two acts must concur. In the absence of either, there is no judgment. A paper signed by a judge, although it contain the entire judgment and be delivered to the clerk of the court to enter upon the order book, is not a judgment, in fact, until it has been entered upon the order book of the court and signed by a judge. Courts of record speak only by their records duly entered and signed in the books provided for that purpose. The judgment in an action or proceeding is usually the final termination of the matter in the court in which the case is pending. By it the most valuable rights of the citizens are determined, and it is of the highest importance that it should be preserved in permanent form and be in fact signed by the very person whose authority directed its entry, unless he fails, within the meaning of section 977, of the Kentucky Statutes, to sign it. This statute provides that:

"Upon the death of a circuit judge or when from any cause the office is vacant, or when the judge is absent, his successor, no matter how chosen, may sign any orders left unsigned by his predecessor, the same as his predecessor might have done."

It sometimes happens that, after a judge has directed the entry of an order or judgment, he is prevented by absence or death or other cause creating a vacancy in the office, from signing the orders or judgments so entered. And when such a condition arises, the orders made and entered by his direction may be signed by his successor. This section applies to special as well as regular judges. If a special judge, on account of death or absence from the court or retirement from the case, should fail to sign the orders in the case in which he presided, they may be signed by the special judge who succeeds him in the case, or by the regular judge of the court unless he was disqualified from presiding in the case. And so, if the regular judge is prevented by death or absence from the court, or by a vacancy in the office, from signing the orders or judgments made and directed to be entered by him, his successor may sign them. Nor do we think it indispensable to the validity of an order or judgment entered by a special judge that it should be signed at its close by his successor in office, or by the regular judge, if the orders of the day among which it is entered are signed by the regular judge or the person acting in his place as judge. The signing of the orders of the day by the regular judge or judge acting for him will have the same force and effect as if he signed the particular order or judgment entered by the special judge, provided he was qualified to sit in the case in which the order or judgment was entered by the special judge. But, if the regular judge could not preside in the case, it would seem to follow that he should not sign the orders or judgments made in it. If the orders of the day which included this judgment had been signed by a judge other than the regular judge, or by a judge who might have presided in the case in which Rawlings was chosen to preside, or, if the particular judgment entered by Rawlings had been signed by a regular judge who was qualified to sit in the case, or by a judge who was selected in the place of Rawlings, to preside as special judge, the presumption would be indulged that Rawlings was absent, and hence the signature by such judge to the orders of the day or to the judgment rendered by Rawlings would give life and effect to his judgment.

Let us illustrate this point by the facts of this particular case: The regular judge could not sit in the case in which Judge Rawlings was selected as special judge. The record does not disclose the reason why the regular judge could not sit, but the presumption is that he was disqualified for some good cause. But, whatever the reason, as he could not sit in the case, neither could he, by signing any orders or judgments rendered by the special judge, give life or vitality to them. The same reason that prevented him from hearing and disposing of the case would necessarily preclude him from signing the orders and judgments entered in the case. It would be a most anomalous state of affairs to hold that although the regular judge could not preside in the case, nor hear or determine any of the matters at issue between the parties, that yet he might give validity and effect by his signature to the final judgment therein. The effect of this practice, if permissible, would be that although a judge could not make an order of continuance in a case, or enter an interlocutory order, or pass on some immaterial question, yet he could, by signing the judgment, determine finally the rights of the parties. We, therefore, conclude that as the regular judge could not sit in this case, the fact that he signed the orders of the day embracing the judgment, his act was not a signing of the judgment entered by the special judge, and, therefore, the record stands as if the judgment was left unsigned. An unsigned judgment is no judgment, hence, an execution could not issue upon it. (Commonwealth v. Chambers, 1 J. J. Mar., 108; Raymond v. Smith, 1 Met., 65; Fristoe v. Gillen, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 150; Johnson v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky., 377.) As there was no judgment upon which an execution could issue, the execution defendants had the right to enjoin the sheriff from seizing and selling their property under the execution. (Knott v. Jarboe, 1 Met., 54; Robinson v. Carlton, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 876; Bramblet v. McVey, 91 Ky., 151.)

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the question that the judgment disposed of matters not presented by the pleadings.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE FERTILIZER CO., &c. v. LORTON, &c.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Homestead—Debtor and Creditor—Where a debtor is entitled to a homestead, his creditors can not have the land sold subject to the homestead right. Such a sale may be ordered after the death of the debtor, reserving the rights of his widow and children, but during his lifetime, the creditors can not demand that the land be sold subject to the homestead right. Under the evidence the lien was properly adjudged on the land in controversy.

Cress & Cress for appellants.

Harrison & Harrison and F. R. Harrison for appellees.

Appeal from Wayne Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

On November 22, 1900, William and Mary E. Lorton conveyed to their son, Isaac Lorton, three tracts of land in Wayne county, Kentucky, for the consideration of $400, as stated in the deed; but it was really a part of the agreement that the son was to live with the old people and take care of them during their lives. After this William Lorton died and Isaac continued to live at the old home with his mother. Whether the place where they lived, which is called the Smith or Watts tract, was included in the conveyance to Isaac, is a matter of dispute between the parties, the calls of the deed describing the land conveyed being uncertain. Isaac Lorton mortgaged the land to secure a debt of $470, which he owed. He was also indebted to his half-brother, John G. Leveridge in the sum of $150, for which he had promised to execute to him a mortgage, but he had not executed it, or at least had it recorded. In this condition of affairs, Isaac Lorton and his brother, Thomas Lorton, carried on a mercantile business and became considerably in debt to the Louisville Fertilizer Co., and other persons who were their creditors. While the business was done in the name of the Lorton Brothers, Thomas Lorton carried on the business, and Isaac Lorton had little to do with it. The creditors, however, brought suit against him for their debts and obtained judgments. Before these judgments were obtained he conveyed the three tracts of land referred to to his mother, and she conveyed them to John G. Leveridge. The creditors thereupon brought this suit to set aside the deeds as fraudulent and subject the land to the payment of their claims. It was insisted for the defendants that the homestead, or Smith tract, was not conveyed to Isaac Lorton. They also insisted that in any event Isaac Lorton was entitled to a homestead in the land if the Smith tract was included in the deed, and that to this extent the deed was not fraudulent; and that to the extent of his mortgage debts upon the land and his own debts, Leveridge was entitled to a lien on it. The circuit court held that the deed made to Isaac Lorton included the Smith tract, or homestead, but he held that Isaac Lorton was entitled to a homestead, and that this should be set apart to him, or to Mary Lorton, his mother, and that after setting apart the homestead, the remainder of the land should be sold, the mortgage debts paid and the debt due Leveridge; that then the balance should be applied to the debts of the creditors. From this judgment they appeal. We have some doubt upon the record whether the Smith tract, or homestead, was included in the deed to Isaac Lorton, but it is unnecessary for us to decide this question, as there is no cross-appeal. In any view of the case Isaac Lorton was entitled to a homestead in the land. To the extent of his homestead his deed to his mother was not fraudulent, and, therefore, the action of the court in setting apart the homestead to her was not prejudicial to the appellants. Where a debtor is entitled to a homestead, his creditors can not have the land sold subject to his homestead right. Such a sale may be ordered after the death of the debtor reserving the rights of his widow and children, but during his lifetime, the creditors can not demand that the land be sold subject to the homestead right. (Cole v. Rohr, 1 Ky. Law Rep., 62; Schmidt v. Oliges, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 297; Thompson on Homesteads, section 738.)

The mortgagees had a lien on the land for their debts and to the extent of their debts, the sale to Leveridge was not fraudulent. The deed to Leveridge is not attacked on the ground that it was made to prefer him to the other creditors. It is attacked on the sole ground that it was made to defraud the other creditors. The evidence shows that Leveridge had, in good faith, a debt against his brother, and the court did not err in adjudging him a lien on the land to the extent of his debt.

On the whole record none of the substantial rights of the appellants were prejudiced by the judgment which is as favorable to them as the facts warrant.

Judgment affirmed.

PACK v. STEPP, &c.

(Filed June 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Divisional Lines—Creek Changing Its Course—The proof shows that the line in controversy has existed and been acquiesced in for more than thirty years. It cannot now be disturbed; if the creek has changed its course it has been gradual, and the line has followed the thread of it. It is not a sudden change of bed as by a freshet.

C. B. Wheeler and W. G. Wells for appellant.

Wells & Wells for appellees.

Appeal from Johnson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Eliza Stepp holds a tract of land in Johnson⁴ county, which she claims under a patent issued to James Wood, in 1845. Geo. W. Pack holds an adjoining tract which he claims under a patent issued to Garland Burgess after the patent to Wood. This controversy has arisen between them as to ownership of a small piece of creek bottom on the south side of Greasy Creek, near the mouth of Two Mile creek.

The two patents do not conflict and the proof shows that the Wood patent includes the land, but the proof also shows that about fifty years ago, the parties, under whom the plaintiff and defendant claim, by agreement, made the creek the line between them, and that Pack and those under whom he claims entered then on the land in dispute and cleared it as a part of it and have since held and used the land so cleared for thirty years. By arrangement a part of the Burgess patent north of the creek fell to Wood and a part of his patent on the south side of the creek fell to those under whom Pack claims. The proof of the establishment of the agreed line and of the taking and holding possession up to is so clear and has been so long acquiesced in, that the line can not now be disturbed. (Creech v. Abner, 106 Ky., 239; Amburgy v. Lumber Co., 90 S. W. 680; Hughes Lumber Co. v. Valentine, 106 S. W. 839, and cases cited.)

If the creek has changed its course, it has been a gradual change and made little by little, and the line has followed the thread of the stream. It is not a case of a sudden change of bed from a freshet or the like. (Halcomb v. Blair, 76 S. W. 843; Spurrier v. Hodges, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 805.)

On the facts shown judgment should have been entered for the defendant. Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a judgment as above indicated.

LOCKHART, &c. v. BUCKNER, &c.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Deeds—Cancellation of—Evidence—In this case, the evidence is examined and held that the deed was properly set aside. It was made under a misapprehension, and in view of the facts appearing, the lower court did not err in canceling it.

McMillan & Talbott and John M. Brennan for appellants.

Morton, Webb & Wilson for appellees.

Appeal from Bourbon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Mrs. F. Lockhart Clay has three daughters, Mary, Sally and Florence Lockhart, the latter being an infant. On June 15, 1904, just before Mary was to marry Aylette Buckner, her mother procured her to make a deed to James McClure to her undivided interest in the tract of land on which they lived, upon the following trust: "Said property shall be, by the second party, held in trust for the sole and separate use of the first party until she shall marry. Upon first party's marriage the second party shall reconvey the same so that it shall be owned, held and possessed as follows, to-wit: By the first party for her sole and separate use and benefit during her life, with remainder in fee at her death, to the issue of her body then living and the descendants of such of them, if any, as may be dead, such descendants taking per stirpes their parents' share. Said deed of reconveyance shall also provide that should such first party die leaving no such issue or descendants of her body, then the remainder in the aforesaid property shall pass the one-half in fee to her sisters, or should they, or either of them, be dead, then to their descendants, such descendants taking per stirpes their parent's share; should either sister be then dead leaving no descendants, her surviving sister shall take her share. The other half shall pass to first party's husband for his life, with remainder to her sisters or their descendants, as provided above as to the one-half. Should said husband be dead at the time of the first party's death, then the whole remainder estate shall pass to her sisters, or sister, or their descendants, as provided above. Should first party not marry within a month from the date of this instrument, then it is ipso facto null and void."

The marriage took place shortly after the deed was made, and after the marriage McClure reconveyed the property back to Mrs. Buckner upon the trust specified in the deed to him. In November, 1907, Mrs. Buckner brought this suit against her sisters, McClure and her husband asking that the deeds be vacated and set aside on the ground that at the time the deed was made she knew nothing of business and was induced to make the deed by her mother, who assured her that she would have her sisters to make a similar deed; that her sister, Sally, was of age and declined to make such a deed; that her sister, Florence, was approaching her majority, and also announced her intention not to make a similar deed; that she would not have made the deed but for the assurance of her mother, and the fact that she did not understand the effect of the transaction. Defense was made for the infant by her guardian ad litem. No other defense was made to the action. The deposition of Mrs. Clay was taken, fully sustaining the allegations of the petition, and the case having been submitted on this proof, the court set aside the deeds. From this judgment the guardian ad litem appeals.

The proof leaves no doubt that Mrs. Buckner executed the deeds by the procurement of her mother relying upon her judgment and in obedience to her parental authority. If the mother's plan had been carried out, no great injustice would have been done Mrs. Buckner, as she would have taken an interest in her sisters' land like that which they took in hers, but to uphold the deeds against her when they refused to make similar deeds, would be to do her great injustice. It is evident that the scheme which the mother had in mind failed to be carried out, and that the deed made by Mrs. Buckner was made under a misapprehension in reliance upon her mother's judgment and guided by her authority. In view of her age at the time, and all the surrounding facts, we think the circuit court properly set aside the deeds.

Judgment affirmed.

CORYDON DEPOSIT BANK v. McCLURE, &c.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Surety—Liability of Note—Valid Note—Merger in Invalid Note—Surety of Valid Note—Liability—Where a son wrongfully signed his mother's name as surety for him on a note to a bank for $1,115.75, which included a note for $440, which his mother had previously signed as surety, it appearing that the son believed at the time that he had the right to sign his mother's name to the larger note, he was not guilty of any moral turpitude thereby, and the fact that the larger note was invalid, did not invalidate the smaller $440-note merged therein, as against the estate of his mother, who had subsequently died.

Vance & Heilbronner for appellant.

Thomas E. Ward for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

The appellee, H. D. McClure, executed to the appellant, Corydon Deposit Bank his note for $1,115.75, to which he signed the name of his mother, Mary H. McClure, as surety, supposing he had authority, in writing from her, to do so; but this court, in McClure, Ex'or v. Corydon Deposit Bank, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 772, held that the writing relied on did not confer upon H. D. McClure authority to sign the note in question. The note of $1,115.75 was given in renewal of three other notes held by the bank against H. D. McClure, one of which was a past due note of $440, in which he was principal, and Mary H. McClure, surety. It is conceded that the latter's signature to the $440 note was written by her.

After the execution of the $1,115.75 note, Mary H. McClure died testate, and soon thereafter the appellee, H. D. McClure, as executor of her will, brought suit in the Henderson Circuit Court for a settlement of her estate. The $1,115.75 note was filed by appellant with the commissioner of the court for allowance and payment. It was allowed by the commissioner, to whose report appellee filed exceptions. The circuit court sustained the exceptions and rejected the claim upon the ground that Mary H. McClure's estate was not liable for the note because her name had been signed thereto as surety by her son, H. D. McClure, without authority in writing from her. Subsequently appellant brought suit against the executor upon the note of $440 attempted to be merged in the $1,115.75 note.

An answer was filed by the executor, denying that the estate of the executrix, or that he, as executor of her will, was liable for the $440 note, or any part thereof, and alleging that she had been relieved from such liability by the act of appellant in merging the note with others, on which she was never bound, in the $1,115.75 note, and in accepting the latter note and marking the $440 note on the back "paid;" and in addition, by postponing, without her knowledge or consent, the maturity and payment of the $1,115.75 note in consideration of interest paid in advance by H. D. McClure, the principal, which acts of appellant, it was further alleged, kept from her information of the attempted merger of the $440 note into the $1,115.75 note, until H. D. McClure became insolvent and prevented her from taking steps to compel H. D. McClure to pay the $440 note on which she was, or had actually been, surety.

By agreement of the parties, a trial, by jury, was waived, and the cause submitted to the court, whose findings of law and fact were adverse to appellant, and resulting in a judgment dismissing the action. Appellant asked, and was refused, a new trial; hence this appeal.

It is manifest that at the time of the execution of the $1,115.75 note both H. D. McClure and the officers of the appellant bank believed the former had authority, under the writing from his mother, to sign her name thereto as surety; but in this they were mistaken. Such authority was not conferred by the power of attorney, and this being true, the note of $1,115.75 was invalid; indeed, as much so as if her name appearing thereto as surety had been forged. While the act of H. D. McClure in signing his mother's name to the renewal as surety, under the circumstances, manifested no moral turpitude, it was, nevertheless, an illegal act, and as an assumption of authority, false in law and in fact. Being therefore, void ab initio, its execution by the principal, and acceptance by the bank, did not merge or discharge the $440 note upon which Mrs. McClure was surety. As said by this court, in McClure's Ex'or v. Corydon Deposit Bank, supra: "If the note signed for her by her son, is invalid, the bank having accepted the renewal on the faith that the signature was valid, should be remitted to the former note which it then held and was admittedly valid."

In Strattan v. McMakin, 84 Ky., 641, it is said: "The verdict and judgment in the suit on the notes accepted in renewal conclusively establish the invalidity of those notes as to McMakin, and the allegations of the petition show that appellant accepted them in ignorance of the fact. He has then, without fault on his part, and, without any consideration for so doing, surrendered the note on which McMakin was confessedly bound, and if the judgment of the court below be permitted to stand, McMakin has been released and the appellant has lost his debt without fault on his part, simply because he confided in the false statements of Hinkle, and that, too, without his having done any act, as far as appears, by which McMakin had been in anywise injured. If such be the law, all must admit that in this case at least, the law is extremely harsh. That the law is otherwise is well established by authority, though never expressly decided by this court. * * * It has been held in many cases that if a new security be void for any reason, it does not satisfy or discharge the pre-existing debt or liability."

In Struss v. Masonic Savings Bank, 89 Ky., 61, the creditor was induced, by a fraudulent representation, to cancel the note upon which the surety was bound. It was held that neither the surety nor any one else, should be allowed to assert rights or claim benefits, derived through the fraud of others. In Northern Bank of Ky. v. Farmers Nat. Bank, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 696, the same principle was applied where a preference was made by an insolvent debtor. The facts were that the debtor had deposited $4,557.75 in the Northern Bank of Kentucky. The bank then held his note for about the same amount, which had been due three months. Shortly thereafter the bank, without his consent, applied the debtor's deposit to the payment of his note because it learned about that time that the surety in the note denied signing it. Subsequently, and within six months after the application of the deposit to the satisfaction of the note, other creditors of the debtor, by suit, attacked the transaction, and also a mortgage that he had given to secure other debts, on the ground that they were preferences made and entered into when the debtor was insolvent. They were held by this court to be preferential and made to operate as an assignment for the benefit of all the creditors; but in so holding the court declared that the doctrine announced in Struss v. Masonic Savings Bank, supra, should apply where a note is discharged by a payment which is afterwards adjudged within the statute against preferential transactions.

Probably no better statement of the doctrine can be found than that expressed in 7 Cyc., at page 1015, as follows: "Since an obligation can not be paid and satisfied by a new promise of a debtor, which is unfulfilled, and which he can avoid, at his pleasure, a note is not discharged by the giving of a new note in payment thereof where the new note proves invalid. Therefore, the surrender of a note, and the acceptance of a new note in payment without the knowledge that the new note is a forgery, does not discharge the original note." (Covington Nat. Bank v. Gaines, 87 Ky., 597; Bowman v. Wood, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 926; Kibley v. Jones, 7 Bush, 245.)

The testimony in the case before us was all to the effect that the $1,115.75 note was accepted by the bank simply in renewal of the three other notes it held against H. D. McClure; one of them being the $440-note, in which Mary H. McClure was surety. When, therefore, the renewal was adjudged invalid, the old liability of Mrs. McClure upon the $440-note was revived. Of this there can be no doubt. Nor does the fact that the renewal allowed four months' time for the payment, or that interest was paid in advance for such time, or that the principal became insolvent before the date of payment named in the renewal, affect the question; because the renewal was invalid from the time of its execution and acceptance.

"An unenforcible agreement by a creditor to indulge a principal does not discharge the sureties in a note." (Kupp v. St. Martimus- Ritter Verein, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 938.) In such case there is no valid extension of time. (7 Cyc., 898.)

While the question of whether H. D. McClure did or did not become insolvent, pending the four months during which the alleged renewal was to run, is not material, we think the circuit court erred in the conclusion of fact that he was solvent when the renewal was given. On the contrary, the weight of the testimony was to the effect that he was insolvent when and before the renewal was executed.

Our conclusion is that appellant was entitled to recover of the executor of Mary H. McClure the amount of the $440, with interest, as claimed.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial, and such other proceedings as may be consistent with the opinion.

BLODGETT v. MILLER.

1. Contract—Action for Money Advanced—Question of Partnership—Motion to Transfer to Equity—In an action at law brought for money alleged to have been advanced for a one-third interest in a contractor's outfit, it was not error in the court to transfer the case to the equity docket when the issue to be tried was a question of fact as to whether or not there was a partnership existing between the parties. If a partnership was shown, then it should have been transferred for a settlement of the partnership.

2. Same—Trial—Admissions by Defendant—Estoppel—On the trial of an action by one for money advanced and loaned to another to secure an interest in a contractor's outfit, in which the defendant set up a partnership and moved to transfer the case to equity, where the defendant on the trial admitted that he had disposed of the whole of the outfit without notice to the plaintiff, he was thereby estopped from asserting that there was a contract of partnership between himself and the plaintiff, and plaintiff had a right to disregard the partnership contract, if there was one, and sue for his money.

3. Excluding Witness from Court Room—Discretion of Court—Infirmary of Litigant—On the trial of a case before a jury it was in the discretion of the trial court whether or not to allow a brother of one of the parties, who was a witness for him, to remain in the court room and assist him in the trial, because of the imperfect hearing of such party.

James Denton for appellant.

Pogue & Pogue and O. H. Waddle & Son for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellee instituted this action against appellant alleging that he advanced to him the sum of $1,500, in consideration of which appellant was to convey to him one-third interest in a certain contractor's outfit and a contract then held and owned by appellant, which contractor's outfit and contract were located on the Rochester and Eastern Transit Line, in the State of New York. It was understood that he was to pay $4,000 for one-third interest. He paid $1,500, which appellant received and converted to his own use, and after receiving and converting the money he failed and refused to admit appellee to said interest in said contractor's outfit and contract, as he had agreed to do. Upon appellant's failure to admit him as a partner he demanded of appellant that he repay to him the sum of $1,500, which he failed and refused to do. By a second paragraph of the petition he alleged that he loaned appellant $250 on the 28th day of July, 1903, which he agreed and promised to repay to appellant, but had failed to do so. By a third paragraph he made the same allegations with reference to another $250, which he stated he loaned to appellant on the 1st day of September, 1903, and asked judgment for $2,000, with interest from the respective dates of the loans.

Appellant answered, denying each of the items of indebtedness set forth in the petition, and alleged that he entered into a contract with appellee whereby he sold to him a one-third interest in the contractor's outfit, and the contract mentioned in the petition, for the price of $4,000, and that the sums of money sued for in the petition were paid to him on the contract price. He denied that he failed or refused, or that he still refuses, to admit appellee to his interest so purchased, and denies that upon such failure or refusal, appellee demanded of him that he repay the sum of money sued for. He also alleged that, at the time of the sale of the interest to appellee, he (appellant) was the sole owner of the contractor's outfit and the contract referred to. He also sold a one-third interest to his brother, D. E. Blodgett, at the same time and at the same price. He further alleged that from the time of the sale to appellee and his brother that they became equal owners in the contractor's outfit and the contract and continued to prosecute the work, as such partners, for some time, and for convenience the partnership transacted the business under the firm name and style of Frank H. Blodgett, for the reason that the contract with the railway was made in the name of Frank H. Blodgett. He also stated that the partnership sustained a loss of about $9,000 under the contract with the railway company referred to, and that appellee had contributed nothing to help pay the loss, except the two items of $250 each. He further alleged that it was necessary to have a full and complete settlement of the accounts arising out of the partnership before the exact status of the partnership could be determined; but the settlement would show that appellee was indebted to appellant in at least the sum of $5,000; and that D. E. Blodgett was a partner in the business and was a necessary party to the action.

To this answer a reply was filed controverting all the affirmative matter contained therein, except he admitted that there was some loss on the contract referred to, but the amount he did not know.

The affirmative matter in the reply, by agreement, was controverted of record.

Appellant moved the court to transfer the case to the equity docket, which motion was overruled. D. E. Blodgett was never made a party to the action. A jury was empanelled to try the case. The sole question tried was, whether or not appellee was ever permitted to become a partner by becoming the owner of one-third of the contractor's outfit and one-third of the contract with the railway company. After the testimony was heard, the court gave to the jury a peremptory instruction to find for appellee, and a judgment was rendered upon the verdict of the jury giving to appellee each item claimed in the petition, with interest.

Appellant asks a reversal for the following reasons: First. Because the court erred in refusing to transfer the case to the equity docket for a settlement of the partnership. Second. Because there was a separation of the witnesses during the trial, and appellant made an affidavit that he could hear only with difficulty, and on that account he needed the presence of his brother, D. E. Blodgett, to aid him in conducting the case and the court refused to allow him to remain in the court room while the evidence was being heard. Third. Because the court erred in giving the jury a peremptory instruction to find for appellee.

The court did not err in refusing to transfer the case to the equity docket, as the issue to be tried was a question of fact as to whether or not there was a partnership to be settled. If it had been determined that there was a partnership existing between the parties, it would have then been necessary to have transferred the case and had the partnership settled.

As to the question of refusing to allow appellant's brother, D. E. Blodgett, to be present during the hearing of the evidence in the case, it is sufficient to say that that matter was in the discretion of the court trying the case; his action thereon should not be disturbed unless it was shown that he abused his discretion in the matter, which does not appear in this case.

The evidence of the parties tended to support the theory advanced by each of them in their pleadings. When appellee paid the $1,500 on August 3, 1903, to appellant, he expected to soon thereafter be admitted as an active partner with a one-third interest in the contractor's outfit and the contract, and that the partnership was to continue for an indefinite period, and the parties understood and expected that writings were to be drawn covering all their understandings and agreements, including the fact that appellee was to be employed as secretary of the partnership at the price of $100 a month. Appellee left appellant with the understanding that he was to proceed to New York and take an inventory of the contractor's outfit with the promise of appellant that on his first trip to New York he would prepare writings covering their agreement. He obtained the inventory and appellant made several trips to New York, and upon each occasion appellee urged that the papers be prepared, which appellant failed to do. The contract with the New York company was completed about the middle of December, 1903, and appellee went to his home in Pennsylvania. And in the month of January, 1904, he went to appellant's home in West Virginia, and again urged that appellant prepare the contract and that he be admitted as a partner; and again in February of the same year he applied to appellant in the same place and asked that the papers be prepared and that he be permitted to become an active partner with a one-third interest in the contractor's outfit, which appellant refused to do. He then placed the matter in the hands of an attorney in West Virginia to look after his interest. Afterwards he was informed that appellant could not be found in that State and summons served upon him. He then placed the matter in the hands of attorneys in Cincinnati, Ohio, who finally located appellant in Pulaski county, this State, and instituted this action. He also stated that he had been informed that appellant had sold and disposed of all the property constituting the contractor's outfit.

Appellant testified that by the contract appellee had become a partner and owner of a one-third interest in the contractor's outfit. He admitted that he was to draw the contract of partnership and did not do it, but in a way, denied that appellee repeatedly requested him to do so. He concluded his testimony as follows:

"After the completion of the New York contract, I sold part of the property constituting the contractor's outfit in which I sold plaintiff an interest and a part of it I transferred to the F. H. Blodgett Company, which was a corporation and in which I was largely interested. I swapped the steam shovel, which was a part of the outfit, for a larger one, while the contract was going on, which shovel was probably worth five or six thousand dollars, which I transferred to the F. H. Blodgett Company. The contractor's outfit consisted of steam shovel, engines and such property and tools as are usually employed in such railroad construction. I never consulted or conferred with plaintiff or his attorney about disposing of this property, and made no effort to do so, and the whole of it was disposed of by me shortly after the completion of the New York contract, either by sale or transfer to the F. H. Blodgett Company. The F. H. Blodgett Company, shortly after being organized as a corporation, obtained a contract in Ohio, and another contract in Indiana, and a portion of the contractor's outfit was transferred to these contracts and used by the F. H. Blodgett Company. I owned the most of the capital stock of the F. H. Blodgett Company and my brother, D. E. Blodgett, the balance, but sometime after this, I bought the stock of D. E. Blodgett and he and I made a settlement of our business so that he does not owe me any part of the $4,000 he agreed to pay me for a one-third interest in the contractor's outfit and contract in New York. My brother, D. E. Blodgett, contracted to take one-third of the outfit and contract in New York at the same price Mr. Miller agreed to pay, but he never paid any portion of the purchase money and I never did call on him for it. I have never notified plaintiff of the losses accruing on the New York contract and never made any demand on him for any payment on account of such losses."

As stated, appellee admitted that a loss was sustained on the New York contract, but said that he expected to make up this loss on future contracts.

In view of all the facts and circumstances proven in this case, we are of the opinion that it is not necessary to consume the time that would be required to discuss the evidence and the principles of law governing the question as to whether or not there was a complete and binding contract of partnership—one which either party might have enforced; because, under the proof, it appears that appellee was never admitted as a member of the firm, nor to his rights and privileges as an owner of a one-third interest therein. The statement of appellant, copied above, shows that he disposed of the whole of the contractor's outfit without giving notice to or consulting appellee in any way; that appellant abandoned, or disregarded, the contract with appellee, if there ever was a contract, and appellant is now estopped by his conduct from asserting the claim that there was such a contract of partnership existing between himself and appellee.

Evidently, appellee, under the facts proven, had the right to disregard the partnership contract, even if there was one, and sue appellant for his money; and it is not necessary to cite authorities to support this conclusion.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. WITT.

(Filed June 5, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Telegrams—Failure to Deliver—Breach of Contract—Where a telegram is delivered to a telegraph company and the price for transmission paid, a contract is entered into between the sender and the company for a delivery of the message within a reasonable time, and for a failure to do so the company is liable for a breach of the contract.

2. Same—Action for Breach of Contract—Limitation—Damages for the failure to deliver a telegram are not an injury to the person in the meaning of Kentucky Statutes, section 2516, requiring an action for an injury to the person to be brought within a year next after the cause of action accrued, but are recoverable under section 2515, providing that an action upon a contract. * * * shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued.

3. Measure of Damages—The measure of damages recoverable for a breach of contract in failing to deliver a telegram are such as flow directly from the breach and they may be to the feelings as well as to the property.

4. Same—Duty of Plaintiff—Effort to Minimize Damages—Where one receives a delayed telegram announcing the death of a sister whose funeral he desires to attend, he should use all reasonable means to minimize the damages for the delay. He can not stand idly by and permit the damages to increase and then hold the wrongdoer liable for the loss which he might reasonably have prevented.

Richards & Quarles and Geo. H. Fearons for appellant.

C. C. Williams, R. L. Pope and T. Z. Morrow for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment upon a verdict rendered against the appellant company for four hundred dollars in damages. The action in which the recovery was had was based upon the ground that the appellant company negligently failed to transmit and deliver to appellee the following telegram:

“Williamsburg, Jan. 26, 1905.

“To John A. Witt,

“Livingston,

“Your sister, Martha Thompson, died this morning. Come first train.

“MARSHALL.”

Williamsburg and Livingston are on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, in Kentucky, and about sixty miles apart. The telegram in question was delivered to the operator at Williamsburg about 4.30 p. m., and in the usual and ordinary course of business should have reached Livingston before 6 o'clock on the same evening and been delivered to appellee, who lived in the town of Livingston, within a short time after its receipt. It was not in fact delivered until about 10 o'clock on the morning of the 27th. The delay in its transmission and delivery is not accounted for by the appellant company, so that, considering the time of its delivery at the place of transmission and the time of its receipt at the point of destination, and the distance between the two places, it may be assumed that the company was guilty of negligence in failing to send the telegram in seasonable time or in failing to deliver it with reasonable promptness after it reached Livingston. If the telegram had been delivered to Witt on the 26th he could have left Livingston on a train that passed through there about one o'clock on the morning of the 27th, and have reached Williamsburg about four o'clock that morning, and Witt testifies that he would have taken that train. The next train leaving Livingston for Williamsburg departed about one o'clock p. m., on the 27th, arriving at Williamsburg at four o'clock p. m. Upon receipt of the telegram, Witt without reading it carefully supposed that it had been sent that morning, and went to the depot for the purpose of taking the one o'clock train for Williamsburg; but, after arriving at the depot about eleven o'clock and again reading the telegram, he discovered that it was dated on the 26th and not the 27th, as his first casual reading induced him to believe and he did not go to Williamsburg. His sister was buried on the morning of the 27th, about 11 o'clock. There was no train leaving Livingston on the morning of the 27th after the receipt of the telegram that appellant could have taken to Williamsburg in time to attend the funeral of his sister.

The company asks a reversal on two grounds. It is first insisted that upon the receipt of the telegram appellee should have telegraphed the family of his sister that he could not reach Williamsburg until that afternoon and have asked them to delay the funeral until his arrival. That in failing to take this action he was guilty of such contributory neglect as would defeat a recovery. It is next insisted that the action, which was not instituted until more than one year after January 27th, was barred by the statute of limitations—the appellant's contention being that section 2516, of the Kentucky Statutes, fixes the time within which an action of this character may be brought. That section reads as follows:

"An action for an injury to the person of the plaintiff, of his wife, child, ward, apprentice, or servant, or for injuries to person, * * * by any company or corporation * * * shall be commenced within one year next after the cause of action accrued, and not thereafter."

It is upon this statute that the appellant chiefly depends to exonerate it from liability to the appellee.

For the appellee it is insisted that this is an action upon a contract, and the period in which it must be brought is controlled by section 2515, of the Kentucky Statutes, providing that:

"An action upon a contract * * * shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued."

Telegraph companies are common carriers. They are engaged in a public service. In consideration of certain fees exacted, they agree to transmit and deliver messages within a reasonable time. Whenever a person delivers to a telegraph company a message to be sent to the addressee, and pays the stipulated price, a contract is entered into between the sender and the company by which the company obligates itself to transmit and deliver the message within a reasonable time. We do not mean to say that it is always a part of the contract that the message shall be delivered, and only use these expressions for the purpose of illustrating the fact that the agreement to transmit and deliver is the result of a contractual relation between the parties. The agreement has all the elements of a contract. The company holds itself out to the public as being able, ready and willing to enter into contracts for the transmission of messages in consideration of the price fixed by it. So that, it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence of these premises that an action against the company for a failure to transmit or deliver a telegram must be grounded upon the breach of the contract obligation. The measure of damages that may be recovered for a breach of the contract are those that flow directly from the breach and are the proximate result of it, and they may be to the feelings as well as to the property. (Western Union Tel. Co. v. VanCleave, 107 Ky., 464.) The damages for the failure to deliver a telegram are not an injury to the person in the meaning of section 2516, supra. This section contemplates a physical injury to the person. Ordinarily, actions brought under this section sound in tort, and are not distinctly based upon a contractual relation, although the tort may have its origin in such relation. To illustrate: when a common carrier undertakes to transport a passenger, a contract relation is entered into, and yet if the passenger is injured, a tort has also been committed that is an injury to the person. And as the injury to the person rather than the breach of the contract is usually the foundation of the claim for damages, it has been held that this statute applies to actions to recover damages for injuries to the person, although the injury results primarily from the breach of the contract by the carrier in failing to safely transport the passenger.

A question in all respects like this was presented to the court in Meniffee v. Alexander, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 980. There, Meniffee brought suit against Alexander, a physician, to recover damages for alleged malpractice—the only question in the case being whether the one-year statute or the five-year statute applied to the action, it being admitted that it was barred if the former statute controlled. In considering the case the court said:

“The phrase ‘an action for an injury to the person of the plaintiff’ in section 2516 refers to those cases where the personal injury is the gist of the action, such as actions for assault and battery and the like. If a druggist should sell a man poison for a harmless medicine, a suit for damages therefor would not be an action for injury to the person although great suffering or loss of health had resulted therefrom. The limitation to an action against a physician for improperly treating his patient is the same as that in a like action against an attorney, a teacher or a mechanic, for negligence in the discharge of a duty assumed by them.”

And it was held that the cause of action had its origin in a breach of duty committed by Alexander, who, in undertaking to afford medical treatment to Meniffee, impliedly undertook that he was reasonably well qualified to perform the service and that his failure to exercise reasonable skill was a violation of a contract duty that he assumed.

It is conceded by counsel for appellant that this case is conclusive of the question under consideration if it should be adhered to. Although the reasoning of this opinion and the conclusion reached, is vigorously attacked as unsound, a re-examination of the question satisfies us of its correctness. The conclusion reached naturally follows from the well grounded assumption that the cause of action originated in a breach of duty flowing from a contract relation, and the resulting damage had its foundation in the contract rather than in the injury to the person.

In respect to the suggestion that appellee was guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat a recovery in failing, upon receipt of the telegram, to telegraph the family of his sister requesting them to postpone the funeral until he could reach Williamsburg, we may say that although appellee's cause of action was complete when the company negligently failed in reasonable time to deliver to him the telegram, it was yet his duty to minimize the damages if he could reasonably have done so. The rule is that where an injured party finds that a wrong has been perpetrated on him, he should use all reasonable means to arrest the loss. He can not stand idly by and permit the loss to increase, and then hold the wrong-doer liable for the loss which he might have prevented. It is only incumbent upon him, however, to use reasonable exertion and reasonable expense; and the question in such cases is always whether the act was a reasonable one, having regard to all the circumstances of the particular case. (13 Cyc., 71; Tradewater Coal Co. v. Lee, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 215; Illinois Central R. Co. v. Gheem, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1952.) And this principle applies to actions for damages against telegraph companies for the failure to deliver a telegram as well as to other actions for breach of contract. (Western Union Tel. Co. v. Matthews, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 3.)

If appellee, after receiving the telegram, could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have secured a postponement of the funeral, it was his duty to have done so. This well-settled principle of law, however, is not applicable to the facts of this case. When appellee received the telegram it was too late to have sent a message requesting the postponement of the funeral, and therefore, he was not guilty of negligence in failing to take this action. It was not within his power, in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, to have minimized the damages.

Finding no prejudicial error, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

C., N. O. & T. P. RY. CO. v. LORTON.

(Filed June 5, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Duty of With Reference to Its Coaches, Windows and So On—Falling of Window—Injury to Passenger—It is the duty of railroad companies to keep their coaches, including its windows and doors, in proper condition. The question as to the falling of the window on appellee's hand was a simple one of fact, submitted to the jury in such manner that they could not mistake the law applicable to the case.

2. Continuance—Bill of Exceptions—The record does not disclose, except the affidavit made in connection with the motion for a new trial, that a continuance was asked because of the absence of a witness, therefore, it can not be said what error was made in this respect. But it appears that the necessary steps to procure the attendance of the witness were not taken.

O. H. Waddle & Son and John Galvin for appellant.

W. M. Catron and Morrow & Morrow for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

Appellee, who was a passenger upon one of appellant's trains, brought this action to recover damages sustained by reason of a window in the car, in which she was riding, falling upon her hand. The defense of the company was a traverse, and a plea of contributory neglect. Upon a trial before a jury, appellee was awarded $325, and judgment for this amount was rendered against the company. A reversal is asked for reasons that will be noticed in the course of the opinion.

Appellee, a lady of middle age, took passage at Junction City for Burnside. She testifies that when she took a seat in the coach, the window by which she was seated, was up. After a time the window fell and was raised by a passenger in the coach. Presently it fell again, when it was again raised by appellee's son. In a short time it again fell, and appellee's hand, being under it, was seriously bruised and injured. Appellee was not an experienced traveler—indeed she testifies that she had never ridden on a train before this time, and as the day was warm and the country new to her, she desired the window kept open for her convenience and comfort, and also that she might better view the country through which the train was passing. There is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether the accident happened between Junction City and Somerset, or between Somerset and Burnside. The witnesses for appellant company testified that it happened before the train reached Somerset; while appellee and her witnesses say it occurred after leaving Somerset, and between that point and Burnside. We do not, however, regard it as material whether the injury happened between Junction City and Somerset, or between Somerset and Burnside. Although counsel for appellant insist in their brief that appellee and her witnesses placed the accident between Somerset and Burnside, because the company had present at the trial the trainmen who were in charge between Junction City and Somerset, but who left the train at Somerset, when it was taken in charge by a new crew.

The amount of the verdict is not seriously complained of, although it is strenuously urged that appellee was not entitled to recover anything, because her injury was the result of such contributory negligence upon her part as that it should defeat a recovery. The plea of contributory negligence is based upon the evidence of appellee as well as other witnesses, who testified that the widow had twice fallen in the presence of appellee before her hand was injured. The fact, however, that the window had twice fallen, and that thereafter appellee had it raised and placed her hand under it, did not in our opinion, constitute such negligence per se as would deny a recovery. Whether it was negligence or not, on the part of appellee, after she discovered that the window would not remain up, to have it raised and place her hand in a position so that the window might fall upon it, was a question of fact for the jury to pass upon. It is the duty of a railway company to keep and maintain its passenger coaches, including the windows and doors, in a reasonably safe condition for the safety, convenience and comfort of passengers; and the failure upon its part to discharge this duty renders it liable in damages to any passenger who suffers injury as a direct result of such failure unless the passenger is guilty of such neglect as will defeat a recovery. Although the window had twice fallen, appellee might have believed it would not fall again—especially when her son, who raised it the second time, said that it would not again fall.

Complaint is also made that the court erred in refusing to grant a continuance on account of the absence of William Doyle, an important and material witness for appellant. The record does not disclose, except in an affidavit made in connection with the motion for a new trial, that a continuance was asked on account of the absence of this witness. Therefore, we can not say what error, if any, was committed in this particular.

If the appellant desired the presence of Doyle as a witness, it should have taken the usual and necessary steps to procure his attendance; and failing in this, have asked a continuance on account of his absence, or asked to have read an affidavit containing the statements he would make if placed upon the witness stand. We are informed in the brief of counsel for appellant, that the reason none of these preliminary steps, so well known by counsel for appellant to be necessary, were not taken is, that he was misled by some agreements made with counsel for appellee. But in the absence of anything in the record to support the statements contained in the brief, we can not assist counsel out of the difficulty in which his reliance upon the courtesy he supposed opposing counsel would extend has placed him.

Misconduct of the jury and of counsel for appellee is also relied upon, but we find nothing in the record indicating that either the jury or counsel were guilty of any misconduct.

The only exception contained in the record is in respect to the instructions of the court, and this is not well founded. The instructions informed the jury in substance, that it was the duty of appellant to keep its railway passenger coach in a reasonably safe condition, and to use ordinary care to prevent injury to its passengers—but that they should find for the company unless they believed from the evidence that the window that fell upon plaintiff's hand was defective, and known to be so by the company, or might have been known to it by the use of ordinary care. And further that they should find for it if they believed that before the window fell the plaintiff knew of its defective condition. It will thus be seen that the issues of fact as well as of law, were very simple, and the real issue in the case was submitted to the jury in such a manner that they could not mistake the law applicable to the case.

Finding no error in the record the judgment must be affirmed.

BURDETT v. MULLINS' EX'TX. .

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Verdicts—Instructions—Failure to Instruct—It is a rule of the Court of Appeals not to reverse a case for the failure of the lower court to give an instruction which the appellant did not ask, where the instructions which the court gave are correct as far as they go.

2. Same—Against Weight of Evidence—Credibility of Witnesses—While the verdict seems to be against the weight of the evidence, the credibility of the witnesses is peculiarly for the jury, there was some evidence to support the verdict if they believed the witnesses, and this was a question for them to determine.

J. Alexander Chiles for appellant.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Amy Allison was the grandmother of Joshua Burdett's wife; she lived in a house belonging to him in Lexington, Kentucky, and for the last year of her life was nursed by Anna Mullins, her health being infirm especially during the last few months of her life. She died in February, 1906. On September 15, 1906, Anna Mullins brought this suit against Joshua Burdett, charging that he had employed her to take care of Amy Allison as long as she lived and had agreed to pay her a reasonable price for her services, the agreement being made in February, 1905; that her services were reasonably worth $200, for which she prayed judgment. The defendant by his answer, in substance alleged that he made the contract with Anna Mullins in February, 1906, and only a short time before Amy Allison died. He also alleged that after the death of Amy Allison, he had turned over her personal property to Anna Mullins and she had accepted it in full of her services. He also pleaded that Amy Allison drew a pension and had other moneys which Anna Mullins had received and which more than paid her for such services as she rendered. On the trial before a jury there was a verdict and judgment for Anna Mullins for the amount she claimed; and the defendant appeals. During the pendency of the appeal Anna Mullins died, and the case has been revived against her executrix.

The instructions which the court gave on the trial submitted to the jury the question whether Burdett had employed Anna Mullins to take care of Amy Allison and whether what she had received was of value more or less than her services. The instructions seem to be correct and our attention has not been called to any defect in them. The defendant did not ask any other instruction on the trial. Our rule is not to reverse a case for the failure of the court to give any instruction which the appellant did not ask, where the instructions which the court gave are correct as far as they go.

The chief complaint on the appeal is that the verdict is palpably against the evidence. The verdict seems to be against the weight of the evidence; but the credibility of the witnesses is peculiarly for the jury. They saw and heard the witnesses and, on the whole case, we can not say that their finding is palpably against the evidence. There is abundant evidence in the case to support the verdict, if the jury believed the witnesses, and whether they would credit this or that witness, was peculiarly a question for them to determine.

Judgment affirmed.

McCAULEY v. TWYMAN, &c.

(Filed June 5, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Passway—Long Use—Presumption of Right—Where a passway has been used without interruption for a long number of years, the presumption will be indulged that its use is a matter of right.

2. Same—Adjoining Lands—Agreed Passway—Long Recognized—Effect—Where two brothers owning adjoining tracts of land, in order to straighten their lines, made a passway between them, each surrendering to the other a parcel of land on his side of the passway, and so recognized the passway as their dividing line for forty years, such passway controls, and their fences should be adjusted accordingly.

W. T. Lafferty for appellant.

J. J. Osborne for appellees.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellees in this action averred that they were entitled to a passway from their lands to the Venus turnpike, and that the appellant, McCauley, had erected a fence in the passway, the fence at some places being in the center thereof; so that the use of it was entirely obstructed. They asked a mandatory injunction requiring appellant to remove his fence to a point ten feet west of the center of the passway. Upon hearing the case, the court granted the relief sought and McCauley appeals.

The land owned by McCauley on the west side of the passway, and was formerly owned by Daniel Taylor. The land now owned by appellees lies on the east side of the passway, and was formerly owned by Jacob Taylor. Jacob Taylor and Daniel Taylor are very old men and brothers. Many years ago, and when each of them owned the land now owned by appellant and appellees, they opened a passway on the line between their lands, so that they might have access to and from the turnpike. The agreement as to the passway was not in writing, but there is ample evidence that it was used by the Taylors, and by persons going to and from the road to their places, as well as by other persons, for as much as forty years before appellant erected his fence. The passway was well defined, and the use of it in places had made a cut in the ground as much as two feet deep.

When the agreement between the Taylor brothers was made in reference to the passway, Daniel Taylor, the main body of whose land was situated on the west side of the passway, owned a few acres on the west side of it; and Jacob Taylor, the main body of whose land was on the east side of the passway, owned a few acres on the west side of it. In order that the land of each might be in one tract, and no part of it separated from the other by a road or passway, an exchange was made, by which Daniel Taylor took the small piece of land owned by Jacob Taylor that lies on the west side of the passway, and Jacob Taylor got the piece of land owned by Daniel situated on the east side of the passway. So that, after this exchange was made, all of the land of Daniel Taylor was on the west side, and all the land of Jacob Taylor on the east side of the passway, which was the line between their farms. There was no written evidence of this exchange of land between these brothers. As Jacob Taylor was 91 years old when his deposition was taken in this case, said:

"Me and Daniel Taylor never exchanged any land, but the one time, and then I owned a little piece on the west side of the road and he owned a little piece on the east side of the road, and we swapped land, and the reason why we swapped, I will tell you: This land was too little to fence up or do anything with, the land that I owned on the west side of the road; and the same way with him; and when we made that swap, he took possession of my land and I took possession of his; and the next thing we made this road the line and the outlet there, and I said, 'Daniel, I will keep everything out of the way of the road on the east side and you must keep everything out on the west side,' and we agreed to that and stood to it."

McCauley, when he bought the land formerly owned by Daniel Taylor, had notice of this agreement—the deed conveying the land to him reciting: "To have and to hold the same with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging; and the first party hereby covenants with the second party that the land so conveyed is free and unencumbered, and that they will forever warrant and defend the same against all claims whatever; except that part which lies inside of the aforesaid boundary, and on the east side of the Ridge road, which part is now in the possession of Jacob Taylor, on account of a trade or exchange of land made by said Taylor and D. Taylor." This reference in his deed is to the exchange of land made between Jacob and Daniel Taylor, before mentioned, of which there was no record; and the "ridge road" mentioned is the passway. This passway was originally opened from the Venus turnpike, at that time a dirt road, to what was known as the Reese pike, a distance of some two miles. A part of this old passway between these two roads was closed many years ago, and is not involved in this controversy.

McCauley relies, with considerable earnestness, upon a compromise made between him and one E. D. Fryman, by which, according to his contention, it was agreed he should have the right to erect his fence in the passway. That a compromise of this nature was made is vigorously disputed, and upon this controverted question of fact, we are not disposed to hold that the chancellor erred in holding that this compromise did not have the effect of authorizing McCauley to take possession of the passway. The chancellor did not in terms express an opinion about the effect of this alleged compromise, but it is manifest that he did not regard it as a serious obstacle in the way of granting the relief asked for by appellees.

There is also some evidence that after McCauley placed his fence in the passway, appellees, in going to the turnpike, traveled over the land of Jacob Taylor; and the point is made that the fact they did this was a recognition of the existence of the compromise relied on by McCauley, but appellees, in response to this argument, say that they went over the land of Taylor by his permission, and because it was the only available route they had. It has been frequently announced by this court that, when a passway has been used without interruption for a long number of years, the presumption will be indulged that its use is a matter of right. In this case the evidence is overwhelming that this passway was used without interruption by the vendors of appellee for as much as forty years. And at the time McCauley bought from Daniel Taylor, he must have known of the existence of this road. Indeed, the language before quoted, taken from the deed conveying the land to him, leaves no room to doubt that he had actual knowledge of its existence at the time of his purchase. The evidence is not sufficient to warrant us in adjudging in opposition to the opinion of the chancellor that the compromise depended upon deprived appellees of the right to this way.

It is also pointed out that the court erred in ordering appellant to move his fence ten feet from the center of the road. The evidence is not clear as to the width of the passway, but there is evidence that in some places, appellant's fence, which was irregularly built, was nine feet east of the center of the passway, and at other places a less distance. Under the facts we can not say that it was error to require him to move his fence ten feet from the center of the road.

The judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

SCHNEIDERHAHN'S GUARDIAN v. ZELLER, &c.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Devise by Husband to Wife—Estate Devised—Construction—A husband by his will provided that "after my death, when all my debts are paid, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Catherine Zeller, all my personal, mixed and real estate of which I may be possessed at the time of my death for her sole use and benefit, to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper." Held—That the will gives the testator's wife the entire estate absolutely. The words "to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper," do not restrict the widow's interest to a life estate in the property devised, or constitute a limitation over.

C. H. Shield and Camden R. McAter for appellant.

Forcht & Field, Kohn, Baird and Sloss & Kohn for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

John Zeller died in the city of Louisville, testate. So much of his will as requires consideration, reads as follows:

"That after my death, when all of my just debts are paid, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Catherine Zeller, all my personal, mixed and real estate of which I may be possessed at the time of my death, for her sole use and benefit, to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper. And I appoint my wife, Catherine Zeller, executrix of this, my last will and testament, without security."

This action was brought to obtain a construction of the will. All the children and grandchildren of the testator were made parties. The Widow, Catherine Zeller, survived her husband several years, but from the death of her husband until her own, claimed to be the sole devisee under his will and the absolute owner in fee of all the estate left by him. She also left a will by which she undertook to dispose of the property held by her under her husband's will, except such portions as she conveyed by deed to some of her children before her death.

Appellees, Wm. Zeller, a son of John and Catherine Zeller, and the widow and children of Henry Zeller, deceased, another son, brought this action; it being their contention that the widow of John Zeller took under the will a fee simple title to all the estate devised. The other children of the testator do not seem to disagree with Wm. J. Zeller, as to the character of the estate Catherine Zeller took under the will, but one of the grandchildren, the appellant, Florence Schneiderhahn, an infant, together with her guardian, the Louisville Trust Company, by answer, counter-claim and cross-petition denied that Catherine Zeller took, under the will of John Zeller, a fee simple title to the estate devised, and alleged that at most she took only a life estate with remainder to the children of herself and John Zeller, and that her attempted disposition of the property by deed and will was unauthorized and void. She asked that the will and deed made by Catherine Zeller be set aside, and the estate divided in proper ratio among the alleged remaindermen under the will of John Zeller, of whom she claimed to be one, as heir at law of her mother, who was a daughter of John Zeller.

A demurrer was filed by appellees to the answer, counter-claim and cross-petition of appellants which the court sustained, and adjudged that Catherine Zeller took under the will of John Zeller a fee simple title to all the property devised. From the judgment sustaining the demurrer and construing the will, Florence Schneiderhahn and her guardian prosecute this appeal.

We are of opinion that the construction given the will of John Zeller by the circuit court was correct. It gives the testator's widow the entire estate absolutely and for her sole use and benefit; The words "to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper" do not restrict the widow's interest to a life estate in the property devised, or constitute a limitation over. There is no remainder and no trust, and consequently the testator's children take no interest. The will was written and the testator's death occurred before the enactment of the present statute with respect to the property rights of married women, and the language used in the will was appropriate to create a married woman's separate estate in fee. The sentence with reference to the use of the property by the sole devisee was merely the expression of the testator's expectation that she would use the property as suggested, and was therefore merely a recommendation as to the use to which it might be applied; nothing more.

"The law favors the vesting of estates. In cases of doubt, it favors a fee rather than a less estate, and an estate once given in fee will not be defeated by a subsequent provision in the same instrument limiting it to a smaller estate unless the language of the instrument or the intention of the testator requires it." (McCauley v. Dale, 108 S. W., 268; Lee v. Moore, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 495; Baxter v. Isaacs, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1618; Moore v. Sleet, 113 Ky., 600; Wilson v. Bryan, 90 Ky., 482; McAdams v. Norton, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1719.)

In Scott v. Scott's Adm'r., 32 Ky. Law Rep., 464, the language used by the testator with reference to a devise to his wife was "to have, to hold, and to use as she may wish," all of the remainder of his estate after paying his debts. In construing this will the court said that under Kentucky Statutes, section 2342, words of inheritance were not necessary to pass the fee; that the language used by the testator indicated his intention that his wife was to have all of his property to do with as she pleased, and no intention to vest title to any part of the property in the children.

In Cox v. Anderson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 721, the devise was to the wife of all the testator's estate "To have and to hold for her own use and benefit; when she is done with it, I give to Mt. Zion Church $1,000." It was held by this court that the gift of the fee, precluded any limitation over, and that the bequest to the church was unenforceable.

In Fink v. Liesman, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 710, the testator gave to his widow all of his personal, mixed and real estate during her life, with full power and authority to sell it if she saw proper, with the proviso that what might be left at her death, should be divided among his children. It was held that the widow took the estate in fee and that a deed executed by her conveyed a good title.

In Sale v. Thornsbury, 86 Ky., 266, the will devised to the widow of the testator an estate in fee with the request that if she married again, she would see that the interests of their children were protected. This court's construction of the will was that the widow took an absolute estate free of any trust for herself or the children.

To the same effect are the following cases: Enders v. Pascoe, 89 Ky., 17; Webster v. Wathen, 97 Ky., 318; Igo v. Irvine, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1165; Goslee's Adm'r v. Goslee's Ex'or., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 654.

The most recent decision of this court on the question involved is Wood v. Wood, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 408, in which the provisions of the will and the intention of the testator were very similar to those in the case at bar. The court held that it was the intention of the testator to give the wife an estate in fee and that the precatory or commendatory words connected with the devise, did not amount to a command or create a trust.

Under the foregoing authorities and others that might be cited, it is manifest that the widow of John Zeller was vested with a fee simple title to the entire estate devised.

Judgment affirmed.

ASHER & HENSLEY v. HOWARD.

(Filed June 5, 1908—Not to be reported.)

This action on two notes for $660, is affirmed on the evidence, the court holding that the instructions fairly and fully presented to the jury the issues as made by the pleadings and warranted by the proof.

Cook & Jones for appellants.

L. D. Lewis and N. J. Weller for appellee.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

In January, 1901, appellee, E. S. Howard, sold to John Slusher certain standing timber for $1,320. At the same time that this sale was consummated, Slusher entered into a contract with appellants, Asher & Hensley, by which they were to pay him a certain price for this timber, when it was cut and delivered in the log at designated points on the water. Slusher executed his notes to Howard for the purchase price and Asher & Hensley became his sureties thereon. Howard became Slusher's surety to appellants on the contract whereby he agreed to cut and deliver the timber within a specified time, at the points designated. The purchase price was evidenced by two notes, one for $300, due in three months, and one for $1,320, due in six months. The note for $300 was paid at maturity.

When the note for $1,320 came due, it was not paid. Asher & Hensley called upon the bank and discussed this note with them, and an arrangement was made, by which it was agreed between the bank and Asher & Hensley, that two notes for $660 each, should be prepared and forwarded to Slusher and Howard, appellee, with the request that they sign them as principals. Neither Slusher nor Howard was present at these conversations. The notes were prepared by the cashier of the bank, as agreed, and forwarded to Slusher, who signed them and procured the signature of appellee thereto, and returned them to the bank, where, after they had been signed by Asher & Hensley, they were received by the bank, in payment for the old note for $1,320, and that was delivered up to Asher & Hensley. When these two notes for $660 came due, they were paid by Asher & Hensley, who thereafter brought suit against Slusher and appellee, alleging that they were joint principals therein. In the meantime, Slusher had failed in business, taken the benefit of the bankrupt law and been discharged. His discharge was pleaded and the case was dismissed as to him. Appellee, denied liability, pleaded the original transaction, and alleged that he had signed the two notes merely as an accommodation to Asher, Hensley and Slusher, and at the request of the bank, and had not intended, as between himself and the other parties named, to be bound for the payment thereof. The reply admitted the original transaction, as alleged in the answer, denied that the two notes were renewals of the $1,320 note, or intended as such, but were obligations on the part of Slusher and appellee, made and entered into for the purpose of securing to Slusher time within which to execute his contract and also to prevent the bank from suing appellee on his guaranty. Issue was thus joined on the question as to whether or not appellee was a joint principal with Slusher on the notes in question, or an accommodation endorser for the benefit of Slusher and Asher and Hensley. On a trial of this question before a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of appellee and to reverse this Asher & Hensley have appealed.

The evidence introduced on the trial consisted of the testimony of the parties to these contracts and that of the cashier of the bank. It was shown that at the time the note for $1,320 fell due, Slusher had made no default in his contract with appellants for cutting and delivering the timber to them, although they testified that at that time they feared he was going to do so, and for this reason they were unwilling to pay the note, but wanted appellee, Howard, as he had guaranteed that Slusher would faithfully and in the time provided for in the contract, cut and deliver the timber in question to sign the notes as principal along with Slusher, and stated to the cashier of the bank that if this was done they would sign them as sureties. The cashier of the bank testified that, under the direction of appellants, he prepared and forwarded the two notes in suit to Slusher, and Slusher testified that he signed them and, with some difficulty, procured the signature of appellee thereto. At this time, Slusher, not being in default with his timber, appellee was in no wise liable to appellants by reason of his suretyship on the timber contract. He testifies positively that when he signed the notes he did so believing that they were being executed for the purpose of renewing the note for $1,320, and that in so doing he was merely accomodating Slusher and appellants by extending the date of payment. This money represented the purchase price of his own timber, and it is not reasonable to suppose that he was voluntarily obligating himself to pay for appellants and Slusher $1,320, which they owed to him.

Appellants testified that when they signed the two notes for $660 each, it was with the understanding that they were to become sureties merely on same, whereas appellee testified that when he signed them it was with the understanding that he was doing so as an accomodation maker for the benefit of appellants and Slusher. If presumptions are to be indulged in, the latter is more reasonable than the former, and the jury no doubt saw it in this light.

Appellants complain especially of the instructions given by the court, which are as follows:

"1. You shall find for the defendant, E. S. Howard, unless you shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, E. S. Howard, and John Slusher, as principals, and the plaintiffs, Asher & Hensley, as sureties for the said Howard and Slusher, executed the two notes named in the petition and shall further believe from the evidence that said Asher & Hensley as such sureties, if you shall believe from the evidence they were sureties, paid said notes, in which event you will find for the plaintiffs the sum of $1,320, with interest from February 6, 1902, subject to a credit of $24.16, August 23, 1902, and $519.39, July 1, 1903.

"2. If, however, you shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, E. S. Howard, signed said notes as an accomodation maker for Asher & Hensley, you will find for the defendant."

These instructions are not subject to the criticisms made of them, but fairly and fully presented to the jury the issues as made by the pleadings and warranted by the proof.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellants, the judgment is affirmed.

MILLER v. RITTER LUMBER COMPANY.

(Filed June 5, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Action for Services—Evidence—In this action by appellant for services under his alleged contract, the evidence shows that his employment was not for a fixed length of time, but was such that might be terminated at will. Therefore, his action to recover for services after he had been discharged was properly dismissed.

J. S. Cline for appellant.

Auxier & Auxier for appellee.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

Appellant, Robert L. Miller, was employed by the appellee company to assist in abstracting titles to certain properties in Buchanan county, Virginia. After he had been engaged some three months or more in this work, he was discharged by the company, whereupon, he filed this suit, seeking to recover of the company $650.00 for five months' services and expenses, alleging that he had been employed by the appellee company for eight months at the agreed price of $100.00 per month for his services and $30.00 per month for his expenses. The company denied liability, admitted the employment but denied that it was for any specified time. Proof was taken by deposition, and the case tried by the court, by agreement, without the intervention of a jury, and the trial judge found for appellee and dismissed appellant's petition. We are asked to review his finding and judgment.

The sole question in the case is, was the employment for a fixed and definite time or was it such an employment as either could terminate at will? But two witnesses have testified, appellant and the agent of appellee, with whom the contract was made. They differ as to the terms of the contract, appellant insisting that the employment was for eight months, while appellee's agent testifies that the employment was not for any specified length of time, and that the continuance of the employment was discretionary with either party. Certain letters which passed between them are filed with their depositions. In one of these letters, written after appellant had been at work for more than a month, he makes this inquiry:

"In order that I may arrange some private affairs I would be glad if you would let me know as near as possible how long you think the company will employ me. If I will be here for a long enough time to justify it, I am thinking of bringing my wife here and keeping house, as getting board is such an item and so unsatisfactory. I can arrange to get a furnished house and would like to hear from you in order to notify the party owning same as to whether or not I will want it."

The tone and tenor of this letter is clearly against the claim and contention of appellant, but he relies upon the letter written to him in response to this inquiry, in which the following language is used:

"Replying to your letter in reference to time that the company will need your services in Grundy. It is impossible for me at this time to determine, for the reason that I can't determine how long it will take you and Mr. Litz to do the work which the company now has outlined, and when you are through this, it may be possible that some other work will be developed. It is the purpose of the company to continue investigation of all Slate Creek titles until the work is completed, and also to complete the investigation of the Knox Creek titles. &c."

The foregoing is all of the letter in question that is pertinent to the issue. We are of opinion that it does not support the theory of appellant, but, on the contrary, that it shows that at that time both appellant and appellee's agent understood his contract of employment alike, to-wit: that it was for an indefinite period, and being such, either had a right to terminate it at any time he saw fit, without notice or cause. (26 "Cyc," 981, L. & N. v. Offutt, 99 Ky., 427, and L. & N. v. Harvey, 99 Ky., 157.)

This rule is not at all in conflict with that announced in the case of Yellow Poplar Timber Co. v. Rule, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 2006. In that case appellee had sustained an injury while in the employ of appellant company, and was demanding damages for such injury, and the company, in consideration that he would not press his claim for damages, agreed to employ him at the rate of $2.50 per day so long as it was in the saw-mill business on the Ohio river. He accepted this offer and did not sue. After he had been so employed by the company until the statute of limitation had run against his claim for damages, he was discharged, and he sued for breach of contract. A recovery was had, and upon appeal this court held that a recovery was proper as the employment, in that case, was not for an indefinite time but, within the understanding of the parties, was for a definite length of time and was capable of being ascertained within a reasonable degree of certainty. In other words it was there held that in that class of cases where the consideration for the employment is paid either wholly or in part in advance by the relinquishment of a claim for personal injuries the contract can not be said to be indefinite, and can not be terminated at the will of the employer without cause. (Penn. Company v. Dolan., 6 Ind., 109; Harrington v. Kansas City Cable R. Company, 60 Mo., 223.) Appellant's contention in the case at bar is not supported by the case of Yellow Poplar Lumber Company v. Rule.

Appellant admits that he undertook this employment upon a month's time on trial, and that if at the end of that time his services were not satisfactory to appellee then they might be terminated; but his letter, written after the expiration of that time, shows conclusively, to our mind, that he did not then look upon his contract as one of employment for any fixed and certain length of time, and the letter written in response thereto is rather corroborative of this fact, and the trial judge properly construed this contract to be an employment which might be terminated by either at will.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

THOMAS' EXECUTRIX v. THOMAS' G'D'N., &c.

(Filed June 9, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Recitals—Disposition of Entire Estate—Testator devised (1) his house and lot to his wife for life and at her death to descend to his three daughters jointly, or in case of the death of any without issue, to the survivor. (2.) Authorized his executor to convert into money any property, real or personal, which he owned and divide one-fifth of a $2,000 life policy to his granddaughter and to hold the same until she marries, or in case of her death, to go to his other heirs. (3.) The executors were empowered to sell all his real estate, and his wife to have all the household furniture. (4.) That his wife and three daughters shall share equally in the distribution of his estate after the bequests made, are complied with. Held—That, by the will, testator disposed of all his estate.

2. Same—Reasonable Presumption—The natural and reasonable presumption is that when a will is made the testator intends to dispose of his whole estate, which presumption is overcome only where the intention to do otherwise is plain and unambiguous, or is necessarily implied.

Heavrin & Woodward, Leon P. Lewis and W. S. Pryor for appellant.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg, J. S. Glenn and J. E. Fogle for appellees.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

James A. Thomas, of Hartford, Ohio county, Kentucky, died in February, 1902, leaving surviving him his widow, Mary C. Thomas, three unmarried daughters, Etta, Stella and Lilly, and a granddaughter, Evelyn Fair Thomas, the only child of Owen J. Thomas, who died intestate before the demise of his father, James A. Thomas. At the time of his death, James A. Thomas was possessed of considerable personal property and various tracts of realty. He left a will, dated April 30th, 1901, which was admitted to probate in February, 1902. This will is as follows:

"Know all men, that I, James A. Thomas, of Hartford, Ky., being of sound mind and disposing memory, but mindful of my mortality, do make, ordain and publish this instrument as my last will and testament in manner and form as follows:

"I will and desire that my just debts, if any, be paid in full.

"I will and devise to my beloved wife, Mary C. Thomas, my house and lot now occupied by myself and family as a residence situated in Hartford, Kentucky, to be used and enjoyed by her for and during the period of her natural life and at her death said house and lot is to descend to and vest in my three daughters, Stelia Thomas, Etta Thomas, and Lilly Thomas, jointly, and in case of the death of either, or any of them, without issue, the survivor or survivors shall hold the same jointly, but may sell and convey one to another or to anyone else, they all agreeing to said sale.

"I will and direct that my executor shall have the power to convert into money any property, real or personal, of which I may die possessed, and divide and distribute as follows:

"To my little granddaughter, Evelyn Fair Thomas, one-fifth of a ($2,000) two thousand dollar life policy. In case the policy should not be paid in full, then my executor shall, out of my estate, make the amount for her, four hundred ($400) dollars and hold the same in trust by them for her until she should become of age or married, and in case of her death before arriving at the age of twenty-one years or her marriage, then this four hundred ($400) dollars shall become an asset of my estate for my other heirs and in order to carry into effect my will, I hereby vest my executors with power to sell and convey any real estate, which I may own at my death, and make deeds to same. It is my will and desire that my wife shall have and retain all my household and kitchen furniture.

"It is my special desire that my wife, Mary C. and three daughters, Stella, Etta and Lilly, shall share equally in the distribution of my estate after the bequests already made are complied with, and in case of the death of any of them without issue, those surviving or their issue, shall hold the same.

"Having full confidence in the integrity and capacity of my wife and daughter, Etta, I hereby nominate them executors of this will, and request that no bond or surety be required of them. It is my desire that no public sale be made of my personal estate, but that my executrix make out an inventory of my personal estate not included in the foregoing bequests to my wife, and file same in the county court clerk's office within a reasonable time, but such inventory to be attested by my executors only.

"Witness my hand this April 30th. 1901.

(Signed) "JAMES A. THOMAS."

This action was instituted by the testator's granddaughter, Evelyn Fair Thomas, to obtain a construction of the foregoing will. The chancellor below held that the testator died intestate as to all of his real estate except the house and lot, in the town of Hartford, in which he resided at the time of his death, and adjudged that Evelyn Fair Thomas was entitled to one-fourth interest in the testator's realty. From that judgment, Etta Thomas and others prosecute this appeal.

The sole question before us is: Did the testator die intestate as to all his real estate, other than the house and lot in which he resided at the time of his death? The validity of the will is not called in question, nor are we concerned with the fairness of its terms, except as an aid to the interpretation of the will. The very office of a will is to permit the testator to dispose of his property as he pleases. The fact that he did dispose of his property in a manner different from what we would have done, had we been similarly situated, can in no way effect the construction of the will where there is no ambiguity or uncertain language. Of course, there may be instances where the language of a will is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would secure fairness and equality, and the other would lead to an unequal distribution of the estate. Under such circumstances, the courts would lean to that construction which would place the devisees upon a plane of equality. But no such rule of interpretation applies where there is no ambiguity in the language of the will. Furthermore, the natural and reasonable presumption is that when so solemn and important an instrument as a will is executed, the testator intends to dispose of his whole estate, and does not intend to die intestate as to any part of his property, which presumption is overcome only where the intention of the testator to do otherwise is plain and unambiguous, or is necessarily implied. (Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 30, page 668; Trusty v. Trusty, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1127; Mayes v. Karn, 115 Ky., 264.) In James v. Pruden, 14 Ohio St., 253, the rule is thus stated:

"It very seldom happens that a man who goes to the trouble of making a will, intends to die intestate as to any of the property that he may own at the time of his death." And in the case of Boyd v. Latham, Busb. L. (44 N. Car.) 365, the court said: "The rule, ut res magis valeat quam pereat, comes in aid of the general presumption that one who makes a will intends to dispose of all of his property."

With this rule of interpretation before us, let us examine the language of the will in question. We find that, after directing the payment of his debts, the testator first disposes of the family residence by giving it to his wife for life, with remainder to his three daughters. He then wills and directs that his executors shall have power to convert into money any property, real or personal, of which he may die possessed, and divide and distribute as follows: First, he gives to his granddaughter, Evelyn Fair Thomas, one-fifth of a two thousand dollar life policy, and provides that, in case the policy should not be paid in full, his executors shall, out of his estate, make the amount which she should receive equal to four hundred dollars. He then gives the household and kitchen furniture to his wife. Immediately following the last item is the clause in which he expresses the special desire that his widow, Mary C. Thomas, and his three daughters, Etta, Stella and Lilly, should share equally in the distribution of his estate after the bequests already made are complied with. The bequests referred to (the word "bequest" not being used in its strictly legal sense) consisted of the family home and the specific legacy of four hundred dollars to his grandchild. Thus it will be seen that the granddaughter was not overlooked in the distribution of the estate; that he had her in mind is shown by the provision which was made for her. Why the testator should have made this provision only, we are unable to say. It may be that she received property from other sources, or that her father had previously received assistance from the testator; but whatever may have been the testator's reason, the fact is, he made no other provision for his grandchild, and it is perfectly apparent from the language of the will that he intended that his wife and three daughters should share equally in all the remainder of his estate. The express power is given the executors to sell any real or personal property of which the testator died possessed. It is evident that the word "any" was used in the place of the word "all," and was meant to include, besides the personal property, all of his real estate, except his residence. After giving them the power to sell, he directs his executors to divide and distribute as follows: After bequeathing the sum of four hundred dollars to his grandchild and providing that his wife should have the household and kitchen furniture, he then points out in plain and explicit terms the manner in which his estate, after the bequests already made are complied with, which language can not be construed to include anything less than all the remainder of his estate, shall be distributed. In other words, he provides for the sale and distribution of his estate, and then gives the names of those among whom it shall be distributed. The language, we think, is incapable of any other construction than that the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate, both real and personal. We are, therefore, of opinion that the court erred in adjudging that the testator died intestate as to all of his real estate, except his residence, and that his granddaughter, Evelyn Fair Thomas, was entitled to one-fourth interest in such real estate.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

HENDERSON, &c. v. CITY OF LEXINGTON.

(Filed June 9, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Eminent Domain—Taking Private Property for Public Use—Jurisdiction of Courts—Whenever it is attempted in the interest of a private corporation, to take private property and devote it to a public use, the question as to whether the use to which it is to be put is or not a public one, is for the court to decide, and an act of the Legislature which attempts to deprive the courts of jurisdiction in such a case would be inoperative and void.

2. Cities—Right to Close Public Ways—Public Function—Discretion of Officials—Resumption—Burden of Proof—The streets, alleys and highways of a city are public places and under the exclusive control of the city and when the properly constituted authorities of the city declare that the welfare and convenience of the public demand that public ways shall be closed, it is exercising a public function as an agent and sub-division of the State and it will be assumed that the officers of the city, as public agents, will exercise such power with wisdom and discretion for the benefit of the public and that the proceeding is not for private or individual use or advantage, and the burden of showing the contrary is upon the person who objects to such proceeding.

3. Same—Legislative Act—Constitutionality—Assumption of Court—The court will not assume that an act of the Legislature authorizing the closing of a street or alley of a city, in whole or in part, by the city council, is unconstitutional because it fails to provide that the question of public use was a matter to be judicially determined, and such act does not take from the courts the control of the subject.

4. Same—Public Purpose—Jurisdiction of Courts—The question of the necessity, expediency or propriety of exercising the right of eminent domain for a public purpose, and the extent and manner of its exercise are questions of general public policy and belong to the Legislative department, but when the corporation that is given this power attempts to exercise it, it is for the courts to say whether or not it is exercised for a public purpose.

5. Act of City—Incidental Benefit to Others—Effect—The mere fact that a corporation or an individual might be interested or benefited by the taking of property by the city for its use, will not of itself deny the right of the city to exercise such power.

6. Closing Alley—Action—Necessary Parties—In a proceeding to close a street or alley in a city, the only persons who are necessary parties thereto are those whose property abuts upon or adjoins the street or alley proposed to be closed, but in case of a fraudulent combination between these property owners and the city to close such highway, not in the interest of the public, permit other persons not entitled to compensation to come in and resist the closing.

7. Same—Trial—Separate Trials—In the matter of allowing separate trials in a proceeding to close an alley way in a city, the discretion is largely in the trial judge. The amount of damages to which each of the parties is entitled can as well be assessed by a single jury as in separate trials by different juries.

8. Same—Measure of Damages—Loss of Business—Difference in Market Value of Property—The measure of damages to which an owner of property abutting on an alley is entitled which has been closed by the city, does not include loss occasioned to his business. He is only entitled to compensation for loss sustained to his property which is the difference in its market value by reason of closing the alley, and where such damages have been assessed by a properly instructed jury, the verdict will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This controversy grows out of the attempt of the city to close an alley. The record presents a number of questions that will make it necessary to state at considerable length the respective contentions of the parties, and to afford a better understanding of the local situation, the following map has been copied from the record:

vol. 33—45

The alley in question is known as Ayers Alley. It was eighteen feet wide, and extended from Main street to High street (crossing Water street, which runs parallel with and about midway between Main and High streets. Water street has for some years been occupied almost entirely by the railroad tracks of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, and at the point where it crossed Ayers alley there were some four tracks. As a result of the occupation of Water street, by the railroad, and the movement of trains and engines thereon, the alley crossing was exceptionally inconvenient and dangerous for vehicles and the traveling public. Three of the railroads entering Lexington, two of them having depots and terminal facilities in different parts of the city, desired to erect a union station into which all their passenger trains might run. This movement upon the part of the railroads met with the approval of the city authorities, and the result was a proposition upon the part of the railroad companies to erect a union station fronting on Main street, west of Ayers alley, and extended back to Water street, on which street the train sheds for the accomodation of passengers in entering and leaving trains should be located. As a part of this scheme for the erection of the union station, it was contemplated that Ayers alley should be closed and a viaduct constructed from Main to High streets, immediately west of and parallel with Ayers alley. The result of the negotiations between the city and the railroad companies was the erection of an ample and attractive station at the place proposed and the viaduct. This viaduct, where it crosses Water street, is elevated so as to permit the passage of trains. It is forty-three feet wide, substantially built, and affords safe and easy passage-way, both for pedestrians and vehicles between the two streets. When the arrangement for the erection of the viaduct and the station had been perfected, the city enacted an ordinance, directing the closing of so much of Ayers alley, as lay between a point 266 feet from the curb line of Main street to a point 192½ feet from the curb line of High street. In other words, under the ordinance, the alley was closed by a wall erected to each side of Water street, so as to effectually prevent persons who used the alley, on either the Main street or High street side, from crossing Water street—the purpose being to have Water street at this point practically free for the use of the railroads that occupied it.

The ordinance recited in a preamble, the reasons for closing that part of the alley, heretofore described, and directed the city solicitor to institute an action in the Fayette Circuit Court for the purpose of closing that portion of the alley described in the ordinance. It was enacted under the authority of an act of the General Assembly, approved March 22, 1906, providing in part that:

“Upon the adoption of an ordinance by the general council authorizing and directing the closing of the whole or any portion of a street or alley or other public highway within the limits or jurisdiction of the city, it shall be the duty of the city solicitor to institute an action in the circuit court for the purpose of having the same closed, and to such action all the owners of ground in the squares or lots divided by such street, alley or highway, or the portion thereof proposed to be closed, shall be made defendants; and if all of such defendants are competent to act for themselves and fail to object to the closing prayed for, then the court shall render a decree accordingly; but if any of said defendants object, or are under disability other than coverture, the court shall empanel a jury, which shall hear evidence and determine the amount of compensation in the form of damages to be paid to each of such defendants. The court shall thereupon direct that said street, alley or other highway be closed upon payment to each of such defendants of the amount of damages awarded to him, or, if any defendant refuses to accept such payment or be for any reason unable to do so, upon payment into court of the amount awarded such defendant or defendants."

As directed by the ordinance, the city solicitor brought this action, naming as defendants therein the railroad companies, who were equally interested with the city in its closing, and Alice McConathy, Mary E. O'Rear, W. H. Henderson, M. E. Combs, and W. E. Barron, the only persons who owned property abutting on the alley, between Main and High streets. These property owners objected to the closing of the alley, upon various grounds, some of which will be later noticed.

The case coming on for trial, a jury was empaneled to assess the damages, and awarded to Henderson, $3,500, to O'Rear $100—giving nothing to Barron. From the judgment upon this verdict these parties prosecute this appeal.

Pending the action, James McAllister, H. E. Wright and J. P. Wright, who owned property fronting on Main street, east of the alley, and running back to Water street, offered to file their separate petitions to be made parties defendant. Upon objection by the city, their tendered pleadings were rejected. They also appealed, but have dismissed their appeal.

Among the questions presented by counsel for appellants, are:

First. The constitutionality of the act of 1906.

Second. The right of the city to close Ayers alley.

Third. The necessary parties to the proceeding.

Fourth. The right of each of the parties to have a separate trial.

Fifth. The admission of evidence as to the amount of damages resulting to each of the parties; and the competency of other evidence rejected.

Sixth. The correctness of instructions upon the measure of damages.

Seventh. That the verdict of the jury is grossly inadequate.

Eighth. Whether or not the alley was closed to carry out an illegal agreement between the city council and the railroad companies, for the purpose of granting to the railroad companies that portion of the alley proposed to be closed.

Taking up these questions in the order named, which is also the order of their importance from a public point of view, we will first consider the act of 1906. It will be observed that under this act the council may adopt an ordinance directing the closing of a street, alley of public way, and thereupon, an action shall be instituted against the owners of ground in the squares or lots divided by the street, alley or way proposed to be closed; and if they object to the closing, the court shall empanel a jury to hear evidence and determine the amount of compensation to be paid. Under this act the city council is empowered to determine the necessity for the closing as well as the question of whether the closing is for a public use. The only matter left by the terms of the act to the courts being, to empanel a jury to ascertain the amount of compensation. The serious objection urged to the validity of this act is that it invests the city council with the sole authority to decide whether the closing is necessary for public purposes, apparently denying to the courts the right to inquire into this question.

Section 13, of the Constitution, of the State, provides in part that:

"Nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him."

And section 242 declares that:

"Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed by them, which compensation shall be paid before such taking, or paid or secured at the election of such corporation or individual before such injury or destruction."

It is admitted that the closing of a public street, alley or highway is a taking of public property within the meaning of these constitutional provisions, and that compensation must be made to the abutting owner; and further, conceded that the closing must be necessary for public purposes. Indeed, these two principles are too well settled to need more than the mere citation of the authorities that support them. (Transylvania University v. City of Lexington, 3 B. Mon., 25; Lexington & Ohio R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana, 289; Gargan v. Louisville, New Albany & Chicago R. Co., 89 Ky., 212; City of Louisville v. Bannon, 99 Ky., 74; Bannon v. Rohmeiser, 90 Ky., 48 Cooley's Constitutional Limitation, page 651.) So that the question narrows down to the proposition: Is it essential to the validity of an act like the one under consideration that the courts should be given the right and discretion to pass upon the question whether or not the taking is for a public purpose when this issue is made, or can the General Assembly of the State, by a legislative act, deprive the courts of the power to inquire whether or not the taking is necessary for a public purpose? In the consideration of this question, it should not be overlooked that although public corporations can not, except for public purpose, take, without his consent, the property of the individual, yet there is a difference as we will presently point out between taking private property for the use of a private corporation, and taking property by a municipal corporation for the use of the municipality.

Whenever it is attempted in the interest of a private corporation to take private property and devote it to a public use, the question as to whether the use to which it is to be put is or not a public one rests with the court to decide. This principle is well settled in this State. In Tracy v. Elizabethtown, Lexington & Big Sandy R. Co., 80 Ky., 259, a proceeding was instituted by a railroad company to take by condemnation for its use the land of an individual. No evidence was offered by either party relative to the character of the use or the necessity of the taking although the property owner denied that the taking was necessary for a public use. The court, after holding that, as an issue was made upon this point, the burden was upon the railroad company to show that the property desired to be taken was intended for a public use, said:

"For if the use be not public, or no necessity for the taking exists, the Legislature can not authorize the taking of private property against the will of the owner, notwithstanding compensation may be required. The courts can not control or supervise the propriety or policy of the condemnation authorized by the Legislature. But this uncontrolled power does not authorize the Legislature to so determine that the use is public as to make the determination conclusive upon the courts, * * * the existence of the public use in any class of cases is a question to be determined by the courts." (Chesapeake Stone Co. v. Moreland, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 1075.)

And this rule which is applicable to municipal or public corporations is not peculiar to the jurisprudence of this State, but is the one generally prevailing. Thus, it is said, in Lewis on Eminent Domain, section 158:

"All the courts, we believe, concur in holding that whether a particular use is public or not, within the meaning of the Constitution, is a question for the judiciary."

If, therefore, the General Assembly should undertake to enact a statute giving to a private corporation, such as a railroad, turnpike or telegraph company, invested with the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, or to a municipal corporation authority to take the private property of an individual upon the payment of compensation and deny to the courts the right to say whether the taking was necessary for a public purpose or not, we would not hesitate to declare so much of the act as undertook to deprive the courts of jurisdiction inoperative and void, upon the ground that the Legislature could not take from the courts the right to determine whether or not the property proposed to be taken was needed for a public purpose.

But municipalities and counties are agencies and subdivisions of the State. The streets, alleys, and highways of a municipality are public places. They are under the exclusive control of the municipality. And when the properly constituted authorities declare that the necessities, welfare, comfort and convenience of the public demands that private property shall be taken or that public ways shall be closed, the municipality is merely exercising a public function, such as the county courts exercise in the opening or closing of public roads. And it must be assumed that the officers of the city, as public agents, will exercise with wisdom and discretion the power lodged in their hands. They occupy towards the public a different relation from the officers and agents of private corporations. The latter, it may be assumed, are largely if not altogether influenced in the acquisition of property by the interest of the corporation they represent, and are more concerned with the private affairs entrusted to their care than they are in the welfare of the public. Therefore, when a private corporation desires to take private property, it must, if the matter is put in issue, affirmatively show by evidence that the property is needed for its use in the performance of its duties to the public. On the other hand, when a municipal corporation, invested by the Legislature with the power to close streets, alleys and highways, or to acquire property, undertakes to exercise the power, the presumption will be indulged that it is in the interest of and for the benefit of the public, and that the proceeding is not for private or individual use or advantage. And so if a municipality ordains that an alley, or highway, shall be closed, or a street opened it will be presumed that it is done in the interest of the public and necessary for public purposes, and the burden of showing to the contrary will be put upon the persons who object to the proceeding, and the court shall usually permit the defendants to make the issue and present evidence in support of it. But, in the case before us, it was so manifest from the pleadings that the closing of the alley was in the public interest that the court did not err in refusing to permit an issue of fact to be made on this point. A case might be presented where the court, after hearing the evidence, would refuse to permit a municipality to open, widen or close a street, alley or way, as if it was made to appear that the purpose was to promote private ends and that the action was not in the interests of the public, (City of Louisville v. Bannon, 99 Ky., 74; Lewis on Eminent Domain, section 134; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 27, page 114.)

Nor is the act unconstitutional because it seems to deny the right of the courts to inquire into the question of public use by failing to provide for the submission of this fact to the judiciary. We will not assume that the Legislature intended to take from the courts the consideration of this question. This is not our construction of the act. It was not essential to its validity that it should expressly stipulate that the question of public use was a matter to be judicially investigated and determined, and we hold that the act does not take from the courts the control of the subject.

It is also argued that the question of the necessity for the taking should be left to the decision of a judicial tribunal. But all the authorities agree that the question of necessity is distinct from the question of public use, and that the former question is exclusively with the Legislative. The necessity, expediency or propriety of exercising the right of eminent domain for a public purpose, and the extent and manner of its exercise for such purpose are questions of general public policy, and belong to the Legislative department of the government. Thus, in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 663, it is said:

"The authority to determine in any case whether it is needful to permit the exercise of this power must rest with the State itself; and the question is always one of strictly political character not requiring any hearing upon the facts or any judicial determination."

And in Lewis on Eminent Domain, it is laid down in section 238:

"Whether the power of eminent domain shall be put in motion for any particular purpose and whether the exigencies of the occasion and the public welfare require or justify its exercise are questions which rest entirely with the Legislature. When the use is public, the necessity or expediency of appropriating any particular property is not the subject of judicial cognizance. The general principle is now well settled that when the uses are in fact public, the necessity or expediency of taking private property for such uses by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, the instrumentalities to be used, and the extent to which such power shall be delegated, are questions appertaining to the political and legislative branches of the government."

The meaning of this is, that the law-making department may invest municipal and certain private corporations that perform some public service, with the right to take private property, and the courts will not inquire into the power of the Legislature to grant this authority. But, when the corporation that is invested with this power undertakes to exercise it, it is for the courts to say whether it is exercised for a public purpose or not. In other words, to determine whether or not the taking of the particular property the corporation desires to condemn is necessary for a public use. To illustrate, a telegraph, telephone or railroad company might be invested by the General Assembly of the State with the power to take the private property of individuals for its use, and the courts would not assume to say that the Legislature did not have the power to grant to the corporation this authority; but, when the corporation undertook to take private property, then the courts would have the unquestioned right to determine whether or not it was being taken for a public purpose, that is, whether or not it was in fact needed by the corporation in the performance of its duties to the public, or whether it was being taken for some other use not necessary in connection with the operation and conduct of the corporation in the performance of the duties it owed to the public.

The motives of the council in closing this alley are also assailed and the accusation is made that their action was influenced by a desire to assist the railroad companies that wanted the freer and safer use of Water street. But, we will not stop to inquire into the motives that prompted the council in the enactment of the ordinance in question. The record discloses that the only purpose they had was to subserve the public good. There is no evidence whatever indicating improper motive.

But, aside from this, when the exercise of authority by a city council is within its power, the motives that influenced it will not be inquired into, except in rare cases, where it is manifest that a flagrant wrong had been perpetrated upon the public, and valuable rights have been surrendered ostensibly for the public good but really for the benefit of private individuals. And the exceptional conditions that would authorize the courts to interfere, are not in any manner presented by this record. (Taylor v. Beckham, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1735; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Morehouse, 88 Am. St. Rep., 919; Waterloo Mfg. Co. v. Shannahan, 128 N. Y., 345; Liguire v. City of Chicago, 139 Ill., 46, 32 Am. St. Rep., 179; Farest Steel Co. v. City of Bridgeford, 60 Conn., 278; Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill., 51; 22 L. R. A., 393; VanWitsen v. Gutman, 79 Md., 405, 24 L. R. A., 403; Horton v. Williams, 99 Mich, 423.)

The mere fact that a corporation or an individual might be interested in or benefited by the taking of property will not of itself deny to the city the right to exercise the power. It is probable that in every case where the right of eminent domain is exercised, private interests will be more or less benefited; but the existence of this fact will not be allowed to defeat the benefits that will accrue to the public. The case before us is an illustration. The railroad companies occupying Water street were benefited by the closing of this alley, its closure removed the liability of accidents at the crossing, gave the companies freer use of Water street, and diminished the cost and expense of damage suits; but, at the same time the erection of the viaduct in connection with the closing of the alley furnishes a safe and convenient passage-way for the public from Main to High streets, relieving travelers of the dangers incident to the grade crossing of the alley. So far as the general public are concerned, there is no room to doubt that the closing of the alley, and the building of the viaduct, was a benefit. The only persons injured by the closing of the alley were those whose property abutted on it between the streets closed by its obstruction. And the mere fact that the railroad companies were benefited and to secure the benefit defrayed part of the expense incident to the condemnation proceedings, will not be sufficient to defeat the right of the city to exercise its power to take the property for the public good. (Knapp v. City of St. Louis, 153 Mo., 560; Vacation of Union street, 140 Pa. St., 525; Summerfield v. Chicago, 197 Ill., 270.)

The next question is, when the city undertakes to close one of its highways, what persons are necessary parties to the proceedings? The streets and highways of a city are for the use of the public, but this does not mean that the entire public of the city must be consulted before any particular highway or part thereof is closed; or, that all property holders in the city shall be made parties to the action, or receive compensation. If this was necessary, it would be impracticable to close any street, alley or highway, or any part thereof, however essential to the comfort, convenience and health of the city the closing might be. Thus, it is said in Transylvania University v. City of Lexington, 3 B. Mon., 25:

"Every owner of ground on any street in Lexington, has a right, as inviolable as it is indisputable, to the common and unobstructed use of the contiguous highway, so far as it may be necessary for affording him certain incidental easements and services, and for a convenient outlet to other streets. * * * The extent of this appurtenant right, depending on circumstances, may not in a particular case, be easily definable with mathematical precision. * * * But it can not, as to each proprietor of ground, be co-extensive with all the streets and alleys of the city. As a private right, it must, like that of vicinage, be limited by its own nature and end; that is, chiefly by the necessity of convenient access to, and outlet from the ground of each proprietor. Beyond some such general limit, as to highways, and subject, like other public roads, to alteration and even occlusion, by the sovereign will, for the common weal. We could not admit that there is no power to change any portion of a street in any part of the city, without the consent of every proprietor of ground in the whole city, or without making compensation in money to every such proprietor."

It is, however, difficult to determine with fairness to the public as well as the private owner, what property owners are so interested in the street, alley or highway proposed to be closed, as to render it necessary that they should be parties to the action. But, our conclusion upon this question is that the only persons who are entitled to compensation and are necessary parties to the proceeding, are those whose property abuts upon or adjoins the street, alley or highway proposed to be closed. We do not mean by this to limit the property owner entitled to compensation or who are necessary parties to the action to those who own property immediately at the point of closure. But think it should embrace all persons and all property abutting upon the street proposed to be closed. To illustrate, if it is desired to close a portion of the street, or the entire street known as "A," between "B," and "C," streets; then all the persons owning property upon "A," street between "B" and "C" streets are necessary parties to the action, and entitled to compensation. So that, in the case before us, as it was proposed to close a part of Ayers alley between High and Main streets, all persons who owned property abutting on either side of Ayers alley between High and Main streets were necessary parties to the action and entitled to compensation. But, owners of property abutting on Main or High streets, not adjoining the alley, were not necessary parties or entitled to compensation because the closing of the alley did not except indirectly, interfere with the right of ingress or egress to or from their property. In cases of this character, if it should be laid down that persons who own property not abutting on the street or alley intended to be closed as herein indicated were necessary parties or entitled to compensation, it would be difficult, if not wholly impracticable to select the persons who should be made parties and who were entitled to compensation. Property owners on adjoining streets or squares, might, with a show of reason and evidence, assert that their property was damaged by the closing, although they had ample access and outlet through other streets. Therefore, the equitable and practicable rule is to limit the persons entitled to compensation and to be made parties to the property owners abutting on the street, alley or highway proposed to be closed, between the nearest streets intersected by the street, alley or highway to be closed. Although if a case was presented in which it was made plain that there was a fraudulent arrangement between these property owners and the city to close the highway, not in the interest of the public, but for private ends, the court might permit, in the interest of the public, some other property owner, not entitled to compensation to come in and resist the closing.

It is further insisted that as Ayers alley was conveyed to and accepted by the city, under a deed, providing that "it shall always remain free and open as a public street or alley," the city had no power to close it in violation of the express conditions under which it was accepted. This argument, if sound, would in many instances impose upon municipalities unnecessary and unreasonable burdens. If a street or highway, dedicated to a city, should cease to be either useful or convenient for the public, and yet the city be obliged to keep it open and maintain it in sufficient repair, it would be imposing upon the public a useless expense; and to so hold would be opposed to both reason and public policy. In our opinion, the correct doctrine is that the city has the same control over highways deeded to it as was Ayers alley that it does over its other public ways, whether acquired by gift, purchase or condemnation. In short, all the streets and public ways of a city, however acquired, are subject equally and alike to the control and regulation of the municipal authorities. In accepting the alley under the conveyance the city did not bind itself irrevocably to keep it open. This is not the fair meaning of the contract. The city assumed the duty of keeping it open as other streets and alleys were kept open, and the right to close it as it might close other streets and alleys.

The city made all of the appellants defendants to the action to close the alley, insisting that the damages to which each of them was entitled should be assessed by the same jury and determined in the same proceeding. The appellants objected to this procedure and demanded that they be awarded separate trials. The matter of allowing separate trials in cases of this character is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, and his discretion, we would not feel authorized to interfere with, unless it worked serious injustice to some of the defendants. The action of the trial court in the case before us was not an abuse of discretion and seems to be in accordance with the provisions of the act, which declares that all the necessary parties shall be made defendants to the action, and contemplates that the damages to be assessed shall be determined in one trial. But, aside from this, there were only three parties defendant. The amount of damages to which each one of them was entitled could as well be assessed by a single jury as in separate trials before different juries. The question involved as to each of them was identically the same, the only difference being that one might be entitled to recover more damages than the other. Separate trials would have involved the consideration by the jury of every question of fact developed upon this trial except that relating to the damages to the particular property of each individual. So that, the time of the court would have been taken up in the hearing of three cases in which the same identical question was involved, except as to the amount of damages to be awarded to each. (Ency. of Pl. & Pr., volume 7, page 503; Washburn v. Milwaukee R. Co., 59 Miss., 379; McKee & St. Louis, 17 Mo., 184; Colcough v. Nashville R. Co., 2 Head (Tenn.), 171.)

It is also complained that numerous errors were committed in the admission and rejection of evidence, and in instructing the jury as to the measure of damages. An examination of the record discloses that the evidence was allowed to take a wide range, and every material fact necessary to enable the jury to properly understand and assess the amount of recovery to which each of the appellants was entitled was brought out. Accepting as correct expositions of the law, the instructions given by the court, the jury could not have failed to understand those facts in the case necessary to enable them to properly estimate the damages in accordance with the instructions.

The court instructed the jury that:

"If they believed from the evidence that either of said property holders will be damaged by closing of Ayers alley, the jury should say in their verdict what sum of money will compensate the said property holder for such damage. In estimating the damage done to each property holder the jury will consider the value to the property owner of the property abutting on said alley and belonging to such property holder, and if said property is of less value to the property holder, by reason of the closing of Ayers alley, than it would be if said alley were left open, the difference of value to the property holder of the property as it now is, and its value as it will be when said alley is closed, is the measure of damage done to the property holder by reason of the closing of said alley."

This instruction was more favorable to the property owners than they had the right to demand. They were entitled to the difference in the market value of the property with the alley open and its market value with the alley closed. Whereas, in the instruction given, the jury were authorized to find the damage to be the difference in the value of the property to the property owner, before and after the alley was closed. The value of the property to the property owner might, in some instances, be a great deal more than its market value, and in others less. In estimating and assessing the damages under the instruction, the jury had the right to and may have taken into consideration the personal and individual inconvenience and loss from a business standpoint that the property owner sustained. The measure of damage to which the property holder is entitled in cases of this character does not include loss occasioned by injury to his business. He is only entitled to compensation for loss sustained to his property and this loss is the difference in the market value of the property. Any other criterion of damages would enter the field of speculation and make the loss incapable of reasonable ascertainment. The market value of a thing is generally the best evidence of its worth—the fairest standard of its value. The individual whose property is taken might not be willing to surrender it for three times its market value. To him it might be associated with sentimental notions that would enlarge its value far beyond the real and substantial. Again, the owner may have established a business in a particular place or building that was more valuable to him than it would be to any one else, and as a consequence the property would have a value to him far above its market value. But these evidences or elements of value are the result of personal or individual preference, and effort. They affect the individual more than they do the property, and if allowed to enter into or control the damage, it would be virtually impossible to estimate or fix with reasonable certainty the real value of the property. It must be admitted that when the standard by which the loss is to be measured is fixed at the market value of the property that the owner in some cases will not secure what is to him its fair value, but on the other hand, the purchaser ought not to be required to pay more than the fair market value for any property that the law gives him the right to take upon the payment of just compensation, and when the owner has recovered this price, he will generally get what he is entitled to. There is some apparent conflict in the cases on this subject, largely attributable to the different states of fact presented, but in Madisonville, Hartford & E. R. Co. v. Ross, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 584; City of Louisville v. Hegan, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1532; L. & N. R. Co. v. Cumnock, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1330, the rule we have announced is fully sustained. It is also the one approved in Lewis on Eminent Domain, section 463; Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 623; Elliott on Streets, section 271; 15 Cyc., 701; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 10, page 1151.

In disposing of this question, we have not deemed it pertinent to the subject in hand to discuss the range the evidence may take in elucidating what is the market value of the property proposed to be taken. No fixed rule of universal application can be laid down. The relevancy and competency of evidence must be left to be controlled by the facts of each case at it comes up. But generally all the facts as to the condition of the property, its surroundings, improvements and capabilities, may be shown. A full discussion of this subject will be found in Lewis on Eminent Domain, sections 478-9; Elliott on Streets and Roads, section 260.

In the case before us, the injury was to the whole property. None of it was, accurately speaking, taken. The only injury consisted in depriving the property of the full use of an adjacent alley; and while this was in the meaning of the Constitution a taking, yet the damage done was susceptible of being fairly estimated upon the basis of the injury done to the market value of the property. And what we have said upon this point must be accepted as our understanding of the law controlling cases presenting questions like the one under consideration.

The court further instructed the jury that:

"The right at present exists in the property owners on Ayers alley, as well as in all citizens of the city of Lexington, to use as a public highway the land adjoining Ayers alley, as originally constructed, on the west side, and being north of Water street, and lying under the viaduct, and being opposite W. H. Henderson's property, but this right on the part of each and every citizen is subordinate to the superior right of the Lexington union station, to use said land for the purpose of its business as it may desire."

The land mentioned in this instruction is indicated on the map by the words "vacant space under viaduct." To understand why this instruction was given, it will be necessary to relate briefly the situation of this space, and the conditions under which it exists. Henderson's property runs back with the alley, and on the east side thereof, to Water street. Under the viaduct at Water street there is an open space, some seventy feet long and about thirty feet wide, in which wagons and other vehicles can go from the alley. This open space is immediately across the alley from Henderson's building, and teams going down the alley from Main street to Henderson's building, can unload, and then go in the space under the viaduct, there turn around, and go out the alley to Main street. While it is a fact that vehicles going in the Main street mouth of the alley, can not cross Water street, they can be driven as far as Water street and turn around in the space under the viaduct and go out the way they came in. Before the alley was closed, vehicles coming from Main street could not be turned in it, but had to go out to either Water street or High street. It will thus be seen that the open space under the viaduct was a benefit to Henderson's property, and in a large measure compensated him for the obstruction of the alley. Admitting this to be true, the argument is made that Henderson's use of the vacant space under the viaduct is limited so as to impair, if not destroy its value to his property, and hence the court should not have instructed the jury upon this point. This argument is rested upon the ground that under the contract between the city and the railroads it is provided that the railroad companies, or rather the Lexington union station company standing in their place, shall be allowed to use in perpetuity, so much of this space as it may desire for its purposes; and that the right of Henderson or persons doing business at his building, to its use may be at any time taken away or so curtailed as to render the use of little importance. That the giving of this instruction exercised a weighty influence upon the jury in estimating the damage to the property of Henderson, by closing the alley, we have no doubt. And if the right of the public, as well as property owners in Ayers alley, to use this space in common with other citizens could be taken away, or so curtailed as to render it valueless, there would be great force in the contention of counsel for the appellants, that the instruction upon this subject was misleading and prejudicial. But, neither the railroad companies nor the union station company will be permitted to deny to the public or any individual, the use of this space as a public highway; and the public generally may use and occupy it upon equal terms with its use by the Lexington union station for the purposes of its business; and this use by the Lexington union station company must be a reasonable and a necessary use. It can not arbitrarily exclude the public from or unnecessarily obstruct their use of this space.

It is also contended that the verdict of the jury is grossly inadequate, but we will not extend this opinion in discussing this question. The amount of damage was a matter entirely within the discretion of the jury. They were doubtless familiar with the location of the property, and the injury to its value that resulted from closing the alley. They saw and heard the witnesses testify, and their finding of the amount of damages will not, as we have frequently announced, be disturbed, as it was not so inadequate as to indicate that the conclusion was the result of passion or prejudice.

After a careful consideration of all the material questions presented by the record, we have reached the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

WILSON, RECIEVER v. MURPHY'S ADM'R., &c

MURPHY'S ADM'R., &c. v. WILSON & MUIR, &c.

(Filed June 9, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Attorneys at Law—Services for Partnership—Payable Out of Partnership Funds—In this case evidence considered and held that a fee of $750, paid to W. for his services as attorney for a distillery firm, which had been dissolved by the death of one of the firm, being for the benefit of the partnership property, was properly payable out of the partnership funds.

2. Receivers—Settling Partnership—Allowances for Services—In allowing the fee of a receiver of a distillery company, which had been dissolved by the death of one of the partners, who was more of a caretaker than any thing else, his principal business being to sign withdrawals of whisky and looking after the distillery when not in operation for several years, the witnesses fixed the value of his services at from $5,000 to $10,000. This trial court allowed him $2,750 Held—That the allowance was not too small.

John S. Kelley for receiver Wilson.

Geo. S. & J. A. Fulton for Murphy's Adm'r, &c.

John D. Wickliffe for Wilson & Muir. &c.

Appeals from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Williams Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

These two appeals grow out of the same transactions, and will be considered together. In the appeal of Squire Murphy's Administrator. &c. v. Wilson & Muir, &c., the question is, whether the fee of John D. Wickliffe should be paid by appellees or out of the funds belonging to the partnership of Murphy, Barber & Company. This question, we shall first consider.

Squire Murphy and A. M. Barber were partners engaged in the distillery business under the firm name of Murphy, Barber & Company. They resided in Nelson county, Kentucky, but their plant was located just beyond the county line, in Bullitt county, at Clermont. Squire Murphy died in August, 1893, leaving a will which was probated in Nelson county. After making some special devises, the testator directed his executor to hold the balance of his estate and operate the distillery in the firm name of Murphy, Barber & Company, until such time (not exceeding three years) as the distillery property could be sold at a fair price and the money collected; then a settlement should be made. The testator appointed his partner, A. M. Barber, as executor of his will, who qualified and entered upon his duties. At this time there was a great depression in the whisky trade. The executor, who was also the surviving partner, continued the business until September, 1896, when the three years named in the will expired. At this time there was still a depression in the whisky business. Under this condition of affairs, a contract was entered into between the executor and surviving partner, A. M. Barber, and the devisees of Squire Murphy, by which the partnership was to continue for one year longer. Before anything was done under this contract, A. M. Barber also died. Thus the partnership and contract for a continuance of the business were terminated, leaving a valuable distillery plant with about 9,000 barrels of whisky in bond in the warehouses, about one-half of which was pledged to banks for the money that had enabled the firm to make the whisky. Some of it had been sold, and was held in storage for the owners; the residue belonged to the firm..

Neither of the deceased partners had a personal representative, and this valuable property was uncared for, and unprotected. Under this state of case, a consultation was held by Wilson & Muir, the largest creditors, the devisees of Squire Murphy, and John Barber, the son of A. M. Barber and representative of the heirs of said decedent, and John D. Wickliffe, attorney for Wilson & Muir, in which it was agreed that suit should be instituted by Wilson & Muir against the devisees and heirs at law of the deceased partners, asking for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of, and sell the partnership property, pay the debts and bring about a settlement of the partnership affairs. This suit was immediately prepared, the petition filed and all parties in interest brought before the court. On November 26th, seven days after the death of A. M. Barber, the circuit judge was appealed to to appoint a receiver. At the time the application was made, a writing was filed with the judge, signed by the devisees of Squire Murphy and the adult heirs of A. M. Barber, asking for the appointment of a receiver and suggesting Eugene Wilson as a suitable person to take charge of the property. Thereupon Wilson was appointed. After that time, John D. Wickliffe continued to act as the attorney of Wilson, giving him advice in the management of the property and assisting him in the preparation of the reports which he filed as receiver.

Counsel for the Murphy and Barber estates insist that, as each of these estates was represented by attorneys, and, as the suit for a receiver was filed on behalf of one of the principal creditors, it would be unjust to charge the estates with the payment of the fee of $750 allowed Wickliffe. It is true, the Murphy & Barber estates each had attorneys, but it appears that their time was chiefly occupied in litigating matters in dispute between these two estates. While it is true, that John D. Wickliffe was attorney for the appel-lees, it is also true, that he was attorney for the receiver. Charles Bakrow, a wholesale liquor dealer of Louisville purchased some of the partnership whisky from the receiver, for which he failed to pay. The record shows that Wickliffe instituted the necessary proceedings to compel Bakrow to pay the money, and succeeded in getting the money. As both the parties were dead at the time the suit for a receiver was instituted, and, as there was no one to take charge of the property, it was necessary that some action be taken to protect the estate. This was done on the application of one of the principal creditors, but with the consent and co-operation of the other creditors and representatives of the two estates. We, therefore, conclude that the services rendered by John D. Wickliffe were for the benefit of the partnership property, and that his fee was properly payable out of the partnership funds.

We shall next consider the question of the allowance to the receiver, Eugene Wilson. Wilson acted as receiver for a period of 43 months. During that time he made a few visits to the distillery plant and wrote several letters. At the time he took charge the debts of the partnership, secured by lien on the whisky, amounted to about $40,000. At the end of the receivership he turned over to the unsecured creditors and representatives of the Murphy and Barber estates about $40,000. The receiver was the son of William Wilson, one of the stockholders in the bank of Wilson & Muir, a creditor of the partnership to the extent of about $32,000. At the time of his appointment and throughout the term of his services as receiver, he was the cashier of the bank of Wilson & Muir. During that time, he also conducted a large insurance business. The trial court allowed the receiver a fee of $2,750. A number of witnesses testified that Wilson's services were worth from $5,000 to $10,000. Counsel for the receiver insist that the large amount of money turned over by the receiver to the estates of Murphy and Barber was the result of his careful management and foresight in the performance of his duties as receiver. On the other hand, counsel for appellees insist that the sum turned over to the estates was not due to any work or foresight on the part of the receiver, but was due entirely to the natural advance in the price of whisky. In cases of this character, we necessarily rely to a large extent upon the judgment of the chancellor. The distillery was not operated. The receiver was more of a caretaker than anything else, and even the burden of taking care of the property was imposed upon others. Where his efforts consisted principally of signing withdrawals of whisky and of looking after the distillery property not in operation, and where these duties were not so exacting as to interfere with his insurance business or his work as cashier of the Wilson & Muir bank, we are unable to say that the allowance of $2,750, made by the court below, is too small.

Wherefore, the judgment in each case is affirmed.

WRIST v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 9, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Malicious Shooting—Self Defense—Instruction As To—Under the evidence it appears that the accused commenced the difficulty. An instruction on self-defense was modified by telling the jury that the plea could not be relied on if accused "brought on the difficulty." While it is the better practice not to use these words, defendant's plea could not have availed him as he did not act in self-defense, and the jury could not have been misled by the use of these words.

2. Distance of Person at The Time of Shooting—The distance of the parties, at the time of the shooting, as it bears upon the question of the intent, is a fact to be considered by the jury like any other fact proved in the case. It should not be pointed out in an instruction any more than any other fact.

Edwin P. Morrow, W. Boyd Morrow and Morrow & Morrow for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

Under an indictment charging him with the crime of willfully and maliciously shooting at, with intent to kill, C. C. Meadows, without wounding him, which is an offense described and denounced by section 1166, of the Kentucky Statutes—the appellant was found guilty and his punishment fixed at one year confinement in the State penitentiary.

The chief and in fact only reason urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the court erred in instructing the jury.

The evidence in the case is brief and simple. For the Commonwealth, the substance of it is that appellant, who seemed to be drinking, went to a store and in a bolsterous voice said he wanted a cheese box. Being told by the store-keeper, Avery, that he did not have any to sell, he made an impertinent reply, and thereupon the storekeeper and Meadows, who was in the store, cursed him and told him to get away. That when leaving for his house, which was a short distance off, he said: "I come back and get you d—— s—— b——." In a few minutes he returned with a shot gun in his hand. When about seventy-five yards from the store, he commenced cursing, and fired the gun at Meadows and the storekeeper, who were standing in the door of the store—some of the shot striking the clothes of Meadows. After the first shot was fired by appellant, Meadows and a brother of a clerk who was present, commenced shooting at him with a pistol, and he fired two or three other shots with his gun.

Appellant, in his own behalf, stated that he went to the store for the purpose of buying some articles of food, and also tried to buy a cheese box, when the storekeeper said he didn't keep boxes around to sell negroes; and after a few other remarks had been exchanged, the storekeeper and Meadows cursed him, drew a pistol, and told him to get out. That in leaving, he dropped his hat about 75 yards from the store, and went to his house to get ready to leave and go to Somerset. That he got his gun, and some shells loaded with bird shot, and went back to get his hat, not intending to have any further trouble; and about the time he reached the point where his hat was, Meadows fired at him with a pistol, when he returned the shot, and thereupon he fired several times as did Meadows, and two or three others who were shooting at him.

With the evidence in this condition, the court instructed the jury upon the charge contained in the indictment, and also touching the lesser degree of the offense, which a misdemeanor, described in section 1242, of the Statutes.

The instruction as to self-defense was modified by the statement in substance that the accused could not rely upon the plea of self-defense, to exonerate him if he brought on the difficulty. The instruction would have been more correct if the court had said to the jury that he could not rely upon the plea of self-defense if the jury believed he brought on the difficulty by first shooting, or threatening to shoot, at Meadows, when it was not necessary, or did not appear to him to be necessary in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to protect himself from death or great bodily harm at the hands of Meadows, or the persons who were with him. But the failure to so word the instruction could not under the facts of this case have been prejudicial to the accused. If the statements of the witnesses for the Commonwealth are true, the accused, without excuse or provocation, commenced the difficulty by shooting at them. In other words, he brought all the trouble, he has suffered upon himself. On the other hand, if his story is true, he did not commence or bring on the difficulty, was entirely without blame, fired only in self-defense and should have been acquitted. It is manifest that the jury accepted as true the statements of the prosecuting witnesses, and reached the conclusion, as they well might have done, that the accused after leaving the store, went to his house, and returned with his shot gun for the purpose of doing some harm to the men who were at the store. Taking this view of the case, appellant's plea of self-defense could not have availed him as he did not act in self-defense.

The safer and better practice, is not to use the words "brought on the difficulty" in an instruction, but if they are used, the court should define their meaning, and there are many cases in which it would be prejudicial error to fail to define what was meant by the expression "bringing on, or brought on, the difficulty." (Greer v. Commonwealth, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 333; Calhoun v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1188; Riley v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky. 268; Brown v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 245; Arnold v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1566; Allen v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 642.) But in this case, there were only two views that the jury could reasonably have adopted. One, that appellant came back towards the store with his shot gun for the purpose of shooting or wounding the men at the store, and with this purpose in view, commenced firing at them; the other, that he only stopped to get his hat on his way to leave the country, when without provocation he was fired upon.

Under the facts the jury could not have been misled by the use of the words "brought on the difficulty." If it was brought on at all by appellant, it was by his conduct in returning to the store to attack Avery and Meadows, or in first shooting at them. And if it was brought on in this way, the appellant forfeited his right of self-defense.

The argument is also made that the indictment should have charged, and the evidence have shown, that appellant when he fired was at such a distance that death or serious bodily harm could have resulted from his shooting; and that the jury should have been so instructed. The offense for which appellant was indicted is a statutory one, fully described in the statute. It is complete when a person shoots at another with the intention of killing him, although he may not wound him. Whether the person shooting is close enough to the person shot at to wound or kill him, is a question for the jury. If a person fired an ordinary shot gun, loaded with ordinary bird shot, at a person five hundred yards off, and there was evidence to show that the shot gun would not carry over a hundred yards, there could not well be a conviction under this statute, as the distance of the parties would preclude the idea that the shooting was done with the intention of wounding or killing. But the distance of the parties, as it bears upon the question of intent, is a fact to be considered like any other fact proven in the case. It should not be pointed out in an instruction any more than any other fact, or given any more prominence than any other fact necessary to constitute the guilt of the accused. Nor is it necessary that it should be charged in the indictment.

Upon a consideration of the whole case, we do not find that any error of law, prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, was committed, and the judgment must be affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY v. SCALF.

(Filed June 9, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Going With State Guards to Inauguration—Volunteer—Illness from Filthy Car—Action for Damages—Grounds for Recovery—One not a member of the State Guards who volunteered to go with a company of State Guards to the inauguration of the Governor is not entitled to damages against the railroad company for illness alleged to have been caused by being compelled to ride in a car that was not properly lighted or heated or not furnished with drinking water or by reason of the noisome and filthy condition of the car, as he was not a member of the guards he had the right at any time to leave the car and go into another without being subjected to military discipline therefor.

James D. Black and Benj. D. Warfield for appellant.

John H. Wilson and B. B. Golden for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellee, Lee Scalf, went with the Barbourville State Guards to the inauguration of Governor Beckham, in December, 1900. Complaining that the coach in which he went to, and returned from Frankfort, was not properly heated or lighted, and was not furnished with sufficient water for drinking purposes; that the stoves and lamps smoked, and that the car was permitted to become in a noisome and filthy condition, and that by reason thereof he experienced great physical and mental suffering and caught severe cold, he instituted this action for damages against the appellant, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. He recovered a verdict for $500.00, and the railroad company appeals.

It appears from the record that appellee never enlisted in the State Guards by taking the obligation required by law. The captain of the company simply requested him to accompany the guards for the purpose of filling out the quota of the company. He thereupon volunteered, and did go with the company. According to appellee's contention, the bad conditions prevailing in the car were due to the negligence of the employees of the appellant company, while the latter insists that those conditions were due entirely to the acts of appellee and his companions, in raising the windows of the car, in attempting to put coal in the fires, in punching the fires with their bayonets, and in scattering lunches over, and vomiting on the floor of the car. Appellant asks a reversal on the ground of the admission of incompetent testimony, and also because of error in refusing and giving instructions.

It appears that the trial court permitted several witnesses to testify to the fact that the members of the guard complained of the cold and other conditions of the car, and expressed these complaints to each other. As these complaints were not made to the employees of the railroad, they were manifestly incompetent, and all such evidence should have been excluded by the court.

Appellant asked the following instruction:

"If you shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Lee Scalf, was not a member of the military company on the trip to, or return from, Frankfort, on the occasion mentioned in the evidence, but that he voluntarily undertook to and did make said trips, and that he could, without subjecting himself to any military discipline, or penalty, have left the coach which was occupied by said company on said trip, after discovering that said coach was dirty or filthy, or gave out offensive odors, or was insufficiently heated, or the lamps gave insufficient light, or emitted foul or offensive odors, or the stoves in said coach gave out smoke, to the discomfort of plaintiff, if any such conditions existed, and could have taken a passage on said trips in another coach, free from such conditions and failed to do so, you should find for the defendant."

We think the court erred in failing to give this, or a similar instruction. Indeed, as there was no proof that appellee was a member of the military company, he could have left the car without subjecting himself to any military discipline or penalty. The statutes do not provide a punishment, except for enlisted men. No power is given to discipline those who go as mere volunteers, and who have not enlisted in the service by taking the obligation required by law. Upon the next trial, the court should give the following instruction:

"The court instructs you that the plaintiff, Lee Scalf, was not a member of the military company on the trip to and from Frankfort, on the occasion mentioned in the evidence, and that he could, without subjecting himself to any military discipline or penalty, have left the coach, which was occupied by him on said trips. And if you believe from the evidence that said coach was dirty or filthy, or gave out offensive odors, or was not sufficiently heated, or the lamps gave insufficient light or emitted foul and offensive odors, or that the stoves in said coaches gave out smoke, to the discomfort of the plaintiff, if any such conditions existed, and that the plaintiff on said trip could have taken passage in another coach, free from such conditions, and failed to do so, you should find for the defendant."

Appellee complains of the fact that he contracted a severe cold by reason of the cars being insufficiently heated. It appears, however, that, after his arrival in Frankfort, he marched and stood around for several hours in the cold without any overcoat on. It was, therefore, impossible to tell whether the cold he contracted resulted from the insufficient heat of the car or from the exposure to the severe weather then prevailing at Frankfort. Upon the next trial, unless there be some evidence that the cold complained of was the proximate result of the condition of the car, all evidence of the cold should be excluded, and the court should omit from its instructions the right to recover on that ground. For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

SINDER v. CONRAD, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Exceptions—Time of Filing—The exceptions to the report of sale herein, aside from being insufficient, were not filed in time. The lower court being one of continuous session has control over its orders for 60 days after they are entered, and within that time may correct them or set them aside, but the power to do so can not be exercised after that time.

E. E. McKay for appellant.

Johnson & Hieatt for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

In an action in equity, styled Florence Conrad and others v. A. B. Drovo and others, instituted in the court below, a decree was rendered, directing the sale of certain real estate in the city of Louisville, formerly owned by Fanny R. Barnes, for distribution of its proceeds among her heirs at law, parties to the action.

The real estate described in the decree was sold July 16th, 1906. Included in the sale were lots one and two, situated on what is known as the "Point" in the city of Louisville. Lot 1 was purchased by the Progress Land Company, and lot 2, by the appellant, Fred Sinder, the latter's bid being $435. In accordance with a requirement of the decree, Sinder, at the time of the sale, paid to the commissioner $25, but failed to execute bond with approved security for the remainder of the purchase money, as directed by a further provision of the decree.

The commissioner filed this report of sale on October 6th, 1906, and under a rule of the court it was, by proper order, laid over one week for exceptions. On February 9th, 1907, exceptions to the report of sale were filed by the Progress Land Company, but were not passed on by the court until March 4th, at which time an order was entered overruling the exceptions, and on motion of the plaintiffs, then made, the report of sale as a whole was confirmed.

On March 30th, 1907, at the plaintiff's instance, a rule was issued against the other purchaser, Sinder, requiring him to execute bond for the amount he was owing upon the purchase price of lot No. 2. The rule was made returnable April 6th, 1907, but upon his motion, was, from time to time, respited to May 1st, 1907. On that day he filed a response which the court, on May 6th, 1907, adjudged insufficient, and made the rule absolute; at the same time issuing an attachment against Sinder, requiring him to comply with the terms of sale, under penalty of being dealt with for contempt. The latter entered his appearance to the attachment and was given a week within which to comply therewith. Instead of complying with the attachment, Sinder, on May 13th, 1907, tendered and offered to file an affidavit and exceptions to the report of sale. On June 1st, 1907, his motion to file them was overruled and the attachment again awarded. From the judgment last mentioned, Sinder has appealed.

The response filed by appellant in substance, set forth the claim that another to whom he assigned his bid and right to the lot, No. 2, failed, on account of an alleged defect in the title to accept the assignment, did not file it in court, and refused to pay the purchase price or execute in appellant's stead a bond for the purchase money; and that following appellant's purchase of the lot, it was so flooded and injured by high water, from the Ohio river, as to diminish its value and prevent him from selling it. His exceptions offered to be filed to the report of sale were to the effect that the lot purchased by him contained one-half of a double cottage, and that the partition wall, supposed to divide his half of the cottage, from the other half, was a foot and a half west of the true line of the lot.

The matters set forth in the response did not excuse appellant's failure to comply with the terms of the sale, or show cause for discharging the rule; and had the exceptions to the report of sale been offered to be filed in time, they failed to state that the owner of the adjoining lot was making complaint as to the alleged encroachment upon his lot; such complaint being necessary to authorize action upon the part of the court looking to the granting of relief as to that matter. (Tepper v. Niemer, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 407.)

But consideration of the grounds of exceptions to the report of sale would be unprofitable; as the exceptions were not filed or offered to be filed in time. Although the report of sale was filed October 6th, 1906, and not confirmed until March 4th, 1907, no exceptions were filed thereto by appellant during the nearly five months thus intervening, and as before indicated, none were offered to be filed by him until May 13th, 1907, more than sixty days after the confirmation of the sale by the circuit court.

The Jefferson Circuit Court, being one of continuous session, has control of its judgments and orders for sixty days after they are rendered or entered, and within that time may correct them or set them aside, for cause, at the instance of a person aggrieved. But the power to do so can not be exercised by that court after the expiration of the sixty days. The order confirming the sale to appellant of the lot in question became final in sixty days from March 4th, 1907, and after that time had elapsed, the lower court was powerless to permit appellant to file exceptions to the report of sale, hence its refusal to allow the exceptions to be filed was proper.

Wherefore, the judgment complained of is affirmed.

LEE V. WHEAT.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Processioners—Report of—Prima Facie Evidence—Section 2374, Ky. Stats., provides that the report of processioners shall be prima facie evidence against and between the parties, and the report in this action would have been sufficient to defeat appellant's claim if there had been no other evidence introduced, but the proof shows that she owns the land in controversy, and that the length of the lines stated in the deed were made by oversight, resulting in the controversy.

2. Same—Under the provisions of section 2128, Ky. Stats., the husband can not deprive the wife of her land or any interest therein by a conveyance made by him, and appellant did not sign the agreement upon which the report of the processioners was based.

Goad & Oliver for appellant.

Bradburn & Basham and J. H. Gilliam for appellee.

Appeal from Allen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

In the year, 1883, a colored woman, Cary Hughes, being then old and feeble, gave her daughter, Sarah Calvert, a small tract of land which she carved out of a tract of one hundred acres that she owned. She had a surveyor to run it out in the shape of a square, mark the lines and plant a stone at each of the four corners. This was proven without contradiction. She placed her daughter, Sarah Calvert, and her husband in possession of the land, and they occupied and claimed to these lines and corners for about twelve years, when it was sold under a mortgage executed to Dr. W. B. Ray. Dr. Ray purchased the land at the decretal sale and kept it for about one year with a tenant in possession, he then sold and conveyed it to appellant, Annie Lee, who, with her husband, has been in possession of it ever since. Appellee, Wheat, purchased the remainder of the land owned by Cary Hughes about one year before the institution of this action, in 1907. He crossed the line and began to cut timber and appellant instituted this action against him for trespass. He answered denying that appellant was the owner of that part of the land on which he entered, and alleged that appellee only owned about four acres, and that, after he bought, a dispute arise between Annie Lee and himself as to the correct location of the lines and corners, and thereupon she had the county proccessioners to run out and establish her corners and lines, and they agreed in writing at that time as to where her line and corners were, giving her a fraction over eight acres. The proccessioners based their report upon this agreement, filed and had it recorded in the county court clerk's office, and appellee pleaded it in bar of her right to maintain this action.

It appears that the deed from Cary Hughes to her daughter, Sarah Calvert, and the deed from Dr. Ray to appellant calls for the length of each line as only twenty-five poles, which would enclose a fraction less than four acres. These calls did not follow any marked lines, nor reach any established corners. It appears that at the time the proccessioners were called there had been cleared and enclosed by fences, within the Sarah Calvert survey, about eight acres, and this enclosed land was given to appellant by the agreement referred to and which the proccessioners reported. It appears that there are near sixteen acres within the boundary established by Cary Hughes which she gave to her daughter and placed her in possession of. It appears from the proof that the person who made the survey of this land did not write the deed to Sarah Calvert, and from the facts and circumstances appearing in the record we are convinced that the draftsman of the deed made the calls "twenty-five poles" instead of twenty-five chains, or fifty poles. The witnesses stated that the measurement was made with a chain two poles long. The testimony shows that Cary Hughes, while she owned the remainder of the survey, and those who owned it after her death, did not claim beyond these lines and the stone corners, and regarded it as the Sarah Calvert survey. Dr. Ray did not testify, but it is evident that he knew nothing in particular about the boundary. He only held a small claim which was a lien upon the land. His deed only called for about four acres.

It is proven, without contradiction, that appellee, Wheat, was shown at the time he purchased, these lines and stone corners, claimed by appellant, as the true lines between the surveys, and that he only purchased to these lines and corners.

In view of these facts, in our opinion, appellee's claim beyond these lines was an after-thought, and he asserted this claim when he discovered that the calls in the deed of appellant only covered about four acres of land.

It is evident, under the proof in this case, that appellee does not own any part of the land in controversy. In our opinion, the length of the lines stated in the deed was made by oversight. But whether this is true or not, Sarah Calvert was placed in possession of the boundary actually allotted to her, and she, as well as those owning it after her, claimed to these lines and corners and were in the actual possession thereof claiming it as their own for more than twenty years, and they were never disturbed in their possession until appellee became the owner of the adjoining land.

Appellee's counsel contends that the processioners report bars appellant from claiming any part of the land, other than that fixed by the report. This is not correct. Section 2374, of the Kentucky Statutes, provides that the report of processioners shall be prima facie evidence against and between the parties * * * interested and others claiming through or under them. The report of the processioners was sufficient to defeat appellant in the action, if there had been no other evidence introduced. But counsel say that the agreement between the parties made and signed, and upon which the report of the processioners was based, is binding upon the parties. The difficulty in the way of this contention is that appellant did not sign the agreement, her husband, Henry Lee, alone signed it, and under the provisions of section 2128, of the Kentucky Statutes, the husband cannot deprive the wife of her land or any interest therein by a conveyance made by him. The testimony was about equally divided upon the question as to whether she gave her consent to the agreement establishing the lines so as to include only the enclosed land; but if her consent had been shown without contradiction, it was only oral, and by this she did not part with her title. If she, by such consent, had induced some person to invest their money in her land excluded by this compromise agreement, then she would be estopped from asserting title to the land; but appellee did not part with anything by reason thereof. His situation is the same as when he purchased the land to the lines and stone corners.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded, with directions to the lower court to render judgment in behalf of appellant for the land in controversy, and to ascertain the value of the timber taken by appellee, if any, and give judgment in behalf of appellant therefor.

BIBB v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Bill of Exceptions—Errors of court on the trial of a case must be shown in the bill of exceptions, not by the affidavits filed on the motion for a new trial.

2. Robbery—Petty Larceny—The evidence shows that appellant's offense was simply stealing by stealth, and she should only have been convicted of petty larceny and not robbery. There was no force used, and no putting in fear.

Louis I. Ingleheart for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Ella Bibb was indicted for robbery. She was convicted and her punishment fixed at four years confinement in the penitentiary.

She was charged with robbing D. E. Lester, by forcibly and feloniously taking from his person his pocket-book or purse, containing money of the United States. The proof showed that the man's name was B. E. Lester, but this was not a material variance, under section 128, of the Criminal Code, as the offense was in other respects described with sufficient certainty to identify the act. Section 128, is as follows:

"If an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit an injury to person or property, or the taking of property, and be described in other respects with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured or attempted to be injured or as to the owner of the property, taken or injured or attempted to be injured, is not material."

Complaint is made of the argument of the Commonwealth attorney in his concluding speech to the jury; but nothing of this is contained in the bill of exceptions. A matter of this sort can only be brought to this court by the bill of exceptions. It can not be brought here upon the affidavits filed on the motion for new trial. The errors of the court on the trial of the case must be shown in the bill of exceptions, not by the affidavits filed on the motion for new trial.

The facts shown on the trial were that Lester and another negro named Scott Driscoll, were in Owensboro, and while there went into a house where there were two negro women, one of whom was Ella Bibb. Lester's statement as to what occurred after he got in, is as follows:

"But when we got in there, I did not see anything but these two women, and I says to my friend, 'We have no business in here,' and one of the women came around where I was and I guess she saw the print of my pocket-book on the outside of my pants, and she came up and made a dive at my pocket and ran her hand in and got the pocket-book before I could take hold of her, and I felt in my pocket and found that the pocket-book was gone, and I says to her, 'you have got my pocket-book,' and she says, 'No, I haven't' and I says, 'Yes, you have.'"

He said that there was $6.10 in the pocket-book; that he went down and got a policeman who came up and arrested the woman and got his money back for him.

He said in his cross-examination that when he felt her hand in his pocket, he grabbed at her arm, but that he did not catch her arm; that she then had his pocket-book; that she stepped up by the side of him, ran her hand in his pocket and got the pocket-book out before he could grab her arm.

In Jones v. Commonwealth, 115 Ky., 592, Tilton, the prosecuting witness, had ten dollars in his vest pocket. The defendant was standing in front of him with his back to him, while he was looking at a bulletin. While in that position he felt something touch his breast. He immediately grabbed and gave a look down, when he saw defendant's hand, which he had grabbed, a foot from his vest pocket; the defendant pulled and slipped the money to his other hand. It was held that the defendant was not guilty of robbery but of stealing from Tilton by stealth. In Dawson v. Commonwealth, 74 S. W., 701, the defendant, a woman, was talking with a man at the gate of the house where she lived. She put her hand in his pocket, when he grabbed her hand and said, "Don't play with my money in that way." She said, "I haven't got your money." He replied, "Yes, you have." Then she laughed. He let her take her hand out and said to her. "Give me my money now." She refused to do it and threatened to shoot him. It was held that the facts showed that the accused was guilty of petty larceny, and not robbery. These cases are conclusive here. There was no putting of Lester in fear. There was no force used upon his person; the woman simply stealthily put her hand in his pocket and took out his money before he knew what she was doing. There are cases where force is used to push a person or to pull him about so as to distract his attention and in this way rob him. (Snyder v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1538.) But in these cases there is force applied to the person. In the case at bar, it was simply a stealing by stealth, and under the facts, the defendant should only have been convicted of petty larceny.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MAJORS v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Bill of Exceptions—Striking from Record—Presumption That Evidence Supported Pleadings—The bill of exceptions and transcript of evidence having been stricken from the record, the presumption must be indulged that the evidence supported the pleadings. The refusal of the lower court to re-docket the case and sign the bill of exceptions was not a final order from which an appeal may be taken.

W. P. McClain and Vance & Lockett for appellant.

Manton Maverick, Dorsey & Stanley, J. Morgan Chinn and Yeaman & Yeaman for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Section 745, of the Civil Code, provides:

"An appeal shall not be granted except within two years next after the right to appeal first accrued, unless the party applying therefor was then a defendant in the action, and an infant, &c."

The judgment appealed from in this case was rendered on October 19, 1905. Appellant, on the 16th day of October, 1907, filed with the clerk of the Court of Appeals, a statement of the parties appellant and appellees, and also a copy of the judgment appealed from and was granted the appeal by the clerk of this court.

Section 738, of the Civil Code, provides:

"The appellant shall file the transcript in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals, at least twenty days before the first day of the second term of said court, next after the granting of the appeal, unless the court extend the time; as, for cause shown, the court may do."

Appellant filed the transcript on the 21st day of March, 1908, which was twenty-three days before the second term of this court, after the appeal was granted. On the 20th day of May, 1908, appellee moved this court to strike the bill of exceptions and transcript of evidence from the record. First, because neither the bill of exceptions nor the transcript of evidence had been signed, approved or certified by the judge of the lower court, or by any one. Second, because the unsigned bill of exceptions and unsigned transcript of evidence were no part of the record in this case. This motion was sustained by this court on May 21st, 1908. Consequently, there is not anything in the record to consider except the pleadings; and the presumption is that the evidence introduced on the trial supported the pleadings of appellee, to the effect that the policy sued on was obtained by fraud upon the part of appellee.

It appears that at the first or second term of the Henderson Circuit Court, after judgment, appellant tendered to that court a bill of exceptions, but it was not signed by the judge of the court; and at the next term, upon motion of appellant, the case was stricken from the docket, and in about twelve months thereafter appellant notified appellee that at the next succeeding term of the court, he would move the court to re-docket the case, and have the bill of exceptions signed by the court. The motion was entered, but the court refused to re-docket the case or sign the bill of exceptions; and appellant asks a reversal of this order. This is not a final judgment from which an appeal can be taken. The proper course for appellant to have pursued was, when he filed the transcript March 21, 1908, to have asked this court for time in which to have the transcript prepared and signed, and then, by proper procedure, to have had the record made up in the lower court and signed by the judge.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MARTIN, &c. v. STEWART, &c.

Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Deeds—Undue Influence—Evidence—Presumption of Law—There is an utter failure to show any undue influence or fraud in the execution of the deed. The law does not presume incapacity, fraud or undue influence, and when the deed has stood as long as this one (14 years) and has been acquiesced in by the grantor, the presumption in favor of the deed can only be overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence.

W. H. Holt and W. S. Harkins for appellants.

Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg and James Goble for appellees.

Appeal from Floyd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Simpson Martin died in the year 1901, a resident of Floyd county. He left surviving him eight children. Two of them, James and John, brought this suit in the year 1906, alleging that he owned, at his death, a tract of land on which he resided, containing about 500 acres. They prayed a division of it among the eight children. The defendants filed an answer in which they pleaded that their father did not own the tract of land at his death, but that he had, in the year 1887, conveyed it to the other six children. By their reply the plaintiffs pleaded that the deed referred to was obtained from Simpson Martin when he was incompetent to make a deed, by undue influence. On their rejoinder the plaintiffs pleaded limitation in bar of so much of the action as sought to set aside the deed.

A sur-rejoinder was filed controverting the plea of limitation; proof was taken and on final hearing the court dismissed the plaintiffs' petition, reserving all other questions made in the case, the defendants having made their answer a counterclaim and cross-petition, and asked a division of the land under the deed, alleging that the plaintiffs had the interest of one of the six children to whom the deed was made.

The deed contains this clause: "The said Simpson Martin reserves the right to have full control of said land during his and his wife's lifetime. This deed is to take effect and be in force after Simpson Martin and Elizabeth Martin's death. Elizabeth Martin died in the year 1906, before this suit was brought. The words quoted merely created a life estate in Simpson Martin and Elizabeth Martin, the title to the land vesting in the grantees, subject to this life estate. The effect of the clause quoted was only to postpone the right of possession. (Hunt v. Hunt, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 973, 119 Ky., 39.)

There is an utter failure of proof to show a want of capacity on the part of Simpson Martin at the time the deed was made, in May, 1887. It was acknowledged on the day it was made and recorded a few months later. He lived about fourteen years after the deed was made. When he died he was something over eighty years of age. During all of these years he attended to his business, and held possession of his property. He was a man of natural good sense, and while it is shown that his memory was bad, especially in the latter years of his life, there is an utter failure to show that he had not capacity to make the deed and the evidence leaves no doubt that he understood well what he had done and acquiesced in it, saying that James and John had gotten their part of the estate; that the girls had worked hard and got nothing, and that it was right that the other six children should have this land. There is also an utter failure to show any undue influence or fraud inducing the execution of the deed. The law does not presume incapacity, fraud or undue influence and when the deed has stood as long as this one, and has been acquiesced in by the grantor, the presumption in favor of the deed can only be overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider the question of limitation. The judgment of the court does not deprive the plaintiffs of any interest they take in the land under the deed; it only determines that the land passed by the deed in the year 1887. The rights of the parties under the deed are reserved in the judgment and are yet to be determined by the circuit court.

Judgment affirmed.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO. v. CITY OF HICKMAN.

SAME v. DAVIDSON, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Cities Enacting Ordinances—Constitutional Requirements—Applicability—Kentucky Constitution, section 46, requiring three readings of a bill on three separate days in each house of the Legislature before its passage, and, on its final passage, to receive the votes of at least two-fifths of the members elected to each house, applies only to an act of the State Legislature, and is not applicable to an ordinance enacted by a city council.

2. Telephone Franchise—Granted by City Council—Authority Conferred—A franchise to operate a telephone exchange in a city, which the city may grant, is not the same thing as a franchise granted by the State. As to the latter, the right to exist as a corporate being, to exercise eminent domain, to carry on a business of a quasi public nature which is conferrable by sovereignty only, may be said to constitute a franchise, but none of these rights can be given by a municipal corporation.

3. Franchise—Ordinance Granting—Installing Telephone—Validity—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 3636, part of charter of cities of the fifth class, providing that no ordinance granting any franchise for any purpose shall be passed by the city council on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, nor at any other than a regular meeting, "an ordinance of a city defining a franchise for the installing of a telephone therein, providing for competitive bids introduced at a regular meeting of the council held more than five days before the passage of the ordinance, conferred a valid franchise on the bidder."

4. Action—Relief Demanded—Alternative Prayer—Under section 90, Civil Code, providing "if no defense be made the plaintiff can not have judgment for any relief not specifically demanded," where, in an action by a city against a telephone company for a violation of its franchise, the city asked that the company be required to remove its poles and wires from the streets, or if this could not be done, then that it be enjoined from charging its customers more than the amount fixed in the franchise, the defendant is not taken unawares if it confesses the petition when the court decides to grant either alternative of the prayer.

5. Same—Action—Who May Sue—Remedy—In an action by a city against a telephone company for a failure to comply with its contract to build and operate a telephone therein, thereby connecting it with other cities, the city may sue for the enforcement of the contract made in its behalf, or one or more of its citizens may sue, but the remedy at law in behalf of the citizen is inadequate. The appropriate remedy was an action for its specific performance.

Wheeler, Hughes & Berry and Wm. L. Granberry for appellant.

Robbins & Thomas and A. M. Tyler for appellees.

Appeals from Fulton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Hickman, a city of the fifth class in this Commonwealth, was asked by promoters of the scheme to be permitted to install a public telephone exchange within the corporation. In order to comply with the requirements of the law, the town council was duly called in extra session on August 16, 1894, when the proposition was regularly presented to the city. The council determined to grant the franchise. It directed the city clerk to advertise for the public sale of the franchise on September 3, 1894, which was the date of the next regular meeting of the council. At this August 16 meeting, there was introduced an ordinance detailing the privilege or franchise to be granted, its term, 20 years, and the conditions on which it was to be granted. The ordinance was laid over till the September 3 meeting. The terms, conditions, &c., mentioned in it, were identical with those directed to be advertised, and which were advertised by the clerk for sale. The sale was made, as advertised, and the bid reported to the council for action on September 3, 1894. The bid being acceptable, was approved by the council, which thereupon unanimously adopted the ordinance introduced on August 16, preceding, granting the franchise. Among the conditions contained in the ordinance, were these two: (1) That work should be begun within six months to install the telephone plant, and be finished within one year from the passage of the ordinance; (2) that the rate charged each subscriber within the city should not exceed $2.50 per month. There were other conditions not involved in this consideration, save one clause, which was relied on by the plaintiffs below as a condition of the grant, and which will be noticed more particularly in its appropriate place in this opinion. The successful and accepted bidder styled himself J. J. Downey, trustee. Subsequently he sold his holdings to Chowning & Wright, who assumed the obligations imposed upon Downey, trustee. The owners of the franchise were about to let it lapse, by their failure to begin work upon the plant within the time specified in the ordinance, when they besought the city council to grant them an extension. This the council did on March 11, 1895, but on the condition that the maximum charges to subscribers to the system in the city should not exceed $1.50 a month for residences, $2.50 for business houses, and where one subscriber had a phone in his residence and one in his business house also, the maximum charge for the two should not exceed $3.50 a month. This condition was accepted by Chowning & Wright, and the plant was thereafter duly installed and set in operation. Later on, the plant was sold to appellant, and the franchise assigned to it. After running the system for some time on the basis fixed in the ordinance of September 3, 1894, as amended by the one of March 11, 1895, appellant increased its charges to its subscribers above the maximum fixed in the latter ordinance. Whereupon, the city brought an action in equity against appellant, setting out the sale and the granting of the franchise, and the terms and conditions thereof, alleging the breach of the terms by appellant, to the oppression of the citizens of the plaintiff city, and couched the prayer of its petition in the following language: "Wherefore, the plaintiff prays that it be adjudged that the defendant has violated its franchise and no longer has the right to do business in the city of Hickman, and that it be required to remove its poles and wires from the streets and passways of the city, and enjoined from continuing in business in the city, if this can be done; but if it can not be done, then it prays that the defendant be enjoined and restrained from charging its customers more than the amounts fixed in the franchise and amendments thereto, and that it be required to fix reasonable and uniform rates for all citizens served by it, and it prays for all necessary and proper relief."

The defendant failing to answer, the allegations of the petition were taken as confessed, and the case was submitted to the court for judgment. The court adjudged that, by the terms of the ordinance granting the franchise being operated by appellant, the franchise was to continue for twenty years from September 3, 1894; that appellant was restricted to a charge not exceeding $1.50 a month for residences, or $2.50 a month for business houses, or $3.50 a month where both were supplied with phones to the same subscriber; and that appellant had exceeded these charges. It was thereupon adjudged, as relief, that appellant be enjoined from charging more than the prices above named and as fixed by the amended ordinance of March 11, 1895. When this judgment was entered, appellant closed its exchange and attempted to abandon its franchise.

At this juncture appellees Davidson and others filed their suit in equity, on their own behalf, and on behalf of all other citizens of Hickman, setting out the foregoing facts, and asked a relief, that the defendant (appellant) company, be enjoined and restrained from discontinuing its service to the citizens who were subscribers and would be during the remainder of the contract period of twenty years, and that the company be required to carry out its contract in that behalf. The result of this last suit was a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, enjoining the removal of the poles, wires, &c., by the defendant, and requiring it to continue for the remainder of the twenty years' service to the citizens of Hickman at a uniform charge of not exceeding that fixed in the amended ordinance of March 11, 1895.

The appellant has prosecuted appeals from each of the judgments above recited.

Appellant's contentions against the judgments are, that the ordinance granting the franchise was passed on September 3, 1894, was void because, (a) it was not passed in conformity to section 46, of the Constitution; (b) that it was passed at the same session at which it was introduced, thereby coming in conflict with section 3636, Kentucky Statutes.

It also contends that the judgment by default was not authorized by the prayer of the petition, and was void, or at least erroneous.

As to the last judgment it contends, in addition, that a court of equity has not the power to compel a telephone company to exercise its franchise by operating the plant, but that the only remedy is to forfeit the franchise.

These questions will be discussed in the order in which they are presented.

Appellant's first contention is based upon the analogy between ordinances of a public and political nature, enacted by municipalities in virtue of the power conferred upon them by the Legislature, and similar laws, when passed by the Legislature itself. Therefore, it reasons, these prosecutions deemed essential to protect the public from improvident action by the Legislature, and which the Constitution has instituted as checks upon such legislation when attempted by the General Assembly, must, by the force of the same public consideration, be applied to town councils when they come to legislate. Section 46, of the Constitution, invoked by appellant under this head, provides that all bills must first be printed; reported upon by a committee; read at length on three different days in each house, and shall, on their final passage, receive the votes of at least two-fifths of the members elected to each house, &c. The particular point sought to be applied here is, that the ordinance should have had three readings, on as many different days, before it could pass. There is no reason why, if one of the features of section 46 applies to town council proceedings, all would not. It would seem to be a sufficient answer to appellant's contention to say that the section is part of the sub-division devoted to the legislative department, the General Assembly. The section is not only inapplicable to the extent of being impossible of application to town councils, but it shows that it was not intended to apply to any legislative body but the General Assembly of the Commonwealth. Town councils of several of the classes of cities have not two bodies. Nor does there seem to be the same ground for interposing such elaborate safeguards in the procedure of these minor bodies which are composed of but few members, sitting in public session in the midst of their constituents also comparatively few in number. But let that be as it may, we find no language in section 46 indicating that the convention intended it to apply to proceedings in municipal legislative bodies. Interpretations of constitutions by rules of implication, is most hazardous, and if ever employed at all it ought to be done in those instances only where the subject-matter and language leave no doubt that the intended meaning of the clause which may be under investigation, may be reached in that way only, and be reached in that way with approximate certainty. This section has never been treated by the courts, the Legislature, or the town councils as applying to the latter. We have no doubt that it was not intended to apply to them.

The other argument of the appellant as to the regularity of the passage of the ordinance is, that as the ordinance granting the franchise was passed the same day that the franchise was sold (after it was sold), it was passed on the same day as of its introduction. To establish a basis for this argument it is necessary for appellant to also establish its assumption that until an ordinance (or resolution) is passed defining or creating a franchise, such franchise can not be offered for sale; and, therefore, that the action of the council on August 16, directing the advertisement of the franchise for sale, in advance of an ordinance or resolution creating or setting apart, the franchise which it was proposed to sell, was void. It will be conceded that, but for the action taken at the meeting of August 16, the action taken on September 3, would have been void, because of section 3636, Kentucky Statutes, which provides: "No ordinance, and no resolution granting any franchise for any purpose, shall be passed by the city council on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, nor at any other than a regular meeting."

September 3 was the date of the regular meeting. To get a proper survey of the question we need to go back a step. What is the franchise which the section of the statute treats of, and which is the subject of all this legislation? And why the necessity for its public sale?

The franchise to operate a telephone exchange in a city, which franchise the city may grant, is not the same thing as the franchise to do the thing when granted by the State. As to the latter, the right to exist as a corporate being, to exercise eminent domain, to carry on a business of a quasi public nature—these attributes and rights, conferrable by sovereignty only may be said to constitute a franchise. But none of these can be given by a municipal corporation. Its powers are limited. Its most complete, exclusive authority may be said to be over its streets and other public ways. It may grant privileges with respect to the proper occupancy of such places not inconsistent with their enjoyment for the primal uses to which they were dedicated. The municipality may say whether it will allow telephone wires to be stretched over its streets, and if so, at which height, and on which side of the street, or whether to be confined in conduits beneath or along the surface. This right, which is most akin to a right of way, is the subject of grant, which partakes in turn of the nature of a contract. Formerly municipalities granted such easements and privileges inconsiderately, or made them the subject sometimes of questionable jobbing. The people of the municipalities were thereby frequently imposed upon. To mitigate such evils, the Constitution of 1891 provided (section 164): "No county, city, town, taxing district or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to grant any franchise or privilege, or make any contract in reference thereto, for a term exceeding twenty years. Before granting such franchise or privilege for a term of years, such municipality shall first, after due advertisement, receive bids therefor publicly, and award the same to the highest and best bidder; but it shall have the right to reject any or all bids. This section shall not apply to a trunk railway."

This section, though self-operative (Nicholasville v. Board of Council, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 592), was the basis, it may be supposed, for the adoption of section 3636, Kentucky Statutes, supra, the latter section providing a more secure method of doing what the Constitution mandatorily required. Reading the two sections together, in view of their purpose, we find that it is not essential to the granting of a franchise by the city that it should, before offering it for sale, first "create" the franchise. On the contrary, the Constitution (section 164) indicates that the city should first advertise for bids, which includes the necessity of setting forth the nature of the proposed franchise, and the terms on which it is to be exercised; then expose the proposed franchise for sale publicly to the highest and best bidder; then, if the bids are acceptable, and one is accepted, grant the franchise to the accepted bidder. The statute amplifying the procedure (the details of which are not touched upon at this point by the Constitution) requires the ordinance or resolution granting the franchise to be accepted only at a regular meeting of the council, after it shall have been introduced and laid over for at least five days. The procedure in the case at bar measures exactly up to these requirements. The proposed ordinance defining the franchise which the city intended to grant, should acceptable bids be received therefor, was introduced at a meeting held more than five days before the regular meeting at which it was passed; the city directed the proposed franchise to be advertised for public, competitive sale, which was done; the bids were acceptable, and when the bids were canvassed and one was accepted, the council in regular session adopted, by the vote of more than three of the members, the ordinance granting the franchise.

We do not mean to intimate that if the city had pursued the course of defining or "creating" the franchise by an ordinance adopted before the advertisement and sale that such procedure would have been irregular. Strictly, a franchise could not be "granted" until there was a grantee to take it. Such an ordinance would be merely declaratory of the municipal purpose, but could confer no rights on anybody until there was a sale of the franchise, as required by section 164, of the Constitution. Rights, mere incorporeal things, can not be carved out and set apart as a log might be hewn. But they will depend upon the power of the grantor to create, and of the consent and capacity of the grantee to take. When so granted, they may then be regarded as separated from the general body from which they were taken, and as having become the absolute or qualified property of the grantee.

We conclude that the granting of the franchise in the manner done in this case was regular, and in strict conformity with the requirements of the Constitution (section 164) and statute (section 3636, Kentucky Statutes).

Appellant contends that the ordinance of March 11, 1895, was void, because it was also the granting of a franchise without sale, and because the ordinance was passed on the same day it was introduced. If the ordinance granted any additional privilege in the streets and public places of the city, there would be no irresistible force in appellant's contention here, or, even if there was some material change in the terms of the grant, so as that the city was, or might have been, prejudiced by the fact, a very grave question would arise whether such an ordinance was not, in effect, the granting of a franchise without a sale. But we do not find such to be the case here. The grantee had agreed to certain conditions as part consideration for this grant. One of them, the rate of tolls, was of particular interest to the public, in other words, the city. The other condition was as to the time within which work on the plant was to be begun. The latter was not of so much importance to the city, except as a kind of security that the bid was in good faith. It was a condition which the city might have been justified in not exacting the penalty for its breach, if the delay had not been material. Still, it was a matter of importance to the grantee, as it weakened his hold upon its franchise. We think it was competent for the city to waive the forfeiture of the franchise because the work had not been begun within six months, in consideration of a reduction of the rates by the owner of the franchise. There was a sufficient consideration moving to the city, to support its waiver of the forfeiture; likewise a sufficient consideration moving to the grantee of the franchise to support his agreement to charge patrons within the city, and for whose benefit and welfare the contract had been entered into, a less rate than was originally agreed upon. In doing this, the city granted no new or different right in the use of its streets, nor did it abate any of the original consideration. On the contrary, it gave only what it had originally agreed to grant, and got in exchange, a better consideration. What it had given up was a right to claim a forfeiture—the giving up of which is not the granting of a franchise.

The first suit—the one brought by the city—contained a prayer of alternative relief, it will be remembered. Section 90, Civil Code, contains this provision: "If no defense be made, the plaintiff can not have judgment for any relief not specifically demanded."

It of course does not follow that he would be entitled to any relief he prayed for specifically in such case. The prayer for relief serves a two-fold purpose: (1) It defines specifically the legal right claimed by the plaintiff, by which the court will be guided in granting or refusing the relief; for while it may not be granted, as not being warranted, supposing the plaintiff has mistaken his right, the court will not voluntarily grant him some other relief which the facts might have entitled him to, but which the plaintiff may not desire, and the court would not, in such case, be warranted in thrusting it upon him. (2) The other feature of the prayer is to apprise the defendant of what is demanded of him. For the same facts may authorize any of several remedies. If the defendant is informed that only a particular remedy is asked, he may be willing to concede that. Hence, he may make no defense. It would be most unjust to allow the plaintiff to subsequently have, or the court to grant, an unclaimed remedy to the defendant's great surprise. But, as more than one remedy may be authorized by the same facts, and as, particularly in equity, it rests in the sound discretion of the court, sometimes, as to which of them shall be granted, the plaintiff ought not to be put to the jeopardy of losing his case because he misjudges the temper of the judge. Hence, the Code allows, as the common law did, a prayer for alternative relief. (Newman's Pl. & Pr., section 356.)

In such a prayer the court and defendant are advised of the plaintiff's claim of right, and of the specific redress he asks. The defendant is not taken unawares if he confesses the petition, when the court decides to grant either alternative of the prayer, as he was informed such was specifically demanded. It was not for the plaintiff, either, to clip the range of the chancellor's discretion in dispensing equity. In this case, the chancellor did grant an alternative of the plaintiff's prayer—the one doubtless which appealed to his judicial sense of right upon the admitted facts. We think there was not error in his action.

Appellant contends that as it had bought a franchise—a mere right to occupy certain public streets with its poles and wires—it could not be compelled to use its right, i. e., to occupy the streets; that a court of chancery will not enjoin a man from abandoning his right, or incorporeal property. We might grant so much, yet it is a sufficient response, we think, that notwithstanding, the court will compel him who bought a right to pay for it, although he may choose to abandon it. In this instance, the pay, the consideration, is the furnishing of a service, not the personal services of the contracting party, but the use of his property and of the time and labors of his employes. In this case as part of the consideration for the grant of the franchise, there is the contract of the grantee to furnish certain classes of persons certain valuable privileges. The contract was made for their benefit, and based upon a valuable consideration. They may sue for the enforcement of the contract made in their behalf, and one or more may sue for all. Or, the city might have maintained the suit, as it was the party with whom the contract was made. (Section 21, Civil Code of Practice.) The remedy at law in behalf of the citizens for the breach of the contract by the telephone company is inadequate. The appropriate remedy was an action in equity for its specific performance. This view the circuit court took.

In the ordinance granting the franchise in question there is a preamble setting forth the extent of the use of the streets contemplated in the establishment of the telephone plant in the city, which clause concludes thus:

"And are to set up poles, string wires, and make necessary excavations therefor, and thus connect said central exchange, and thereby each subscriber's instrument, with such other cities and towns, to-wit: Paducah, Mayfield, Fulton and Union City, and to such other neighboring towns to which this system can be extended, for the full term of twenty years upon the following terms and conditions:
* * *

"Fifth. The rate for use of said telephone shall not exceed $1.50 per month for each telephone, and $1 per month for exchange service for each subscriber."

The language of the ordinance of March 11, 1895, except as to the amount, is substantially the same as above.

The circuit court held that the patrons were entitled to have telephone service furnished them to Paducah, Mayfield, Fulton and Union City, without any additional charge over $1.50 a month for residence phones, $2.50 a month for phones in business houses, and $3.50 a month where one subscriber uses both. The parties had never so construed the terms of the ordinance. Nor is such construction consistent with the common usage or based upon the probabilities. We think it was the intention of the parties to express by the language quoted "that subscribers to the Hickman Exchange should have the privilege of using its long distance connections from the place where their phones were, in the city, without having to go to a pay station; but in fixing rates, the parties dealt only with the service which was to be completely performed within the city of Hickman. To the extent indicated the judgment in the case of Davidson and others was erroneous and is reversed, and remanded, for the entry of a judgment in conformity herewith. But the judgment in the case of the city of Hickman, is affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. JONES, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Actions—Injunction Bonds—Supersedeas—The plaintiff in the action for an injunction having superseded the judgment and taken an appeal to the Court of Appeals, the action on the bond should have been continued until the appeal was heard and determined by this court.

2. Damages—Injunctions—The ground upon which damages are sought to be recovered on the injunction bond is that plaintiff's mules remained idle from the time it was executed until the injunction was discharged. In this class of cases there can be no recovery if the damages alleged to have been incurred could have been avoided by ordinary care. If he could have gotten work by ordinary diligence, he can not recover for remaining idle.

Lewis McQuown, W. L. Brown and Eli H. Brown for appellant.

Sam C. Hardin for appellees.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

M. A. Miller brought a suit in the Laurel Circuit Court against Cy Jones and Green Jones, asking that her title to a half interest in a certain tract of land, be quieted. She obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from removing the timber from the land during the pendency of the action, and executed an injunction bond with the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company as her surety. On the trial of the action, her petition was dismissed and the injunction dissolved. Thereupon this suit was brought by Cy Jones and Green Jones against the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, upon the injunction bond, to recover the damages they had sustained, by reason of the injunction. The defendant filed an answer controverting the allegations of the petition as to the damages sustained. Afterwards it filed an amended answer pleading that M. A. Miller had taken an appeal to this court from the judgment dismissing her petition and dissolving her injunction; that she had executed a supersedeas bond; that a supersedeas had issued superseding the judgment of the circuit court, and that the case was pending in this court. The defendant thereupon entered a motion that the action be continued until the appeal was heard and determined in this court. The circuit court overruled the motion and the case being tried, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $425; the defendant appeals.

In Gardner v. Continental Insurance Co., 31 Ky. Law Rep., 69, it was held by this court that a supersedeas suspends the judgment but does not annul it or undo what is already done. It has no retroactive effect; whatever is done under the judgment while it is superseded is done without authority from the judgment as it is then powerless. Other authorities are collected in that opinion. (Durham v. Strait, 119 Ky., 222, 2 Cyc., 910.) In Johnson v. Williams, 82 Ky., 45, it was held that, after the judgment was superseded, the plaintiff could not bring an action upon the judgment and take out an attachment against the defendant's property. As the judgment had not been superseded at the time the action was brought, it was properly instituted; but the subsequent supersedeas took away from the judgment all efficacy while the supersedeas remained in force; and the action should have been continued until the appeal was determined in this court or the supersedeas was discharged. As the supersedeas does not undo what has been done. Where it is given pending an action it does not operate to abate the action, for this might seriously prejudice the plaintiff, where he had obtained a lien by his action or where he had the parties before the court and might be unable in a second action to get his process served. But the condition of the bond is that the surety will pay the defendant such damages as he may sustain by reason of the injunction if it is finally decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted. When the judgment dissolving the injunction is superseded, it has not been finally determined that the injunction ought not to have been granted; for that is the question to be determined on the appeal. When a judgment dissolving an injunction is not suspended, as provided in section 748, of the Civil Code, the injunction is no longer in force. The provisions of that section were not complied with, and so the dissolution of the injunction took effect; the injunction being no longer in force, the defendants were at liberty to proceed with the cutting of the timber on the land. This right in them was not affected by the subsequent supersedeas of the judgment; and if the condition of the bond had been that the surety would pay the damages sustained if the injunction was dissolved, then the supersedeas would have been no defense to this action. But the condition of the bond is that the surety will pay the damages sustained if it is finally decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted; and no judgment can be entered against the surety when there is no final decision in force to this effect. The court therefore should have sustained the defendants' motion to continue the case while the supersedeas was in force.

The chief ground upon which damages were sought was that the plaintiff in the action had five mules which remained idle from the time the injunction was obtained until it was discharged. The rule in this class of cases is that the plaintiff can not recover any damages which he might have avoided by ordinary care and that if he could get other work to do by ordinary diligence, he can not recover for remaining idle. The plaintiff testified in effect that the mules remained idle because his time was taken up in taking proof in the action and looking after it as he had no time to look around and get work for his mules or to put them at something else. The proof taken in the action related to the title to the land. If no injunction had been taken out, it would have been just as necessary for the plaintiff to look after the taking of the proof as it was. The fact that the plaintiff was unable to work his mules was therefore due to the fact that he had to attend to the defense of the law suit. Such damages as these are not covered by injunction bond. If the plaintiff could not attend to the law suit and work his mules, he should have gotten somebody else to work the mules, and if the work could have been obtained for the mules by ordinary diligence, no recovery can be had upon the bond for their remaining idle. (Lewis v. Scott, 95 Ky., 486; Miller v. Smith, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 242.) In the latter case the court pointed out what damages might be recovered upon an injunction bond in a case like this under proper allegations.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

TRUSTEES OF WHITE SCHOOL DISTRICT, NO. 15. OF LYON
COUNTY, &c. v. CUMMINS, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Schools—Levy of Taxes to Build Schoolhouse—Power of Trustees—Any indebtedness in excess of the income and revenue for any year is void under section 157, Constitution, but the county superintendent, having made the levy to build the schoolhouse, the trustees of the school district had the right to make the levy and allow the fund to accumulate until it amounted to a sufficient sum to warrant them in undertaking the building of the schoolhouse. They had a right to make a levy in 1903, another in 1904. and then wait until 1905 to make another levy to build the school house.

Newton W. Utley for appellants.

R. W. Lisanby for appellees.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

On Dec. 27, 1902, the county school superintendent condemned the schoolhouse in District No. 15, for repair or building. In June, 1903, he again condemned the house and ordered a new house to be erected. A similar order was given on July 1, 1904, and July 3, 1905. Each of these orders was in writing and served on the trustees. On July 6, 1903, the trustees regularly levied a poll tax of one dollar on each white, male and an ad valorem tax of twenty five cents on each $100 worth of property for the purpose of carrying out the order of the county superintendent. On Aug. 20, 1904, they made a similar levy for the same purpose, and on Aug. 5, 1905, they made a third levy. In the year, 1905, they set about building the schoolhouse, the old one being in a wretched condition and having been, three times, condemned by the county superintendent. They built the house at a cost of something like $400. The taxes levied would not yield this amount; and their intention was to raise the balance among themselves or by private subscription. They made themselves personally responsible for the debt, and placed the taxes in the hands of the sheriff for collection. After all this had been done, this suit was brought by certain tax-payers of the district enjoining the sheriff from collecting the taxes on the ground that the taxes were levied to pay a debt contracted in violation of section 157, of the Constitution. The circuit court sustained the injunction and the defendants appeal.

The tax levies for the three years will amount to less than $300 and the money realized from the tax levies, with the other resources in the hands of the trustees will not be sufficient to pay the debts incurred for the building of the schoolhouse; and there will be a balance which they themselves will have to pay or raise by private subscription. But this is no reason why the tax-payers should not pay the taxes which have been levied. The county superintendent having condemned the schoolhouse, the trustees had authority to make the levy which they made. Having made the levy, they could allow the fund to accumulate until it amounted to a sufficient sum to warrant them in undertaking the schoolhouse. Any indebtedness contracted in excess of the income and revenue provided for the year and other assets on hand, is void under section 157, of the Constitution, and the municipality can not be authorized to assume it. That which is void under this section is the indebtedness in excess of what the trustees may lawfully create. In other words it is the balance due on the building of the schoolhouse over and above the levies and assets in hand. But the trustees had authority to make a levy for the year 1905, and were authorized to use the assets on hand in building the schoolhouse. They had a perfect right to make a levy in 1903 and another in 1904, and then wait to 1905 to make another levy and build the schoolhouse. This whole question was carefully considered in the case of Overall v.

Madisonville, 102 S. W., 279. The opinion in that case fully sustained the action of the trustees here.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a judgment dismissing the petition.

COMMONWEALTH, FOR USE, &c. v. TEEL, &c.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Office and Officer—Action on Bond of Town Marshal—Unlawful Arrest—Necessary Parties—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest, the town is not a necessary party and is not liable for the wrongful acts of such officer, and can not protect such officer by refusing to join in an action with and for the benefit of a person injured by the wrongful acts of its officials.

2. Same—Necessary Allegations—Penalty Recoverable—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest it is not necessary to allege in the petition that the city council had, by an ordinance, fixed a penal sum to be named in the bond, for, if the plaintiff recovers he is not limited by the amount of the penalty named in the bond.

3. Same—Approval of Bond by City Council—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest, the petition is not demurrable because it fails to allege that the bond was approved by the city council, nor it is demurrable because there is no averment that the plaintiff had not committed any offense authorizing his arrest.

4. Damages—Recoverable Against Sureties—In an action against a town marshal and his sureties on his official bond for damages for an unlawful arrest, the plaintiff should not be permitted to recover against the sureties anything more than compensatory damages.

Allen D. Cole and W. A. Byron for appellants.

Geo. Doniphan and Geo. B. Kinney for appellees.

Appeal from Bracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

Appellant, J. I. Rosenthal, instituted this action in his own name and in the name of the Commonwealth of Kentucky for his use and benefit against appellee, Lake Teel and his co-appellees who were sureties on Teel's bond as marshal of the city of Augusta. The bond is as follows:

"Whereas Lake Teel has been appointed marshal of the city of Augusta, Ky., by the city council of said city and bond is required of him as such marshal for the faithful performance of the duties of the said office, also his duties as tax collector and the duties of all offices of which by virtue of said chapter 250, of the General Assembly of Kentucky, approved July 3d, 1893, and of section 3628, chapter 89, of the Kentucky Statutes, he is ex-officio incumbent. Now we, Lake Peel, principal, and James A. Thomas, John Riley and M. T. Flannery, his sureties, of Bracken county, Kentucky, do covenant with the Commonwealth of Kentucky for the use of the city of Augusta, Kentucky, in the penal sum of ($3,000) three thousand dollars, that the said Lake Teel as marshal of the said city will faithfully perform all the duties required of him as such marshal and tax collector and the duties of all offices of which he is made by the aforesaid chapter and section of the Kentucky Statutes ex-officio incumbent, and all such other duties as may be by ordinance or law required of him and that he will faithfully discharge all such duties and deport himself according to law.

"Witness our hands this January 8, 1906.

"LAKE TEEL,
"JAMES A. THOMPSON,
"JOHN RILEY,
"M. T. FLANNERY.

Attest, "W. C. WITTMEIER,
"City Clerk."

The defendants, appellees, filed the following special demurrer to the petition:

"The defendants specially demur to the petition herein because the petition shows on its face that no right of action enures upon the bond set out in the petition, in the name of the Commonwealth of Ky. or the Commonwealth of Kentucky, for the use of J. I. Rosenthal or in the name of J. I. Rosenthal. The bond was executed under section 3621, of the Kentucky Statutes."

The court sustained this demurrer, and thereupon appellant presented and offered to file an amended petition making the city of Augusta a party defendant to the action, alleging that it refused to join in the action for his benefit. Objections were made to the filing of this amendment which the court sustained, but made it a part of the record in the case. If the city was a necessary party to the action the court erred in refusing to allow the amended petition to be filed. But, in our opinion, the city was not a necessary party. It is not the law that cities and towns can save their officials from having to respond in damages by refusing to join in actions with and for the benefit of persons injured and damaged by the unlawful and wrongful acts of their officials. (Scott v. Commonwealth, For Use, &c., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 571, and Connelly v. American Bonding & Trust Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 714.). In the last named case the bond was executed for the marshal of the city of Newport, and in that case the court said:

"It is thought that this bond does not indemnify any person other than the city of Newport because the undertaking is to the said city alone. We are, however, of the opinion that the bond is controlled by the following sections of the Kentucky Statutes, and must be read in connection therewith, and that under the provisions of these sections, the informality of not naming the Commonwealth of Kentucky as the obligee of the bond will not prevent a recovery thereon by the person aggrieved. Said sections are as follows:

"Section 3751. The obligation required by law for the discharge or performance of any public or fiducial office, trust or employment, shall be a covenant to the Commonwealth of Kentucky from the person and his sureties that the principal shall faithfully discharge the duties of the office, trust or employment; but a bond or obligation taken in any other form shall be binding on the parties thereto according to its terms.

"Section 3752. Actions may be brought from time to time on any such covenant or bond in the name of the Commonwealth, for her benefit, or for that of any county, corporation or person injured by a breach of the covenant or condition, at the proper cost of the party suing, against the parties jointly or severally, together with the personal representative, heirs and devisees or distributees of such of them as may be dead; and the recovery against principal and surety shall not be limited by the amount of the penalty named in such bond. Nor shall the recovery be restricted only to such duties or responsibilities as belong to the office, post, trust or employment at the date of the covenant or bond, but may include any duties or responsibilities thereafter imposed by law or lawfully assumed."

"The bond is broad enough to cover an unlawful arrest or unnecessary and illegal punishment by the officer. (Johnson v. Williams' Adm'r., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 658.)"

These authorities and the sections of the statutes quoted show conclusively that the special demurrer was improperly sustained.

What we have said disposes of the only issue on this appeal; but appellees' counsel present in their brief several matters showing that the allegations of the petition are not sufficient to sustain a cause of action. First, the petition does not show that the penal sum required to be fixed by the city council by ordinance was done as required in section 3621, of the Kentucky Statutes. Second, the petition does not show that the bond was ever approved by the city council. Third, the petition does not show that Lake Teel committed a wrong, nor were any facts alleged which negatived the presumption of innocence of the officer. Fourth, The petition shows that it is sought to recover exemplary damages, rather than compensation. Conceding that the allegations of the petition are insufficient to support a cause of action, we can not affirm the judgment for that reason, because no general demurrer was filed. If the lower court had sustained a general demurrer to the petition appellant would have had the right to file an amended petition curing the defects therein. As the judgment will have to be reversed for the reasons stated we will express our opinion on the questions presented, so that on the return of the case a trial may be had according to law. With reference to the first proposition, our opinion is that it was not necessary to allege in the petition that the council, by ordinance, had fixed a penal sum to be named in the bond. for if appellant recovers anything in the action he is not limited by the amount of the penalty named in the bond. (Section 3752, Kentucky Statutes.) The question, as to whether the petition was defective in failing to allege that the bond was approved by the city council, is settled by the case of Growbarger, &c. v. U. S. Fidelity & Gauranty Co., &c., 31 Ky. Law Rep., 555. In that case this court said:

"It is further contended by counsel for appellee that the judgment of the lower court, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition as to appellee, was authorized, because of the admission in the petition, that the council or other authorities of the town of McHenry, had neither made nor kept a record of the execution of the marshal's official bond, or of its acceptance by that body."

It is true that the petition contains in substance, the admission that the records of the council fail to show the execution or acceptance of the bond, but it also contains the averments in substance that the bond was required of the marshal by the council, that it was duly executed by him, as principal, and appellee as surety. and also that it was duly approved and accepted by the town council, and in addition, an attested copy of the bond, obtained of the proper authorities of the town, was filed with and made a part of the petition.

These averments being confessed by the demurrer, constitute a sufficient statement of the facts showing the proper execution and acceptance of the bond. If no such bond was required of the marshal, or it was not executed by him, or signed by appellee as surety, or accepted at all, as alleged in the answer filed by appellee, without waiving its demurrer to the petition, such matters of defense or any of them, if sustained by sufficient evidence, on the trial, would prevent a recovery as to it, though the mere failure of the council to make the record of the execution or acceptance of the bond. would not do so, if in fact it was executed and accepted.

In executing an official bond only a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute is necessary. If statutes compelling the giving of bonds prescribe what they shall express, it is to subserve a two-fold purpose: First. Uniformity in the terms and conditions. Second. The best protection possible from the bond to the public and those dealing with the officer. But as said in Mechem on Public officers, section 268, such statutes are usually directory.

"And inasmuch as the substance is ordinarily more to be regarded than the form, it is quite generally held that unless the statute expressly declares that a bond not executed in form prescribed shall be void, the statute will be construed to be directory only and a substantial compliance with it will suffice."

In section 269, the author mentions informalities which would not invalidate an official bond:

"Thus that the bond is not taken by the proper persons or in the prescribed manner, or that it was not approved, by the designated officer, or that it was not signed or acknowledged in the presence of a particular officer, or that it was given before the time specified, or not until the time fixed had expired, or was not stamped as required, or that the officer who gave it had not been sworn, is immaterial, and the bond, if otherwise perfect, will be enforced."

Again, in section 270, it is said:

"So the fact that the officers charged with the duty of approving or filing the bond, had not performed it, will not defeat the validity of the bond, or release the sureties from it."

Also in section 313, it is declared:

"Approval being thus for the protection of the public only, it is well settled that where, by virtue of the bond, the officer has been inducted into office, his sureties can not escape liability for his defaults because the bond was not approved by the proper officer or was not approved at all."

"Applying to the facts alleged in the petition the law is announced by Mechem in the several sections, supra, it is patent that the lower court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition upon the ground last indicated. Indeed, our consideration of all the questions raised by the demurrer to the petition has constrained us to disagree with the conclusions reached by the learned judge of the circuit court, for we are of the opinion that the demurrer should have been overruled."

The allegations of the petition are not sufficient to sustain a cause of action for the reason that it does not negative, sufficiently, the alleged presumption of the officer's innocence of wrong doing. It should have been alleged, specifically, that appellant was not committing any offense in the presence of the officer, and that he had not committed any felony for which he was subject to be arrested. These allegations were necessary to show that the officer had no right to arrest him without a warrant. If the petition were not defective in the particular mentioned, then it was not necessary to allege that appellant was not trying to escape from the officer after his arrest, or that he did not first assault the officer, for if the arrest were unlawful, the presumption is against the officer: that is it will be presumed that his beating and bruising of appellant, was without authority of law. On the other hand, if the arrest of appellant were lawful and he sought to recover damages for the unlawful and unnecessary beating and bruising while under arrest, then it would have been necessary for appellant to have alleged that he was not trying to escape from the officer, and that he did not first assault him. If the arrest were lawful, and appellant endeavored to make his escape, and in doing so made an attack upon appellant and put him in danger of bodily harm, the officer was not bound to retreat, but in such case, had the right to use any means for his self-defense and for the keeping of the prisoner that were necessary and reasonable. (Connolly v. American Bonding Co., &c., supra.)

With reference to the fourth proposition, it is sufficient to say that the petition is not defective, and that, if appellant recovers anything, he should not be permitted to recover against the sureties of the officer anything more than compensation. (Johnson &c. v. Williams' Adm'r, 111 Ky., 289, and Scott v. Commonwealth, For Use, &c., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 571.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

NOLAN'S ADM'R v. STANDARD SANITARY MF'G. CO.

1. Master and Servant—Injury to Servant—Negligence of Master—Safe Place to Work—Verdict—New Trial—Appeal—John E. Nolan, in a trial before a jury, was given a verdict for $1,085 damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of his employer in not furnishing him a safe place in which to work. The trial court set aside the verdict and granted defendant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was excessive, to which he excepted and prayed for an appeal. Before the second trial he died. The action was revived in the name of his administrator and on the second trial, a verdict was rendered for the defendant. This appeal is prosecuted by the administrator to review the first verdict and judgment granting the defendant a new trial.

2. Same—Excessive Verdict—Burning by Molten Metal—Cripple for Life—Pain and Suffering—Lost Time—Where, on the trial of an action, by a servant, against his master for an injury caused by not furnishing him a safe place to work, made so by the negligence of the foreman, in causing another laborer to dig a trench near where the plaintiff was at work, in doing which he struck a ladle containing molten metal, which the plaintiff was carrying, causing it to splash upon his leg and foot, burning both severely, causing him great suffering and pain and the loss of three months time from his work, and making him a partial cripple for life, a verdict of $1,085 was not excessive.

3. New Trials—Discretion in Granting—Review—While the circuit court has a broad discretion in granting new trials, its exercise is subject to review and where it is made manifest that it erred in the exercise of such discretion, it is the duty of this court to correct the error. It is with great reluctance that this court will interfere with a verdict on the ground that it is excessive and the circuit court should be equally reluctant to do so.

4. Reversing First Judgment—Entry of First Verdict Ordered—Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the last verdict and judgment, and in lieu thereof, to enter of record the first verdict returned by the jury and enter judgment in conformity therewith.

Baird & Underwood for appellant.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

This action was instituted by John H. Nolan to recover of appellee damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence.

There were two trials of the case in the court below. The first trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in Nolan's favor for $1,085 damages. Upon appellee's motion, the lower court set aside the verdict and judgment and granted it a new trial, to which Nolan at the time excepted, and prayed an appeal, which was granted. Thereafter, and before the second trial, Nolan died, intestate, from a cause in no way resulting from the injury complained of. Andrew M. Sea, by appointment of the Jefferson County Court, duly qualified as the administrator of his estate and was made a party to the action, which was revived and thereafter prosecuted in his name as such administrator.

The second trial of the case resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee.

The purpose of the administrator in prosecuting this appeal is to obtain a review of the action of the circuit court in setting aside the first verdict and judgment and granting appellant a new trial.

It appears from the averments of the petition, as amended, that Nolan was in the employ of the appellee as a molder and that while engaged in its service, in that capacity, he was injured by molten iron being thrown upon his leg and foot, whereby both were badly burned and injured. The particulars of the accident, as alleged, were that Nolan, acting immediately under an order from appellee's foreman, was engaged in catching with a ladle the molten metal from a cupola furnace when the foreman ordered a negro laborer to dig a trench in the sand, about the base of the furnace, in doing which he struck Nolan's ladle, containing the hot metal, causing it to splash upon his leg and foot. That his injuries were caused by the unsafeness of the place where he was required to work, made so by the negligence of the foreman in directing the negro, without notice to Nolan, to dig the trench under his ladle, while he was in the act of drawing off the molten metal, and in failing to furnish a sufficient number of hands to carry on the work of drawing the metal from the cupola; the digging of the trench being as claimed by Nolan, intended as a substitute for an assistant to aid in removing the metal.

While the testimony as to the manner of Nolan's receiving his injuries was conflicting, that introduced in his behalf strongly conduced to prove that he was injured by the negligence of appellee's foreman as claimed, and the case was manifestly one for the decision of a jury. This seemed to be fully recognized by the lower court, notwithstanding its action in granting the new trial following the return of the first verdict.

It appears from the record that the new trial was granted solely upon the ground that the damages awarded Nolan, by the verdict of the jury were, in the opinion of the trial judge, excessive, this conclusion being based, as stated by the court, upon the fact that Nolan, upon becoming able to resume his occupation, earned about the same wages that he received before the accident. As to the character and extent of Nolan's injuries there was little, if any, contrariety of evidence. It showed that his leg was badly burned by the molten iron metal below the calf and that his foot was also so badly burned as to make him, at least, a partial cripple; and when his deposition was taken, which was a year after the accident, Nolan testified that he was still lame, and to use his own expression, this lameness was then so marked as to cause him, when walking, to throw the injured foot "like a stringhalted horse." His statement that the injuries to his leg and foot compelled him to remain in his room and refrain from work for a period of three months was not contradicted by any witness; and if he failed to testify in respect to his physical and mental sufferings during that time, the burns themselves, as well as the character of the red hot liquid metal, by which they were inflicted furnished indisputable evidence of the pain and suffering, both physical and mental, they must necessarily have caused. Leaving out of estimate the question of whether his injuries were permanent, and the three months loss of time from his work, we would be loath to say that Nolan's mental and physical suffering, caused by the injuries in question, did not entitle him to the $1,085 allowed by the verdict; certainly it can not justly be claimed that this amount was excessive, if, in addition to his mental and physical suffering and the loss of time from his work, any impairment of his ability to earn money from the date of the accident to the time of his death, caused by his injuries, should also have been considered by the jury in estimating the damages to which he was entitled.

The evidence as to the three months' loss of time resulting from Nolan's injuries was as positive as was that with respect to his physical and mental suffering, but the evidence as to any impairment of his ability to earn money was not as convincing. There was, however, some evidence as to such impairment and it was for the jury to say, from all the evidence, whether his capacity to earn money, between the date of the accident and his death, was to any appreciable extent thereby lessened. If so, his estate should have been compensated for the loss. The fact that it was shown he was at one time earning, after the accident, the same wages as a molder he had received before, while competent as evidence on the question of whether any impairment of his earning capacity had resulted from the injuries sustained, was not, as the trial court seemed to think, conclusive of the absence of any impairment. If, as there was some evidence to show, Nolan was permanently lamed by the burns he received, and it rendered him less skillful in his occupation as a molder, and thereby prevented him from obtaining such wages as persons of ordinary skill in the same occupation would ordinarily receive, then such lameness amounted to an impairment of his ability to earn money, and constituted a proper element of damages. Obviously, a lame man, whatever may be his occupation, has not the same capacity to earn money as a man sound in body. And it is the loss of capacity the law compensates.

While the circuit court has a broad discretion in the matter of granting new trials, its exercise is subject to review, and when it is made manifest that it has erred in the exercise of such discretion, it is the duty of this court to correct the error. The discretion, thus lodged in the circuit court, should be exercised with great caution in determining whether a new trial should be granted on the ground that a verdict is excessive in amount. It is with great reluctance that this court will interfere with a verdict upon that ground, and the circuit court should be equally reluctant to do so.

In expressing its mind in regard to its right to interfere on account of an alleged excessive verdict, this court, in Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. Mitchell, 87 Ky., 327, said:

"We are not acting as a jury, and it is only when it is glaringly excessive and appearing at first blush to have resulted from passion or prejudice, that we can interfere. The power should be sparingly exercised and only in extreme cases. This is the policy of the law, reasonably and necessarily so. It is difficult, indeed, impossible, to measure, with mathematical certainty the extent of some of the elements of compensatory damages. The law has confided the duty to the opinion of the jury as the best means of arriving at their extent, even approximately, and their verdict should be regarded prima facie, as the result of an exercise of an honest judgment upon their part."

In Mud River Coal Co. v. Tipton, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 940, it was held that a verdict for $1,725 damages, for injuries which confined the plaintiff to his bed several months and made of him a cripple, was not excessive. In Adams Express Co. v. Smith, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1915, a verdict of $1,000 damages, for breaking the plaintiff's leg, was held not excessive.

In Bowling Green Stone Co. v. Capshaw, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 945, the plaintiff recovered $2,000 for an injury to his foot, which made him a slight cripple. The verdict was held not excessive.

In C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Wiley, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 770, 90 S. W., 557, a verdict of $1,500 recovered by Wiley against the railroad, for the breaking of two bones in and an injury to the nerves of the hand, was held not excessive.

In City of Louisville v. Hall, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1064, 91 S. W., 1133, for a "serious injury" to his ankle, a boy, 17 years of age, was allowed $800. This court said the verdict was not excessive. In Louisville Gas Co. v. Page, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 885, 86 S. W., 1112, a woman recovered a verdict for $2,000, for injuries sustained to her elbow, by falling over a gas box. This court held that the verdict was not excessive, and in doing so, in part said:

"In a case like this, where there has been a serious injury, and much physical pain and suffering, and there being some evidence from which the jury might conclude that the injury may be permanent, it is difficult, if not impossible, for a jury or court to determine with exactness the proper compensation. The mere fact that the court would not have fixed the compensation so high as a jury has done, is no reason for setting the verdict aside, and granting a new trial. To justify the court in doing so, the verdict must be so excessive as to induce the belief that it was caused by passion or prejudice of the jury."

The right of this court to correct an erroneous ruling of the circuit court in granting a new trial, has been declared in numerous cases. Thus in Week v. Patton, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 776, it is said:

"While appellate courts are slow to disturb the action of the lower court, in granting a new trial, they will do so when it plainly appears, as it does in this case, that there is no good reason why a new trial should have been granted."

In Anderson v. Republic Iron and Steel Co., 107 S. W., 220, it is said:

"The trial court erred in holding as a matter of law, that appellant ought to have known of the defective condition of the roof, and in setting aside the verdict and awarding a new trial. At the time of granting the new trial, the trial court indicated his purpose to give a peremptory instruction for appellee on the second trial, and upon the same evidence did instruct the jury to find for appellee. Under the authority of Richards v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1478. we are of opinion that the order granting a new trial should be set aside, and that judgment should be entered upon the verdict rendered at the first trial."

(Richards v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1478; Curry v. Fetter, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 494; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Ricketts, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 662; Crowley v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1434.)

The record in this case shows no error in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in giving or refusing instructions. The single error was in the action of the circuit court in setting aside the first verdict and granting appellee a new trial. This should not have been done.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the last verdict and judgment and in lieu thereof to enter of record the first verdict returned by the jury, and to enter judgment in conformity therewith.

EWING v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Homicide—Killing Woman on Street—Apparent Friendliness—Proof of Previous Threats—Circumstances Indicating Malice—On the trial of one for murder, who shot and killed a woman with whom he was walking on the street, although the parties were then apparently friendly, it was not error to allow proof that on the Saturday prior to the killing the accused when informed that the deceased had had a fight with another girl with whom he was intimate he said: "I wish I had been there," and also that he said on the day of the killing, "I would as soon kill this bitch as not," the jury was to judge whether the friendliness was apparent or real, and the proof, taken in connection with his buying a pistol and other circumstances, should go to the jury on the question of malice.

2. Same—Malice Must Be Proven—Question for Jury—The doctrine of implied malice does not obtain in Kentucky, and when we reject the doctrine of implied malice, the existence of malice is a question for the jury, and the offense which would otherwise be murder becomes voluntary manslaughter where, under the evidence, the jury find, as a fact, that the killing was not done with malice aforethought.

3. Same—Question of Malice—Reckless Shooting—Indifference to Consequences—When we do not apply the doctrine of implied malice and submit the question of malice to the jury, it must follow that if the jury find the act was done without previous malice, they may find that the act was voluntary where it was done so recklessly or carelessly as to show an indifference to consequences. He who puts a loaded pistol at the head of another and pulls the trigger, knowing the danger attending the act, can not be heard to say he intended no harm.

4. Pointing Pistol at Another—Unlawful Act—Homicide Resulting—Offense Committed—The pointing of a pistol at another whether loaded or unloaded, is unlawful under the statute, and where a homicide is committed by the doing of an unlawful act, the offense is involuntary manslaughter, if the facts are not sufficient to constitute murder or voluntary manslaughter.

Nat. A. Porter and J. M. Simmons for appellant.

N. B. Hays and C. H. Morris for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Charles Ewing was indicted in the Warren Circuit Court for the murder of Carrie Shields. He was found guilty, as charged, and his punishment fixed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, and from this judgment he appeals.

Carrie Shields was sixteen years old. According to the proof for the Commonwealth, a girl named Girtie Ray was intimate with Charles Ewing. The killing occurred on Monday. On the previous Monday Carrie Shields had a fight with Girtie Ray, Charles Ewing being away at the time. On the following Saturday when he returned, Girtie Ray told Charles Ewing that Carrie Shields had jumped upon her and beat her up while she was drunk, and he said "I wish I had seen her," or "I will see her," the witness did not remember which. He bought a pistol, and on the following Monday morning the two women, Charles Ewing, and a man named Sam Chambers, all the parties being negroes, were at a saloon near the landing below Bowling Green. They drank in the saloon, and took whisky away with them. While they were there, Ewing was heard to say, with an oath, "I would just as soon kill this bitch as not." The saloon-keeper told him not to raise any racket there, and he said "all right." They got into a boat and went across the river, and then to a man's house. As they were returning from the man's house to the river, when the party were walking quietly along the turnpike and apparently in a good humor, Ewing suddenly raised his pistol, and without stopping, fired it, striking Carrie Shields, with whom he was walking, in the head and instantly killed her. Sam Chambers and Girtie Ray were walking behind him, and witnessed the shooting.

On the other hand, the proof for the defendant is, that Sam Chambers had given his pistol to Carrie Shields, and as they were walking along she held it in his face, saying "Don't you believe I'll shoot you." He said "No." She repeated this three or four times, and he each time said "No." They didn't stop walking. He pulled out his pistol, and threw it in her face, and said as he testified: "No, I don't believe you will shoot me; and I bore too hard on my trigger, and it went off and killed her. She had her pistol in my face, and I had mine in hers; we both were walking along with our pistols in each other faces, and my pistol went off."

"Q. Did you pull it purposely?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. Did you think she was meaning to shoot you?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. What was her manner?"

"A. She was laughing, and I thought she was playing."

"Q. And when you pulled your pistol, what was your intention?"

"A. I was playing myself when I pulled mine."

"Q. Did you mean to shoot her?"

"A. No, sir."

The defendant's testimony is in some measure corroborated by other witnesses.

The court did not err in allowing the proof as to what the defendant had said when he heard that Carrie Shields had beaten up Girtie Ray when she was drunk, or in allowing proof of what he said at the saloon that morning. Although the parties were then apparently friendly, the jury were to judge whether the friendliness was apparent or real; and the proof taken in connection with his buying the pistol and the other circumstances in the case were sufficient to go to the jury on the question of malice.

The court instructed the jury as to murder, involuntary manslaughter, and shooting by misadventure. He also gave an instruction on self-defense, but he gave no instruction on voluntary manslaughter, his view of the case being that the shooting was either murder or involuntary manslaughter.

There is no doubt that at common law it would have been a question for the court, and not the jury, whether this shooting was done with malice or not; and that at common law it would have been held murder. In 1727, the Chief Justice delivered the unanimous opinion of all the judges (in the case of Rex v. Oneby, 2 Stra., 766), as follows: "The judges are to determine what is malice, or what is a reasonable time to cool; and they must do so upon the circumstances of the case; the jury are judges only of the fact, and we must determine whether it be deliberate or not. Hence it is, that in summing up the evidence, the judges direct the jury if you believe such a fact, it is so; if not, it is otherwise; and they find either a general or a special verdict upon it. There is no instance where the jury ever find that the act was done by malice, or that the party had or had not time to cool; but that must be left to the judges upon the circumstances of the case."

In 2 Bishop on Criminal Law, section 376, it is said: "An actual intent to take life is not a necessary ingredient in murder, any more than it is in manslaughter."

Again, in section 680, it is said: "Ordinarily when one without legal excuse so uses a deadly weapon that the death of a human being results therefrom, the law either conclusively or as a violent presumption of fact, infers malice aforethought, and adjudges the act of the murder."

Under these authorities, it is manifest that at common law the killing in this case would be held to be murder upon the ground that malice was implied from the use of a deadly weapon under the circumstances shown. But the doctrine of implied malice does not obtain in Kentucky. (Farris v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 362; Buckner v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 601; Trimble v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 176.) Yet it does not follow that because the doctrine of implied malice does not obtain in Kentucky, the shooting here, which would be murder at common law, is involuntary manslaughter. When we reject the doctrine of implied malice, the existence of malice is a question for the jury, and the offense which would otherwise be murder becomes voluntary manslaughter, where under the evidence the jury find as a fact that the killing was not done with malice aforethought. Accordingly, it has been held in Kentucky, in a long line of cases, that, where one kills another by the wanton, reckless or grossly careless use of fire arms, the offense, if without malice aforethought, is voluntary manslaughter, although he had no intention to kill. (Sparks v. Commonwealth, 3 Bush, 111; Chrystal v. Commonwealth, 9 Bush, 669; York v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 360; Smith v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky., 318; Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 356; Brown v. Commonwealth, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1335.) These opinions rest on the common law principle that a man must be held to intend the necessary consequence of his act.

In 1 Bishop on Criminal Law, section 313, it is said: "There is little distinction except in degree between the will to do a wrongful thing and an indifference, whether it is done or not. Therefore, carelessness is criminal, and within limits supplies the place of affirmative criminal intent."

When we do not apply the doctrine of implied malice, and submit the question of malice to the jury, it must follow that if the jury find the act was done without previous malice, they may find that the act was voluntary where it was done so recklessly or carelessly as to show an indifference to consequences. To hold otherwise, would be to ignore the rule that he who acts recklessly is in law presumed to intend the consequences of his act. He who puts a loaded pistol at the head of another and pulls the trigger, knowing the danger attending the act, can not be heard to say he intended no harm. (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 18.) At common law the offense was not involuntary manslaughter where the act amounted to a felony, or was likely to endanger life, although done without intention to kill. (Roberson's Crim. Law, section 198, and cases cited.) As the reckless killing of another with a deadly weapon was not involuntary manslaughter at common law, when we hold that such a killing is not necessarily murder, the offense which was not involuntary manslaughter at common law, does not become involuntary manslaughter; but when the jury finds that the homicide is not with malice aforethought, it is a voluntary killing without malice, the recklessness of the act supplying the intent to harm the person shot.

This case is on all fours with Messer v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 700; 27 Ky. Law Rep., 527; 28 Ky. Law Rep., 821. On the first appeal of the case, the judgment was reversed because the court failed to give an instruction on involuntary manslaughter. On the second appeal it was reversed because the court by oversight omitted an instruction on accidental killing. On the third appeal, the judgment was affirmed. But, on each trial, the court gave an instruction on voluntary manslaughter.

On another trial, the court will, by its instructions, submit to the jury these propositions:

1. If the defendant willfully, feloniously and with malice aforethought, shot and killed Carrie Shields, he was guilty of murder.

2. If he shot and killed her, without malice aforethought, by the reckless or grossly careless handling or shooting of the pistol, when he knew the pistol was dangerous to life if used in the way he used it, they should find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, although he did not intend to shoot her.

3. If he was not reckless or grossly careless in using the pistol, but intentionally pointed it at her, although believing it would not go off, not intending to shoot her and not having reason to apprehend that it would go off, he was guilty of involuntary manslaughter.

4. If the shot that killed her was accidental and unintentional on the part of the defendant, and not willful, and with malice aforethought, as defined in number one; or the result of his recklessness and carelessness, as defined in number two; or of his intentionally pointing the pistol at her, as defined in number three; he should be acquitted.

There was proof introduced by the defendant to the effect that the defendant paid fifty cents for the pistol; that it was old and that he had repeatedly snapped it, and thought it would not go off; and it would appear from his evidence that the firing of the pistol was due to his pulling the trigger harder than he intended.

There was nothing in the case upon which to base an instruction on self-defense; and this on another trial will be omitted. There were witnesses to the homicide, and, therefore, the case does not fall within the rule that an instruction on self-defense should always be given where the proof is exclusively circumstantial. Section 1308. Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "If any person shall draw a deadly weapon upon another, or shall point any deadly weapon at another, or shall hold or flourish or use in a threatening or boisterous manner, or shall, on a public highway, or at any school assembly, place of public worship or business, or in going to or from any place of public worship, fire or discharge at random any deadly weapon, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, whether said weapon be loaded or unloaded, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than fifty nor more than one hundred dollars, or imprisoned not less than ten nor more than fifteen days, or both."

The pistol was a deadly weapon for the woman was killed. It was unlawful for defendant to point it at her, whether it was loaded or unloaded. Where a homicide is committed in the doing of an unlawful act, the offense is involuntary manslaughter, if the facts are not sufficient to constitute murder or voluntary manslaughter. (Roberson's Crim. Law, section 198.) If, therefore, the defendant willfully pointed the pistol at the woman, and thus killed her, he is at least guilty of involuntary manslaughter.

The court will also give to the jury this instruction. "If there is a reasonable doubt of the defendant being proven guilty, he should be acquitted. If there is a reasonable doubt of the degree of the offense which the defendant has committed, he should only be convicted of the lower degree. Voluntary manslaughter is a lower degree of the offense than murder; and involuntary manslaughter is a lower degree than voluntary manslaughter."

Instructions 1 and 7, given by the court, are correct. In lieu of instruction 9 this court will instruct the jury that the word "feloniously" means proceeding from an evil heart or purpose; and that the words "malice aforethought" means a pre-determination to do the act of killing without legal excuse; and it is immaterial how suddenly or recently before the killing, such determination was formed. The instructions indicated and above referred to, constitute the whole law of the case.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

WALKER, &c. v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

(Filed June 10, 1908—Not to be reported)

Fraudulent Conveyances—Affirmed on the Evidence—The case is affirmed on the evidence, which shows that appellant W., to avoid paying a judgment, fraudulently conveyed to his father-in-law, S., his farm and all his personal property for the recited consideration of $5,150, when in fact nothing was paid, which deed was set aside as fraudulent and without consideration and the property held subject to the judgment.

Spelght & Dean for appellants.

Herschel T. Smith for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

On the 17th day of May 1906, appellee recovered in the Fulton Circuit Court a judgment against appellant, J. K. Walker, in the sum of $202.13, with interest thereon from the date of the judgment, and $12 as cost of the action. On the 17th day of September, 1906, it had issued from the clerk's office an execution on the judgment for the amount thereof and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Hickman county for execution. The execution was returned to the office from which it issued endorsed "no property found." On May 17, 1906, the day on which the judgment was rendered, appellant Walker was in the town of Fulton, and on learning that the judgment had been rendered, he went to the telephone office and tried to call up his father-in-law, W. H. Stephens, one of the appellants, but failed to get him. When he returned to his home near Beelerton, he went to Beelerton, about eight or nine o'clock at night, and there again telephoned his father-in-law, and requested him to come to his home the next morning, which is about twenty-three miles from Mayfield, where his father-in-law lived. Both of appellants testified that there was not anything said in this conversation over the telephone as to the purpose for which appellant, Stephens, was wanted at the home of Walker. The next morning Stephens arrived at Walker's home about nine o'clock; but before that hour Walker went to a nearby neighbor, Mr. Elliott, who was a deputy county court clerk, and had him to go to his house and write a deed of conveyance of Walker's farm to appellant, Stephens. Elliott had nearly completed the writing of the deed when Stephens arrived. The consideration named in the deed was "4,000 cash in hand paid." Elliott took the acknowledgement of Walker and his wife, Stephens paid him the recording fee and directed him to take it to the county clerk's office in Clinton and have it recorded, which was done that day, May 18, 1906. Elliott left immediately after completing the deed and did not see any money pass from Stephens to Walker.

This action was instituted by appellee to set aside this deed, upon the ground that it was made for the fraudulent purpose of defeating appellee in the collection of its judgment, and that there was no consideration paid for the land. The proof shows, without contradiction, that such was the purpose of appellant, Walker, in making the conveyance; for it is shown, without construction, that some time before appellee instituted the action to recover a judgment on the note, he was in appellee's bank in Fulton and asserted that he would never pay the note, and that he would use all means in his power to avoid the payment of it; and upon being told that he had plenty of property and could be made to pay it he said to the officers of the bank, "crack your whip and collect it if you can." This, coupled with the fact that upon the same afternoon, he heard the judgment was rendered, he tried to get into communication with his father-in-law in Mayfield, and that night did get into communication with him and asked him to come to his house the next morning early, and before he arrived had obtained the services of a deputy county court clerk, and was having the deed prepared when his father-in-law arrived, and had the deed recorded that day. And, in addition to this, he, on the same day he conveyed the land, also conveyed by a separate writing several horses, mules, cows and calves, all his farming implements and growing crops to his father-in-law for the recited consideration of $1,150 cash in hand paid. These facts show conclusively that appellant Walker's purpose was to prevent appellee from collecting its judgment. But appellants say that there is no allegation in the pleadings, and there was no proof, that appellant Stephens had notice of the fraudulent purpose of his son-in-law, Walker, and that the proof shows that he paid a valuable consideration for the land.

Walker testified that his co-plaintiff did pay him $4,000 in cash for the land, and $1,150 for the stock, crop and farming implements soon after he arrived at his house, on May 18, 1906, and Stephens testified to the same. They both testified that the sale of the land had been under consideration by both of them for several months prior to that date; that Walker desired to go west on account of his wife's health. But they did not state that there had been anything previously said with reference to the sale and purchase of the crop, stock and farming implements.

It is a little remarkable that when Walker requested, by telephone, that his father-in-law, who was twenty-three miles away, to come to his house early the next morning, that there was nothing said why he wanted him to come so quickly and that Stephens failed to inquire why he wanted him to make such a trip under the circumstances, and more remarkable why Stephens would get up early enough to drive in a buggy, twenty-three miles, by nine o'clock, and carry with him, loose in his pockets, $1,000 in gold, and enough paper money to make the sum of $5,150, and without any knowledge or information that he would have any use for it. It is true that he anticipated the land deal would be made; but why carry with him $1,150 extra? It seems that he had enough paper money to purchase the land, and it is strange that he would burden himself with $1,000 in gold. It does appear that Walker took a trip west and remained a month or so, but his wife remained at home. It further appears that Walker had been in possession of this farm and all the personal property since the alleged sales. Stephens testified that he had had most of this gold for eight or ten years, and had owned most of the paper money several years before the trade. It also appears from the testimony that he had owed from three to five thousand for several years, on some of which he had been paying eight per cent. interest. It is strange that he owned all this money and had it in his possession, deriving no benefit from it, and at the same time owing debts upon which he was paying eight per cent. interest.

In our opinion, the lower court had grounds to believe that these transactions took place with the knowledge, upon the part of Stephens, of the fraudulent purpose of his son-in-law in making the sales; and also for believing that no real consideration passed from Stephens to Walker, for the land or the personal property, in which case, the sale was void as to appellee's judgment, whether Stephens had notice of the fraudulent purpose of Walker or not. (Sections 1906 and 1907, Kentucky Statutes.)

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

STERNS COAL CO v. EVANS' ADM'R.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Actions—Continuances—Correcting Error in Name of Party—where the real defendant to an action is before the court, a verbal error in the name of the defendant and correction thereof, whether it be a corporation or an individual, will not of itself be grounds for a continuance.

2. Mines and Mining—Foul Air—Death of Miner—Action for Damages—Evidence—Competency—Statutory Provision—Under Ky. Statutes, section 2731, providing for keeping fresh air in coal mines, on the trial of an action against a coal company for damages for negligently causing the death of a miner by reason of the explosion of foul air therein, evidence was competent, that a fan located on the outside, near the mouth, used to furnish pure and fresh air in the mine, was often, before the explosion, stopped and not in running order, and that the mine boss knew of this condition of the fan.

3. Same—This statute (section 2731), and every statute intended for the protection of laborers engaged in the hazardous business of

J. N. Sharp and M. S. Singleton for appellant.

H. H. Tye and I. N. Steely for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

In 1904 this action was brought against the Sterns Coal Company, limited, averred to be a Michigan corporation, by the administrator of William Evans, deceased, to recover damages for the loss of his life, which occurred as alleged in a coal mine owned and operated by the defendant. It was alleged that the death of Evans was caused by the negligence of the company in failing to perform its statutory duties in respect to the mine, and that this failure caused an explosion that resulted in his death.

Afterwards, upon motion of the defendant, stating that it was a citizen of the State of Michigan, the case was transferred to the Federal court, but upon motion was remanded to the State court. In March, 1907, the Sterns Coal Company, limited, filed its answer, in which, after denying all the averments of the petition, it pleaded in one paragraph the contributory negligence of Evans, and in another that his death was the result of the negligence of his fellow servants. A reply completed the pleadings.

Upon the trial of the case, and at the conclusion of the testimony in chief for the plaintiff, he offered an amended petition striking out the word "Limited," in the name of the Sterns Coal Company, limited, discontinued the action against the Sterns Coal Company, limited, and asked that the cause proceed against the Stern Coal Company. Thereupon the Sterns Coal Company, by its attorney, J. N. Sharp, who was also the attorney engaged in conducting the defense for the Sterns Coal Company, limited, filed his affidavit in which he said in substance that the amendment was a surprise to the Sterns Coal Company, and it was not ready to proceed with the trial, as it had no witnesses present to testify in its behalf, and had no opportunity to summon witnesses. The affidavit further set out that the Sterns Coal Company was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Tennessee, and did not own, control or manage the mine in which Evans lost his life. And further, that Evans was not in its employment at any time or at the time of his death.

The same attorney, on behalf of the Sterns Coal Company, offered to file its answer, in which it is averred that it was a Tennessee corporation, had never been served with process, had no connection with the mine in which Evans was employed, or anything to do with the causes that brought about his death.

The trial judge refused to permit the answer of the Sterns Coal Company to be filed, and also refused to continue the case. The defendant, declining to introduce any evidence, the jury, after being instructed, returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, now appellee, for the sum of $1,350.00. Upon this verdict a judgment was rendered against the Sterns Coal Company for the amount thereof.

Counsel for appellant insists that serious error was committed by the lower court in failing to continue the case on behalf of the Sterns Coal Company, and in rendering judgment against it. This argument is based upon the proposition that the judgment against the Sterns Coal Company, a Tennessee corporation, when the cause of action accrued against, and the action was instituted and prosecuted against, the Sterns Coal Company, limited, or the Sterns Coal Company, a Michigan corporation.

The apprehensions of counsel that a judgment was rendered against a Tennessee corporation or that a Tennessee corporation operating under the name of the Sterns Coal Company will be obliged to pay any part of the judgment, are not well founded. The action was instituted and prosecuted against a Michigan corporation, and the judgment was rendered against that corporation. If there is no Michigan corporation known as the Sterns Coal Company, then the judgment is a nullity. The trial court, in permitting the amendment to be filed, and in declining to continue the case at the instance of the Tennessee corporation, and in refusing to permit an answer in its behalf to be filed, was evidently acting upon the theory that the real defendant was before the court, represented by counsel, defending the action, and resisting a recovery, and that the only effect of the amendment was to correct an error in its name. And if in fact the Sterns Coal Company, a Michigan corporation, did own or manage and control the mine in which Evans lost his life, and if in fact this corporation was represented by counsel in defending the suit, the action of the trial judge in permitting a verbal correction in its name did not prejudice its rights or entitle it to a continuance. If the real defendant is in fact before the court, a verbal error in the name and the correction thereof, whether it be a corporation or an individual, will not of itself be grounds for a continuance. And so, in this case, if the real name of the Michigan corporation, that was the owner and manager and operator of the mine in which Evans lost his life, was the Sterns Coal Company, it was not entitled to a continuance because the court struck out of its name the word "Limited." On the other hand, unless the Michigan corporation, operating under the name of the Sterns Coal Company, owned, operated and managed the mine, and was guilty of the negligence that resulted in the death of Evans, the judgment is a nullity.

And in this connection, it may be remarked that in its petition for a removal of the case to the Federal court, the Sterns Coal Company, limited, without disclosing whether it was a corporation or partnership averred that "it was a citizen and resident of the State of Michigan, and had its principal place of business at the city of Ludington, in that State." This petition was subscribed and sworn to by Robert L. Sterns, who averred that he was the treasurer of the company, and its chief agent and officer in this State.

In June, 1902, the Sterns Coal Company filed in the office of the Secretary of State, as provided in the statute, a statement setting out that the Sterns Coal Company, of Ludington, Michigan, was a corporation, and designating William Kinney, of Sterns, Ky., as its agent upon whom process might be served; but we will not further pursue the inquiry as to whether the appellant is a Tennessee or Michigan corporation. As if it was a Tennessee corporation, the judgment is void; if a Michigan corporation, valid. On the record before us, it appears that appellant is a Michigan corporation, and that it was properly proceeded against to recover the damages sustained.

We do not deem it necessary to go into a detailed statement of the evidence. It clearly establishes that the life of Evans was lost by the negligence of the mining company, and its agents and servants superior in authority to Evans. This negligence consisted in permitting large quantities of coal dust to remain in the mine and in failing to keep it properly ventilated. The failure to perform these duties resulted in what is known as a coal dust explosion.

During the examination of a witness for appellee, he was permitted to state, over the objection of appellant, that several people were killed in the explosion that resulted in the death of Evans. In our opinion this evidence was competent for the purpose of illustrating the force and deadly character of the explosion, and as a circumstance tending to establish the negligence of the appellant company. It was in fact a part of the res gestae.

It is also insisted that the court erred in allowing testimony that the electric fan, located on the outside of the mine, near its mouth, and used for the purpose of furnishing pure and fresh air in the mine, was often, before the explosion occurred, stopped because not in running order. It was not attempted to show that this condition existed after the explosion. We think evidence of the condition of this fan before the explosion and the fact that it frequently stopped furnishing fresh air, was competent for the purpose of bringing home to the appellant company knowledge that this machine so essential to the safety of the miners, was not in reasonably good working order. The evidence tended to establish that the air in the mine on the day of the explosion, and at other times previous thereto, was very bad, and that this resulted from the failure to keep this electric fan in operation, and that the mine boss knew of this condition, and also that the fan was not in good working order.

The statute, section 2731, provides in part that:

"The owner, agent or lessee of every coal mine * * * shall provide and maintain for every such mine an amount of ventilation of not less than one hundred cubic feet of air per minute per person employed in such mine, which shall be circulated and distributed throughout the mine in such a manner as to dilute and render harmless and expel the poisonous and noxious gases from each and every working place in the mines."

This, and every statute intended for the protection of laborers engaged in the hazardous business of coal mining, should be rigidly enforced, and mine owners held to the strictest accountability in the performance of these statutory duties. As said in Godfrey v. Beattyville Coal Co., 101 Ky., 339:

"The statute requires each owner, or lessee, of a coal mine, under a penalty, to provide and maintain by appliances and means therein described, a prescribed amount of ventilation throughout its mine. And all that was necessary for appellant to make out his case prima facie was to show the injury was caused by an explosion, and that appellee had not complied with the statute; and thus would have been shifted the burden upon appellee to show the injury was caused not by explosion of accumulated gases of a noxious or inflammable character, but instead, by the imprudent and negligent manner in which the blasting was done by appellant." To the same effect is Andricus v. Pineville Coal Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 704.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA v. NEELEY.

(Filed June 4, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Insurance, Life—Suicide—Evidence—This action was upon a policy of insurance which provided that if insured died by his own hand within three years, whether sane or insane, it should be void. Within three years the insured took his life. Under the rule announced in the cases referred to in the opinion herein, it is held that, under a policy of this sort, there may be a recovery although the insured took his own life, if at the time he had not sufficient mind to know that he was taking his life, and the evidence brings the case within the rule above stated.

Moorman & Warren and Truman Plantz for appellant.

Lee & Hester for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

The Modern Woodmen of America issued to John B. Neeley a certificate, insuring his life in the sum of $1,000 for the benefit of his wife, Jennie M. Neeley. The certificate was issued on June 1, 1904. It provided, among other things, that if he died within three years, by his own hand, whether sane or insane, the certificate should be void. On April 24, 1907, he took his own life, and this suit was brought by his wife against the order to recover on the policy, charging at the time he took his life he had not sufficient mind to understand that he was taking his life. In the circuit court, judgment was entered in her favor, and the defendant appeals.

In Manhattan Life Insurance Co. v. Beard, 112 Ky., 445; Metropolitan Insurance Co. v. Thomas, 106 S. W., 1175, it was held by this court that, under a policy of this sort, there might be a recovery, although the insured took his own life, if at the time he had not sufficient mind to know that he was taking his life. The proof on the trial showed that several weeks before his death, the insured became of unsound mind. He thought that his business was bad, although it was in good shape. When a person would be talking to him he would run off fifteen or twenty feet, get down on his hands and bore his head in the ground, making a curious noise, between a groan and a scream. He would be that way for fifteen or twenty minutes, and then would be alright again for a while. The spells became more frequent and more violent as the days went by. He was living on the land of a Mr. Cayce. He was taken to a physician, and this did no good, and finally Mr. Cayce was sent for. At the sight of Mr. Cayce he seemed to get very much excited, and seemed to be trying to get away. Finally they managed to get him up to the house. Two or three men stayed there to watch him that night. He was very restless. He would get up and try to go out or walk out every few minutes; but one of them would watch him. Between twelve and one o'clock two of the men went to sleep, and about two thirty, when he seemed to be quiet in bed, the other man fell asleep. Toward daybreak he was aroused by hearing somebody go out of the house. He missed Neeley and went in search of him. About an hour afterward he found him hanging to a tree, where he had hung himself with a rope, about half a mile from the house. About three days before he died, he told one of the men with him that when one of these spells came on him something would commence to go around in his head, and it seemed to revolve and get faster and faster until it would get to where he didn't know what he was doing. Toward the last, the spells came every half hour; and from the evidence of a number of witnesses, he had no mind at all. We think the proof brings the case within the rule laid down in the cases cited. The court aptly submitted the question to the jury by instructions under which the verdict of the jury for the plaintiff is necessarily a finding by the jury that at the time that he took his own life he did not have sufficient mind to understand that he was taking his life, and that he did not have mind enough to know that the act would probably result in his death, or to inflict it with the intention of taking his own life. Among other things, the court told the jury that, "if the insured had mind enough to know that if he tied a rope around his neck it would likely produce death and that he tied the rope with that intention, there could be no recovery unless his mind was so far gone as to render him unconscious that he was taking his own life."

Appellant complains that the court did not require the jury to find a separate-general verdict, as asked by it, but the finding of the jury under the instructions which the court gave, is necessarily a negative answer to the question which the defendant propounded; and, therefore, the substantial rights of the defendant were not prejudicial by the refusal of the court to require the jury to find a separate-general verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

WATSON, &c. v. WATSON'S TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Fraudulent Conveyances—Evidence—An examination of the facts of this record make it manifest that the conveyances complained of were fraudulent, and the lower court properly so held.

A. C. Moore and J. M. Mocquot for appellants.

Hendrick, Miller & Marble and C. H. Wilson for appellees.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This action was brought by the appellee trustee in bankruptcy for the purpose of recovering for the creditors of the bankrupt two tracts of land which he alleged the bankrupt had fraudulently conveyed a short time before taking the benefit of the bankrupt law, for the purpose of cheating and delaying his creditors.

On the 7th day of February, 1905, the appellant, Watson, conveyed to L. Z. Watson, his nephew, a tract of land, containing 88¾ acres for the recited consideration of $1,000, to be paid within five days from that date. On the same day he conveyed to his sister, Mrs. S. A. Mandry, a tract of land, containing 100 acres, for the recited consideration of $650, cash in hand paid.

John F. Watson testified that Mrs. Mandry's son, on the day and at the time the conveyances were made and at his house, paid him in cash, $650; and that L. Z. Watson on the following day paid him the thousand dollars mentioned in the deed, and due on February 12th. He also proved by Isaac Lindley, who wrote both the deeds, that Mrs. Mandry was not present, but she was represented by her son, Phines Mandry, and that he saw Phines Mandry pay to Watson, in cash, $650. And by L. Z. Watson that on February 8th, he paid to John F. Watson the one thousand dollars.

Asked what he did with the $1,650, Watson said that when he went to bed on the night of the 8th of February, he put the money under his pillow, and the next morning, after getting up, he went out to feed his stock, and when he came back the money was gone. That there was no one about the house during the night or morning, except his wife, his three children, and his niece. That he did not at any time mention the theft to any person, except to his wife and niece. Nor did he take any steps whatever to discover the thief, or make any effort to ascertain who took the money, although he was satisfied that neither his wife, children, nor niece got it. He also said there was snow on the ground at the time, and that on examination of the premises he failed to discover any tracks or traces of persons who had come to or been about his house.

L. Z. Watson, whom the evidence discloses to be a young person about 24 years of age, a day laborer; and the owner of little property, said that his grandmother, on her death-bed, some seven years before the transaction with John F. Watson, gave him the $1,000 that he paid to Watson. That he did not lend any of the money out, or put it in a bank, or make any other use of it, but kept in his possession during these seven years the identical money that his grandmother had given to him; that no one knew he had it except his uncle, John F. Watson.

Although L. Z. Watson testifies that his grandmother, in 1897, presented to him as a gift, $1,000, in money, the record shows that in December, 1896, she and her husband conveyed to John F. Watson, the appellant, a tract of land in consideration of his agreement to board, take care of, furnish medical treatment and give decent burial to them when they died, and there is no evidence, aside from the testimony of L. Z. Watson, that his grandmother had any property of any kind at the time of this alleged gift of $1,000.

It is a significant fact that neither Mrs. S. A. Mandry, nor her son, Phines Mandry, were introduced as witnesses by appellant; nor did they testify; although the purpose of the action was to subject to the payment of John F. Watson's debts, the tract of land for which, according to his contention, Mrs. Mandry had paid him $650.

The lower court held that the conveyances were fraudulent. The facts we have recited make this conclusion so manifestly just that we do not deem it necessary to extend this opinion in a further discussion of the inferences that might be drawn from the facts to show that the transaction was not an honest one. It might be admitted that in the presence of Lindley $650 was paid by Phines Mandry to John F. Watson; but it would not be an unreasonable or far-fetched conclusion, especially in view of the failure of Phines Mandry or his mother to testify, that this $650 was very promptly returned to them.

It is unnecessary to comment upon the alleged payment of the $1,000 by L. Z. Watson.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MARTIN v. FERGUSON.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Judgment for Specific Property—(Renebaum v. Atkinson & Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 587. for a full discussion of this question.) The language of section 1665 is too plain to require construction. Wherever there is a variance between it and section 588 of the Code, the statute must prevail for it was enacted subsequently to the Code provision.

Walter P. Lincoln for appellant.

J. D. Reed for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

This is an action by the appellee, S. J. Ferguson, for the recovery from the appellant, Catherine Martin, of three large mirrors, valued at $200 each, and for fifty dollars damages for their wrongful detention. A judgment was rendered by the circuit court that the mirrors were the property of appellee; that they were worth two hundred dollars each, and in the aggregate six hundred dollars; that the owner had been damaged in the sum of fifty dollars by reason of the wrongful detention of her property by the appellant, and that, in the event the mirrors could not be delivered, appellee was entitled to a judgment for six hundred dollars. On this judgment, the appellee caused execution to issue in her favor against the appellant for the sum of six hundred dollars. Appellant moved to quash this execution, and, the motion being overruled, has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The only question arising upon the record before us is, whether or not, under the judgment rendered, the appellee has the right to demand the value of the property instead of the property itself, if the latter be tendered in satisfaction of the judgment.

Article 7, of chapter 46, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows:

"Sec. 1665. When a judgment shall be recovered for a specific thing, the plaintiff may have an execution issued thereon, commanding the proper officer to take the thing so recovered, and deliver the same to the plaintiff.

"1. Or the plaintiff may, if he so elect, take an execution for the assessed value of the thing recovered, and, in either case, the execution shall embrace the damages assessed for the detention and costs.

"2. The court may, upon satisfactory proof that the property recovered has perished, or that, without the fault of the defendant, it is out of his power to produce the same, order the plaintiff to receive the assessed value in lieu of such property."

As this statute was enacted subsequently to section 388, of the Code, wherever there is a variance between them, the statute must prevail. The language of the statute is too plain to require construction. It gives to plaintiff (appellee) the right, if she so elects, to an examination for the assessed value of the property involved, and for the damages assessed for the detention and for her costs. The whole question here was passed upon by this court in Renebaum v. Atkinson & Co., &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 587, adversely to the contention of appellant, and, under the statute as construed in that case, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

L., H. & ST. L. RY. CO., &c. v. McDONALD.

Railroads—Action Against—Improper Remark to Jury by Counsel—The objection to the improper remark of counsel complained of was sustained and the jury admonished to disregard it and this was all that was necessary under the circumstances.

The answer of the Louisville Railway was properly permitted to be read as evidence against it. Its evidence was not rendered incompetent because appellee's counsel subsequently took the position that no blame could be attached to it. (For a full statement of the facts and circumstances in the matter of the collision in which appellee was injured, see 31 Ky. Law Rep., 617.)

Helm & Helm for appellants.

Bennett H. Young and Max I. Greenstein for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers` Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

On the 15th day of December, 1904, there was a collision at Fourteenth and Main streets in the city of Louisville, between a cut of freight cars, belonging to appellant, and a street car of the Louisville Railway Company, in which a number of people were injured. A description of the circumstances under which the collision occurred may be found in the opinion of this court rendered in the case of Louisville, Henderson & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Kessee, By, &c., 81 Ky. Law Rep., 617. Appellee, claiming to be among the number injured, instituted this action against appellant to recover damages. He obtained a judgment for $2,500, and the railroad company appeals.

For reversal, appellant relies upon the following grounds: First, irregularity in the proceedings and misconduct of counsel for appellee; second, excessive damages; third, error in admitting incompetent evidence; fourth, the giving of an instruction submitting the question of punitive damages to the jury.

First. In closing his argument for appellee, counsel used the following language:

"And with that I commit into your keeping the case of this soldier, maligned by these corporate lawyers, hunted and hounded by their detectives in the hope that they might have revenge on him, because he had the courage to testify against them in nine cases, most of which my friend Helm lost."

Counsel for appellant objected to the making of the above statement. At that time the court adjourned for dinner. On reconvening, the court said: "Gentlemen of the Jury: An objection was made at the time we adjourned, and I overruled it because I did not distinctly hear it. I want to say that that objection should be sustained, because it is not competent to refer in this case to what any jury in any other case did."

In sustaining the objection and admonishing the jury that it was not competent to refer to what any jury in any other case had done, we think the court did all that was necessary under the circumstances. The jury were told, in effect, to disregard the statement of counsel. We do not think it was incumbent upon the court to discharge the jury. Were we to hold that the jury should be discharged every time an improper remark is made by counsel, it would be almost impossible ever to complete a trial by jury.

Second. According to the testimony for appellee, his hand was hurt, his ankle injured, and he also received injuries on the back of his head. Dr. Reynolds testified that the diminution of the eye-sight resulted from the injury on the back of his head. The physicians who testified for appellant, state that appellee's eye-sight was not impaired by any of his alleged injuries. and that the injuries to his hand and ankle were very slight. In view of the conflicting evidence of the physicians, and of the further fact that appellee was entitled to punitive damages, we are unable to say that the sum of $2,500, is excessive.

Third. During the progress of the trial, the answer of the Louisville Railway Company, admitting that McDonald was a passenger on the street car, was read in evidence. Counsel for appellant earnestly insist that this answer should not have been read, in view of the fact that counsel for appellee admitted that the Louisville Railway Company was not to blame. The latter company, however, was a defendant, and the court had a right to permit its answer to be read as evidence against it. The fact that counsel for appellee subsequently took the position that no blame attached to the Louisville Railway Company, did not have the effect of rendering the evidence incompetent. Even if it did, we do not think the admission of such evidence was such error as to justify a reversal.

Fourth. With a few slight variations, the evidence as to the negligence of Thomas Riley, the flagman, is substantially the same in this case as it was in the case of Louisville, Henderson & St. Louis Railway Company v. Kessee, supra, and the subsequent cases growing out of the same accident, in all of which an instruction authorizing punitive damages was approved. Counsel for appellant argue with great force and earnestness that such an instruction is not proper. After a reconsideration of the question, however, this court has decided to adhere to the principle enunciated in its former opinions. We, therefore, hold that the court did not err in submitting the question of punitive damages to the jury.

Perceiving no error in the record prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

RIDDELL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Malicious Cutting—Self-Defense—Instructions—(Wrist v. Commonwealth, decided June 9th.) While this court has held an instruction erroneous which contains the expression "brought on the difficulty," without describing the manner by which it was brought on, yet, where the instruction contains such a provision, such an instruction presents the law of the case and is not subject to criticism. The evidence shows that appellant began the difficulty, the error in the admission of evidence was not material and the judgment will not be disturbed.

J. B. White and R. W. Smith for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Estill Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellant, John W. Riddell, was indicted by the Estill Circuit Court, at its December term, 1907, for the offense of malicious cutting and wounding, with intent to kill, one Edgar Thomas, with a knife or other edged instrument. At the April term of said court, he was tried and convicted and his punishment fixed at two years' confinement in the State penitentiary. From an order overruling his motion and grounds for a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant and the prosecuting witness, Edgar Thomas, were share tenants of a crop of corn grown on the farm of James Winn, in Estill county, during the year 1907. Appellant and Thomas were each to get one-fourth of the corn raised, while Winn was to receive one-half of the crop. On the day of the cutting, they, together with some other men, were engaged in gathering and hauling the corn from the field. The corn had been cut and placed in shocks in the field. As it was shucked they threw it on the ground in piles, one pile in each shock. They would then get down on their knees and throw the corn up into the wagon. While engaged in loading the corn, appellant and Thomas became involved in a dispute as to whether Thomas should have the thirteen or sixteenth load. The evidence for appellant, shows that he first said to Thomas, "If you get the thirteenth load, there will be a better man in the field than I am." Thomas then sprang to his feet and ran his hand into his pocket, took therefrom his knife and opened it, and said to appellant, "Uncle John, God damn you, you can't bluff me or you can't run a sandy on me." Thereupon appellant got up, took out his knife and said, "Edgar, if you want to cut me, I will help you cut." Thomas then kicked up a frozen clod, and appellant told him not to hit him with that clod. Thomas thereupon changed his knife to his left hand and threw the clod with his right hand, at appellant's head, striking him on the arm. Appellant then grabbed Thomas and stabbed him in the back with his knife. According to the proof for the Commonwealth, Thomas had a small, broken knife, which he had been using in cutting vines from around the corn shocks. This knife was in Thomas' hip pocket, and he tried to get it out at the time he was cut, but failed to do so. Appellant began the difficulty by advancing on Thomas with an open knife and Thomas, after receding a few steps, picked up the clod and threw it at appellant. Appellant asks a reversal on the ground of admission of incompetent testimony and for errors in the instructions.

After the cutting, Thomas was carried to a barn near by, and the court permitted witnesses to testify to the fact that Thomas said that he was killed, and was going to die, and that he thereupon began to pray. While this testimony should not have gone to the jury, it was not material one way or the other, and we are of opinion that its admission was not prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant.

After submitting to the jury the question, whether or not the cutting was done maliciously and with intent to kill, or whether it was done in sudden affray and without previous malice, the court gave the usual self-defense instruction, with the following qualification:

"But this instruction is subject to the following qualifications: If the jury should believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, John W. Riddell, brought on the difficulty in which said Edgar Thomas was cut, stabbed and wounded by assaulting the said Edgar Thomas with a knife when it was not necessary, and when the defendant had no reasonable grounds to believe it necessary, to protect himself from immediate danger of the infliction on him of death or great bodily harm, or which reasonably appeared to him about to be inflicted on him by said Thomas, and that the defendant thereby brought on such danger to himself, if they believe from the evidence that any such danger existed, then in that event, the jury can not acquit the defendant on the ground of self-defense or apparent necessity."

While this court has held an instruction erroneous, which contains the expression "brought on the difficulty," without describing the manner or means by which the difficulty was brought on, yet where the instruction contains such a provision, and qualifies it by words showing the manner in which the difficulty was brought on—as, for instance, in the case at bar, by using the words "by assaulting said Edgar Thomas with a knife," &c.—such an instruction presents the law of the case, and is not subject to criticism. (Allen v. Commonwealth, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 784; 10 Ky. Law Rep., 582; Crawford v. Commonwealth, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 356; Johnson v. Commonwealth, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 281; O'Day v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 848.)

Perceiving no error in the record prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF GLASGOW v. CRISP.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Streets—Re-construction Of—Injury to Person in Crossing Street—Damages—Appellee, in crossing one of appellant's streets stumbled over a pile of brick that had been left following the re-construction of the street, injuring herself. It was a bright, sunshiny day, she knew the bricks were in the street and saw them as she attempted to cross it. Upon the trial for damages for the injury, there should have been a peremptory instruction directing the jury to find for the city.

2. Same—While it is true that persons have a right to walk across the street at all points where it can be done with safety, no one, knowing of a danger, has a right to wantonly cast himself upon it and then demand damages for the injury received as a result of his own negligence.

J. Lewis Williams and B. G. Ellis for appellant.

Baird & Richardson for appellee.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

The appellee, Alberta Crisp, in crossing East Main street in Glasgow, Kentucky, stumbled over a pile of bricks or cement blocks, which were in the highway, and fell, receiving severe personal injuries. Upon the trial of this action, which was instituted to recover damages of the municipality for the injuries which she received, a jury awarded her the sum of five hundred dollars; and of the judgment based upon this verdict, the city is complaining.

The city authorities had re-constructed the sidewalk in front of appellee's residence, and the bricks or cement blocks, which had been taken up and replaced by new material, were piled in the highway along the edge of the gutter. The debris was not piled in any regular order, but, as we gather from the testimony, was scattered along the edge of the street near the gutter. Appellee was crossing the street from her house to that of a neighbor, in order to inform the neighbor that her son had been injured. It was a bright, sunshiny day, and she knew the bricks were in the street and saw them at the time she undertook to cross it. She says, however, that she did not know they would "creen" or turn under her foot and throw her down.

Was appellant entitled to recover anything from the municipality? We think not. In making public improvements, municipalities are bound to use the highway for the deposit of debris, but, in doing so, they are required to use, at least, ordinary diligence to protect the public from danger, and, therefore, when it is dark, or when, from other causes, this use of the highway renders it dangerous to the public safety, sufficient warning must be given to the traveling public of the danger. Ordinarily, at night, lights are placed upon piles of stone or other debris, or barricades are made around them; but generally, it may be said that in daylight, where piles of stone or brick, or cement blocks are in the highway, it is presumed that the public can see them and will not recklessly walk over them and be hurt. While it is true that persons have the right to walk across the street at all points where it can be done with safety, no one has a right, knowing of a danger, to wantonly cast himself upon it and then demand damages for the injury received, as a result of his own reckless negligence. The plaintiff in this case, as said before, deliberately walked over the blocks, which turned under her feet and threw her to the ground. For her to say that she did not know that blocks, piled roughly one upon the other, are liable to turn under one's feet if walked upon, is as absurd as to say that she did not know the law of gravitation prevailed at the particular place.

The facts of this case bring it within the principle enunciated in City of Covington v. Manwaring, 113 Ky., 592. There, the plaintiff stumbled over bricks on the sidewalk, which had been raised out of the level by the roots of a tree which was growing there; and although the plaintiff testified that he did not know the bricks were raised or in bad condition, it was held that the fact that he worked at a store near the place of injury and swept off the sidewalk at least once a week, charged him with knowledge of the condition of the bricks, and that he could not recover. The plaintiff, in the case cited had a stronger case than has appellee here. She admits that she knew the bricks were in the street and saw them at the time she walked upon them. The trial court should have sustained appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for it at the close of plaintiff's testimony.

The judgment is reversed for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

HURT v. CHESS & WYMOND CO.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Question of Fact—Finding of Chancellor—This controversy as to the sale of some stave timber, is simply over a question of fact, the evidence is very conflicting and it being a rule of this court not to disturb the finding of the chancellor where on all the evidence, the mind is left in doubt as to the truth of the matter, the finding of the chancellor is approved.

Baird & Richardson and J. W. Kincead for appellants.

Carroll & Middleton and J. C. Carter for appellees.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

The Chess & Wymond Company brought this suit against S. F. Hurt, enjoining him from interfering with it in cutting certain stave timber from 300 acres of land owned by him, which it claimed to have bought of him by a written contract made on September 27, 1905. By his answer he charged, in effect, that the written contract was obtained from him by fraud and asked that it be set aside. The court continued in force the restraining order granted by the clerk until the final hearing of the case and on final hearing he perpetuated the injunction and dismissed the defendant's counter-claim by which he sought a cancellation of the contract. From this judgment he appeals.

The appeal raises simply a question of fact. The evidence is very conflicting and on the whole case we can not say that the chancellor abused a sound discretion in refusing to set aside the contract. Our rule is not to disturb the chancellor's finding, where, on all the evidence, the mind is left in doubt as to the truth; and upon the whole record we can not say that the weight of the evidence is not with the chancellor. The contract was made with Hurt by a man named Tuck, who was an agent of the defendant. He and Tuck differ very much as to what occurred, but Tuck's version of it is sustained in some measure, by the defendant's own conduct, by Shaw, a bystander, and by the writing itself. Hurt, at that time, made his mark to the contract, and Shaw witnessed it, also making his mark. On the next morning Tuck returned and asked Hurt to sign the paper himself. Tuck says that he had erased the former signature of Hurt and the signature of Shaw as a witness. Hurt says that this was not done, and he seems to think that at that time a different writing was obtained from him. But we are satisfied that the writing that is now produced is the same writing which Hurt originally signed. The paper has been produced before us and shows sign of erasure. Hurt's name is signed lower down on the paper, beneath where the erasure is and the paper itself contains words which Shaw says, were in the paper that he heard read the evening before. It calls for timber standing or lying down and the trees reserved in the paper are those that Shaw says were reserved. The paper also satisfies us that the contract was a sale of the stave timber on the tract and not of 800 trees, for if 800 trees were sold, there would have been no necessity for making the reservations that are in this paper and which Shaw testifies were in the paper which he heard read. It may be that the defendant made a bad bargain, but timber has advanced very much in price since this contract was made and we are satisfied that if the price had declined as much as it has advanced, this controversy would never have arisen.

The purchaser has cut off the land something like 1100 trees. It has exhausted its contract and whatever white oak or pin oak timber is now on the land is the property of Hurt. By moving away, the company has said to Hurt, that it has cut all the timber which it bought and after moving away and abandoning all right to cut further, it can not return to the land and cut other timber. The judgment of the circuit court is to be read in connection with the plaintiff's petition. It only adjudges to the plaintiff the right to the timber in controversy. We do not see anything in the judgment prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant; but if the defendant wishes it, the judgment may at any time be corrected in the circuit court, for clerical misprision in so far as it adjudges to the plaintiff any timber other than that specified in the written contract. The court having continued in force, pending the action, the temporary restraining order made by the clerk, thus in effect granted an injunction, and whether he had granted an injunction or not, he could by his final order grant an injunction.

On the whole record we do not see that the substantial rights of the defendant were prejudiced by the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

SUMRALL v. VANARSDALL'S ADM'R.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Estates—Settlement Of—Costs of Settlement—Payment Of—S. complains that the money realized from the sale of the real property, in this action to settle a decedent's estate, can not be taken to pay the costs of the settlement suit, and while this view as a principle is correct it can not be applied here for the reason that the personalty realized more than enough to pay the costs, a part of which went to discharge a part of the prior mortgage debt. Appellant's mortgage being inferior, can not complain of the judgment requiring him to pay the costs. (19 Ky. Law Rep., 1773)

J. T. Wilson for appellant.

Greene & VanWinkle for appellee.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

Jackson Vanarsdall died intestate, domiciled in Mercer county, Kentucky. His estate was wholly insolvent. The real property was heavily mortgaged; and he owed some six thousand dollars of unsecured debts; the personalty realized only the sum of six hundred and forty-eight dollars and ninety-five cents. C. D. Thompson, the appellee, was appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate, and shortly after his appointment instituted this action to settle the estate of his decedent. He made the mortgagees of the real property, J. T. Lillard and C. M. Sumrall, parties defendant, and called upon them to set up their claim against the estate, which they did. The case was referred to the commissioner, with directions to advertise for and report on claims. The liens of the mortgagees, Lillard and Sumrall, were enforced and the property sold at judicial sale, realizing a little less than the debts of the mortgagees and the back taxes due the Commonwealth. Leaving out the taxes the real property brought one hundred and fourteen dollars more than the mortgage debts. Sumrall, whose mortgage was inferior to that of Lillard, purchased the latter's debt, and became thereby, holder of all the mortgage claims on the property.

After the estate was settled, the court entered a judgment allowing the plaintiff's attorney four hundred dollars as a fee; to D. N. Currie, the commissioner, the sum of ninety dollars was allowed for his services; and the Harrodsburg Democrat Company was allowed twenty dollars for advertising the sale. From this judgment, C. M. Sumrall, the holder of the mortgage lien, has appealed, claiming that the money realized from the sale of the real property can not be taken to pay the costs of the settlement suit; and he cites in support of that position the case of Kentucky National Bank v. Louisville Bagging Company, 98 Ky., 371. His position, as a principle of law, is undoubtedly sound, but we see no occasion for its application here. The personal property realized six hundred and forty-eight dollars, a sum which seems to have been amply sufficient to pay the costs of settling the estate, including the attorney's fee. It is true, some of the money realized from the sale of the property will have to be taken to pay the items the allowance of which is complained of; but appellant overlooks the fact that he has already received from the proceeds of the personal property as much as, or more than, will have to be taken from the proceeds of the sale of the real property. The items complained of amount to five hundred and ten dollars in the aggregate. The administrator, C. D. Thompson, out of the personal property, paid to Lillard, the holder of the first mortgage, two hundred and fifty-eight dollars, on the interest of his debt. Appellant, in his brief, admits that the administrator paid one hundred and eighty-four dollars taxes on the real property. It is also shown that, pending the litigation, the administrator paid fifty-eight dollars insurance and thirty-eight dollars for repairs on the mortgaged property. Equity requires that these sums should be accounted for by the holder of the mortgage. He can not take the fund which was primarily liable for the costs of settlement of the estate, and have it applied for his benefit to the detriment of the officers engaged in settling the estate. In addition to this, a large part of the expense he would have had to pay out of the proceeds of the realty at all hazards. His mortgage would have had to be foreclosed before he could get his money. This would have entailed court costs, including commissioners' fees and fees for advertising the sale. This expense would have had to come out of the proceeds of the sale of the realty even if it brought no more or less than the mortgage claim; and appellant is in nowise injured by being required to pay this court cost in this action. This is in full accord with the principle announced by this court in Farmers and Traders Bank v. Norton's Assignee, 44 S. W., 428, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1773.

We do not see how, upon equitable principles, the appellant was injured by the judgment complained of; it is, therefore, affirmed.

SCHNEIDER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Liquor License—Discretion of County Court in Granting License—The county court has a discretion in granting tavern licenses, and unless it is shown, that that discretion has been abused, there is no cause of complaint.

2. Same—Appellant's license was regularly procured, the evidence is to the effect that he is a keeper of a tavern in good faith, and that there is a real necessity for a tavern at the place. The fact that he is charged in two cases of illegal sales of liquor does not show that appellant keeps a disorderly house.

John B. Grider, D. W. Wright and S. D. Hines for appellant.

Thos. W. Thomas for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellant, Joe Schneider, has a tavern located at Delafield, Warren county, Kentucky, at what is generally known as the "boat landing." At the November term, 1907, of the Warren County Court, he made application for a tavern license with the privilege of selling spirituous, vinous and malt liquors. No question was made as to his having filed proper notices as required by law; but as there was an oral protest against granting the license, the court, without objection by any one, set out by metes and bounds the neighborhood in which the sense of the legal voters might be obtained as to whether or not the application of appellant should be granted. No written protest was filed, but on the day of the hearing several persons were in court to protest against the granting of the license. After hearing the testimony the county court granted the license. The Commonwealth then appealed to the circuit court, and the circuit court decided that appellant was not entitled to the license. From that judgment, he prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the record in this case that appellant is a man of good character, and that he has kept a tavern at Delafield for a period of about thirty years. The place where he sells liquor is located on the road, while his residence, consisting of about six rooms, is situated fifty yards to the rear of where the liquors are sold. Near his residence is, also, another large room, in which four beds are kept. It is the contention of the Commonwealth that appellant is not a keeper of a tavern in good faith, and that there is no real necessity for a tavern at that point. In addition to this, the Commonwealth insists that he has not kept an orderly house.

Delafield, it seems, is a small river town, on Barren river, at the head of navigation, about one mile from Bowling Green. Considerable business is transacted at that point. Steamboats ply from Bowling Green to Evansville, Indiana, and also up Green River. The boat landing is the harbor for the fleet of United States boats that are frequently engaged in improving the river. The proof shows that appellant's place was the only tavern in Delafield, and that it was continuously patronized by people going away, or coming in on boats; that shippers of hogs and cattle depended almost solely upon Schneider's tavern and premises. It is true, appellant stated that he frequently kept personal friends for nothing, and that he let people hitch their horses in his yard without making any charge therefor. It seems, too, that he never kept any books showing his receipts from guests independently of the bar. He does swear, however, that his receipts, aside from the bar, amounted to sixteen or twenty dollars per week. It is argued that, because the receipts from his bar were far in excess of that amount, the keeping of a tavern was a mere device to enable him to conduct a saloon. We are unable to say that, because the receipts from the bar were larger than those from the tavern proper, the owner is not a bona fide tavern keeper. If such were the rule, no man could be said to be a keeper in good faith of a tavern or a hotel, for it is a well known fact that the bar privileges in many instances carries with it returns much larger than are received from the accommodation of guests in other respects.

Nor do we think there is anything in the argument that appellant was not prepared to receive women. True, his family occupied the most of his residence, but, in case of an emergency, we doubt not that his family could be doubled up in such fashion as to enable him to take care of women guests.

Counsel for appellee earnestly insists that, because Bowling Green is situated about a mile distant from Delafield, and the former city has hotels which would accommodate the patrons who go to Delafield, there is no necessity for a tavern at Delafield. We do not think, however, that the question depends upon whether or not accommodation can be secured at another place. It depends upon whether or not there are persons, who, in going to Delafield, naturally seek or desire accommodation at appellant's tavern. Where a tavern has existed at one place for about thirty years, and the proof shows that the receipts from it, exclusive of the bar, amount to from sixteen to twenty dollars per week, and a number of reputable citizens testify that, in their opinion, there is a necessity for a tavern at the place in question, we are unable to say that no such necessity exists, even though an equal number of citizens testify that, in their opinion, there is really no need for such tavern.

The only other point attempted to be made against the granting of the license was that Schneider did not keep an orderly house. There was some proof to the effect that at times large crowds of negroes assembled around the tavern. There was also some proof to the effect that drunken men were seen occasionally on the pike beyond Schneider's tavern. It does not appear, however, that they became or were drunk at Schneider's tavern. Appellee relies principally upon the fact that appellant was twice convicted of selling liquor to minors, claiming that, under the rule laid down in Caudill v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2140, this fact showed that Schneider did not keep an orderly house. In that case, Caudill had applied for a merchant's license to sell spirituous liquors. The applicant had been engaged in the illegal sale of liquor both to adults and minors. This court held that the county court was given a judicial discretion as to when a license to sell liquors should be granted; that, as it was an admitted fact that the applicant had sold without license, and in further violation of the law, there was no abuse of the legal discretion confided to the court, in refusing the applicant a license. In the case cited there were numerous violations of the law on the part of the applicant. Here, we have two isolated cases of illegal sales of liquor to minors, made by the proprietor's clerk in the proprietor's absence. This court has held, in a large number of cases, that the county court has a discretion in granting tavern licenses, and, unless it is shown that that discretion has been abused, there is no cause of complaint. (Lupe & Hambright v. Barbee, &c., 18 B. Mon., 9.) Where, then, an applicant has been a tavern keeper for thirty years, is a man of good character, and the only evidence of his having kept a disorderly house is the fact that a few negroes congregated about his place, that drunken people were seen upon the road—it is not being shown however, that they became drunk at his establishment—and that he in two instances had sold liquor to minors, we do not feel authorized in reversing the action of the county court, which, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it by law, held that the applicant was entitled to a license.

No doubt, the fact that Bowling Green has recently gone "dry" has made the opposition to a tavern at Delafield all the more pronounced, and in the opinion of many substantial people it is not desirable to have a tavern there. That being the case, the law has provided means whereby the sale of liquor at that point may be prevented.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a license.

JOHNSON, &c., v. COOK BENEVOLENT INSTITUTE.

(Filed June 12, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Benevolences—Funds Set Apart to—Object to Which it Should be Applied Ceasing to Exist—The association having long since ceased to exist, viz: in 1858, the fund sought to be set apart to its use can not be reached by the appellants who claim to be survivors of it. Testator intended to make some provision for a volunteer fire association and it ceasing to exist, his executors merged the fund intended for it in an object of charity, to which he had bequeathed the great bulk of his estate, and the refusal of the chancellor to disturb it after the great length of time the latter institution had had control over it, will not be disturbed.

D. W. Sanders and J. W. S. Clements for appellants.

F. Hagan for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Prior to 1837, and until 1858, volunteer fire companies were the protection of Louisville against fires. There was no provision then for paid enlisted firemen. The volunteer companies were manned by able-bodied, public-spirited citizens. There was a fine spirit of emulation among the companies for quick, efficient work. Samuel Hinman Cook, a man of wealth, and who had evidently been identified with one of these companies, or at least affected with keen appreciation of the public spirit displayed by its members in their hazardous endeavors in the city's behalf, made his will in 1837, in which is this clause:

"I give and devise to my aforesaid executors one thousand dollars, to be laid out in stocks as aforesaid, the dividends whereof are to be expended and applied for the benefit of disabled firemen and indigent widows of firemen of the Mechanics Fire Company, of the city of Louisville."

The executors laid out the $1,000 in bank stock, and kept it so invested till after 1858, at which date the city of Louisville, having installed a paid fire department of trained men, who devoted all their time to the calling, the volunteer organizations, including the Mechanics Fire Company, were disbanded permanently. In the meantime appellee corporation had been created by an act of the Legislature to carry out the benevolent bequests and devises of Samuel Hinman Cook. Some time after 1858, owing to the fact that the Mechanics Fire Company no longer had an existence, appellee, construing that, under the doctrine of cy pres, it should apply this $1,000 bequest to an object of charity as near like the specific one named in the clause of the will giving it, merged it with the great bulk of the testator's estate which he had devised to institute and maintain a hospital for the care of "sick and infirm persons of the city of Louisville, and such as be so sick and infirm in said city and destitute of the means of relief." This hospital, maintained by the testator's benevolence, is an Old Woman's Home, which receives and cares for worthy destitute old women who have no relations or means upon which they can rely for support:

Appellants, some eight or ten in number, claim to be the surviving members of the Old Mechanics Fire Company, save two of appellants who claim to be widows of former members. These people are aged from 65 to 88 years. Some of them claim to be destitute. The two widows claim to be entirely destitute and helpless. The appellants assert that they were the sole beneficiaries of the $1,000 bequest, and that its income, and indeed the $1,000 itself should be given over to them for their relief. They charge a diversion and misappropriation of the trust fund and claim an accounting and restitution. The circuit court dismissed them without relief. They appeal.

The clause of Cook's will bequeathing the $1,000 must be read in the light of his surroundings to get at his meaning. At that time steam fire engines were not known, certainly not in use in Louisville. Nor were there then paid, regularly enlisted firemen whose business and duty it was to give all their time and labor to fighting fires in the city; nor is it probable that such a plan was then thought of. It was evidently contemplated by the testator that the Old Mechanics Company, which had probably been a useful and honorable organization for years, and which, in its younger days, he had belonged to, would continue to serve the public with that disinterested devotion to the public welfare which was the cause of his admiration and pride; that its membership would be constantly changing; and that in the dangers incident to its work some of its active members would receive disabling injuries, maybe death. These things might occur at any time during the future. His purpose was, we think, to help those who were disabled while in that public service, and to relieve the indigent widows of such as might die in the service; not necessarily die while in the line of duty, but die while members of the company. He could not have meant that so small a sum should be distributable among so many as would result if all who had ever been members should at any time in the future, whether then members or not, become disabled, or leave indigent widows. His mind was upon a continuing service, and his aim was to help that service by coming to the aid of those in it who most needed help. When twenty years later, in the progress of events and the development of more modern methods, the old volunteer companies were done away with, that which had moved the testator to establish the charity ceased to exist, and the object of his bounty, the volunteer fire company service to be done by the Mechanic's Fire Company, died. That we think was the end of the matter, so far as the former members of the Mechanic's Fire Company were concerned. Those who had become widowed during the existence of the company, and were indigent, had a vested interest in the fund bequeathed, and if the female appellants had averred and shown facts bringing them within the class just described they would have been entitled to relief. But at any rate, if they are as described in their petition, we have no doubt that the trustees of appellee society would feel a particular obligation resting upon them to admit these women to the Old Woman's Home, if applied to, owing to their relation to this old company.

But we can not see that appellants have any legal right to the fund in question.

Judgment affirmed.

MANN, &c. v. REIGLER, &c.

(Filed June 12, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Easements—In Adjacent Wall—Prescription—One may acquire an easement in an adjacent wall by deed, or by prescription, which presumes a deed. Conceding that the wall stood upon appellees' lot when appellants came to rebuild their house, their easement was established and it included the right to repair or rebuild.

Vance & Heilbronner for appellants.

Clay & Clay for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, reversing.

Appellee, Mary P. Reigler, and appellant, Mann, owned adjoining city lots, on which two-story brick business houses had been built many years ago. The dividing wall between the houses was used in common, the joists and rafters of each house resting in or upon it. This condition had existed for more than twenty-five years (how much longer no witness ventures to state), and was so when each of the parties to this suit acquired title to their respective lots. Some twelve or fourteen years before the institution of this suit appellants' house was damaged by fire. In repairing it, they dug a more extensive cellar beneath their house, replaced the burnt joists with sound ones, and carried the wall up another story. Appellees knew of that fact when it transpired. This suit was brought recently by appellees to oust appellants from the use of the wall, upon the allegation that the wall was wholly upon the lot of the plaintiff, and appellants' use of it was without her consent. The circuit judge found that the old wall was worth $728; also that it was wholly on appellees' lot. It was adjudged that it would be inequitable to require appellants to remove their house; so appellants were directed to pay to appellees one-half of the value of the old wall, and it was further adjudged that each party should, without further hinderance from the other, have the right to use the new wall—the third story.

We are told that the judgment was rested on Wilford v. Gerard, 108 Ky., 322; 22 Ky. Law Rep., 203; 56 S. W., 416. While there are several features of the two cases in common, we think the controlling principle of the case at bar, which was not in Wilford v. Gerard, was overlooked. In the instant case appellants relied upon a title to an easement in the wall by prescriptive use, and the evidence abundantly sustains their claim. One may acquire an easement in an adjacent wall by deed, or by prescription, which presumes a deed. If appellants' vendors had, by deed, acquired the right to build their house against and tying it into appellees' adjacent wall, appellants would have had the right to repair the injured structure or rebuild it in case it was burned down or removed. Such an easement, unless the language restricted it to a particular period, would have been continual. Whether such deed was made in the case here is not shown. But for all that is shown, it may have been; or at least appellees' predecessors may have built and owned both houses, or have received pay for the use of the partition wall from the owners of the other house. There is nothing to show that something of that kind, executed in ample form, did not happen. The great lapse of time, with such open and continuous use without hindrance or complaint, supports the inference that it did. It is because of such conditions that the law raises a presumption, after such great lapse of time, of a grant and its loss. Such presumption, unrebutted, is as efficacious as a grant in fact, in most ample form. The situation, then, when appellants came to rebuild their house, was that appellants' easement in the wall, conceding that it stood wholly on appellees' lot, was established, which included the right to repair or rebuild. (3 Kent's Com., 437, 13 Ed.)

But the appellants did not have the right to impose a new or an additional servitude by virtue of the easement of the particular one connected with a building of the dimensions of the old one. (Wilford v. Gerard, supra.) When appellants built on the additional story by running up the partition wall a sufficient height to form one of its walls, appellees, with full knowledge of the fact, stood by without protest and suffered it. It is there for their use also. It does not appear that it has to any extent damaged the old wall, or impaired appellees' use of it as it was enjoyed before. Under these circumstances, appellees will not now be heard to claim compensation for the wall, which they may enjoy in common with appellant, and which has cost appellees nothing, and damaged them nothing.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

CITY OF OWENSBORO v. SINGLETON.

(Filed June 12, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Streets—Grades of—Damage to Property by Grading—A lot owner is not entitled to recover from a city for damage to his lot because of the original grading of the street, where the grade has not theretofore been fixed. The grade of the streets must be presumed to have been taken into consideration when the land was dedicated or acquired by condemnation. The case of City of Owensboro v. Hope, 33 Ky. Law Rep., ante, is conclusive of this question.

J. A. Dean and Geo. W. Jolly for appellant.

W. T. Ellis, C. M. Finn, Miller & Todd and R. W. Slack for appellee.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

Mary L. Singleton owns a house and lot in the city of Owensboro, on Crittenden street, between Second and Third streets. The city council established the grade to be cut down about two feet in front of her property. The street was constructed upon the grade thus established; and she then brought this suit against the city, charging that her property was very much injured, from the fact that two of her shade trees were destroyed; that two others were practically destroyed; that it would be necessary for her to build a retaining wall to protect her lot; and that even with this, ingress and egress would be very much affected, and the value of the property depreciated. Her lot fronts on the street seventy-five feet. On a trial of the case she recovered a judgment for $425, and the city appeals.

It appears from the record that, though the street had been in the city for a number of years, the grade of the street had not been established. In City of Owensboro v. Hope, 108 S. W., 873, 33 Ky. Law Rep., ante, it was held that a lot owner is not entitled to recover from a city for damages to his lot because of the original grading of the street where the grade has not heretofore been fixed; as the grade of the streets must be presumed to have been taken into consideration when the land was dedicated or acquired by condemnation. It was also held in that case that the establishment and maintenance for more than fifteen years of improvements on lots adjacent to an ungraded street did not affect the right of the city to establish the grade; and that the delay of the city to fix the grade, did not estop it from fixing the grade when, in the judgment of the council, it became necessary. That case seems to be conclusive here. It is true that the street in this case has existed for a long time; but we do not see anything in the evidence to take the case out of the rule laid down in the case cited.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

HARDWICK, SR., &c. v. KARN.

(Filed June 12, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Landlord and Tenant—One who takes possession from a tenant can make no defense against the landlord which the tenant could not make.

2. Same—Equity—(28 Ky. Law Rep, 615.) Hardwick was awarded a writ of possession against Smith, his tenant. K. can not take possession of the property from Hardwick's tenant and then enjoin Hardwick from enforcing the writ of possession which had obtained against the tenant. If the gift by K. to his daughter was void he may assert his right to the land in a proper action.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney and W. E. Aud for appellants.

C. S. Walker, Wilfred Carrico and Lavega Clements for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

J. B. Karn was the father of Eva K. Hardwick. When she married he said to her that as a wedding gift she might then have and take possession of a tract of land owned by her mother, then dead, and in which he had an estate for life, as tenant, by the courtesy, Mrs. Hardwick being the only child of her mother. At that time the land was rented to C. S. Smith, who thereafter rented the land from Mrs. Hardwick until she died, in the year 1902. After her death, Smith refused to give possession of the land to her husband and child. They instituted an action of forcible detainer against him and recovered judgment in the magistrate's court. Smith appealed to the circuit court, which also decided against him. He then appealed to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. (Smith v. Hardwick, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 615.) After the judgment of the circuit court had been affirmed in this court a writ of possession was awarded against Smith. Before the writ was executed, J. B. Karn brought this suit against the sheriff and Hardwick, alleging that he was in possession of the property; that they were asserting claim to it and asked that his title be quieted, and that they be enjoined from interfering with his possession. By their answer, the defendant set up the proceeding in the forcible detainer case referred to, and alleged that before the writ of possession could be executed, Karn procured Smith, the tenant of Hardwick, to surrender possession of the place to him and placed in possession of the property one Goff, as his tenant; that this was done for the purpose of defeating the judgment rendered in that case; that Karn was the real defendant in that case; that he employed counsel, was present at the trial, and directed the defense. They also alleged that Karn took possession of the property by collusion with Smith and thus placed it in the possession of Goff as his tenant, for the purpose of evading the judgment in the case referred to. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the answer and entered judgment in favor of Karn, as prayed. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

Smith was Hardwick's tenant. Having entered under Hardwick and held as his tenant, he can not deny his landlord's title. If Karn got possession from Smith he stands in Smith's shoes. He who takes possession from the tenant can make no defense against the landlord which the tenant could not make. If he has title to the property he may assert it in the proper proceeding. But he can not force the landlord to bring an action of ejectment to get possession from his tenant. The possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord, and he who enters under the tenant holds as the tenant holds. If it be true that the gift by Karn to his daughter, being in parole was void under the statute of frauds, the title to the land for his life is still in him. He may assert his rights in a proper action; and when he so asserts his rights, any equities in favor of his daughter, or those claiming under her, growing out of improvements to the property, or the like, may be set up; but Karn can not take possession of the property from Hardwick's tenant, and then enjoin Hardwick from enforcing the writ of possession which he had obtained against the tenant.

Judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to overrule the demurrer to the answer, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. ROBBINS.

(Filed June 12, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Pleading—Private Crossings—(L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Emerson, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1149, for the facts of this case.) The provisions of the Kentucky Statutes, relating to farm crossings, did not have the effect to repeal the provision in appellant's charter relating to such crossings. The petition seems sufficient to support the judgment; it does not appear that any demurrer was filed to it, and where objection is made that a private statute is not properly pleaded, it should be done by special demurrer.

Benjamin D. Warfield, Chas. Carroll and Chas. H. Moorman for appellant.

J. F. Combs and Ben Chapeze for appellee.

Appeal from Bullitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Bullitt Circuit Court requiring appellant to provide for appellee a proper wagon-way across its right of way and railroad track, so as to enable appellee to pass from one side of the railroad, where a part of his land is, to the other, where the remainder lies, and for the sum of $130 in damages sustained by him on account of its failure to provide the crossing at the time he first made application for it to the time of the trial.

The facts of the case at bar are the same as those in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Emerson, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1149; Thompson v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 530; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Brooks, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1307, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Pittman, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1037. The opinion in the case, L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Emerson, supra, concludes the questions raised in this case, except two. The first is, appellant claims that the petition is not sufficient to support the judgment. It was alleged in the petition that it was the duty of appellant, under the provisions of its charter, to provide him a wagon-way so that he could cross from one part of his farms to the other. Appellant relies on section 119, of the Civil Code, as sustaining this position. It is as follows:

"1. Neither the evidence relied on by a party, nor presumptions of law, nor facts of which judicial notice is taken, excepting private statutes, shall be stated in a pleading.

"2. In pleading a private statute, it shall be sufficient to refer to it by stating its title and the day on which it became a law."

Appellee did not state in his petition the title of appellant's charter nor the day on which it became a law. It does not appear in the record that any demurrer was filed to the petition in this case; and this court, in the case of Rudd v. Deposit Bank, 105 Ky., 443, decided that an objection that a private statute relied on was not properly pleaded should be made by special, not general, demurrer. In addition to this, we are of opinion that this section of the Code is not applicable in a case like this. In our opinion, it was not necessary that appellee give appellant information as to the date when the act creating it became a law, nor the title of the act. It is conclusively presumed to know these things. The section of the Code was intended to require a party, who was relying upon a private act, to give the other party notice of it, when the other party is not presumably familiar with or connected in any way with the private act.

Appellant filed an amended answer alleging, in substance, that on July 14, 1902, it by its board of directors, accepted the provisions of the present Constitution of the State and filed in the office of the Secretary of State these resolutions and thereby accepted the provisions of the Constitution; and it is contended that by reason thereof that the provisions of its charter requiring it to construct farm crossings are repealed, and the provisions of the General Statutes with relation thereto take the place of them. In our opinion, the laws found in the Kentucky Statutes, with reference to farm crossings, were not intended to, and did not have, the effect to repeal the provisions of appellant's charter referred to. Appellant obtained its right of way through the State by virtue of its charter, it received donations of right of way, purchased and condemned the balance of the right of way with the provision in its charter requiring it to construct such farm crossings, thus entering into and forming a part of the contract by which it obtained the right of way upon which to construct its road. This was an inducement, probably, to some to give right of way and induced others to sell at a less price, and in all probability lessened verdicts in cases in which it condemned the right of way, and it can not evade this liability which it assumed when it accepted its charter.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

ADAMS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 12, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Criminal Law—Pro tem. Commonwealth's Attorneys—Appointment—Statutory Provisions—Discretion of Court—Under sections 120 and 127, Kentucky Statutes, relating to the appointment of a pro tem. attorney in the absence of the Commonwealth's Attorney, Held—Their meaning is that in the absence of both the Commonwealth's attorney and county attorney, or when both are of kin or of counsel for the accused, the circuit judge shall appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. whether in cases of felony or misdemeanor, but in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, when the county attorney is present, the circuit judge shall not appoint such pro tem. attorney, except in felony cases he may, or not, appoint such pro tem. attorney in his discretion.

2. Same—Presence of County Attorney—Refusal to Appoint Pro Tem. Commonwealth's Attorney—On the trial of one indicted for murder, in the absence of the Commonwealth attorney, it was not error in the circuit judge to refuse to appoint a pro tem. Commonwealth's attorney, where the county attorney was present and took an active part in the prosecution, though employed counsel was permitted to close the argument for the Commonwealth before the jury. The case of Keeton v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1164, is modified so far as it conflicts with this opinion.

3. Same—Employed Counsel—Opening and Closing Argument—This court will refuse to reverse a judgment of conviction in a criminal case upon the ground that employed counsel was permitted to make the opening statement and the closing argument where it appears that the trial was otherwise properly conducted and the defendant's guilt is reasonably certain.

4. Misconduct of Counsel—Admonition of Court to Jury—Effect—An improper statement made by the county attorney to the jury, which the court admonished the jury not to consider, can not be considered on appeal as prejudicial to the defendant.

Bethurum & Bethurum for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

Appellant was indicted in the Rockcastle Circuit Court for the murder of William Hays. On the trial the jury, by their verdict, found him guilty of voluntary manslaughter and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary eighteen years. Judgment was thereupon entered in conformity to the verdict. Appellant was refused a new trial by the circuit court, and, by this appeal, seeks a reversal of the judgment of conviction.

Appellant killed Hays by shooting him with a shotgun at the latter's residence. Although but fifteen years of age at the time of the homicide, appellant had become greatly infatuated with the wife of deceased, who was twenty-five years of age and the mother of three children. She was evidently a lewd woman and had maintained an improper intimacy with appellant for at least a year before the homicide. She had twice left her husband, and during one or both of these separations, became an inmate of a bawdy house. By correspondence and assiduous personal attention of an affectionate character, she fed appellant's passion until it became his habit to visit her two or three times a week for a year before he killed her husband. During and between such visits she furnished him with cheap novels and other unwholesome reading matter, of the "Buffalo Bill" variety, which could not in any way have profitably ministered to his intellectual or moral growth.

On the day of the homicide appellant, gun in hand, left his father's residence, which was about a quarter of a mile from that of deceased, and after, as he claimed, spending two hours in hunting squirrels, reached the house of the latter, upon entering which he leaned his loaded gun against the wall by the door, took a chair near by and apparently became absorbed in the contents of a novel which Mrs. Hays handed him. When he arrived at the Hays' residence deceased was engaged in gathering corn, but soon came to the crib lot with a load and called to his wife to come to him. She obeyed the call, and, after a short conversation with her husband, returned to the room where appellant still sat reading. Telling appellant of the presence near the house of her husband, she requested him to go to another room and remain until the husband left, in order that the latter might not see him; but appellant failed to comply with her request. In a short time deceased went into the house and, passing through the room by appellant, without speaking to him, entered the kitchen and there deposited his coat which had been carried on his arm. Again coming into the room where appellant sat, deceased said to him: "Wolford Adams, this is my house and none of yours; you get out of it." Upon completing this statement, deceased reached a stove used for heating the room, and bending over it, proceeded to warm his hands. While deceased was warming his hands at the stove appellant got upon his feet, seized his gun and shot deceased in the jaw and neck. The latter fell to the floor and immediately expired. When shot by appellant deceased was not menacing him in any way, or even looking at him; and was at the time unarmed.

Thus far we have given, in substance, the testimony of the Commonwealth which was furnished by Mrs. Hays and two of her children, one eight and the other seven years of age, who, besides appellant, were the only eye witnesses of the tragedy. On the other hand, appellant's testimony was to the effect, that deceased, upon entering the room, cursed his wife and appellant; that at this juncture, fearing an attack from deceased, and intending to leave the room to avoid it, appellant picked up his gun which deceased attempted to grasp with his left hand and take from him; at the same time moving his right hand toward his hip pocket, as if to draw a weapon, with which to kill him; seeing which appellant pointed the gun at deceased and fired in his necessary self-defense.

From the foregoing outline of the evidence it will be seen that of the Commonwealth conduced to prove, that in shooting deceased, appellant was guilty of willful murder, while that of appellant tended to prove that the shooting was excusable on the ground of self-defense. It may be remarked, however, that the fact that the shot from appellant's gun entered the lower side face and neck of deceased, would seem to support the testimony of the Commonwealth's witnesses, that when shot, he was warming his hands at the stove and not looking at appellant. If, as claimed by appellant, he took the life of deceased to save his own, the latter's attack upon him must have been provoked by jealousy arising from appellant's improper intimacy with his wife. Upon the other hand, if appellant took the life of deceased without justification, jealousy doubtless furnished the motive for the homicide and the act was, therefore, murder, because maliciously committed. In view of the evidence contained in the record appellant has, in our opinion, no right to complain of the verdict. His youth, and the fact that his inexperience had made him a victim of the arts of a designing woman, no doubt appealed to the sympathy of the jury and induced them to find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, when otherwise they would have found him guilty of murder, as charged in the indictment.

We will only consider such of the grounds urged in the circuit court for a new trial as are now relied on by appellant for a reversal of the judgment appealed from. The errors assigned are four in number.

1st. That the circuit court failed to appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. to act in behalf of the Commonwealth in conducting appellant's trial. 2d. That employed counsel was improperly permitted to make the closing argument to the jury. 3d. That the county attorney and employed counsel were allowed to make, in argument to the jury, improper and inflammatory statements, that were prejudicial to appellant's substantial rights. 4th. That incompetent evidence was admitted for the Commonwealth in rebuttal.

As to appellant's first contention, it may be remarked, the record shows that the regular Commonwealth's attorney was disqualified to engage in the prosecution of appellant by reason of his employment by the latter, before his election as Commonwealth's attorney, to defend him for killing deceased; the Commonwealth was, therefore, as fully deprived of that officer's services in appellant's case as if he had been absent. Indeed, in contemplation of law, he was absent. The Commonwealth, however, was represented throughout appellant's trial by the county attorney, who conducted the examination in chief of the State's witnesses, made an argument to the jury, and properly performed such other duties as are required by law to be discharged by the Commonwealth's attorney.

Section 120, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "In the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, at any term, or part of a term, of a circuit court, the judge of such court may appoint some suitable attorney to act in his absence, * * * but the court shall not appoint an attorney to act in the place of the Commonwealth's attorney unless he and the county attorney are both absent, or of kin to or counsel for the accused, except in cases of felony."

This section contains the only authority conferred by the law of the State upon the circuit judge or other court, to appoint a Commonwealth's attorney, pro tem. Section 127, Kentucky Statutes, which in part, defines the duties of the county attorney, provides: "He shall attend to the prosecution of all cases in his county in which the Commonwealth or the county is interested; * * * he shall also attend the circuit courts held in his county and aid the Commonwealth's attorney in all prosecutions therein, and in the absence of an acting Commonwealth's attorney, he shall attend to all Commonwealth's business in said courts."

Considering the two sections quoted as one (and they should be so read), their meaning is that the judge of the circuit court shall, in the absence of both the Commonwealth's attorney and county attorney, or when both are of kin to or of counsel for the accused, appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. to perform the duties of both, whether in cases of felony or misdemeanor. But that the judge shall not, though the Commonwealth's attorney be absent or of kin to or counsel for the accused, appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. when the county attorney is present and not of kin to or of counsel for the accused, except in cases of felony, in which event he may appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem., but is not bound to do so; the appointment being discretionary with him.

If this be a correct interpretation of the statute in question, of which we have no doubt, we must further hold that the failure of the circuit court to appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. to represent the Commonwealth in appellant's trial, was not error. The county attorney took an active, if not the leading part, in the prosecution. The record manifests the ability with which he and associate counsel conducted the case, and fails to indicate that in dealing with appellant's substantial rights, either was less than ordinarily fair. The prosecution was not, as insisted, wholly turned over to the control of counsel employed by the friends of deceased to convict appellant. It does not appear from the record that the county attorney was, at any stage of the trial, unmindful of his duty, or of the appellant's rights.

We are aware that much may justly be said of the danger of entrusting the prosecution of criminal cases too much to employed counsel, and we do not mean to be understood as holding that either the courts, Commonwealth or county attorneys, should be permitted to turn over the prosecution of criminals to those who are under no responsibility to the State, but the right of employed counsel to assist in such cases has long been recognized, and their assistance may be accepted by official prosecutors of the Commonwealth charged with the duty of enforcing the law. Obviously, the Commonwealth's attorney is the representative of the State in all prosecutions for violations of its criminal and penal laws, but under the law the county attorney is not less so, and his responsibility to the law, the courts and the people is just as great. Both should be honest, fearless and impartial in the performance of official duty, and as far removed from conniving at the escape of the guilty from punishment, as of demanding a conviction that would be unauthorized. It is true, as claimed by counsel for appellant, that this court, in Keeton v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1164, held that it was reversible error for the trial court to refuse to appoint a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem., but it appears from the opinion that the county attorney was in that case, permitted by the court to turn over the prosecution of the accused wholly to counsel employed by relatives of the person whom he killed, and that too, over the objection and notwithstanding a motion of the accused that a Commonwealth's attorney pro tem. be appointed. Upon the facts of that case, we are yet of opinion that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to appoint a suitable attorney to act in the place of the Commonwealth's attorney; but in discussing generally the power of the judge of the circuit court to make such appointment the opinion in some measure misinterpreted section 120, Kentucky Statutes, and entirely overlooked section 127, relating to the duties to be performed by county attorneys in the circuit court. The opinion in Keeton v. Commonwealth, supra, is now, therefore, modified to the extent that it conflicts with the conclusion herein expressed.

The second contention of appellant is not well taken. This court will refuse to reverse a judgment of conviction in a criminal case upon the ground that employed counsel was permitted to make the opening statement or close the argument if it appears, as in this case, that the trial was otherwise properly conducted and the defendant's guilt is reasonably certain. (Bennyfield v. Commonwealth, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 446; Roberts v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky., 449.)

The third contention of appellant is likewise untenable. The statements of the county attorney in argument in regard to the peaceable character of deceased, while not strictly within the record, was not more improper than the statements made in argument by appellant's counsel imputing to deceased a character for violence not shown by the evidence. The county attorney was responding to this statement. What he said should have been omitted, but the court's failure to exclude it was not prejudicial error. The further complaint of appellant that employed counsel, in argument to the jury, said: The children (meaning the children of deceased, used as witnesses for the Commonwealth) testified before the coroner's jury and could have been contradicted by members of that jury if their testimony on the trial of appellant differed from that given by them before the coroner, can not be sustained, because the statement was excluded by the court and the jury given to understand that they were not to consider it, therefore, it could not have been prejudicial to appellant.

The fourth contention relating to the admission for the Commonwealth of evidence in rebuttal, is equally untenable. The testimony was furnished by several witnesses and was as to the election of the body of deceased immediately after the killing; location of blood spots, and the fact that no arms were found upon his person. Much of this testimony might have been introduced in chief, but it was made necessary and competent in rebuttal by the testimony of appellant, which brought out new particulars as to these matters, and, besides, differed in many material respects from that of other witnesses introduced in chief by the Commonwealth. The testimony in question was properly admitted. The instructions aptly presented all the law of the case.

Being satisfied that the record is free from prejudicial error, and that appellant had a fair trial, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

W. R. Fletcher was convicted in the Logan Circuit Court of rape and sentenced to be hung. He appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. He applied to the Governor for clemency and his application was denied. The date of his execution was fixed for February 15, 1907. On February 12, 1907, he wrote the following letter:

"My Dear Loving Daughters:

"I guess my last hope is gone. I don't want you all to grieve after me for I think I will be better off than to be in jail, for I think I am prepared to go and want to ask one thing of you all is to meet me in heaven. Jennie, Lula and Bettie and Mary, I want you to understand that I am as innocent of the charge which I have to die for as an angel in heaven, and it does me good to know that God knows that I am not guilty. Jennie, tell John to see that my body is taken home and buried in our own graveyard, and get Stinson to preach my funeral. Tell him I am at rest. I want to make you and Lula a deed to that house and lot, and I don't want you and her to ever have any trouble over it. Jennie, I don't do this because I think more of you and Lula than I do of Mary and Bettie, but I do it because you both attended to your dear old mother so good. I hope to soon meet her in heaven. Jennie, Mary has got enough of my money to bury me, I guess. So this is from your loving father,

"W. R. FLETCHER.

"To Jennie and Lula, may God bless you all, is my prayer.

"Yours,

"W. R. F."

He was executed on February 15, and afterwards the letter was offered for probate as his will. The appeal before us is prosecuted from the judgment of the circuit court admitting the paper to probate. It is insisted that the paper is not testamentary in character; that it only indicates an intention to make Jennie and Lula a deed to the house and lot, and that the deceased having died without executing this intention by making a deed, the paper can not be probated as a will.

In determining whether the paper is testamentary or not the court will look, not only at the language of the instrument, but at the situation of the maker and at his intention. W. R. Fletcher knew when he wrote this paper that he was to die on February 15. His last hope of life was gone, and knowing that he was to die on the fifteenth, he wrote this letter to his daughters. The letter shows on its face that it is inartificially written; but his meaning is sufficiently apparent. He did not have in mind that he was thereafter to make his daughters a deed to the house and lot. What he had in mind was that he wished them to have the house and lot, and not to have any trouble over it; for he added, "I don't do this because I think more of you and Lula than I do of Mary and Bettie, but I do it because you both attended to your dear old mother so good." These words show that he had in mind not something that he was going to do, but something he was then doing. In other words, they show that he intended them to have the house and lot by virtue of the letter he was then writing, and not by virtue of some instrument he was thereafter to write. A will may be in any form. The words in which the intention of the testator is expressed are immaterial if sufficiently appears from the instrument that he was making a disposition of his property testamentary in character. In Clark v. Ransome, 50 Cal., 595, the following note written in expectation of death was probated as a will, "Dear Old Nance: I wish to give you my watch, two shawls, and also $5,000. Your old friend, E. A. Gordon."

In Beyers v. Hope, 48 Am. Rep., 89, the decedent wrote on the back of a business letter, addressed to a man and his wife, the following, addressed to the wife: "After my death you are to have $40,000. This you are to have, will or no will. Take care of this until my death." In Hunt v. Hunt, 17 Am. Dec., 438, the decedent endorsed on the back of a note, these words: "If I am not living at the time this note is paid, I order the contents to be paid to A. H." He died before the note was paid. In Fickle v. Snepp, 49 Am. Rep., 449, the instrument was in form a promissory note; in all these cases the papers were probated as a will. Indeed the general rule is that an instrument is a will if properly executed whatever its form may be, if the intention of the maker to dispose of his estate after his death is sufficiently manifested. (Babb v. Harrison, 70 Am. Dec., 203.)

Under these principles the circuit court properly admitted the paper to probate as the will of W. R. Fletcher.

Judgment affirmed. ✓

SWARTWOOD'S GUARDIAN, &c. v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD CO., &c.

(Filed June 12, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Railroads—Children Stealing Rides—Legal Duty of Company—Actional Negligence—There is no legal duty devolving on railroads to prevent children of tender years from stealing rides by jumping on passing trains in cities or towns. Where there is no legal duty there can be no actional negligence.

2. Same—Trespassers—Duty Owed to Company—All persons who venture upon a railroad train unbidden by the company and unknown to it, do so at their own peril, and as they have no right, the company owes them no duty in such cases. This rule applies without respect to the age or condition of the trespasser.

3. Invitation to Children to Play on Lot—Stealing Rides—Proximate Cause of Injury—The fact that a railroad company had a pile of sand on an open lot, near its track, on which children sometimes played, does not render the company liable to damages in an action by a child who ran from the sand pile and jumped on a passing train to steal a ride and was thereby injured. The sand pile had no connection with the injury, and was not the proximate cause of it.

B. F. Graziani for appellants.

Benjamin D. Warfield, S. D. Rouse, John Galvin and Maurice Galvin for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court. .

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

The question for decision in this case is, whether railroad companies, whose lines traverse cities and towns, or other populous communities, must maintain a lookout for children who are in the habit of jumping on and off the cars while in motion, although the railroad people did not know that the particular child who might be injured by such practice, was in fact upon its cars; and to provide against such injuries.

The petition in this case, which was held bad on demurrer, alleged that the infant plaintiff, aged eight years, was attracted to appellee's trains in the city of Covington, by other children jumping on and off the cars while in motion, stealing rides, and that the defendants were aware of the practices of such children at that point; that a watchman of the appellees, whose duty it was to lower and raise a nearby gate across a street railroad intersection, also knew of the practice of the children, but on the occasion of the plaintiff's injury, took no precaution to learn whether he was on the train or not; that plaintiff, following the practice of the other children, and in attempting to jump on one of the moving cars, slipped and fell beneath it, thereby having a foot cut off. It is not charged that the defendants knew that plaintiff was attempting to make his perilous try at the time he did it, or that defendants neglected to use any precaution to save him from injury after discovering his peril. So the question comes down to the point stated in the beginning of this opinion.

It is a fact of which we all know that railroads traverse streets and lots in our cities on their grade; that there is little or no protection against trespassing upon the railroad tracks; that children and others do so in spite of the well known danger of the practice. The Legislature has not taken action to require railroad companies or the cities to maintain barriers against such trespassers. The habit of such trespassing, including perhaps the childish tendency and practice of clambering on to the moving cars to get a short, free ride, is well known also to everybody, including, of course, the railroad people. If the operators of the train know of the actual presence of such trespassers—for such they are—they are required, by the humaneness of the law, not to injure them if, with the means at their command, they can avoid doing so. Nor will the inconvenience and annoyance entailed be counted. The courts have never gone further than that. The Legislature may, but it has not. Any other rule, particularly the one contended for by appellant, would require practically that such railroads should police all their lines and vehicles in such cities and towns in anticipation of the dangers to thoughtless and heedless persons.

Because of their inexperience and childish instincts, infants of tender years are not always held to the same strict accountability as adults in such matters. The latter are charged with their own negligence in willfully going into such perilous places, without right to do so. But even if they were not negligent, as for example, if they were insane, the rule would not be different. So the rule is not based entirely upon the negligence or even wrong of the so-called trespasser. Rather, the reason a recovery is denied is because the railroad company has not been legally negligent of any duty it owed to such person. Without legal duty there can not be actionable negligence. The duty is not owing because, as such person had not the right to be at the place, his presence need not be expected, and need not therefore be provided against. It is true it is known that such trespasses are probable. But they are sporadic. The railroads are required to serve the public by running their trains over their tracks; they are held to a rather strict accountability in many matters connected therewith. To require this additional duty would be to put railroad operations beneath the rights of trespassers upon the railway tracks. It would be hard, if not impracticable, to draw a line between willful trespassers and those of other degrees; or between those who trespass in towns and those who trespass in the country. Both quarters are alike subject to the practice, though with varying frequency. Hence no distinction is recognized as existing with respect to such.

The courts have gone as far as seems allowable within the principles of the common law, in applying the doctrine of liability to technical trespassers; where, for example, the public uses a railroad as a street or passway for such time and with such frequency as to show, with reasonable certainty, that they are present at all times, the railroad company, by its acquiescence seemingly assenting to and inviting such use, the traveler is not deemed a trespasser; or if he is, the company is charged with notice of the fact of his presence. It may be thought harsh and arbitrary to draw a line between such and children who are allowed to habitually trespass on the moving cars. But the line must of necessity be drawn somewhere. And where the gradation becomes shadowy and indistinct it may appear that the line is drawn arbitrarily. But it is not so in this instance. A very practical differentiation exists logically. The public—which of course, includes everybody—may obtain an easement in land by prescription. The particular land thereby is dedicated to the public use. As railroads do run upon streets of cities, it is not inconsistent that streets may be opened up along the railroad track. If the railroad, in fact, so dedicates its track in a city, or allows it to be so used for such a length of time as that the public right attaches, as if there had been such dedication, then the public are there as a matter of right; or, at least, the railroad, because of its acquiescence and seeming invitation, will not be heard to deny it. Its duty in that event is to maintain a lookout for such persons, knowing they are probably present; and to take precautions against injuring them.

But this rule of presumptive dedication does not apply as to sparsely settled sections, or where the use is comparatively infrequent and without semblance of an assertion of a public right.

These rules obtain without any respect to the ages or mental conditions of those using such ways.

Now as to the cars, there is no such thing as the public's acquiring a right to use them by prescription. There is no precedent for such a claim and no principle in law analogous to it. All who venture, unbidden by the company, and unknown to it, upon its trains, do so at their own peril, as they can have no right, and the company therefore, owes them no duty, in such case. This rule also applies from the very necessity of the matter, without respect to the age or condition of the trespasser. For the court must deal with the question first of legal duty, not compassionate innocence.

Counsel for appellant cites and relies upon Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. Popp, 96 Ky., 103; Branson's Adm'r v. Labrot, 81 Ky., 638, and a line of cases, known as the Turntable Cases." In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Popp, supra, the injured child, was known to be on the car by the trainmen, when they bumped other cars against it so violently and negligently as to throw the plaintiff off and hurt him. The principle on which the recovery was allowed in that case is one firmly fixed, namely, the known presence of a trespasser imposes the duty on the trainmen to use care not to injure him. They have the right to eject him because he is a trespasser, but not to kill or maim him.

Branson v. Labrot supra, rests on the same principle as the turntable cases, namely, the negligent leaving upon one's lands, unguarded, dangerous contrivances attractive to children, whereby they are lured on to the real property of the negligent owner and sustain injury. But that principle has not a place here. The cars were not left in unguarded lots, but were being used in the only way the conditions permitted them to be used at that time and place.

So far we have discussed this case, omitting to mention another allegation of the petition which appellant seems to place some stress upon, as supporting a right to recover in this action; that is, it is alleged that on an open lot owned by defendants, adjacent to their track, where the injury occurred, defendants had placed a pile of sand and left it unguarded, which was attractive to children, and did attract them and the plaintiff to that point to play; that whilst they were there, the train came along, when plaintiff left the sand pile and attempted to board the cars. The allegation as to the sand is wholly redundant. The sand had no connection with the injury, and was not a proximate cause of it. If the plaintiff had been injured by the sand, or by rolling or slipping from it under the train, and thereby got hurt, a different question would be presented. But such was not the fact.

We are of the opinion that the ruling on the demurrer was without error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

EVANS v. COOK, &c.

(Filed June 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Passway—Long Use—Evidence to Establish—Burden of Proof—The law is now well settled in this State that, where the use of a passway extends over a long period of years, very slight evidence will be sufficient to show that it was enjoyed as a matter of right, and when the proprietor undertakes to close it the burden is on him to show that the use was merely permissive and not a claim of right.

2. Same—Obstruction—Erecting Gates—Points of Entry and Exit—Failure to Show—Statutory Fine—Where gates were erected across a passway that has been used and claimed as a matter of right for more than fifteen years by the public, the burden is on the owner of the land through which it runs to show that they were erected at the points where it enters and leaves his premises and failing to do this the gates are an obstruction, for which he is liable to a fine under Kentucky Statutes, section 4354.

Porter & Sandidge, Duff & Hutcherson, J. W. Compton and J. R. Beauchamp for appellant.

Baird & Richardson for appellees.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellant, R. V. Evans was tried and fined in the Metcalfe county court for obstructing a passway by erecting gates across same. Thereafter he instituted this action to enjoin the collection of the fine and further threatened prosecution.

By section 4354, Kentucky Statutes, it is made an offense to obstruct a passway. The fine that may be imposed for the offense is ten dollars. The county judge had jurisdiction to try the offense herein. While it is true that, in the case of Trustees of Louisville v. Gray, 1 Litt., 146, this court enjoined the collection of a fine where the question of title to real estate was involved, that decision was rendered prior to the enactment of section 285, of the Code. The latter section provides that an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment shall not be granted in an action brought by the party seeking the injunction, in any other court than that in which the judgment was rendered. Under this section, it has been held that, where an action is brought to stay proceedings on a judgment in a justice's, county or quarterly court, it must be brought in the court which rendered the judgment. (Davis v. Davis, 10 Bush, 274; Neeters v. Clements, &c., 12 Bush, 359.) As this proceeding was brought in the circuit court, and not in the county court, the former properly held that the collection of the fine imposed could not be enjoined. As the petition, however, seeks to restrain further threatened prosecutions, and, as this court has held that where the offense concerns property, the title to which is involved, a court of equity will restrain prosecutions until the question of title is determined (Trustee of Louisville v. Gray, supra; Shinkle v. City of Covington, &c., 83 Ky., 420), it will be necessary to consider the record and the points raised by appellant.

In the first place, appellant contends that the alleged passway was never established by an order of court, or dedicated to the public and that it is not an offense to obstruct a pathway not so established or dedicated. In this construction of the statute, counsel are in error, for this court has distinctly held that there is nothing in the section referred to which limits its application to a passway established by order of the court. It applies to all passways which have been legally established by the acts of the parties or by the act of law. The purpose is to prevent the obstruction of such ways when once opened by the wrongful acts of others. (Hughes v. Holbrook, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1210; Miller, &c. v. Pettit, Id., 337.)

Counsel for appellant contend that the proof shows that neither the prosecuting witness, W. B. Cook, nor the public had any right of passway through appellant's land, and, even if they had, the construction of gates by appellant did not constitute an obstruction of the passway. The evidence of all the witnesses in this case shows that there has been a well-defined passway across appellant's land for a period of more than thirty years. This passway extends not only across appellant's land, but over the lands of the prosecuting witness, W. B. Cook, the farm which now consists of two tracts formerly belonging to the father of appellant. Upon the death of the father, appellant obtained the farm now owned by him, while the other portion of the farm went to his brother, who, about fourteen years prior to the institution of this action, sold the same to appellee, Cook. The law is now well-settled, that, if the use of a passway extends over a long period of years, very slight evidence will be sufficient to show that it was enjoyed under a claim of right; and when the proprietor undertakes to close a passway, the burden is on him to show that the use was merely permissive, and to explain away the presumption that its uninterrupted enjoyment, for more than fifteen years, was not exercised as a claim of right. (Smith v. Pennington, &c., supra.) Not a single witness testified that the use by appellee Cook, and his vendors, or by the public in general, was ever permissive. There can be no doubt, therefore, that appellee and others had a right of passway over appellants land.

The next question is whether the erection of the gates constituted an obstruction of the passway. This court has frequently recognized the right of the owner of the premises, through which a passway extends, to erect gates at the points where the passway enters and leaves his land. (Smith v. Pennington, &c., supra; Maxwell v. McAttee, 9 B. Mon., 20; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, page 34.) As the burden of proof was on appellant, it was necessary for him to show that the gates erected by him were at points where the passway enters and leaves his premises. The proof utterly fails to show the exact location of the gates; indeed, from the language used by appellant, we are inclined to the opinion that the gates, as a matter of fact, were not constructed at points where the way enters and leaves his premises. If, as a matter of fact, appellant had constructed gates at such points, such action on his part would not constitute an obstruction of the passway, and he would be entitled to the relief sought. He failed to show that the gates were so placed, and it therefore follows that he must be denied the relief prayed for.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

HOME INS. CO. OF NEW YORK v. MYERS.

(Filed June 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Isaac T. Woodson for appellant.

R. Gudgell & Son for appellee.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Judge Settle delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, overruling.

Appellant's petition for a re-hearing having been considered by the whole court, it is thought proper to withdraw the following paragraph of the opinion:

"Another thing is that it was neither alleged nor proved by appellant that it had, even since the destruction of the house returned or offered to pay appellee the unearned part of the premium. In view of appellant's theory that the policy was rendered void by the sale of the property, and transfer of the policy to appellee without the written consent given at the Chicago office, it should have tendered appellee the unearned part of the premium."

The foregoing paragraph should have no place in the opinion, because the contract was entire, and the risk having attached, the premium was not apportionable. If the appellant had been entitled to insist upon the forfeiture as claimed, no tender of any part of the premium would have been necessary.

The court concludes that the opinion in other respects correctly states the law of the case.

Wherefore, the petition is overruled.

McCANDLESS, BY, &c. v. McCANDLESS' ADM'RS.

(Filed June 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Estates—Settlement Of—May be Brought as Soon as Representative qualifies—The law is well settled in this State, that an action to settle the estate may be brought as soon as the personal representative qualifies. (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1366.) Appellant seeks to have her husband's estate constituted a trust for her benefit because of his parol declaration just after he was shot and shortly before his death, and while the court properly held that she was not entitled to the whole of it, it was error to dismiss her action on the ground that she asked a settlement of the estate.

John W. Compton and Porter & Sandidge for appellants.

Rollin Hurt and J. R. Beauchamp for appellee.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

James A. McCandless, a resident of Edmonson, Metcalfe county, Kentucky, was shot and killed. Just prior to his death he made certain statements in regard to the disposition of his property, which appellant contends constitute a trust for her benefit. We give below the language claimed to have been used by him, by the witnesses who testified in appellant's behalf:

"Q. When you got to your husband, J. A. McCandless, if he said anything to you, tell all he said?"

"A. He said, 'I am killed, and I want you to have everything I have got.' He said more, but I was so excited that I can't recollect it."

"Same witness: (Record, page 18.)

"Q. Did you hear what he said to G. W. Hundley in regard to taking care of you, and the property said McCandless owned then?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Tell what he said, as near as you can remember."

"A. He said: 'Be good to Nora; take care of her, and I want her to have everything I have got.'"

"Q. Did he tell him anything about wanting G. W. Hundley to see that you got the property that he, McCandless, left?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Tell what you remember that he said to Hundley."

"A. He said: 'I want you to take care of what I have left for her and see that she gets it.'"

"G. W. Hundley: (Record, page 23.)

"Q. How long after he (J. A. McCandless) was shot until you saw him?"

"A. Not over ten minutes."

"Q. Did he call you to him?"

"A. When I stepped in the door of his house they were laying him down, and I went to him and took hold of his hand."

"Q. If he said anything to you, tell what he said."

"A. I asked him what was the matter, and he said, 'I am shot and killed.' And he said: 'I want you to be good to Nora, for I have given her everything I have got, and I want you to see that she gets it.'"

"M. O. Scott:

"This witness is county judge of Metcalfe county, and was present when the shooting occurred, and at decedent's request called his wife to him. He is asked and answers: (Record, page 30.)

"Q. Did you hear what conversation took place between J. A. McCandless and his wife, after she got there? If you did, tell all that you remember that he said to her"

"A. Yes, sir, he told her he was killed. He told her he was shot in the heart, and I think he said he could not live but a few minutes. He told her that he wanted her to have everything he had. She said something to him about not being willing to give him up, and that she could not live without him, and he told her that he gave her all of his property to take care of her. I heard him tell her that his left arm was shot off, and he called her some pet name, I think it was 'Kid,' and told her not to take on."

"On cross-examination, same witness is asked and answers:

"Q. You say on direct examination, that you heard James A. McCandless. 'Tell his wife that he gave her all his property to take care of her?' I want to ask you if he used the word 'property' or the words 'all I have got?'"

"A. He used both words. At first he said he gave her all he had, and afterwards, in talking to her, said he gave her all of his property."

"A. J. Franklin: (Record, page 28.)

"Q. Did you hear the conversation that passed between McCandless and Nora, his wife?"

"A. Yes, sir; I was standing there."

"Q. Tell what McCandless said to his wife as near as you can remember."

"A. He said something about his property, but I can't tell you how it was. I paid no attention to it."

"J. H. Ball: Record, page 35.)

"This witness heard conversation between decedent and G. W. Hundley, about nine o'clock on night of shooting. After conversation detailed by Hundley, he is asked and answers:

"Q. Did you hear him (decedent) say what he wished done with his property? If yes, tell all he said and to whom he was talking at the time."

"A. Yes, I heard him say what he wanted done with his property. He was talking to Mr. Hundley and said to him that he wanted him to take good care of his daughter and that all he had was for her."

Counsel for appellant rely upon the case of Roche, &c. v. George's Ex'or., 92 Ky., 609, wherein the court approved the following language used in the case of Barkley v. Lane's Ex'ors, 6 Bush, 587; "The authorities are all agreed that to fasten a trust on property by parol declaration it is only necessary that the language used clearly and explicitly manifest the owner's purpose to transfer the right, and point out with certainty both the subject of the trust and the person who is to take the beneficial interest." In the opinion of this court, this case is distinguishable from the case cited in that no specific property was referred to. The court, therefore, finds it unnecessary to consider what is essential to create a trust in specific property.

It appears from the record in this case that appellant not only sued for the whole of her husband's estate, on the theory that a trust had been created for her benefit, but also asked for a settlement of the estate. The court below dismissed her petition. While the court properly held that appellant was not entitled to the whole of her husband's estate, we are of opinion that it was error to dismiss appellant's petition in so far as it asked a settlement of the estate. The law is well settled in this State, that an action to settle the estate may be brought as soon as the representative qualifies. (Brand's Ex'or v. Brand, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1366.)

Upon the return of the case the court will set aside the order dismissing appellant's petition in so far as it seeks a settlement of the estate, and the administrator of appellant's husband will settle his accounts in this action. In view of the fact that the judgment is affirmed upon the principal question involved, the administrator will pay the costs of this appeal out of the estate.

For the sole reason that the judgment directed appellant's petition to be dismissed in so far as it sought a settlement of the estate, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

PADUCAH TRACTION CO. v. SINE, BY, &c.

(Filed June 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Personal Injury—Collision of Wagon with Street Car—Injury to Boy Assisting Driver—Question of Fellow Servants—Where a boy, assisting the driver of an ice wagon in delivering ice, was injured by a collision with a street car, the boy and driver of the wagon, though fellow-servants of the ice company, sustained no such relation to each other as that the negligence of the driver should be imputed to the boy in an action by the boy against the street car company for damages in causing his injury.

2. Same—Care Required to Avoid Collision—It is the duty of one driving or riding in an ice wagon, on a street to exercise ordinary care in approaching a crossing on which a street car line is running, to avoid a collision, and while the street railway company is entitled to the free passage of its cars it is also its duty to use ordinary care to discover the approach of a wagon to its track and avoid injuring it or the persons in it.

3. Negligence of Driver—Concurring Negligence of Street Car Company—If the boy's injuries were caused wholly by the negligence of the driver of the wagon, no right of recovery exists against the street car company, but if they resulted from the joint or concurring negligence of the company and the driver, both are liable and a recovery may be had against either.

4. Duty of Motorman—Failure to Use Ordinary Care—If the motorman of the street car, notwithstanding the negligence of the driver of the wagon, by the use of ordinary care, could have stopped the car in time to have prevented the collision and failed to do so, such failure constituted negligence for which the company was liable to the boy in an action for damages, and this would be true whether the motorman's failure to stop the car was caused by his running it too fast, or by not maintaining a lookout ahead of his moving car.

5. Instructions After Closing Argument—The giving of an additional instruction to the jury, after the conclusion of the argument, while not proper practice, yet where a proper instruction was given, after the argument, which it would have been error to have omitted, the giving of the instruction was not a reversible error, especially where neither counsel asked to make an additional argument.

Wheeler, Hughes & Berry for appellant.

Hendrick, Miller & Marble for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

The appellee, William Sine, an infant, by a collision between an ice wagon and one of appellant's street cars, was thrown from the wagon to the railway track and his leg so crushed by the wheels of the car as to necessitate its amputation. For the injuries thus sustained, appellee, by next friend, sued appellant in the McCracken Circuit Court, alleging they were caused by the negligence of the motorman operating the car. $10,000 was the amount of the damages claimed. The answer traversed the petition and in addition pleaded that appellee's injuries were caused by his own contributory negligence and the negligence of the driver in charge of the wagon. These pleas were denied by reply and upon the issues thus made a trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment in appellee's favor for $2,000. Appellant moved for a new trial which was refused by the circuit court and this appeal followed.

The collision occurred at the intersection of Jackson and South Third streets, in the city of Paducah. The ice wagon was the property of the Robertson Ice Company; appellee and the driver of the wagon were employes of the ice company and engaged in the business of delivering ice to its customers. The driver's place, of course, was at the front of the wagon, from which he controlled the mules drawing it. Appellee's post of duty was at the rear end of the wagon, upon a foot board, attached to and hanging down about a foot and a half from the bottom of the wagon bed. From this position he delivered ice from the wagon in such quantities as might be requested by purchasers. The ice wagon contained a heavy curtained top, or cover open at each end, the roof and sides of which extended back beyond the step, so enclosing it that appellee, in order to see any object on either side of the wagon, would have to hold the wagon bed with one hand and lean his body backward.

On the occasion of the collision, the ice wagon in approaching the intersection of Jackson and Third streets, was going from east to west on Jackson street, and the street car passing over Third street from north to south. As the wagon neared the railway track, there was a building on the corner which prevented the approaching car from being seen by the driver until the wagon reached the edge of Third street, and if the street was fifty feet in width between pavements and the railway track was in the middle of the street and eight feet wide, the wagon was within about twenty-one feet of the track before the driver could have seen the car. Appellee, however, was less favorably situated, as he was standing on the foot board, at the back end of the wagon, and his view of the street, in the direction of the coming car was obstructed by the side of the wagon cover as well as the corner building. Both he and the driver testified that they did not see the car until the wagon got upon the railway track, though they claimed to have been keeping a lookout for a car at the time. Both also claimed to have first looked along the railway track south for a car and upon looking north only discovered, after getting on the track, the one by which the wagon was struck, but it was then too late to avert the collision.

It further appeared, from appellee's evidence, that Jackson street was constructed of brick, and the ice wagon in moving over it made a considerable noise; that the street car was running at an unusually high rate of speed, and that no effort was made by the motorman to give the usual signals of its coming, or to control or lessen its speed after he discovered, or by ordinary care could have discovered, the wagon and that it was about to cross the track in front of the car. If appellant's motorman saw the wagon on the railway track or about to go upon it, in time to have prevented the collision by stopping the car, but for the high rate of speed at which he was running it, or if the collision was caused by his failure to maintain a proper lookout ahead of him, or his failure to sound the car gong, in approaching Jackson street, in either of these events, he was guilty of negligence, which entitled appellee to recover; and there was evidence in appellee's behalf tending to prove negligence on the part of the motorman in one or more of these particulars.

Appellant introduced on its behalf considerable evidence to the effect that the car was not running at a high rate or dangerous rate of speed, that the usual signals were given, and a lookout maintained by the motorman, and that the driver of the ice wagon ought to have seen, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, and heard the car, from the time the wagon reached Third street and before going upon the track in front of it, and thereby have prevented the collision; but that he failed to exercise such care and negligently drove upon the track when so near the car that it was impossible to stop it in time to prevent the collision. Appellee and the driver of the ice wagon were lawfully upon the street occupied by appellant's car track and had the right to use any part of it with the ice wagon, but in using the street, it was their duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid a collision with appellant's car, and while appellant was likewise entitled to the use of its railway track on the same street for the free passage of its cars, it was also its duty to use ordinary care to discover the ice wagon and avoid injuring it or persons in it. (Palmer Transfer Co. v. Paducah Railway and Light Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 473; Green v. Louisville Ry. Co., 27 Ky. Law Rep., 316.)

The record furnishes very slight, if any, evidence of contributory negligence on the part of appellee. The great weight of it conduced to show the absence of such negligence. He testified that he did not see and could not discover the presence of the car until the wagon was on the track and the collision became an inevitable fact, and that it was then too late for him to jump out of the way of the car. No witness expressly contradicted this and the statement was apparently corroborated by the physical fact that his position on the foot board prevented him from seeing the car until he got to or practically upon the track.

As already intimated, there was evidence on appellant's behalf to the effect that the driver of the ice wagon was guilty of negligence; though much of appellee's evidence conduced to prove that he was not. However, if it be conceded that the driver's negligence contributed to the accident, we do not regard it material in this case in view of the proof of the motorman's negligence. This is not an action of a servant against the master to recover for injuries resulting from the negligence of a fellow-servant. Appellee and the driver, though fellow-servants, in the employ of the Robertson Ice Company, sustained no such relation to each other as to the appellant, in this case; nor should the negligence of the driver be imputed to appellee as he was neither his agent nor servant.

If appellee's injuries were caused wholly by the negligence of the driver, no right of recovery exists in his behalf against appellant, but if they resulted from the joint or concurring negligence of appellant and the driver both are liable therefor in damages, or a recovery may be had against either. On the other hand, if appellee's injuries were caused by the negligence of the motorman alone, appellant's responsibility therefor, can not be questioned. So, if it be admitted that the evidence in this case tends to show that the driver of the ice wagon was negligent, in not discovering the approach of the car, before driving upon the railway track, or in attempting to cross the track in front of the car, if, as the evidence strongly conduced to prove, appellant's motorman, notwithstanding such negligence, on the part of the driver, by the use of ordinary care could have stopped the car in time to have prevented its collision with the wagon, and failed to do so, such failure constituted negligence entitling appellee to recover of appellant the damages he sustained from the collision. And this would be true whether the motorman's failure to stop the car in time to prevent the collision, was caused by his running it at a too rapid and dangerous rate of speed, or an account of his not maintaining a lookout ahead of the moving car. The doctrine fixing appellant's liability upon such a state of facts as here presented, if its contention as to the negligence of the driver of the ice wagon is allowed, is well stated in the case of Kentucky and Indiana Bridge Co. v. Sydnor, Adm'r, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 951, as follows:

"McDowell was a fellow-servant of decedent, Renfro, in repairing the car, it is true, but it does not follow from that fact that anybody in connection with McDowell could wrongfully injure or kill Renfro in that work and escape liability on the ground that the fellow-servant, McDowell, aided in the wrongful act. Nothing is better settled than that when two or more by their joint tort damage another, the joint tort feasons are jointly and severally liable to the injured person for his entire damage. The doctrine of non-liability of a master or employe to one of his servants for an injury inflicted by the negligence of a fellow-servant is based upon the implied contract of the parties, which is, that each servant agrees to assume the risk of his fellow-servant's negligence, the correlative undertaking of the master being that he will use reasonable diligence to engage none but competent fellow-servants. If the master notwithstanding, engages incompetent workmen, from whose negligence damage is sustained by his fellows, the master is liable for the injury, because it was brought about by a breach of his implied undertaking. But this assumption by the laborer of his fellow-servant's negligence, or, to put it differently, the excusing of the master for the act of such, is the result of the contract between the master and servant and is personal to them. A stranger to the contract is not entitled to its benefits, for he does not bear any of its obligations. As to him the fellow-servant with whom he acts in doing the wrong is like any other joint tortfeasor; they are both liable for the injury they have inflicted by their negligent acts." (Pugh v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 101 Ky., 77; Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. (Mass.) 49, 38; Am. Dec. 339; Johnson v. Lindsay, 65 L. T. N. S., 97; Smith v. N. Y., &c R. R. Co., 19 N. Y., 132; Gray v. Phil., &c., R. R. Co., Fed., 168; Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Cummins, 106 U. S., 702; Bishop, Non-Contract Law, section 518.)

We have considered the objections urged by appellant to the instructions. The instructions are numerous; for that reason, and because of the already sufficient length of the opinion, they are not set out therein. While in some respects inaptly worded, they substantially conform to the conclusions herein expressed; set forth the reciprocal duties resting upon appellant and appellee with respect to the state of facts resulting in the latter's injuries, and fairly presented for the guidance of the jury the law applicable to every issue in the case.

The giving of the additional instruction after argument had been concluded, was not, under the circumstances, reversible error. The instruction in question was eminently proper. The others would have been insufficient without it, and the failure to give it would have been error.

The giving of instructions, after the conclusion of the argument to the jury, should not be approved, as a practice. In a few cases this court has refused to reverse for it, where, as in this case, it was made to appear that the additional instruction was indispensably necessary; that the case had been fully and satisfactorily argued on each side, or that neither counsel asked to make a further argument on account of the additional instruction. (Turner v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 2161; Kenneday v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1066; Sears' Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 152.)

We do not think the giving of the instruction after argument was prejudicial to appellant. It is conceded by appellant's counsel that the verdict is not unreasonable in amount.

Judgment affirmed.

BEREA COLLEGE v. BURNELL, &c.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Passway—Permissive Use—Rights Conferred—Where the Use of a passway is merely permissive on the part of the owner, a privilege extended to his neighbors without any intention to surrender his right to it, or purpose on their part to assert claim, and no act or conduct by either indicating that such use was other than a neighborly act, such use, even for fifty years, would not confer the right to claim it against the owner, or prohibit him from closing it.

Smith & Smith for appellant.

J. C. & D. W. Chenault for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

In this action, appellant, Berea College, seeks to enjoin appellees from obstructing a road or passway leading from the lands of appellant, over the lands of appellee, to the Berea and Big Hill turnpike. The land now owned by Berea College, and to which this alleged passway leads, was formerly owned by Sam Pigg, Berea College being his vendee. The land now owned by Anthony Burnell, and over which appellant claims a passway, was formerly the property of J. K. Harris, the appellees Anthony Burnell and William Burnell being the vendees of Harris.

About seven or eight years prior to the institution of this action, appellees constructed a fence on each side of a lane which was located a few yards from a road formerly leading through the lands of appellee, Anthony Burnell and his vendor, J. K. Harris. Several witnesses testified that, prior to that time, the road adjoining the lane in question and the lane itself were used by appellant and its vendors and the public in general for a period of more than fifteen years. The testimony for the appellees is to the effect that the persons so using the road through the premises of J. K. Harris did so with his permission; some of the witnesses testifying that, in some instances, they paid for the privilege of going through J. K. Harris' lands. The evidence further shows that appellees' vendor, Sam Pigg, used the old road through J. K. Harris' land by permission from Harris. The evidence for appellees also tends to support their position, that the use of the land, which they fenced after their purchase of the property from Harris was merely permissive. Indeed, it appears that the president of Berea College at one time sought to purchase from Anthony Burnell the strip of land along which the lane now runs. This is not consistent with the position that Berea College and its tenants used the passway as a matter of right.

Where the use of a passway is merely permissive on the part of the owner of the land, a privilege extended to his neighbors without any intention on his part to surrender his right to it, or purpose on their part to assert claim, and when there is no act, or conduct by either that would indicate that the use of the way was other than a neighborly act, and it is recognized that the privilege is one that may be revoked at any time by the owner of the land, its use for over fifty years will not confer the right to claim it as against the owner, or prohibit him from closing or discontinuing it. (Smith v. Pennington, &c., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1282.)

Without giving the testimony in detail, it may be said that, while there is considerable evidence of the uninterrupted use of the passway for a long period of years, there is also much evidence that this use was only permissive. The chancellor took the latter view, and decided in favor of appellees. After a careful reading of the record, we are unable to say that his conclusion was erroneous.

Judgment affirmed.

CLARKE v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Volunteer—Riding On Freight Train—Where one voluntarily performs services upon a freight train on which he is riding, with the knowledge of the conductor, without having paid compensation, he can not be considered as a passenger, or as an employe, but may be classed as a volunteer.

2. Same—Injury to Volunteer—Performing Services—Knowledge of Engineer—Care Required—Recovery—Where a volunteer riding on a freight train, received an injury in attempting to couple the engine to the cars, with the knowledge of the engineer, the only duty the servants of the company owed him, was to exercise ordinary care to prevent injuring him, and, to entitle him to recover damages for an injury so incurred there must be evidence conducing to show that the engineer failed to exercise ordinary care in handling his engine at the time he was injured.

J. J. Osborne and W. J. Osborne for appellant.

Benjamin D. Warfield and E. M. Dickson for appellee.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellant, at the time he received the injuries complained of, was eighteen years of age. His foot was crushed by being caught between the couplers in a train. Averring that the injuries he received were caused by the negligence of the employes of appellee in operating the train, he brought this action to recover damages.

Upon a trial, and at the conclusion of the evidence offered in behalf of appellant, the lower court directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellee. So that, the only question we are called upon to consider is whether or not the evidence introduced was sufficient to authorize a submission of the case to the jury. In the disposition of this question, it will be necessary to relate with some detail the facts.

On the day he was injured, Clarke went to Maysville, Ky., on a passenger train. Late in the afternoon, he went to the depot for the purpose of returning to his home upon a freight train that left Maysville for Paris, about 5 o'clock. Arriving at the depot some twenty minutes before the freight left, he assisted the train crew, with whom he was acquainted, and with the knowledge of the conductor, in making up the train, coupling and uncoupling cars, and performing such other duties as brakemen ordinarily discharge. He did not ask permission of the conductor to ride on the train, nor did the conductor ask him if he was going to ride, nor was anything said between them concerning this matter. But, when the train left Maysville, he got on it, and soon after it left the depot he went into the caboose where the conductor and the train crew were seated. The train had its full compliment of men, consisting of the engineer, fireman, conductor and three brakemen. Between Maysville and Parks Hill, at which last named point the injury occurred, the train stopped at several stations for the purpose of unloading and loading freight; and at each of these places, Clarke assisted the trainmen. He does not state particularly that the conductor requested him to assist the crew in loading and unloading freight, but does say that the conductor was present at each station and did not object to his assistance or request him to desist. He also testifies that, in the presence of the conductor, one of the brakemen furnished him a suit of overalls to wear, so that he might not injure or soil his clothes in handling the freight. He did not pay or offer to pay any fare; nor was any fare demanded of him. When the train reached Parks Hill, a station on the road Clarke was directed by the conductor to uncouple the engine from the freight car next to it, so that the engine might go down on a switch some two hundred yards distant, and get a couple of cars that they wanted to put into the train. When the engine started after the cars, Clarke, in connection with one of the brakemen, got in the engine cab and rode down to the point where the cars were standing on the side-track. He says he was directed by the conductor to go with the engine and assist in getting the cars out. When the engine reached a point some 25 feet from the loaded cars, Clarke got out of the cab, and walked back to couple the tender to the end of the nearest car. The coupling knuckles on the car were closed, and the tender bumped its coupling knuckle into the coupling knuckle of the freight car without making the coupling. Clarke then signalled the engineer to pull away from the freight car, which he did, until there was a space of some 10 feet between the end of the tender and the car. After the engine had pulled away, Clarke undertook with his hand, and finally with his foot, to open the coupling on the freight car, so that the tender could be coupled to it. While in the act of opening the coupler with his foot, the engine backed in, catching his foot between the couplers, injuring it to such an extent as to make necessary the amputation of his leg between the ankle and the knee.

Counsel for appellant contends, first, that at the time of his injury, Clarke was a passenger and entitled to sue and recover as a passenger for injuries sustained; and second: that if he was not a passenger, he was an employe and entitled as such, to maintain the action and recover damages.

The question as to when a person, who is not riding on a passenger train, or a train upon which passengers are permitted to ride, is entitled to the rights that attach to a passenger, has been considered by courts of last resort in a number of States, including our own court; and different views are taken as to when and under what circumstances the relation of passenger is created. But we do not think that any of the elements necessary to constitute Clarke a passenger, or to fix the liability of the company upon the basis that he was a passenger, exist in this case. There is no pretense that the train, upon which he was riding, had any accommodation for passengers, or that passengers were ever carried upon it, or that he asked or was given consent by the conductor or any other person to ride as a passenger, or that he tendered or offered to tender his fare as a passenger. On the contrary, Clarke knew, that the train did not carry passengers, and that he was not riding on it as a passenger, except in the sense that he was being carried from one place to another. The mere fact that he was riding by the invitation or with the knowledge and implied consent of the conductor, did not, under the facts of this case, convert him into a passenger in the ordinary and legal acceptation of the term. We do not deem it necessary in the consideration of this case, to point out the conditions under which a person, riding upon a freight train, may become a passenger, or to define the authority of the conductor of a freight train relative to permitting persons to take passage upon it. The facts make it so apparent that Clarke, at the time he received the injury complained of, was not a passenger, that we will not do more than cite the following authorities in which different phases of this question are illustrated: Dunn v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 58 Maine, 187; 4 Am. Rep., 267; L. & N. R. Co. v. Thornton, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 778; Dalton v. L. & N. R. Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 97; Skirvin v. L. & N. R. Co., 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1208; B. & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Cox, 66 Ohio State, 276, 90 Am. St. Rep., 583; Thompson on Negligence, sec. 2666, 3326; L. & N. R. Co. v. Hailey, 27 L. R. A., 549; Eaton v. Deleware, Lackawanna, &c., R. Co., 57 N. Y., 382; 15 Am. Rep., 513; L. & N. R. Co. v. Scott's Adm'r., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 30; C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Jackson, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 630; Elmore v. Sea Board Air Line R. Co., 42 S. E., 989.

Nor can Clarke, at the time of his injury, be considered as an employe of the company. The train had a full crew, there was no emergency, and no especial need for the services of Clarke. The conductor, under the circumstances had no authority to and did not employ him to assist as a brakeman. The general rule is that where a brakeman is absent, and the proper and safe management of the train so requires, and in cases of sudden emergency demanding extra labor, it is within the implied authority of the conductor to employ assistance; but all the authorities agree that except under the conditions indicated, the conductor is not authorized to employ agents or servants to assist in the management or operation of the train. (Sloane v. Railroad Co., 62 Iowa, 728; Railway Co. v. Prospect, 83 Ala., 518; Eason v. Railway Co., 65 Texas, 577; McDaniel v. Railroad Co., 90 Ala., 64; Elliott on Railroads, sec. 302; Church v. Chicago R. Co., 50 Minn., 218.)

Neither can it be said with propriety that at the time of the accident, he was a trespasser. He was performing duties with the knowledge and consent of the persons who had at least, the apparent right to request his assistance. So that, we think, he may properly be treated as a volunteer. In Thompson on Negligence, section 4680, it is said:

"A person who volunteers to assist the servant of another, without being employed so to do by that other, is deemed to assume all the ordinary risks incident to the situation. His position is that of a volunteer, and is analogous to that of a trespasser or bare licensee. He takes things as he finds them, and in case of his being injured—unless the injury occurs under such circumstances as to create a liability, if he were regarded as a trespasser, intruder or bare licensee—he can not recover damages from the master of the servant whom he had volunteered to assist. If, after discovering such volunteer has placed himself in a position of danger, even through his own negligence, the servant fails to exercise reasonable care to avert injury, the latter will be liable. This liability does not rest on any contract obligation, but on a general duty not to inflict a wanton or willful injury on another." To the same effect is Elliott on Railroads, section 1305; Evarts v. St. Paul Ry. Co., 56 Minn., 141; 45 Am. St. Rep., 460; L. & N. R. Co. v. Pendleton. 31 Ky. Law Rep., 1025.

Considering the matter from this standpoint, and treating Clarke as a volunteer, the only duty that the company owed under the facts of this case, was to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to him. With the knowledge of the engineer and by the direction of the conductor, Clarke was engaged in an effort to couple the engine to the cars, and while in the performance of this act, the engineer was obliged to exercise ordinary care to prevent injuring him. So that, the point upon which this case must turn is whether or not the engineer exercised this degree of care. If he did, the company was not liable, and the ruling of the trial court was proper; on the other hand, if he did not, the case should have gone to the jury.

In the disposition of this question, we are not concerned in anything that took place before the arrival of the train at Parks Hill, or on other previous occasions, as for the purpose of this case we may assume that at Parks Hill, Clarke, for the first time, volunteered to perform any duties in connection with the train.

In order that the facts as to the pivotal point in the case may be clearly understood, we will state the testimony as to what took place. Clarke's evidence is as follows:

"Q. How close was the tender to the two loaded cars when you got out of the cab?"

"A. About 35 or 40 feet."

"Q. What did you do after getting out of the engine cab?"

"A. I walked along, backing him on back, bringing the engineer back by signals."

"Q. What signals did you give him?"

"A. Just to back up."

"Q. What signals did you give the engineer, if any?"

"A. After he came on back, the knuckles were closed and wouldn't couple. He came on back and hit and made a bump, and then had to pull the engine up; had to open the knuckle. I had to pull him up once after the train had bumped and didn't couple, then the second time I tried to push the knuckles open and got my foot caught."

"Q. What signal did you give the engineer, if any, after the engine bumped into the car and didn't couple?"

"A. Gave him the signal to pull up."

"Q. About how far did he pull up from the end of the first car?"

"A. It wasn't over 15 feet."

"Q. What did you do then, after he pulled up?"

"A. I was trying to open the knuckle."

"Q. How were you trying to open the knuckle?"

"A. Trying to open it with my hand until the train got nearly there; I threw my foot up to try to kick it open."

"Q. What signals, if any, did you give the engineer from the time he commenced backing in the engine and tender after he first pulled up and before your foot was caught?"

"A. Gave him the signal to stop—shut down."

"Q. How close was the tender to the loaded car at the time when you gave him that signal?"

"A. About eight or ten feet."

"Q. What then happened after you gave him the signal to stop?"

"A. He kept on coming back."

"Q. Then what happened?"

"A. Why, I was trying to couple—trying to kick that knuckle open, and he came back in a jerk and caught my foot in there."

"Q. About what distance was the jerk?"

"A. Four or five feet."

"Q. How were you trying to push open the coupling knuckle?"

"A. With my foot."

Homer Bourne, a witness introduced for appellant, testified in substance, that he was on top of the box car at the time the coupling was attempted to be made; that he saw Clarke leave the engine cab and start back and come towards the car upon which he was to make the coupling, but didn't see him afterwards. He said that the engine came back to make the coupling in the usual way, and didn't jar the car on which he was any more than was done in making an ordinary coupling.

Another witness, Riley Payne, said that he saw Clarke and two other brakeman get out of the cab, and that Clarke and the brakemen both gave signals to back the engine. He was within ten feet of Clarke at the time of the accident, and on the same side of the train, and said that: "Clarke got off the cab and signalled back, to come on back; that he came in and aimed to kick the coupling off, and caught his foot. That he did not remember but one effort made to couple the cars." That there was no change in the speed of the engine, from the time Clarke got out of the cab until his foot was caught; that Clarke stepped from the engine and went along with the engine as it backed, and that the engine moved gradually. That the nearest brakeman was about 15 feet behind Clarke, and before this brakeman came up to where the coupling took place, Clarke went in and attempted to kick the coupling open with his foot, and just as he kicked the coupling open, the engine came back and caught it.

Tom Payne testified that he was on the box car, that the engine intended to couple to. That he saw Clarke get out of the engine cab and signal the engineer to come back. That he did not see any person else giving signals. That the engine backed up to make the coupling, that it missed, and pulled up about 10 or 12 feet, and backed again, and caught Clarke's foot the second time. That Clarke, upon the failure to make the coupling, on the first attempt, gave the signal to pull up, and in obedience to the signal the engineer did pull up 10 or 12 feet, and that when Clarke gave the signal to back, the engine was backed.

The foregoing evidence does not establish that the engineer knew that Clarke was in a perilous position, nor is it sufficient to show that in backing the engine, he failed to exercise ordinary care. It is true that Clarke says he signaled the engineer to stop, but he does not say that the engineer received the signal or if he did receive it, that he could have stopped the engine in time to have prevented the accident or that the movement of the train was unusual or unnecessary. In C., N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Jackson, supra, a boy, 16 years of age, while riding on a freight train, with the permission of the conductor, and with the understanding that he should open the switch, was injured—in discussing his evidence that he had signalled the engineer to back the train, the court said:

"Appellee's evidence that he signalled the engineer to back the train is no evidence of the fact that he did act upon that signal, as there were four other men connected with the train whose business it was to look after its movements and give necessary signals. He testifies that he gave the signal from the right side of the train, the side upon which the engineer was sitting, and that the engineer was looking back through his window. Still that does not prove that the engineer did see him or his signal, but simply shows that if he cast his eyes where the appellee stood, he could have seen him. If the appellee had been an employe in operating the train, and had given a signal to back it, under the circumstances stated by him, then an inference might be drawn or a presumption indulged that the engineer saw him and acted on his signal. * * * Besides, this, there is no proof offered by the appellee, to show that the jerk which threw him from the train was one that was unusual in the moving of freight trains, or that any unnecessary force was applied to the train which produced the sudden movement designated as a jerk. There was no negligence shown upon which to base a recovery."

To entitle Clarke to recover in this case, there must have been some evidence conducing to show that the engineer failed to exercise ordinary care in handling his engine at the time Clarke was injured. Upon this vital point there is a total failure of proof, and the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD CO. v. GORMLEY.

(Filed June 17th, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Benjamin D. Warfield, J. A. Sullivan and Jno. T. Shelby for appellant.

Smith & Smith for appellee.

Response to petition for re-hearing, per curiam.

Upon another trial the court should instruct the jury that, in estimating the damages, if any, to which appellee is entitled, they should take into consideration the difference between the fair market value of the horse immediately before his injury and afterwards, and find in damages such sum as will reasonably compensate appellee for any injury the horse sustained that resulted directly from or was caused by the injury he received.

The parties may also introduce evidence conducing to show the condition of the horse up to the time of the trial, but no recovery can be had for loss that may have been sustained on account of inability to keep racing engagement the horse was entered in, although damages are allowable for money in caring for the horse that was made necessary on account of his injuries.

Petition overruled.

John W. Douglas for appellant.

Appeal from Owen Circuit Court.

Opinion by the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

On March 14th, 1905, S. S. Barnes and wife, Anna Barnes, for the recited consideration of $1,000.00, conveyed to appellee, W. H. Johnson, the life estate of S. S. Barnes in and to a certain tract of land situated in Owen county, Kentucky, consisting of 80 acres. This deed was duly acknowledged by S. S. Barnes and his wife, and recorded in the Owen county clerk's office. In the month of March, 1906, appellant, S. S. Barnes, instituted this action to have the deed in question canceled. He charges that the conveyance was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, and that there was no consideration therefor. He also charges that the deed was executed to secure appellee in the payment of money borrowed through him from the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company, and that the deed was intended to be, and was, only a mortgage. The petition concludes with a prayer that the deed be set aside, and if this be not done that appellant have judgment against appellee for the sum of $1,000.00. Appellee filed a special demurrer to the petition, which was sustained. Appellant thereupon amended his petition, and made his infant children parties to the action. Thereafter appellant filed a second amended petition in which he alleged that, during the winter and spring of 1905, he borrowed about $800.00 through appellee, W. H. Johnson, the exact amount of which he could not state; that subsequently he made a contract with appellee whereby he sold the tobacco which he had previously purchased, amounting to 6,000 pounds, and also his individual crop of tobacco, raised in the year 1904, consisting of about 4,500 pounds; that appellee, Johnson, purchased said tobacco with the understanding that he was to pay appellant's indebtedness. By appropriate pleadings, appellee made an issue as to the matters alleged in the petition and amended petitions.

About the same time, appellant sued appellee for the sum of $100.00 and interest, alleged to be due under and by virtue of a written agreement whereby appellee held back $100.00 due appellant on a land trade. By the agreement it was provided that the $100.00 was retained by Johnson to secure him for losses on tobacco purchased by appellant with money furnished by the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company. The $100.00 was to be payable in the event Barnes paid the warehouse company. To this petition, Johnson filed an answer in which he charged that appellant was still indebted to the warehouse company largely in excess of the sum of $100.00, and that appellee was bound as appellant's surety for the payment of said sum.

Thereafter the court consolidated these two actions. Evidence was taken, the case submitted, and judgment rendered in favor of the appellee. From that judgment S. S. Barnes prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that appellant Barnes was also the owner of a life estate in another tract of land, consisting of 40 acres, and that this was likewise conveyed to appellee by deed properly signed, acknowledged and recorded. Appellant complains, first, of the error of the trial court in sustaining the special demurrer to the petition, and requiring the infant children of appellant to be made parties. As appellant had only a life estate in the tract of land in controversy, and, as his children owned the estate in remainder, it was altogether unnecessary to make the latter parties to the action, and the special demurrer was, therefore, improperly sustained. We are of opinion, however, that the judgment should not be reversed because of such error, but that on the return of the case it should be modified so as to adjudge that the costs made necessary by this action of the court should be paid by appellee.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in consolidating the two actions. It appears from the record, however, and especially from the evidence introduced by appellee, that the $100.00 referred to in the common-law action was a part of the purchase price for the 80 acres of land. That being the case it was proper to consolidate the actions and consider the two together for the purpose of determining whether or not there was any consideration for the deed sought to be canceled.

During the progress of the case, appellant made a motion to have the following questions tried by a jury: 1. Was there any consideration for the 80 acres of land? 2. Did W. H. Johnson buy appellant's tobacco and thereby become paymaster to the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company for the money borrowed to pay off same? 3. Was the $100.00 held by Johnson a payment on the 40-acre tract of land or a payment on the 80-acre tract of land? 4. Was the deed to the 80-acre tract of land a genuine sale for a valuable consideration, or was it intended only as security for the money furnished to pay for the tobacco alleged to have been purchased by Johnson, Section 12, of the Civil Code of Practice, provides for the trial before a jury of ordinary issues in equitable actions. The absolute right to have such issues tried by jury, however, is confined to issues which are purely legal in their character. Where issues are of equitable cognizance, it is entirely within the discretion of the chancellor whether he will order a jury to aid him in a finding on the facts. (Kennedy v. Ten Broeck, 11 Bush, 241; Blakey v. Johnson, 13 Bush, 200.) The question in this case is: Should the deed be set aside? Incidental to the determination of that question, and forming an inseparable part thereof, are the other questions concerning which appellant asked a trial by jury. Such issues have always been of equitable cognizance, and must necessarily be so for the reason that the question is whether, in good conscience, the transaction should stand or be set aside. (Ford, &c. v. Ellis, &c., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1837.) That being the case, it was decretionary with the chancellor, whether or not he would seek the aid of a jury, and, in refusing to submit such issues to the jury, no error was committed.

The only question remaining to be considered is, whether or not the evidence supports the findings of the chancellor. It appears that, prior to the time of the execution of the deed, appellant had executed two mortgages to appellee covering the property in question. Appellant claims that a portion, if not all, of these mortgage debts had been paid off. He also swears that no money was paid him on the day the deed was executed. According to the evidence for appellee, only a portion of the mortgage debts had been paid, and he, upon the day the deed was executed, paid to appellant the sum of $175.00. This evidence is confirmed by that of other witnesses, who testify that they were present and saw the money paid. It is also in the evidence that appellant stated, after the deed was made, that he had sold his property to appellee. Of course, the burden of proof in this case was on appellant. Where appellee already had two mortgages on the property in question, it is not likely that the deed was intended to be an additional mortgage—especially in view of the fact that appellee gave appellant the additional sum of $175.00, and admits holding back the sum of $100.00, which was payable to appellant when his indebtedness to the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company should be discharged. Without giving the evidence in detail, we are of opinion that appellant failed to establish the fact that there was no consideration for the deed in question, or that the deed itself was intended as a mortgage. On the other hand, the weight of the evidence is with appellee, and we think fully sustains the finding of the chancellor.

Inasmuch, however, as the $100.00 retained by appellee was for the purpose of securing him to that amount as surety for appellant to the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company, appellee, of course, can not retain this money as his own, unless he has already paid, or shall hereafter pay, to the Cincinnati Tobacco Warehouse Company a sum equal to that amount. In other words, appellant is entitled to have the sum so retained by appellee applied to his indebtedness to the warehouse company. If appellee has not already made this payment, or if he shall fail in the future to make such payment, proper proceedings may be had to require him to pay such sum as a credit on appellant's indebtedness to the warehouse company.

Judgment affirmed.

MCDONALD, TREASURER, &c. v. PARKER, SUPERINTENDENT,
&c.

(Filed May 14th, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Graded Common Schools—District Established for Seventeen Years—County Superintendent—Refusal of Pro Rata to District—Where a graded school district has been established and recognized for seventeen years as such without question, either by the State or county officials, or others, the County Superintendent of Schools can not refuse to pay over to the treasurer of such school district the pro rata to it from the common school fund, on the ground of an alleged defect in the election proceedings by which such district was established as a graded school.

2. Same—Employing Teachers Without Certificates—Gratuitous Services—A college known as Union College, which belonged to the Methodist church was burned, near Barbourville, in August, 1906. The professors of said college (including two young lady teachers, who had no certificates of qualification and who made no charge for their services), were employed by the trustees of a graded common school district to teach said district school for the year 1906. Held—That while the statute forbids the employment, as teachers in the common schools, of persons who do not hold certificates showing them competent to teach, it does not forbid the trustees from accepting the aid of teachers whose services are given gratuitously.

3. Same—Employing Teachers From Denominational College—Constitutional Inhibition—Where a denominational college was destroyed by fire, the fact that the trustees of a graded common school district employed the faculty of said college to teach its school for that year is not a violation of Sec. 189 of the Constitution, forbidding "the appropriation of any fund raised or levied for educational purposes to be used by or in aid of any church, sectarian or denominational school," the said teachers at the time having no connection with the burnt college.

J. M. Robsion, J. D. Black, P. D. Black and S. B. Dishman for appellants.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion by the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

Appellant, W. H. McDonald, who, at the time this litigation commenced was the treasurer of graded common school district No. 1, instituted this action against B. E. Parker, County Superintendent of Common Schools of Knox county, for purpose of obtaining a writ of mandamus requiring the appellee to pay over to him, as treasurer, the sum of one thousand, four hundred and seventy dollars, which was the pro rata of district No. 1, of the common school fund in his hands for distribution in Knox county for the school year 1906-1907. Appellee does not deny the possession of the money, but resists the action to require him to pay it over to the treasurer on two grounds: First, a defect in the election proceedings by which the district was established as a graded school; and, second, because the trustees have made a combination with Union College, in violation of the provision of section 189, of the Constitution. The issues on these two defenses were properly joined, and the case having been submitted to the circuit judge, on final hearing he dismissed the petition; and from this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The first defense may be disposed of in very few words. It is based upon supposed defects in the orders of the court authorizing the submission to the qualified voters of the district the question whether or not a graded school should be established therein and certain bonds issued for the purpose of erecting buildings, &c. The election by which the graded school was established in the district, was held seventeen years ago, and in due time thereafter it was declared by the proper authorities that the graded school was established by a majority of the votes cast upon the question; and ever since, it is not disputed that, a graded school has been maintained and carried on in the district without any question by either the State or county officials, or the taxpayers interested in the proposition. The appel-lee has himself, as superintendent, always recognized it as an established fact, and has made official reports accordingly. Before he became superintendent, he was employed as teacher in the school for several years. It is manifest that it would be intolerable, after a district has thus been established, if the legality of the election by which it was established could be called in question in a collateral proceeding every time a litigant is tempted by the stress of his case so to do. There was no contest inaugurated to call in question the validity of the election by which the district was established as a graded school, and, as the time has long since expired in which such a contest could be made, it can not now be done. (Hopkins v. Swift, 100 Ky., 14; Wilson, &c. v. Hines, 99 Ky., 221; Cole v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 385.)

The second defense, which is based upon the theory that the trustees of the school have made a combination with the authorities in charge of Union College, which is situated in the district, grows out of the following facts: Union College is an educational institution, operated under the auspices of the Kentucky Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In September, 1906, Union College had among its teachers Prof. G. H. Reibold and two ladies, the Misses Weaver, who were under contract with it to teach during the ensuing school year. In August 1906, Union College suffered a disastrous fire by which its administration building was totally destroyed. This misfortune made it impossible to open the institution to its full capacity until the burned buildings could be rebuilt, and the trustees of the institution found themselves with more teachers on their hands than they could utilize in teaching the student body they had room to accommodate in their remaining buildings. A re-arrangement of their professional corps became absolutely necessary. Shortly before the fire the trustees of the graded school were anxious to secure the services of Prof. Reibold as principal of their school, and had made overtures looking towards his employment in this capacity. He informed them, however, that he was under contract with Union College to teach for it and could not honorably release himself. After the fire, the faculty of Union College became anxious to make some arrangement by which they could be relieved of some of the burden of paying teachers whom they could not use; and, looking to this end, the president of the college, Dr. Easley, opened negotiations with the trustees of the graded schools. It was first thought that some sort of fusion could be entered into by the two institutions, which would be mutually advantageous to them, and considerable discussion along this line was had, some of the trustees being in favor of it if it could be legally done; but, upon the advice of counsel, this whole idea was abandoned, the attorney for the trustees being correctly of the opinion that no part of the public school fund could be lawfully paid over in any way or by any arrangement to a denominational school. Prof. Reibold then resigned his position as teacher in Union College, and was employed along with Profs. Faulkner and Jones as teachers to conduct the graded school. It was suggested also that the Misses Weaver should be employed in the lower grade department of the district school to teach the smaller children, but it was found to be an insuperable objection to this that they did not have the certificates required by the statute, which authorized their employment as teachers in the common schools of Kentucky. Thereupon the faculty of Union College, being under contract with the Misses Weaver for the ensuing year, donated their services as teachers to the graded school; Union College undertaking to pay them their salaries, and their services to be absolutely free to the district. The contract between the trustees and Profs. Reibold, Faulkner and Jones is as follows:

"This contract made and etered into this September 13, 1906, between John Bolton, L. W. Farmer, A. W. Hopper, J. Stanfill and Benjamin Mathews, trustees of Barbourville graded common school, district No. 1, parties of the first part, and G. H. Reibold, W. C. Faulkner and H. B. Jones, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the conditions and obligations hereinafter set out, the first parties have this day employed second parties to conduct and teach the said common graded school, district No. 1, Barbourville, Ky., for a period of nine months, beginning on September 13, 1906. The said second parties agree to teach each and every white child within the lawful school age, living in said district, who presents himself and desires to be taught, free of charge, for the said full period of nine months. Said school to be taught in accordance with the common school laws of the State of Kentucky, and said teachers and school at all times be subject to the visitation and lawful authority of the said trustees of said district and the county superintendent of schools of Knox county and the Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of Kentucky. Said second parties are, at all times, to keep and maintain the school rooms in a clean and healthful condition. The said G. H. Reibold is to be principal and have general supervision and control of the entire school, both teachers and pupils. The said W. C. Faulkner is to be first assistant teacher and the said H. B. Jones, second assistant teacher. The said G. H. Reibold is to receive for his services the sum of one hundred dollars per month. The said W. C. Faulkner shall receive the sum of fifty dollars per month for his services, and the said H. B. Jones shall receive the sum of fifty dollars per month for his services; all of said teachers to be paid out of the public fund of said district, and shall be paid at such time as the public funds shall be turned over to the treasurer of said district. First parties shall furnish all fuel and supplies and provide janitors.

 "J. F. STANFILL.

(Teachers) "H. B. JONES,
 "W. C. FAULKNER,
 "GEO. H. REIBOLD."

At the commencement of the school the trustees distributed among all the patrons of the graded school the following notice:

"NOTICE.

"To the patrons of Barbourville White Graded School, District Number 1.

"All patrons of Barbourville (White) Graded School, District No. 1, will take notice that said school will open Thursday, September 13, 1906.

"The board has secured Prof. Geo. H. Reibold as principal, with an able corps of assistants. The school is free to all white children living in said district who are within the school age."

It is conceded that the school, which was conducted by the trustees for the school year in question was the most successful and prosperous one, from an educational standpoint, ever held in the district. It is admitted that every white child of school age who desired so to do was taught therein free of charge. But it is said the fact that Prof. Reibold and the Misses Weaver had but lately come from Union College and the young ladies were without the certificate required by law, authorized the superintendent to withhold the fund paid into his hands by the State and county for the benefit of the district. Section 189, of the Constitution, which is invoked in support of part of this position is as follows: "No portion of any fund or tax now existing, or that may hereafter be raised or levied for educational purposes, shall be appropriated to, or used, by, or in aid of, any church, sectarian or denominational school."

It is conceded by appellant that the young lady teachers were without the necessary certificates which would authorize their employment as teachers in the common school system of the State; but it does not follow that, because they could not be employed as teachers for pay, they might not teach in the public schools without pay. It is abundantly established by the evidence in this case, that these ladies were eminently qualified to teach young children, this being a branch of pedagogy for which they were especially educated and by nature adapted. We are unable to see how their employment violates either the letter or the spirit of the statute, which forbids the employment of any one as a teacher who is without the required certificate. The reason and spirit of the statute is, that the public money, devoted to educational purposes, shall not be squandered on incompetent teachers, and the certificate is a guaranty of the qualification of the teacher. The statutory requirement is undoubtedly a wise and useful provision, but it was not intended to prevent charitable persons from donating their services to the education of the common school children. If one skilled in the teaching of music or drawing were so philanthropically disposed as to be willing to teach the children music or drawing, without any charge to the State, or the district, it would hardly be supposed that this would not be permitted because the specialist in question did not have the statutory certificate authorizing his general employment as a teacher in a public school. Philanthropy is not so prevalent in our State that laws have to be enacted to forbid its exercise. The record before us establishes, without any sort of contradiction, that the authorities of Union College, finding themselves under contract with the young ladies in question, and being unable to employ them in their own school, donated their services to the use of the pupils of graded common schools in district No. 1. Nor do we think the evidence in this case authorizes the inference that there was any connection, direct or indirect, near or remote, between Union College and the graded school. It is shown in the testimony, and not denied, that the appellee was present at the opening of the public school in September, 1906; that he made a speech there, in which he congratulated the district upon its good fortune in securing the services of so able a body of teachers, and complimented the trustees upon their zeal and fidelity in inaugurating the school under such auspicious surroundings. We are not advised as to why he changed, so radically, his position with reference to this school, for he bears able testimony, that he had never had a better school under his charge as superintendent than that which he seeks to destroy in this litigation.

It can not be controverted, that the statute forbids the employment, as teachers in the common schools, of persons who do not hold certificates showing them competent to teach. But we hold that the provision does not forbid the trustees from accepting the aid of teachers whose services are given gratuitously. Altruism is not within the inhibition of the statute. Nor can it be denied, that the Constitution forbids the diversion of any money raised by taxation for public education into the coffers of any denominational school; but we have read this record several times, with the utmost care, and have failed to find the slightest evidence of any intention to pay one cent of the fund involved here to Union College, or to any one connected therewith, or to either of the Misses Weaver. On the contrary, the uncontradicted testimony shows that every dollar of it will be paid (and is due) to Profs. Reibold, Faulkner and Jones, who were employed by the trustees to teach the school during the session of 1906-1907. No one disputes that these men were qualified in every way to teach in the public school, or that they carried out their contract with the utmost fidelity. It is conceded that the character of their work was of the highest class, and that every white child in the district, within the pupil age, who desired to attend school, was received and taught.

So far from putting the public school under sectarian influences, the evidence shows that nearly all of the trustees are members of, or sympathizers with denominations other than the Methodist Church. Not one of the teachers in question, including the young ladies, were shown to be members of, or sympathizers with that denomination. The truth is, the appellee's defense, so far as the constitutional point is concerned, is merely suspicion, based upon very small and insignificant circumstances. Among others, he showed that there were two very poor young men trying to work their way through Union College; that President Easley persuaded the trustees to hire these boys, at eight dollars per month each, to act as janitors in the school. It is not denied that the services of a janitor were needed, or charged that the young men did not faithfully earn the pittance paid them; but the fact that they were students at Union College at the time of the employment, seems to have presaged all the evils of a union of church and State. Again, owing to the fact that appellee wrongfully withheld from the treasurer the money with which to operate the school, the trustees were unable to pay Prof. Reibold his salary; and in order that this able educator might continue his work, President Easley persuaded his board to advance his salary, taking his obligation to repay it out of the money coming from the State. But for this generous action by the board, doubtless the deadly thrust aimed by the appellee at the existence of the school, would have been fatal in its consequences.

In conclusion, perhaps no higher encomium could be paid the character of the school involved here than is contained in the opinion of the learned trial judge, whose judgment we are reviewing. After setting out the arrangement we have detailed above, he said: "Under this arrangement, in connection with Profs. Reibold, Faulkner and Jones, a most excellent school has been conducted for some seven months in the graded school building. It has given almost universal satisfaction in the town of Barbourville; in fact, I might say, that the school for this year, has been the best ever conducted in the city of Barbourville. * * * The proof shows, I think, that every child within the school age of Barbourville graded school district, has had an opportunity to attend this school free. I regard it as the very greatest of misfortunes to the people and the children of Barbourville if they should lose this school; but it is a misfortune not of my making. I think that the defendant would much better have administered to the interests of the people of Barbourville if he had sought to have avoided this issue, rather than to raise it; but that is a matter for him—not for me—to decide."

We are of opinion that Profs. Reibold, Faulkner and Jones had a valid contract with the trustees of graded school No. 1, of Barbourville, to teach for them during the school session of 1906-1907; that they earned this money by honest and faithful work; that the evidence shows conclusively that all of it is due and will be paid to them, and none of it will ever go to Union College, or any one connected with it, nor to either of the young ladies who lacked the required certificates to qualify them to teach in the public schools. These professors were in nowise to blame, even if we assume (which was not shown) that some of the acts of the trustees were irregular or improper. Having faithfully performed their contract, and the district having received the benefit of their services, they can not be deprived, by any defense based on suspicion, of the reward justly due them.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in conformity with the prayer of the petition.

1. Taxation—Tax on Dogs—Act Regulating Sheep Industry by Taxing Dogs—The act of the Kentucky Legislature, approved March 1, 1906, entitled "An act to promote the sheep industry and to provide a tax on dogs," means that it is an act to promote the sheep industry by providing a tax on dogs, and is, therefore, not inimical to section 51, of the Constitution, providing that "no law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title.

2. Same—Statute—Police Regulation—Remuneration for Sheep Killed by Dogs—The act is not a revenue statute, but is a police regulation, in that its object is to remunerate the owners of the sheep for any losses they may suffer by the killing of their sheep by dogs, and the license imposed was intended to be a regulation of dogs and in this way to promote the sheep industry.

3. Ownership of Dogs—Legislature—Regulation—Dogs are an appropriate subject of regulation under the police power of the State. It is within the power of the Legislature to prohibit their ownership entirely and to provide, where their ownership is allowed, any regulation which the legislative discretion may impose.

4. Special Privileges—Public Services—The statute does not confer any special privileges on the owners of sheep, but merely protects these owners from the destruction of their property by dogs, and, therefore, it is not inimical to section 3, of the Bill of Rights, forbidding the grant of exclusive privileges to any man, or set of men, except in consideration of public services.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

This action was instituted by appellees, citizens of Carter county, Kentucky, and owners of dogs, to test the validity of an act of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, approved March 1, 1906, entitled "An act to promote the sheep industry and to provide a tax on dogs." By the first and second sections of the act a license tax of one dollar per capita is required to be assessed upon every dog four months old within the Commonwealth, which the owner of the animal is required to pay. This tax is required to be levied and collected as are other taxes, and paid over to the State Treasurer, but to be kept separate from the other public accounts and taxes by the Auditor and Treasurer. The funds thus raised are declared to be for the purpose of indemnifying losses by the killing or injuring of sheep by dogs. The third and fourth sections of the act provide how the losses by the killing of sheep by dogs shall be proved and paid; and if there be any surplus after paying all losses occurring by the killing of sheep by dogs, it shall be paid over to the school fund of the county in which it was assessed. There are several other provisions of the act, but a consideration of them is not necessary to an adjudication of its validity.

The petition sets forth the act and the fact that it was about to be enforced by the sheriff and assessor of Carter county, and prays for an injunction restraining these officers from its enforcement on the ground of its invalidity. A general demurrer to the petition was overruled, and, the officers declining to plead further, a judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the petition; and from this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The first objection to the act is, that its title is inimical to section 51, of the Constitution, which provides that "no law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title;" it being said that the title of this act relates to two separate subjects of legislation, and is, therefore, invalid. If the act under consideration does relate to two subjects, it goes without saying that it is void as a whole. But we do not agree that the title before us relates to two subjects. The subject-matter of the act is the promotion of the sheep industry, and this is to be accomplished by the imposition of a tax on dogs. No other attempt to promote the sheep industry is indicated by any provision in the act taken as a whole. It may be that the title to the act is somewhat awkwardly expressed. What it really means is, that it is an act to promote the sheep industry by providing a tax on dogs, and when thus read, all duality disappears.

A second objection to the act is, that it is violative of section 171, of the Constitution, in that the taxes imposed are not collected for public purposes; and, third, it is invalid because in violation of sections 172 and 174, of the Constitution, which require all property in the Commonwealth, not exempted from taxation by the Constitution, to be assessed at its fair cash value and taxed in proportion thereto. These two objections may be considered together, and they involve a most important part of the claim that the act is invalid.

The first question to be determined is, whether or not the statute before us is a revenue statute, or whether it was enacted for the purpose of police regulation. That it was not intended as a revenue statute is obvious from the most superficial reading. The title declares the purpose of the enactment to be the promotion of the sheep industry by the levy of a tax on dogs, and the body of the act shows clearly that its object is to remunerate the owners of sheep for any losses they may suffer by the killing of their sheep by dogs. The license tax imposed, then, was intended by the Legislature to be a regulation of dogs, and in this way to promote the sheep industry.

This confronts us with the question as to whether or not it is within the competency of the Legislature to regulate dogs in the manner undertaken to be done in the statute before us. That dogs are an appropriate subject of regulation, under the police power of the State, is established by an overwhelming weight of judicial authority; and unquestionably it is entirely within the power of the Legislature to prohibit the ownership of dogs at all, and to provide, where their ownership is allowed, any regulation which the legislative discretion may impose. No where has this doctrine been asserted with greater clearness than by our own court.

In the case of Bradford v. McKibben, 4 Bush, 545, an act was upheld which authorized the killing of any dog found on the premises of a neighbor without the presence of its owner or keeper. In its opinion, the court said: "Whatever may be the temptations, therefore, to entice a dog from home without the presence of his owner or keeper, even though it be for the propagation of his species, his innocence is no protection to him; if he is found roaming on a neighbor's premises, without the presence of his protector, his life is forfeited, if the owner of the premises on which he is found will exact the penalty, and choose to execute the sentence."

In the case of Commonwealth v. Markham, 7 Bush, 486, an ordinance of the city of Frankfort provides: "That all persons owning or controlling dogs within the city of Frankfort are hereby required annually, on the 10th day of April, to apply to the city clerk to register, and procure a brass collar, duly stamped, for each dog, and pay to the clerk at the time of registry a tax of two dollars for every dog so owned and registered; which tax the clerk shall pay into the city treasury. Any person failing to comply with the provisions of this ordinance shall, on conviction before the police judge, be fined the sum of five dollars for each day of failure, and for each dog owned or controlled by him, not registered as aforesaid. The marshal or any police officer shall forthwith kill any dog found upon the streets without such collar so procured from the city clerk." The charter of the city of Frankfort only authorized the council to levy ad valorem taxes on the real and personal estate of its citizens for local revenue; so that if the ordinance was for revenue only, it was void as being contrary to the charter. The court held that the act was sanitary and not for revenue, and upheld the ordinance under the police power delegated to the city by its charter. In the opinion it is said:

"Presuming that the owners of worthless or pestilent dogs would not pay such a tax for such a license, the expulsion or destruction of inferior or dangerous dogs, as well as protection to the useful class, was the constructive aim of this enactment by the council. The purpose was sanitary and not fiscal. How far the end may be accomplished by the means prescribed is for the municipality, and not the judiciary, to decide. And this court can not adjudge that because a more adaptable expedient, molded in better form, might have been chosen, that which has been adopted was unauthorized."

In the case of Sentell v. New Orleans, &c., Railroad Co., 698, the the Supreme Court of the United States upheld as constitutional a law of the State of Louisiana, requiring dogs to be placed upon the assessment rolls, and limiting any recovery by the owner to the value fixed by himself for the purpose of taxation. The court, through Mr. Justice Brown, in a very learned opinion, discusses in a broad and philosophic manner the whole subject of the property in dogs, and the question as to whether or not, and how far, these animals are subject to the police power of the State. The rule as to the right of the State to prohibit the keeping of dogs is thus stated: "Even if it were assumed that dogs are property in the fullest sense of the word, they would still be subject to the police power of the State, and might be destroyed or otherwise dealt with, as in the judgment of the Legislature is necessary for the protection of its citizens. That a State, in a bona fide exercise of its police power, may interfere with private property, and even order its destruction, is as well settled as any legislative power can be, which has for its objects the welfare and comfort of the citizen. For instance, meats, fruits and vegetables do not cease to become private property by their decay; but it is clearly within the power of the State to order their destruction in times of epidemic, or whenever they are so exposed as to be deleterious to the public health. There is also property in rags and clothing; but that does not stand in the way of their destruction in case they become infected and dangerous to the public health. No property is more sacred than one's home, and yet a house may be pulled down or blown up by the public authorities, if necessary to avert or stay a general conflagration, and that, too, without recourse against such authorities for the trespass." (Bowditch v. Boston, 101 U. S., 16; Mouse's Case, 12 Coke, 63; Governor, &c. v. Meredith, 4 T. R., 794; Stone v. The Mayor, &c., 25 Wend., 157; Russell v. The Mayor, &c., 2 Denio, 461.)

To the same effect is Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass., 136; Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H., 373.

In 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, title Police Power, page 930, it is said: "The police power of the State has been used to a greater extent to regulate and control the keeping of, and property in, dogs than any other class of domestic animals. And statutes requiring the payment of a license fee, sometimes denominated a tax, for the keeping of dogs, are very usual, as also are provisions requiring all dogs running at large to be muzzled. And the police power has even been held to extend to authorizing the summary killing of dogs found running at large contrary to law."

Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th edition, page 881, in note 3, thus summarizes the law on the subject in hand: "Dogs are subject to such regulations as the Legislature may prescribe, and it is not unconstitutional to authorize their destruction, without previous adjudication, when found at large without being licensed and collared according to the statutory regulation. (Authorities omitted.) As a measure of internal police, the State has the power to encourage the keeping of sheep, and to discourage the keeping of dogs, by imposing a penalty upon the owner of a dog for keeping the same. (Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind., 62.) Or, by imposing a dog tax for a fund to indemnify sheep owners for losses suffered from dogs." (Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich., 139; 9 N. W., 246.)

In the case of City of Carthage v. August Rhodes, 9 L. R. A., 352, the Supreme Court of Missouri upheld an ordinance of the city of Carthage licensing dogs and cats, and providing for their being impounded or destroyed if found running at large, contrary to the ordinance. In the opinion it was said: "Taxation may be for the purpose of raising revenue, or for the purpose of regulation. Where for the purpose of raising revenue, or for the purpose of regulation, it is an exercise of the police power of the State. They are both distinct co-existent powers in the State, and either, or both, may be exercised through a municipal corporation. In this case, by the terms of the charter, both powers are granted to the city of Carthage as to the dogs of that city. The dog-license tax required by its ordinance is easily referable to the exercise of the police power granted."

In the case of Fox v. Mohawk & Hudson River Humane Society, 51 L. R. A., 681, the Court of Appeals of New York upheld a statute of that State which authorized the humane society to kill unlicensed dogs without notice to the owner and without any judicial proceeding.

From the foregoing authorities, and upon principle, we are of opinion that the regulation of dogs is within the police power of the State, and that it is competent for the Legislature to prohibit the keeping of dogs entirely, or, if it is necessary for the public welfare, any other regulation may be adopted which, to the Legislature, may seem most expedient for the promotion of that end. We are also of opinion that, the statute not being for revenue, but an exercise of the police power, its provisions are not regulated by any section of the Constitution relating to fiscal matters, and, although the sum required to be paid by the owner of each dog four months old is called a tax, and it is required to be assessed by the assessor, collected by the sheriff and paid over to the State Treasurer, this is only a mode of regulating the dog within the State, and protecting the sheep industry to the extent that the burden imposed will result in the destruction of worthless and dangerous dogs and create a fund to pay losses for the destruction of sheep by dogs. We do not think it can be doubted that, if it is competent for the Legislature to prohibit the ownership of dogs, or to prohibit them running at large, it is also competent for it to impose any other regulation which, in its wisdom, is best adapted to promote the sheep industry. Therefore, it seems to us competent for the Legislature to say to the owners of dogs in the State: "You may own dogs, and you may permit them to run at large, but you must, as a condition precedent to this privilege, provide a fund by which their ravages on sheep may be paid for." That the State may do this legitimately, seems quite clear, unless we are prepared to say that the less is not included in the greater, or a part in the whole. Surely, if dogs be destroyed altogether, or their ownership prohibited, any less drastic legislation is entirely within the competency of the Legislature.

It is true, in the case of Commonwealth v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky., 681, it was held that, in our State, the common law rule that dogs were not property has been modified or abrogated by statutes which tax them and thus recognize them as property. Dogs are, therefore, made property by statute; and when these animals, which were not property at the common law, are raised to the dignity of property by the statute, it is entirely competent for the Legislature to fix such conditions as it chooses. The statute before us, which makes dogs property, requires, as a condition precedent, that the owners of them shall pay a tax, the proceeds of which will insure sheep raisers against the effect of their ravages. That this can be done constitutionally, is sustained by the great weight of authority.

In the case of Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St., 340, the law imposing a per capita tax on dogs, and appropriating the funds so created for the purpose of paying any loss occurring to the owners of sheep by the killing of the property by dogs, was upheld as a valid and constitutional exercise of the police power of the State. To the same effect is Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind., 62; Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich., 183; Ex Parte Cooper, 3 Tex. Ct. App., 489; Cole v. Hall, 103 Iowa, 30; Longyear v. Buck, 10 L. R. A., 43; Freund on Police Powers, section 434; State Regulation of Personal Property (Tiedeman), pages 845-846.

Nor do we think the act is inimical to that portion of section 3. of the Bill of Rights, which provides: * * * "And no grant of exclusive, separate, public emoluments or privileges shall be made to any man, or set of men, except in consideration of public services." * * * As we view it, the statute does not confer any special privilege on the owners of sheep. It merely protects these owners from the destruction of their property by dogs. It is the duty of the State to protect every citizen in his life, liberty and property; and it certainly is within the competency of the Legislature to exercise the police power of the State to protect all property against the ravages of destructive animals. The question as to how this is to be done, and what property is to be so protected, is a matter of legislative discretion. Undoubtedly the sheep industry is a most important one to the whole State. All of our citizens are interested in an industry which supplies the market with wholesome meat, provides means of obtaining warm and comfortable clothing, and at the same time furnishes labor to the otherwise unemployed. It is only necessary to allude to this phase of the question; the importance of the industry as a whole is most obvious. It is equally obvious that sheep are peculiarly liable to the ravages of dogs. They have neither the fleetness to escape, nor the courage to defend themselves from attack, and their silent suffering enables the dog to prey upon them without any danger that the owner will be warned of the destruction of his property by the outcry of the dying animal. No other domestic animal that we can call to mind is so liable to destruction by dogs as the sheep. It, therefore, seems to us clearly the duty of the State, if the furtherance of the sheep industry is a desirable end, to so regulate the ownership of dogs as to protect the sheep from destruction by these animals. The statute is certainly a reasonable one, and lays but a small burden upon the owner of each dog; and in effect it only requires the owner to make good the damage done by his property. The fact that sheep are generally killed at night when it is impossible to ascertain the owner of the dog committing the ravage, makes it necessary, if protection is to be had through this channel at all, that each owner of a dog shall be required to contribute a small amount to a common fund dedicated to the remuneration of owners of sheep killed by unknown dogs. As said before, this is simply requiring the owners of dogs to make good the ravages of dangerous animals kept by them; and no citizen has just cause of complaint, if he keeps animals destructive to the property of others, that he is required to make good the damage done by them. The statute, in truth, is but an enforcement of the maxim sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas; and, as such, its constitutionality is beyond successful question.

Thus far we have rested the right of the Legislature to provide a fund for the payment of losses of sheep by the ravages of dogs, alone upon the police power of the State, but in the case of Kentucky Live Stock Breeders' Association v. Hager, Auditor, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 518, we upheld an act which appropriated fifteen thousand dollars per annum, from the funds in the public treasury raised by taxation, to provide for the improvement and development of live stock, agricultural and kindred interests by the establishment and maintenance of a State Fair. In the opinion, in responding to the objection to the act, that the money appropriated was not for a public purpose, it was said: "It is also insisted that a State Fair is not a public purpose for which the money of the State may be appropriated by the Legislature, and that the act merely gives a bounty of fifteen thousand dollars to appellant. The appropriation to the World's Fair was sustained by this court (Norman v. Board of Managers, 93 Ky., 537), and if the Legislature may appropriate money in aid of a fair held in another State to properly represent the State in such a fair, it is hard to see how a fair held within the State to make an exhibit of the products of the State is not equally a public purpose. Such legislation has been sustained by the current of authority in the other States of the Union having constitutions substantially the same as ours." (Daggett v. Colgan, 92 Cal., 53; State v. Cornell, Neb., 74 N. W., 61; Charpless v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. St., 147; City of Minneapolis v. Janney, 90 N. W., 312; Downing v. Indiana State Board of Agriculture, 129 Ind., 443; Shelby County v. Tennessee Centennial Exposition, 26 S. W., 694; Bennington v. Park, 50 Vt., 178.)

"In House of Reform v. City of Lexington, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1470, and Children's Home Society v. Hager, Auditor, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 1135, we held that the State might appropriate money to a public purpose, and make an existing corporation its agent for the disbursement of the appropriation just as it may appoint other agencies for this purpose. We adhere to the rule laid down in those cases for the reasons there given."

It would be difficult to point out a difference in principle between promoting any one agricultural interest and the promoting of all agricultural interests, in so far as being a public purpose is concerned. If the whole State may be taxed for the purpose of maintaining a State fair to exhibit the various agricultural interests, we are unable to see why it may not be taxed to prevent the destruction of sheep by dogs. But we are not driven to resting the case upon this latter principle, as we are convinced that the police power of the State affords a firm foundation upon which to base our opinion in upholding the act involved in this litigation.

The act which we herein construe does not fix, by its terms, the compensation to the sheriff for collecting the tax, and we are asked to say in this opinion how the officers are to be remunerated. The act provides that the license tax shall be assessed and collected as other taxes, and we are of opinion that the Legislature intended the officers to be paid in the same way, and at the same rate at which they are remunerated for the collection of revenue taxes; that is, for the purpose of ascertaining the remuneration due the officers, the gross amount of the dog tax collected shall be added to the total amount of the revenue tax collected, and, upon the whole, the officers' remuneration shall be fixed by the terms of section 4148, of the Kentucky Statutes; ten per cent. on the first five thousand dollars of the total, and four per cent. upon the residue, the total amount of the remuneration of the officer not to exceed the sum of five thousand dollars.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the petition, and for other procedure consistent herewith.

MORGAN, &c. v. COMBS, &c.

(Filed June 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Greene & Van Winkle for appellants.

Wm. Cromwell for appellees.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Judge Settle delivered the following response to petition for rehearing and modification:

Upon the return of this case to the court below, if it should turn out, as claimed by appellees, that William Ward is in possession and the rightful owner of the land by bona fide purchase, which appellants intended to convey, and believed they were conveying to appellee, W. J. Combs (although that fact nowhere appears in this record), the court, instead of adjudging a reformation of the deed in controversy by a conveyance from appellants to W. J. Combs of the land now claimed to be owned by William Ward, should simply cancel the deed heretofore made to W. J. Combs and rescind the contract of sale, in which event appellants should return to W. J. Combs the value, in money, of the horse exchanged by the latter for the lot intended to be conveyed, as of the date of the sale, with interest thereon, and Combs should be made to account for the reasonable rental value of the lot during the time he has had it in possession; the latter to be given a lien upon the lot for the value of the horse, and if appellants fail to pay same the lien may be enforced to pay such sum, if any, as may be found to be due Combs after charging him with the rent.

Polly Ward should still be allowed to remove from the lot in controversy the buildings she placed thereon. But if it should turn out that Wm. Ward is not in possession and is not the rightful owner of the lot, really purchased by appellee, W. J. Combs, of appellants, the lower court, upon return of the case, should simply carry out the directions contained in the opinion.

To the extent above indicated, the opinion is modified. In other respects the petition is overruled.

PITTSBURG, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO & ST. LOUIS RY. CO.
v. DARLINGTON'S ADM'X.

(Filed June 17, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Railroads—Death Caused by Collision of Trains—Action Against Both Railroads—Verdict Against One—Wrong Name Given in Verdict—Judgment Thereon—Validity—H. D. was killed in a collision between the trains of the P., C., C. & St. Louis Ry. Co. and the L. & N. R. R. Co. In an action by his administratrix against both roads the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury find a verdict for the plaintiff to the amount of ten thousand dollars, and fix the blame on the Pennsylvania Railroad Company." The Pennsylvania Railroad Company was not a party to the action, but the evidence showed that the defendant, P., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., though a separate corporation, was a subsidiary corporation of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and was, on the trial, called by the latter name. Held—That the lower court properly rendered a judgment on the verdict against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Co., sometimes called the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

2. Same—Verdict of Jury—Intent—Duty of Court in Ascertaining—The intent of a jury is to be sought in the language they use in their verdict in the light of the record, and resort may be had to the pleadings and other parts of the record to see what the jury meant by their verdict. The court is at liberty, in the absence of a stenographic report, to consult his recollection of the evidence, as well as the file of the court in order to understand what the jury meant by their verdict.

3. Action Against Two Defendants—Verdict as to One—Effect as to the Other—Where two defendants are sued and the jury returns a verdict against one of them the effect of the verdict is to release the other.

Chas H. Gibson for appellant.

Ira Julian and Forcht & Fields for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Hugh Darlington was killed in a collision between a train operated by appellant and one operated by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, which were using the same track. His administratrix sued both the railroad companies to recover damages for the destruction of his life, charging each with negligence. The result of the trial, which was conducted, so far as the court's rulings went, in unobjectionable manner, was the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find a verdict for the plaintiff to the amount of ten thousand dollars, and fix the blame on the Pennsylvania Railroad Company."

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company was not sued in the action. But the appellant, though a separate corporation, is a subsidiary corporation of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Both are owned by a common owner, the Pennsylvania Company. It was a common thing for appellant to be called "The Pennsylvania Railroad," as being a part of that system and so classed in popular understanding. During the progress of the case before the jury it was alluded to several score times by counsel and witnesses as "The Pennsylvania Railroad Company," or as "The Panhandle," the latter being also a popular, and probably an advertised name of appellant's route. It was rarely called by its true name during the trial. The issues being tried by the jury were two: One, whether the death of Darlington was due to the negligence of the defendants, or to his own negligence; the other, if not to the negligence of both the defendants, but was due to the negligence of either, which was to blame?

The instructions submitted these issues in apt language. The trial lasted two days. The jury's verdict shows, first, that they found for the plaintiff ten thousand dollars, thereby finding the fact to be that decedent did not come to his death by his own negligence; and that under the measure of recovery submitted by the court, $10,000.00 was fixed as the value of the life which was destroyed. The only thing remaining then for them to do was to say whether either company was alone guilty of the negligence which resulted in the injury, as otherwise both would have been liable, and the judgment would have gone against them jointly. In language not artistic, but leaving no doubt of the jury's meaning, they "fixed the blame" on one of the defendants alone, thereby exonerating the other. If appellant's proper name had been written in the place of "Pennsylvania Railroad Company" there would have been no room for contesting the sufficiency of the verdict.

Jurors are gathered from every walk of life. Very frequently, perhaps most generally, they are not men of literary learning. Their choice of expressions is very apt to be not exact, their verdicts being frequently ungrammatical and rarely couched in the terminology of the law. Hence courts view the findings of the jury with great leniency, and every reasonable presumption is indulged in aid of a general verdict. The main thing is to get an understanding of what the jury intended. Their intent is to be sought for in the language they used in their verdict, interpreted in the light of the record. Resort may be had to the pleadings, or other parts of the record to see what the jury meant by their verdict. (Brannin & Smith v. Force's adm'r, 12 B. Monroe, 506; Miller v. Shackelford, 4 Dana, 264; Pickett v. Pickett, 2 Bibb, 178; Warford v. Osbil, 1 Bibb, 247; Adams v. Landrum, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 287; Buckeye Engine Co. v. Buckwatter, 61 S. W., 263; 22 Ency. Pl. and Pr., 955-959; Lee v. Bradway, 25 Ia., 216; Red River and L. & N. Co. v. Strue, 32 Minn., 95; Austin Water, Light & Power Co. v. Makenson [Tex.], 27 S. W., 588.)

Appellant concedes that the record may be looked to in the interpretation of the verdict. But it contends that the record does not include the evidence, but is only that part which constitutes the roll and which is consequently preserved in writing before the court. Under the practice in this State the evidence may be taken, by order of the court, by the court's official stenographic reporter, and is made, when so taken, a part of the record in the case. (Sec. 4639, Ky. Stat.) But we are inclined to the opinion that, in the absence of such statute, the court was at liberty to consult his recollection of the evidence, as well as the files of the court, in order to understand what the jury meant by their verdict. The reason for admitting the latter admits the former also. In the case of Buckeye Engine Company v. Buckwatter, supra, we said:

"Under the evidence and instructions the verdict of the jury, 'We, the jury, agree and set aside the amount sued for,' clearly means that the jury found against appellant on the account."

It was there held that the usual expression in the reported cases, "a verdict is good if its meaning may be understood in the light of the record," included the evidence in the case. For that matter the instructions of the court to the jury may not become a part of the record until identified by a properly signed bill of exceptions. Nor, in some instances, can the evidence be. Nevertheless, both are before the trial court, and within his knowledge. He may, and should, have resorted to either as well as to any other part of the record, in arriving at the jury's meaning so that it might correctly be carried out in the judgment which is to be entered upon the verdict. The court will then, if necessary to perfect the record, and to sustain the verdict, require the record to be completed by a properly prepared bill of exceptions, or bill of evidence, as was done in this case, so as to show truly what had occurred in the trial.

In the verdict above quoted the word "blame" is spelled "plame." The verdict was written by a German-American. No one is in doubt as to the meaning of the word, whether spelled correctly or spelled phonetically according to its writer's pronunciation.

On the whole we have no doubt that the jury intended to find, and did find, by the verdict, against appellant. The name given it may be regarded as its nickname or alias. There can be no rational doubt as to the certainty of their meaning in this matter, in the light of the record, including the evidence. The court, in rendering judgment upon the verdict adjudged the plaintiff to recover $10,000.00 and costs "against the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company, sometimes called the Pennsylvania Railroad Company," which we think was not an improper form of judgment, and fully explains what might otherwise, at first glance, seem an inconsistency between the verdict and judgment.

Appellant also complains that the verdict was incomplete in that it did not pass upon the question of the liability of the defendant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. But we think it did. The effect of the verdict, and the evident intent of the jury was to find that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was not negligent in the matter. It was equivalent to a verdict in its behalf, and the judgment should have been accordingly. (I. C. R. R. Company v. Murphy, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 93; 97 S. W., 729; Handley v. Lawley, 90 Ala., 527; Maynard v. Pordar, 75 Ga., 654.) But whether the Louisville & Nashville Company may not have ground for complaint because a judgment was not rendered in its behalf on this verdict, is not ground for complaint by this appellant. (I. C. R. R. Co. v. Murphy, supra.)

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF NEWPORT v. EBERT.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Jailers—Fees Allowed—Ordinances of Second Class Cities—Diverting Fees—Public Policy—By Kentucky Statutes, section 3145, part of charter of second class cities, the compensation of jailers of such cities is fixed at not less than $1,500 nor more than $2,500 per annum. Section 1730, Kentucky Statutes, allows certain compensation for dieting prisoners and other fees. By an ordinance of the city of N. (a second-class city), the salary of the jailer was fixed at $1,800 payable in monthly installments, and provided that the jailer shall account to the city at 20 cents per day for each prisoner other than those from said city. Held—That where a city fixes the fees of a jailer for more than $1,500 the jailer must look to his fees for the sum so fixed in excess of $1,500, as it would be contrary to public policy to permit the city to divert to its own use the fees allowed for taking care of persons other than its own.

C. T. Baker for appellant.

Wm. U. Warren for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing

Appellee, Christian Ebert, was, on the 5th day of November, 1907 at the regular election held in the city of Newport, on that day, duly and regularly elected city jailer by the qualified voters of said city for a term of four years. Newport is a city of the second class. The General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, by an act approved March 6th, 1902, provided that the compensation of such jailer shall not be less than $1,500, nor more than $2,500 per annum. This act is section 3145, of the Kentucky Statutes, of 1903, and is a part of the law or charter of cities of the second class. By an ordinance passed in November, 1907, and approved by the mayor of said city on November 29th, 1907, the general council of the city of Newport, fixed the salary of the city jailer, from and after the first Monday in January, 1908, at $1,800, payable in monthly installments of $150 each. The ordinance also provided for an allowance to the city jailer of twenty-five cents per day for keeping and dieting each city prisoner, to be paid in monthly warrants drawn upon the city treasurer. The ordinance further provided that "the jailer shall pay and account to the city in the amount of twenty cents per day for each and every prisoner, other than city of Newport prisoners, that he may receive and keep in said jail, and shall also account and pay to the city all the moneys that he may receive from said prisoners other than city of Newport prisoners."

It appears that the city jailer may and does, receive and keep the county, State and United States prisoners. By section 1730, of the Kentucky Statutes, jailers are allowed:

"For keeping and dieting prisoners in jail, when confined for an offense other than a felony or contempt of court, fifty cents per day, to be paid out of the county levy, unless confined for a breach of the by-laws or ordinances of a city or town, or for the violation of a statute, where the city or town gets the benefit of the fine; in that case to be paid by such city or town.

"For imprisoning and releasing a prisoner charged with a misdemeanor, sixty cents, to be paid out of the county levy, unless confined for a breach of the by-laws or ordinances of a city or town, or for a violation of the statute, where the city or town gets the benefit of the fine; in that case, to be paid by such city or town. And for imprisoning and releasing a prisoner charged with a felony, sixty cents, to be paid out of the State treasury."

The United States Statutes also provide for certain fees payable to jailers who receive, diet and discharge United States prisoners.

Appellee instituted this action for the purpose of testing the validity of that part of the ordinance relating to his salary which attempts to require the city jailer to account for, and pay to the city of Newport, the fees received by him from the county of Campbell, the State of Kentucky, and the United States government, under sections 356 and 1730, of the Kentucky Statutes. The circuit court adjudged that part of the ordinance invalid, and from that judgment the city of Newport prosecutes this appeal.

It is the contention of appellant that the jail in question is a city jail, and is maintained by the city of Newport; that in fixing the salary of the city jailer, the city of Newport has the undoubted right to say that the fees payable by the county, State and United States Government shall become its property; and further, that the charter of cities of the second-class provides that the compensation of officers shall be by fixed salary, and not otherwise, and that all fees and commissions growing out of the performance of the duties thus laid upon the officers, shall revert and belong to the city. This court, however, in the case of Burke on Petition, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 358, which involved the right of the city to require a policeman to turn over to it fees allowed by the State for apprehending prisoners charged with felony, held that the foregoing provision of the charter applied only to fees, costs and commissions arising out of the performance of duties owing by the officers to the city. In discussing the matter, the court said: "In our opinion, the law, so far as it may be applicable to policemen, has reference alone to the relation between the city and these officers, and was intended to silence conclusively any claim such officers might assert against the city for services rendered in its behalf, of whatever nature. We do not believe it to have been the intention of the Legislature to authorize the cities to convert to their use the fees allowed by the State to these peace officers for the arrest of felons. This would conduce to take away the incentive for the execution of the criminal laws of the Commonwealth—a matter in which the State, rather than the city as such, has a special interest."

The fees allowed by the Commonwealth and United States government are for the benefit of the jailer, who may and does receive State and Federal prisoners. The office of jailer is as important in the administration of justice as that of the policeman. It is the duty of the jailer to receive, properly diet, and finally discharge the prisoners committed to his care. The fees allowed him are an incentive to the faithful performance of such duties. If the city had the right to divert a portion of the fees allowed by the State and Federal governments to its own use, it would also have the right to divert all of the fees. The State and Federal governments are interested in seeing that their prisoners are properly cared for. If the fees allowed by them, to the jailer, should be diverted by the city, it might, and probably would, result in a lack of care and attention on the part of the jailer to such prisoners. As such fees are allowed to the jailer, and as the purpose of their allowance is to stimulate him to give due care and attention to the prisoners committed to his care, we think it would be contrary to public policy to permit the city of Newport to divert to its own use the fees allowed for taking care of prisoners other than its own.

By the provisions of its charter, the city of Newport must pay to the city jailer not less than $1,500. We are of opinion, however, that it may provide, where it fixes his salary in excess of this sum, as was done in the present case, that the city jailer must look to his fees for the sum so fixed in advance of $1,500; in other words, the city may arrange his salary with regard to his fees, just so long as it does not pay him a less salary than it is required by law to pay. In this case the salary was fixed at $1,800. The effect of the ordinance, therefore, is to credit the city of Newport by fees received in the sum of $300. To that extent, only, the portion of the ordinance complained of, is valid. This view of the ordinance permits the jailer to retain all the fees allowed him by law for taking care of the county, State and Federal prisoners. If these fees be less than $300, the city must pay him enough to make his salary $1,800; if they amount to more than $300, the city shall have credit to the extent of $300.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed in so far as it conflicts with the views herein expressed, and cause remanded, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MOORE v. TERRELL.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Forcible Entry and Detainer—Statute of Frauds—Appellant does not show himself entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy. His contract as one not to be performed within a year, was not in writing and was void.

S. W. Tolin and John S. Gaunt for appellant.

Appeal from Boone Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

This is a forcible entry proceeding. Appellant and appellee each claim to have leased the premises for the crop year of 1907, beginning March 1, 1907. Appellant claims to have rented the land on February 15, 1907, from the landlord, by parol contract. But he does not claim that his tenancy was to begin before February 18, 1907, and was for one year thereafter. On February 18, 1907, appellee rented the premises from the landlord by written contract for the same year. There was another tenant in possession whose term did not expire till March 1, 1907. After March 1, 1907, appellee entered into possession, and thereafter appellant entered upon his possession, which was the occasion of the writ. Prior to March 1, 1907, appellant entered by the consent of the old tenant and did some work preliminary to his taking possession under his parol lease.

The landlord denied having rented the land to appellant at all. On the trial in the country on the issue made by appellants plea of not guilty, the jury found for appellee. On the trial of the traverse in the circuit court, the jury there found the inquisition in the country was true. This appeal raises several questions as to the correctness of the trial in the circuit court, but we do not deem them important in view of our conclusion that appellant does not show himself entitled in any event to the possession. His contract being for one year (admitting it was made as he claims) the term was not to begin until some days after the contract was made, and as it was a contract not to be performed wholly within one year and was not in writing, it was void. (Greenwood v. Strother, 91 Ky., 482.) Nor was it partially executed so as to take it out of the Statute of Frauds by appellant's so called entry on February 18, 1907. That entry was upon the term of the former tenant, and was by his permission, not the landlord's. No right could be acquired by appellant as against the landlord from that fact. Appellant did not enter upon his term, but upon the former tenant's. What he did was not in execution of his contract, but in anticipation of it. The questions raised by appellant are eliminated by the situation discussed.

The judgment in favor of the appellee is affirmed.

CITY OF OWENSBORO v. SWEENEY.

(Filed June 17, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Municipal Corporations—Sprinkling Streets—Taxing Abutting Property Therefor—Validity of City Ordinance—The question for consideration in this case is, has the General Assembly of the State the power to enact a law "giving cities" the right to adopt ordinances imposing upon property abutting on the streets and public places of the city, a tax based upon the frontage of property, for the purpose of defraying the cost of sprinkling the streets and public places upon which the property abuts?

2. Constitution—Limitations—Arbitrary Power—Taxation Without Corresponding Benefit—While there is no limitation in the Constitution, upon the power to levy improvement taxes nor any definition of what an "improvement tax" is, it does not follow from this that the Legislature is so absolutely supreme that its authority can not be questioned. Arbitrary power exists nowhere in this republic.

There is a line at which the power to tax and take for special assessments must stop, and in this character of assessments we may safely say that it must stop when it goes beyond real and substantial benefits to the abutting property distinct from those enjoyed by the public.

3. Special taxes can not be levied unless the property charged receives a corresponding physical, material and substantial benefit from the exaction, upon the ground that it is an attempt to take private property without just compensation in violation of the Constitution, and we hold that sprinkling streets does not confer a special benefit upon the adjacent property in the sense of contributing to its value and hence a special tax for this purpose can not be maintained.

Geo. W. Jolly for appellant.

W. T. Ellis, C. M. Finn, Miller & Todd and C. S. Walker for appellee.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The only question we need consider in this case is, has the General Assembly of the State, the power to enact a law giving cities the right to adopt ordinances imposing upon property abutting upon the streets and public places of the city a tax based upon the frontage of the property for the purpose of defraying the cost of sprinkling the streets and public places upon which the property abuts.

It has been expressly ruled by this court in Maydwell v. Louisville, 116 Ky., 885, that an ordinance enacted in pursuance of legislative authority, levying an ad valorem tax upon property for the purpose of sprinkling the streets is not unconstitutional. The opinion was rested upon the ground that the sprinkling of streets contributes to the preservation of the public health, and hence the tax levied was for public purposes within the meaning of section 171, of the Constitution, providing that "taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only."

The reasoning of that opinion, and the conclusion therein reached, we adhere to; but there is, as we shall endeavor to show, a marked difference in principle between laying a distinct tax for this purpose upon all property of a city, or upon all of the property in a taxing district, if the city is divided into taxing districts, and levying a special tax upon real property according to its frontage.

In the case before us, the tax is not levied upon property according to its value. The value of the property is not taken into consideration. Nor is the tax apportioned to correspond with the benefits received. A vacant lot with a frontage of fifty feet, and worth only one hundred dollars, must pay the same amount of taxes as a highly improved lot with the same frontage, but worth one hundred thousand dollars. There seems to be something radically wrong with a tax that is arbitrarily assessed without any reference to the value of the property or benefits conferred, and although it is everywhere recognized that perfect equality in taxation is impossible of attainment, the fundamental theory upon which all property taxes are imposed is that the property shall contribute in proportion to its value and thus bear as near as may be, its equal share of the burden. And this theory of equality and uniformity is firmly fixed in the tax laws of this State. In more than one section of the Constitution, it is clearly expressed, that taxes shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and shall be assessed at its fair cash value, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair voluntary sale.

But it is generally agreed that these principles conceded to be sound, only apply to taxes collected for the purpose of defraying the expenses made necessary in the conduct of the governmental affairs of a city, and have no application to special taxes assessed for improvements, such as streets, sidewalks, gutters and sewers. It is recognized by all the courts, including our own, that a municipality may lay a tax upon abutting land for purposes of local improvement, and the tax may be asserted according to the frontage of the property without regard to its value. (Gosnell v. City of Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 510; Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 752.) This manner of assessment and taxation in many instances works a gross injustice upon the property owners, as under it, a vacant lot, practically worthless, may be burdened with the same tax as an adjacent highly improved and valuable lot. But, as this method of taxation, under legislative authority, has now become too firmly established to even question its soundness, all that remains for the courts is to restrain the power within proper and reasonable limits. And this restrictive supervision is made necessary by the growing disposition of municipal bodies to extend it to embrace many subjects not contemplated in its origin.

The question of municipal taxation is one of the most important and intricate public questions of the day. Municipal authorities as a rule are disposed to be liberal in the imposition of taxes, and do not seem disturbed by the ever increasing burden of indebtedness that is accumulating upon the cities of the country. Fortunately, the Constitution of this State has placed a check upon the extravagant expenditure of public moneys and has fixed a limit beyond which a general property tax for public purposes can not go, unless assented to by the voters at an election held for that purpose. But this valuable and salutary limitation would afford little protection if, under the guise of improving property, special taxes might be levied without let or hinderance, and without regard to the constitutional limitations which do not apply to this method of taxation. If the right to lay these special assessments can be extended to embrace any subject which the municipal authorities with the aid of the Legislature deem it expedient to reach, it will soon come to pass that the wise safeguards of the Constitution will afford slight security to the taxpayer. To evade them, it will only be necessary for the municipal authorities to place the burden upon abutting owners under the pretense that it is an improvement tax and hence may be charged in addition to the property tax imposed. Under this plan or scheme, should it be held allowable, if the general property tax in a city has reached the limit and no larger sum can be gathered from this source, the city council may, by charging some of the current expenses of the city to abutting owners, divert to other uses, the amount theretofore expended for this purpose out of the property tax collected. To illustrate, if the cost of maintaining the police department of a city is ten thousand dollars, and this sum has been paid out of the revenue derived from a general property tax, and the Legislature can give the city the right to charge this item of expence against the abutting property owners, upon the ground that it is conferring a special benefit upon them in the preservation of the peace, order and quiet of the city, then this ten thousand dollars may be applied to other purposes. And so, if the fire department cost annually twenty thousand dollars, and the city had appropriated this sum from the general revenue collected, it could, if so authorized, charge it against the property owners, and thus have this additional sum to use in other ways. And thus, the matter might be extended, until the taxation, general and special, upon real property would far exceed the constitutional limit, and the property owners be helpless. If property can be charged under a special tax with the expense of sprinkling the streets, upon the ground that it is an improvement, beneficial to the property, we see no reason why it may not be charged with the cost of maintaining the fire department, the police department, and the water and lighting system of the city, as it is more important that the city should have police and fire protection, and a supply of water and light, than that the streets should be sprinkled. Indeed, there is more force and propriety in the argument that abutting property would receive more benefits from police, fire, water and light than it would from sprinkling.

But, in answer to all this, the argument is made that in the absence of constitutional limitation, the Legislature is supreme and to its wisdom and discretion, must be left the settlement of these questions.

It is true, there is no limitation in the Constitution upon the power to levy improvement taxes, nor definition of what an "improvement tax" is, but it does not follow from this that the Legislature is so absolutely supreme that its authority can not be questioned. Arbitrary power exists nowhere in this republic. There is a line at which the power to tax and take for special assessments must stop. The only question is where to draw it. And in the character of tax under consideration, we may safely say that it must stop when it goes beyond real and substantial benefits to the abutting property, distinct from those enjoyed by the public.

The theory upon which special taxes are sustained, is that the property assessed receives special benefits in addition to those received by the community at large. This, says Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, in section 761:

"Is the true and only just foundation upon which local assessments can rest. And to the extent of special benefits, it is everywhere admitted that the Legislature may authorize local taxes or assessments to be made."

Cooley on Taxation, section 1153, lays it down that:

"There can be no justification for any proceeding which charges the land with an assessment greater than the benefits. It is a plain case of appropriating private property to public use, without just compensation; and a clear case of abuse of legislative authority in imposing the burdens of a public improvement on persons or property not specially benefited, would undoubtedly be treated as an excess of power and void."

The Supreme Court of the United States in Illinois Central R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 147 U. S., 190, 37 L. Ed., 134, in discussing the difference between general taxes and special taxes, said:

"On the other hand, special assessments or special taxes proceed upon the theory that when a local improvement enhances the value of neighboring property, that property should pay for the improvement." And quotes with approval from Cooley on Taxation, the following:

"Special assessments, on the other hand, are made upon the assumption that a portion of the community is to be especially or peculiarly benefited in the enhancement of the value of property peculiarly situated as regards a contemplated expenditure of public funds. And in addition to the general levy they demand that special contributions, in consideration of the special benefit shall be made by the persons receiving it. The justice of demanding special contribution is supposed to be evident in the fact that the persons who are to make it, while they are made to bear the cost of the public work, are at the same time to suffer no pecuniary loss thereby, their property being increased in value by the expenditure to an amount at least equal to the sum they are required to pay. This is the idea that underlies all these levies."

And so in the Law of Special Assessments by Hamilton, section 236, the rule is announced, supported by ample authority, that:

"Special taxation for a local improvement, as well as special assessments of benefits for same, necessarily proceeds upon the theory of benefits to the property on which it is levied, and that a burden imposed upon any other theory is a mere arbitrary exaction—a taking of private property for public use without just compensation."

And in Smith's Modern Law of Municipalities, section 1228:

"A special assessment, or local assessment, as it is frequently called, is a species of taxation imposed by municipalities for the purpose of local improvement, and is based upon the assumption that the property in the locality of the property improved will be specially and peculiarly benefited thereby, by which a duty is imposed upon owners to contribute an amount in payment of the cost of the improvement equal to the benefits received. * * * Special assessments rest upon the ground that special burdens may be imposed for special or peculiar benefits accruing from public improvements. Local assessments can only be imposed to pay for local improvements clearly conferring special benefits on property assessed, and to the extent of those benefits only."

And this court, in a long line of cases in harmony with the foregoing principles, has held that all municipal assessments are based upon the ground that the property subjected to the assessment is benefited by the improvement for which the assessment is made. (Preston v. Roberts, 12 Bush, 570; Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee 8 Bush, 508; Bradley v. McAtee, 7 Bush, 667; Zable v. Louisville Baptist Orphans Home, 92 Ky., 89.) Some courts hold that the right to impose local assessments is derived from the police power of the State. (Hamilton on Special Assessments, section 40.) But, it is not necessary to resort to the police power to find authority for the laying of taxes of this character. We think the safe, conservative and well-defined place to rest them is upon the theory that they may be imposed as an equivalent for benefits conferred that are not enjoyed by the general public. It is upon this ground that this court, as well as nearly all the others, has found its justification in imposing them.

We may therefore, announce as sound in principle and supported by ample authority, the doctrine that special taxes can not be levied unless the property charged received a corresponding physical, material and substantial benefit from the exaction. And furthermore, that if the assessment does not confer a physical, material and substantial benefit, it will be invalid upon the ground that it is an attempt to take private property without just compensation, in violation of the Constitution. So that the question narrows down to the proposition whether or not street sprinkling may be considered an improvement in the sense that the adjacent property derives special benefits of the character described from it distinct from the benefits received by the public generally. If a sidewalk, or gutter, or street is constructed in front of property, the reasonable and natural result is, that the property derives some benefit and advantage from the improvement, and something substantial or at least tangible is added to its value. Of course, the value of improvements to adjacent property may be different, depending on the use to which the property is put, its situation and surroundings, and in many instances it may not be very appreciable and fail to realize the expectation on which the levy is made, but, nevertheless, all of the property is, to some extent, benefited, or at least this is the object and reasonable intent of the improvement. But, sprinkling streets, does not, in our opinion, confer a special benefit upon the adjacent property in the sense of contributing to its value; and hence a special tax for this purpose can not be sustained upon the only ground that this class of taxation rests.

The view we have announced is in harmony with the ruling of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in Chicago v. Blair, 149 Ill., 310, 24 L. R. A., 412, where, in considering a similar question, it was said:

"In the nature of things, the sprinkling is only useful while the work is continued. In a few hours the beneficial effects are gone, and the property is worth no more than before the street was sprinkled. It is insisted, however, that all improvements—the building of sidewalks, the paving of streets, of however lasting material—are evanescent, and that in a few years at most, they will necessarily require renewing; and that it makes no difference whether it be water put upon the street, or wood or granite; that all alike are but temporary in character. In a sense this is true, but not in a practical sense. It is common experience that well-paved streets and convenient and durable sidewalks, furnishing access to property, do in fact enhance its market value. It is however insisted, that the sprinkling of the street during the summer months renders the occupation of the adjacent property more enjoyable and comfortable, and that therefore, the property is enhanced in value. Doubtless, the same result would follow by placing vases at convenient points on the street, to be filled every morning with fresh-cut flowers; or by open-air concerts, in which music should be selected with reference to the taste of the adjacent dwellers. (Pettit v. Duke, 10 Utah, 311.)

Judge Phillips, in New York Life Insurance Company v. Prest, 71 Fed. Rep., 815, said:

"Under such ordinances, streets are sprinkled in front of vacant lots, on which are neither houses nor any living creatures. It could hardly be said, with reason, that running a sprinkling car now and then in front of such a lot adds to its market value; nor is there in such occasional laying of the dust any semblances of permanency. It is as evanescent as the early and later dew, and in my judgment it is no more within the power of the municipality thus to create liens on the citizens property than to hire 'rain makers to vex the skies for refreshing showers, and charge the lots adjacent to the rain-drops with the cost thereof. As the sprinkling of the public highways of a city, like the cleaning thereof, contributes much to the comfort and enjoyment of the property, its cost should be made a general and not a special burden."

A contrary view is maintained in State v. Raise, 38 Minn., 371, where it is said:

"The testator's main contention, however, is that street sprinkling is not an 'improvement' within the meaning of this section of the Constitution, because it lacks the element of permanence: that its results are transient; that, to constitute an improvement, there must be some work or structure, such as a pavement, sidewalk, or the like, that will remain after the labor is performed, and permanently enhance the value of the property. But, if permanence or durability is to be the test, how long must the beneficial results last in order to constitute an improvement? It certainly will not be claimed that the work must be eternal in duration, or imperishable in character. We are unable to see any difference in principle between the work of street sprinkling, the results of which, unless repeated, last but a day, and the construction of a block pavement or wooden sidewalk, which wears out or decays, and has to be rebuilt every few years. When a pavement or sidewalk has worn out the future value of the property is not enhanced by it any more than it is by street sprinkling when that ceases. Neither do we see that it makes any difference whether the substance applied to the surface of the street is wood, which has to be renewed every few years, or water, which has to be applied daily. Each benefits the adjacent property as long as it lasts, and no longer. It is not the agency used, or its comparative durability, but the result accomplished, which must determine whether a work is an improvement in the sense in which that word is here used." And by the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in Sears v. Board of Aldermen, 43 L. R. A., 834; and the Supreme Court of Indiana, in Reinken v. Fuehring, 130 Ind., 382, 30 Am. St. Rep., 247.

The foregoing opinions present the conflicting views touching this question held by other courts. And while there is much plausibility in the reasoning of the Minnesota case, we are not impressed with its soundness. There is clearly a difference not only in degree, but in principle, between the occasional and temporary convenience and pleasure that laying the dust, in the street confers, and the permanent and useful advantage that comes from well paved sidewalks or macadam streets that are suitable and serviceable for travel in rain or shine, summer and winter. Abutting property can not be taxed alone for the convenience or pleasure or comfort of the persons who use the streets, or in order that the neighboring premises may be made more attractive or beautiful to look upon. The rights of the owner must be considered. If his property is taken, he must receive some material, substantial benefit as an equivalent for the exaction. The city, as a whole may, as we have held, devote a portion of its revenue to this purpose; as indeed it may and often does, to the purchase of other conveniences that are esteemed of public service and yet practically considered result in doubtful benefits to the general public. But there is no good reason why the individual owner should be burdened in addition to his heavy load of municipal taxes, with charges that are levied without corresponding benefits.

The law authorizing the tax, as well as the ordinance under which it was imposed, are both invalid, and the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

GOLLADAY, &c. v. THOMAS, &c.

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Dying Without Issue—The devise to Mrs. S. being to her for life, and at her death to her children, and having none that the land should revert to testator's children, the chancellor correctly held that, upon the death of the devisee, the property so conveyed her by the will, passed to her surviving brother and sisters, no children having been born to her.

2. Same—Under section 4843, Kentucky Statutes, the devise having failed, by reason of the death in the lifetime of the testator, the estate must pass as in the case of intestacy, no contrary intent having been expressed in the will.

R. W. Crenshaw for appellants.

John W. Kelly for appellees.

Appeal from Trigg Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

The will of Alfred Thomas is in these words:

"I, Alfred Thomas, being of sound mind and deposing memory, do make this my last will and testament revoking all others, to-wit:

"1. I give to my daughter, Ida Golladay, the tract of land where she lives, that I have already deeded to her, and the tract of land of three hundred acres, known as the Bob Lucas—and a tract bought from Mrs. and Dr. Rasco, thirty-two acres, her lifetime then to her children.

"2. I give to my daughter, Inez Vinson, the tract of land where she now lives, of two hundred and ten acres, and the tract of two hundred and three acres, less twelve acres off the west end or corner given to T. M. Thomas for timber, where T. H. Meredith lived in 1903, her lifetime and then to her living children, if any; if none, then it is to descend to my children.

"3. I give to my son, Thomas M. Thomas, the tract of land where he now lives of two hundred and forty-eight acres and the tract of land of one hundred and fifty acres, known as the Parks Wilson land, and twelve acres of land off the tract off the west end or corner where Meredith lived in 1903. for timber, his lifetime, then to his children and all indebtedness either by note or account.

"4. I give to my daughter, Gracey Shoulders, the tract of land where I now live of two hundred and sixteen acres and two acres bought from Tandy Wadlington, her life time and at her death to her children, also a tract of land of one hundred and twenty acres, where Bob Rogers now lives to her her lifetime, then to her children, if any; if none, it is to descend back to my children.

"5. I give the remainder of my land to my four children, their lifetime, to be equally divided between them and then to their children.

"6. I give to Clara and Gracey Martin, each eight hundred dollars out of my personal property, if not enough left, sell enough land off on the land to pay all indebtedness and to give Clara and Gracey Martin the amount given them and to put up a iron fence around the entire grave yard at J. R. Golladay, to cost about, say $250.

"7. If there is anything left after gifts is paid and indebtedness paid, the remainder be divided equally between my children. This 9th day of April, 1904, I hereunto set my hand and seal.

"ALFRED THOMAS."

At the time the will was made, the testator had four children; after it was made, Mrs. Shoulders died without issue, before her father, the other three children surviving him.

At the time the will was made, Ida Golladay, had two children and Thomas M. Thomas had two or three children. Neither Inez Vinson nor Gracey Shoulders had children. Gracey Shoulders, having died without issue, after the will was made and before the testator's death, this suit was brought to determine who takes the land devised to her in Item 4, of the will. The circuit court held that the land devised to her passed to her surviving brother and sisters. The guardian ad litem of the grandchildren, who were all infants, appeals.

Section 4843, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows:

"Unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will such real or personal estate, or interest therein, as shall be comprised in any devise in such will which shall fail or be void, or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall not be included in the residuary devise contained in such will, but shall pass as in case of intestacy."

Under this statute it is evident that the devise to Gracey Shoulders having failed, by reason of her death in the lifetime of the testator, the estate must pass as in case of intestacy, unless the contrary intent is expressed by the will. Counsel rely upon section 2064, Kentucky Statutes:

"When a devise is made to several as a class or as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before the testator, and another or others shall survive the testator, the share or shares of such as so die shall go to his or their descendants, if any; if none, to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the devisor. A devise to children embraces grandchildren when there are no children, and no other construction will give effect to the devise."

This section is not applicable for the reason that the devise here is not made to several as a class. The devise is made simply to Gracey Shoulders and the rule applicable where there is a devise to joint tenants, can not affect the rights of the parties. The only question, therefore, left for decision, is whether an intention appears from the will that if the devise to Gracey Shoulders failed, the property should not pass as in case of intestacy. The testator does not seem to have contemplated that Thomas M. Thomas or Ida Golladay would die without issue, as they then each had several children; but he did contemplate that Inez Vinson and Gracey Shoulders might die without children, as none of them then had children; and so, in both the second and fourth clauses of the will, he provides as to each of them that if they die without living children, the land devised to them is to descend to his children. If Gracey Shoulders had survived her father and died without leaving children, after his death, the land would have descended back to his three remaining children. Inez Vinson has only a life estate in the tract of land devised to her; if she dies without living children, it will descend to the testator's children, and his grandchildren would take no interest in it. (Montgomery v. Montgomery, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 87.) We do not think the testator intended that his grandchildren should take an interest in the land devised to Inez Vinson or Gracey Shoulders, if they died before his death, as he expressly provided that if they died after his death, without children, the land devised to them should go to his other children. The law favors the vesting of estates; and we see no reason why the surviving children should not take the same interest in the land devised to Gracey Shoulders, when she died before the testator, as they would have taken had she survived him and then died without children. Section 2346, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows:

"A contingent remainder shall, in no case, fail for the want of a particular estate to support it."

The contingent remainder in the other children was not under this statute defeated by the death of Mrs. Shoulders; but she having died without issue, the surviving three children took the land at the death of the testator under the will. The same result would follow the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

MORSE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Embezzlement—Indictment —Averments— Proofs of Assumed Names—Competency—Identification—On the trial of one indicted by the name of Homer Marlon, alias Homer Morris, alias P. Homer Morse, for embezzlement by collecting money from S for a Distilling Co., for which he was acting as agent, and converting it to his own use, under Ky. Statutes, sec. 1202, evidence was competent that he had sold warehouse receipts for whisky in bond to persons other than S. and collected the money, representing himself as Homer Marlon, for the purpose of identifying him as the person indicted.

2. Same—Identification—Range of Evidence Allowed—Upon the trial of an indictment, when the defense is that it was not himself but another who committed the crime the evidence on behalf of the Commonwealth may be permitted to take a wide range for the purpose of developing the past history of the accused, and the names he has assumed, to the end that he may be identified as the person who committed the offense charged. But if, in the investigation, it should appear that the accused had been guilty of some other offenses the court should admonish the jury that they should consider such evidence only for the purpose of identification.

3. Same—Evidence of Commonwealth—On the trial of one indicted as agent, for embezzling the money of a corporation, the Commonwealth must prove (1) that the accused was the agent of the corporation; (2) that as such agent, in the course of his employment, he received money for the corporation; (3) that he fraudulently converted the money so received to his own use.

4. Same—Guilty Intent—Evidence Showing—Acts Implying—It is not indispensable that the Commonwealth should introduce evidence to show guilty intent before a conviction can be secured for embezzlement. While such intent is a necessary ingredient and must be alleged in the indictment the law will imply an intent from the acts of the accused when they are sufficient to establish his guilt. But the Commonwealth will not be permitted to prove that the accused has committed other and distinct crimes than the one for which he is being tried, unless such evidence is necessary to establish the identity or guilty knowledge of the accused.

5. Corporation—How Proven—On the trial of one for embezzling the money of a corporation the existence of the alleged corporation may be proven by parol evidence.

6. Money Embezzled by Agent—Commission of Agent—Where one is shown to have embezzled money which he as agent collected for his employer, he can not be excused because he was entitled to a part of the money as his commission as such agent.

7. Amount Charged—Proof of Less Sum—Sufficiency—One may be convicted for embezzlement although the evidence may show that the amount embezzled was less than the sum named in the indictment.

B. F. Graziani for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellant was indicted under section 1202 of the Kentucky Statutes, providing in part that.

"If any officer, agent, clerk or servant of any bank or corporation shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use or the use of another, money * * * belonging to such bank or corporation * * * which shall have come into his possession * * * as such officer, agent, clerk or servant. * * * he shall be confined in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than ten years."

The indictment charged that appellant, who was indicted as Homer Marion, alias Homer Morris, alias P. Homer Morse, while acting as the agent of the Consumers Distilling Company, a corporation under the laws of Kentucky, had by virtue of his agency collected and received $59.95 from Henry Staggenburg, for whisky sold and to be delivered, and did unlawfully, fraudulently, and without the consent of the Consumers Distilling Company, embezzle and convert to his own use the said sum of money, with the fraudulent and felonious intent then and there to convert the same to his own use, and to permanently deprive the company of its property therein.

Upon a trial under this indictment, he was convicted and his punishment fixed at two years confinement in the State penitentiary. We are asked to reverse the judgment of conviction, chiefly because the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence and also for error in the instructions given to the jury.

A brief statement of the facts will aid in understanding the force of the objections raised.

The Consumers Distilling Company is a Kentucky corporation, with its principal place of business located at Louisville. It was engaged in the manufacture of whisky, and the sale of it direct to the saloon trade. The whisky sold was in bonded warehouses. Its sales were made by agents who delivered to purchasers warehouse certificates for the amount of whisky they desired to buy. These warehouse receipts specified the serial numbers of the barrels of whisky the purchaser bought, which was deliverable to bearer upon the payment of the purchase price, tax, and other charges.

Appellant was employed by the company to solicit trade and was furnished a supply of blank warehouse receipts, and sale order blanks. He was not personally known to the company, but was employed by it upon the recommendation of his cousin, Bradford Morse, who had been acting as its agent in the territory assigned to the appellant after Bradford Morse quit its employment. These agents were not authorized to collect money on sales made, but were authorized to receive from the purchaser their commission upon sales, which was five per cent. Appellant made sales to H. P. Murphy and H. C. Davis, and from these persons he collected more than his commissions, but remitted to the company the amount collected from them less commissions. He did not remit any money collected from other persons or send in any other orders or notify the company of any other sales.

Henry Staggenburg testified that he was a saloon keeper in Covington, and that on July 22, 1907, a man named Homer Marion, came to his place of business with samples of whisky, order blanks and certificates, and that he bought from him three five-barrel certificates, for which he paid him, at the time, $29.95, and in about a week afterwards, thirty dollars more. He identified the appellant, Morse, as being the person who sold him the whisky under the name of Henry Marion, and also produced the receipts signed by Homer Marion. The warehouse receipts delivered by Homer Marion alias, P. H. Morse, recited in substance that the Consumers Distilling Company had sold to Staggenburg, fifteen barrels of whisky in a bonded warehouse, naming it, which it agreed to deliver to him on the payment of the United States government tax, and other taxes and storage, and the price at which the whisky was sold. The total amount of the purchase was $126.65.

Upon the trial, persons by the name of Hennessy, Dennis, Sidler and Schutte were introduced as witnesses for the Commonwealth. Each of them was permitted to state, over the objection of appellant, that while representing himself to be Homer Marion, and an agent for the Consumers Distilling Company, appellant sold to them warehouse receipts for whisky in bond and collected from each of them a part of the purchase price. They positively identified the accused as the person who sold them the whisky and collected from them the money under the name of Homer Marion; and were permitted to relate all the details of the transaction each of them had with him. The treasurer of the Central Savings Bank & Trust Company also identified the accused as representing himself to be Homer Marion when he cashed the checks given to him by Staggenburg. Other witnesses were introduced who identified the appellant as having transactions with them under the name of Homer Marion; and yet others who knew him when he was going under the name of E. B. Morse.

The president of the company testified that he employed the accused upon the recommendation of his cousin, Bradford Morse, to act as agent in his place during his absence from the State. That he had never seen the accused until after his arrest. That agents of the company were not authorized to collect from persons to whom whisky was sold any part of the purchase price except their commissions. That no report was made to the company by the accused, of whisky sold to Staggenburg, Hennessy, Dennis, Sidler or Schutte, nor did he remit to it any money on account of sales to these parties.

The appellant, when introduced as a witness in his own behalf, testified that he had acted as agent for the Consumers Distilling Company for a short while, and during the time had sold whisky to Murphy and Davis, but had not sold or attempted to sell any whisky to either Staggenburg, Hennessy, Dennis, Sidler or Schutte, nor had he collected from them any money. He attempted, in the course of his examination, to place these transactions upon Bradford Morse, and denied that he ever assumed the name of Homer Marion, or Homer Morris, but admitted that at one time he had assumed the name of E. B. Morse. Over his objection, the Commonwealth was permitted to ask him if he had not been indicted and convicted in the Federal court as E. B. Morse for a fraudulent use of the mails. He was also required to state that as E. B. Morse he had rented property, some years before the trial, from a man named Rolsen, and was also interrogated concerning other incidents in his life that had no bearing upon the offense he was charged with, except to show that at various times he had assumed different names. The defense of appellant was rested entirely upon the fact that the crime he was charged with was committed by Bradford Morse. In other words, that the Commonwealth had instituted the prosecution against the wrong person.

The first question presented is the competency of the evidence of Hennessy, Dennis, Sidler and Schutte. The trial court admitted the evidence of these persons for the purpose of showing a criminal intent upon the part of the accused, and admonished the jury that this was the only purpose for which their testimony was received. Considering the defense interposed by appellant, we are of the opinion that, although the evidence was competent, the reason for its admission given by the trial judge, was erroneous. It was relevant and admissible for the purpose of establishing the identity of the accused, but not, as we will presently show, for the purpose of showing a criminal intent upon his part. The grounds upon which it was admitted are not however material; it was competent evidence and the appellant was not prejudiced by the erroneous reason assigned by the lower court. The accused denied that he had ever assumed the names of Homer Marion, or Homer Morris, and that he had any transactions with Staggenburg. It was, therefore competent to prove not only by Staggenburg, but by the other witnesses, who, about the same time knew him or had similar transactions with him, that in dealing with them he represented himself to be Homer Marion, and to prove by them that appellant was the identical person whom they knew as Homer Marion. This evidence might have been made by as many persons as were able to identify him without reference to whether they had business transactions with him or not. In the examination of these witnesses, for the purpose of fully identifying the accused, it was also permissible to allow them to relate the circumstances under which they knew him, and the business transactions they had with him. In addition to this, and as a corroborative and relevant fact tending to show that the accused had assumed the name of Homer Marion, it was competent to prove that he had assumed other names, and that, under another name he had been indicted and convicted in the Federal court. When the defense of a person is that it was not himself but another who committed the crime, the evidence in behalf of the Commonwealth may be permitted to take a wide range for the purpose of developing the past life and history of the accused, and the names he has assumed, to the end that he may be identified under these assumed names as the person who committed the offense under investigation. But, if in the course of the evidence brought out in the elucidation of these facts, it should appear that the accused had been guilty of some other offense, the court should at the time admonish the jury that they should not consider evidence of other offenses as even tending to show his guilt of the crime for which he was being tried, but that it was only competent for the purpose of establishing the identity of the accused and to illustrate that, at different times, he had assumed various names.

As the evidence of Hennessy, Dennis, and the others was relevant and competent upon the question of identity, the admonition of the court that the jury could not consider it as evidence that the accused was guilty of embezzling the money secured from Staggenburg had the same effect as if he had in terms directed them that it was only admitted to establish the identity between Homer Marion and P. H. Morse. We might rest the opinion here upon the question of the relevancy of this evidence, but in view of the importance of the question raised, we will endeavor to state the reasons why we think the trial judge committed a technical error in the reasons assigned for the competency of the evidence.

Under an indictment for embezzlement, it is necessary that the Commonwealth should prove (1) that the accused was an officer, agent, clerk or servant of a bank or corporation, (2) that as such officer, agent, clerk or servant, and in the course of his employment, he received money or property of the bank or corporation, (3) that he embezzled or fraudulently converted to his own use the money or property so received. If the accused was the agent of the Consumers Distilling Company, a corporation, and as such agent, in the course of his employment, or within the scope of his duties, he received or collected from Staggenburg, money due the company and failed to pay it over, the crime was complete. It was not necessary to introduce other evidence to show a fraudulent intent upon his part to convert it to his own use. That he so intended might be reasonably inferred from the other facts proved. The case for the Commonwealth was made out by the testimony of Staggenburg, and the president of the company, and if no evidence had been introduced for the defense a judgment of conviction might have followed. And under the circumstances it would have been not only unnecessary, but highly prejudicial to admit evidence of other distinct embezzlements from other persons. But, as the accused denied that he had secured any money from Staggenburg, it was, as we have endeavored to show, competent to admit other evidence to establish his identity, although this evidence developed the offenses committed in connection with Hennessy, Dennis, Sidler and Schutte. The peculiar defense interposed by the accused rendered necessary evidence of his identity, and at the same time made it unnecessary to introduce collateral facts to show intent. The question of intent was not particularly put in issue by the accused. His defense was not grounded upon a lack of intent and therefore, on this point, it was only required that the Commonwealth should show the facts directly connected with the Staggenburg transaction. It is not indispensable that the Commonwealth should introduce evidence to show a guilty intent before a conviction can be secured for embezzlement. An evil intent is a necessary ingredient in the commission of arson, burglary, larceny, murder, and almost every other felony, including embezzlement, and must be charged in the indictment, but the law will imply the intent from the acts of the accused when they are sufficient to establish his guilt, and this, upon the ground that every accountable person is responsible for the consequences that flow from his acts. (Snapp v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 173.) Intent, however, often becomes a material factor in determining the guilt of the accused, and when this state of case is presented, it is competent to show the guilty intent by relevant evidence connected with, or that throws light upon the transaction under investigation. But, it is not often that it is permissible, in order to show intent to introduce evidence of other and distinct crimes. And it may be said to be a rule of general application, in the trial of criminal cases, that the Commonwealth will not be permitted to introduce evidence showing that the accused has committed other and distinct crimes than the one for which he is being tried. The justice of this rule can not be denied. Evidence of the commission of other offenses is very prejudicial to the accused, has a tendency to divert the mind of the jury from the case under consideration, and often may find the accused entirely unprepared to meet the new issues presented. For these reasons the practice in this State has been against the admissibility of evidence of this character, unless it is necessary to establish identity or guilty knowledge or intent or motive for the crime under trial or be so interwoven with it that it can not well be separated from it, in the introduction of relevant and competent evidence, or the independent offense was perpetrated to conceal the crime for which the accused is on trial. The exceptions to the general rule against the admissibility of evidence of other and distinct offenses, are in a general way stated as follows in Underhill's work on Criminal Evidence, page 107:

"1. If several similar criminal acts committed by the person on trial are so connected with respect to time and locality that they form an inseparable transaction, and a complete account of the offense charged in the indictment can not be given without detailing the particulars of such other acts, evidence of any or all of the component parts thereof is admissible to prove the whole general plan.

"2. When the commission of the act charged in the indictment is practically admitted by the accused, who seeks to avoid criminal responsibility therefor by relying on a lack of intent or want of guilty knowledge, evidence of the commission by him of similar independent offenses, before or after that upon which he is being tried and having no apparent connection therewith is admissible to prove such intent or knowledge.

"3. If the facts and circumstances tend to show that the person committed an independent, dissimilar crime to enable him to perpetrate or to conceal the offense for which he is being tried, evidence of the independent crime is admissible against him when the intent to perpetrate or conceal the independent offense furnished a motive for committing the crime for which he is put upon trial.

"4. When a crime has been committed by the use of a novel means or in a particular manner, evidence of the defendant's commission of similar offenses by the use of such means or in such manner is admissible against him as tending to prove the identity of persons from the similarity of such means or the peculiarity of the manner adopted by him."

These admirably stated exceptions are supported by a multitude of cases and text writers, from which we may select as examples, the following: State v. O'Donnell, 61 Pac. Rep., 892; Shaffner v. Com- monwealth, 13 Am. Rep., 649; Peeples v. Corbin, 15 Am. Rep., 427; Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, volume 1, sections 1125-6; Greenleaf on Evidence, volume 1, section 53; Elliott on Evidence, volume 4, section 2720; People v. Molineux, 62 L. R. A., 193; People v. Seaman, 61 Am. St. Rep., 326; State v. Brady, 62 Am. St. Rep., 560; McGlasson v. State, 66 Am. St. Rep., 842; Calkins v. State, 98 Am. Dec., 121; Devoto v. Commonwealth, 3 Met., 418; Clarke v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1029; O'Brien v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky., 354; O'Brien v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2511; Bess v. Commonwealth, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1091; Barnes v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 803; Denham v. Commonwealth, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 171; Raymond v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 785; Snapp v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 173.

The authorities also agree that evidence of independent crimes is more particularly admissible when the charge under investigation is uttering forged paper, counterfeiting, receiving stolen property, and embezzlement, the reason for this being that the defense of mistake or ignorance or lack of guilty knowledge is more frequently interposed as a defense by the accused in cases of this character than in prosecutions for other offenses. Hence it is well settled by the authorities before cited that in prosecutions for embezzlement, when the defense is that the accused did not intend to commit the embezzlement or that the act alleged to constitute the crime was the result of accident, mistake or oversight, evidence of other embezzlements is admitted for the purpose of showing an evil intent and a guilty knowledge in the commission of the crime under investigation. But in the case before us, as there was no attempt to rely upon a defense of this character, evidence of other acts of embezzlement by the accused was not necessary to establish his guilty knowledge, evil intent, or bad motive, nor were they so inseparably connected with the Staggenburg transaction as to be a part of it. The only issue in the case was whether or not the accused had sold whisky to and collected money from Staggenburg. He said he did neither. If his identity had not been a question in the case, we are unable to perceive upon what theory evidence that he collected money from other persons and failed to pay it over, would be relevant under a prosecution for embezzling money collected from Staggenburg, any more than evidence of other offenses would be relevant in prosecutions for larceny, or burglary, or arson, where the defense was an alibi. The issue did not present a case of accident, mistake, oversight, error in book-keeping, or other facts tending to prove lack of evil intent. Leaving out of consideration the identity of the accused, the embezzlements from Hennessy, and others, at different times and places, did not throw any light upon the embezzlement from Staggenburg. Nor were they necessary to establish an evil intent in the Staggenburg transaction, because, as we have seen, it was a separate, disconnected transaction. It stood alone. The question of evil intent or guilty knowledge was in no wise involved in view of the defense made.

In this connection it may be asked at what stage in the trial can the Commonwealth introduce evidence of other offenses, when such evidence is competent. In answer, we say that evidence of this character may be offered whenever the nature of the defense is disclosed that will permit it. If, in the opening of the case it appears that the accused will rely on any of the defenses before mentioned, to show lack of evil intent, or guilty knowledge, then the Commonwealth may put in its evidence in chief—but if the nature of the defense is not disclosed, until the evidence for the accused is offered, it may come in rebuttal, and this we consider the safer practice.

It may also be remarked that if the appellant had denied that he was acting as agent for the company, it would be competent to prove by other witnesses than Staggenburg, that he had represented himself to them as its agent.

Another objection is that it was not shown by competent evidence that the Consumers Distilling Company was an incorporated concern. It is argued that in cases of this character it is necessary that the original articles of incorporation, or a copy of the record, showing that incorporation, should be produced. Under the statute, the crime of embezzlement can only be committed in connection with the property, money or effects of a bank or corporation. It is, therefore, essential that there should be sufficient evidence of the incorporation of the concern, the money, property or effects of which is embezzled. The question then is, can the facts of incorporation be shown by parol evidence, or is it necessary that the record should be produced. We do not think that record evidence of the incorporation is essential to show that fact. It may be shown by parol evidence. In Thompson on Corporations, section 7713, it is said:

"In criminal prosecutions, when the question arises whether a company is incorporated, for instance, in a case of a prosecution for larceny of the property of an alleged corporation, or for a forgery of the bills of an alleged banking corporation, it is only necessary to show that the corporation exists de facto, and this may be proved by general reputation; in other words, by proving by parol testimony, that it is a corporation de facto, doing business as such."

This general principle is fully supported in Calkins v. State, 18 Ohio St. Rep., 307, 98 Om. Dec., 121; Thalheimer v. Florida, 38 Fla., 169; State v. Thompson, 23 Kas., 338; 33 Am. Rep., 165.

In Standard Oil Company v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 5, the court, in considering this question, said:

"However, it is not necessary to offer in evidence the articles of incorporation. The de facto existence of a corporation may be established by evidence tending to show that it acted and was accepted in the community as a corporation under the name alleged. In fact, any evidence tending to show that it is a corporation is sufficient." (Geo. H. Goodman Co. v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 519.)

Under the sound rule announced in these authorities, in a prosecution against a corporation, or in a prosecution against a person for embezzlement, or other crime committed against a corporation, the corporate existence may be shown either by the record or by evidence of persons, who are able to state that the concern in question is a corporation, or by other facts or circumstances showing that it is a corporation. In a prosecution for embezzlement, the money or property of a bank, insurance company or of a railroad, doing business in this State, it would not be necessary to prove, in any way the fact of incorporation, because under the statute these institutions can not conduct business until they have been incorporated. But, as to other concerns that may do business either as corporations, partnerships or individuals, the fact of incorporation may be shown in the manner before stated.

On the trial, appellant introduced as witness for the purpose of proving by him that he was qualified as an expert in the examination of handwritings and that a letter purporting to have been written by Bradford Morse to the company was in the same handwriting as the receipts Staggenburg and others testified were given them by the accused. The trial judge refused to admit this evidence, and this ruling is complained of. The reason for the ruling does not appear in the record, but we assume it was because it was not shown that the letter purporting to have been written by Bradford Morse, was in fact written by him, and that the statute in relation to disputed handwriting was not complied with. Looking at the matter from this standpoint, the ruling was correct. If writings, admittedly made by Bradford Morse, had been offered or introduced on the trial, it would have been competent to prove by a person qualified to express an opinion upon disputed handwritings that the genuine writings of Bradford Morse and the papers produced by Staggenburg and others, appeared to have been written by the same person. The rule as to the admissibility and comparison of disputed handwritings is prescribed by the act following section 604 of the Civil Code, and when it is proposed to introduce evidence of this character, these statutory provisions must be followed.

It is further urged that as agents of the company were allowed to collect and retain commissions, appellant could not be guilty of embezzlement, because he had the right to collect a part of what he retained, and having the right to collect a part thereof, was not guilty of the statutory offense of embezzlement in collecting and retaining the whole of what he collected, although he might have converted the same to his own use. This precise question was settled adversely to the contention of the appellant in Commonwealth v. Jacobs, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 921. In that case, Jacobs was employed by the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company to solicit insurance and collect premiums. His contract with the company provided that he should receive as a salary fifteen per cent. of what was actually collected each week and paid to the company. He collected from a number of policyholders money which he failed to pay over. The trial court being of the opinion that as Jacobs was entitled to fifteen per cent. of the money, he was not guilty of embezzlement in retaining the whole of it; but this court, in reversing the judgment, said:

"Although the defendant was entitled to 15 per cent. of the fund as his commission, he held the remaining 85 per cent. as the agent of the company. And when he embezzled it, his act was as much within the purpose of the statute as if he had been entitled to nothing for commissions and had embezzled the whole fund."

Nor is the point well taken, that because, under the contract, appellant was not permitted to collect anything except commissions he could not be guilty of embezzlement in collecting and converting to his own use, money which, as agent, he had no right to collect. It would be giving a very narrow and inefficient construction to the statute to hold that when an agent of a corporation, by virtue of his agency, was placed in a position where he might collect money for the corporation, that he could not be charged with the crime of embezzlement if his contract provided that he should not have the right to collect. It is manifest that if appellant did in fact obtain any money from Staggenburg, he was enabled to get it because he represented himself as the agent of the company. And if, as such agent, and in the course of his employment, he collected money for the company represented by him, and converted it to his own use, he committed the offense denounced by the statute. The money collected by him, if any, came into his possession by virtue of his agency, and he will not be allowed to escape the penalty of converting it to his own use upon the ground that he was not authorized by the company to collect it, although in fact he did collect it as agent.

In Bishop's New Criminal Law, section 363, it is said on this point:

"A case of embezzlement not only may, but must, show a departure by the servant from the line of his duty. And it is contrary to the entire spirit of our law, as well in the criminal department as the civil, to permit a man to set up his own wrong in justification or evasion of any charge against him, or, in this instance to say that because he added another wrong to the one made penal by the statute, therefore he should escape all punishment. * * * In reason, whenever a man claims to be a servant while getting into his possession the property to be embezzled, he should be held to be such on his trial for the embezzlement."

The instructions are also complained of, but they are not open to criticism or objection, although the indictment charged embezzlement of $59.95, a conviction might be had on proof of the embezzlement of a less sum. And the court properly so instructed the jury.

After a careful examination of this record, we have been unable to discover any error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, and the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

The whole court sitting.

Judge Hobson dissenting, only upon the ground that in his opinion the evidence of other crimes was competent upon the question of intent.

REGISTER NEWSPAPER CO., &c. v. WORTEN,

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Libel—Actions For—What Petition Should Charge—Publication In Newspaper—Where the effect of a publication in a newspaper is to hold a person up to contempt and ridicule, it is not necessary that the petition in an action seeking damages for a libelous publication should allege that the bringing of a suit without authority was unprofessional. When the article complained of charged appellee with bringing an unauthorized suit, the libel was complete.

2. Same—Libelous Character of Publication—A publication referring to one as "the lawyer, a fellow with a license to practice," and containing the charge that such person is the friend and companion of criminals is libelous, and a demurrer to the paragraph of the petition pleading it was properly overruled.

3. Same—Charge in publication that attorney solicited business—The fact that it is unprofessional for a lawyer to solicit business is not only recognized by the bar, but by the public, and a newspaper publication containing such a charge is libelous.

4. Pleading—Part of Publication Pleaded—In pleading a libelous publication, it is only necessary for the plaintiff to set out that part of publication which he considers libelous. He makes out his case when he proves the publication of the libelous matter.

5. Same—Instructions—After setting out the alleged libelous articles, the instructions directed the jury to find against the defendants unless they believed from the evidence that all of said publication were true, or in substance true. Held—That the words "or in substance true," were sufficient to exclude from the consideration of the jury all immaterial statements of fact having no real bearing upon the case. (Louisville Press Company v. Tennelly, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1231.)

Hendrick, Miller & Marble for appellants.

Breathitt & Bell for appellee.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

J. M. Worten is an attorney at law. He was born and reared in Livingston county, which adjoins the county of McCracken. Prior to his removal to Paducah, he was county clerk of his native county and had practiced law in that county for six or seven years. When he moved to Paducah he formed a partnership with Hon. Charles K. Wheeler, who had just been elected to represent the first district of Kentucky in the Congress of the United States. Some time after his removal to Paducah, he became city solicitor for that city. While occupying that position he rendered an opinion unfavorable to the interests of the appellant, Register Newspaper Company, which was an applicant for the city printing. From that time on there seems to have been considerable feeling of enmity between Worten and the editor of the Register Newspaper Company. That paper published various articles concerning him, and he at times instituted libel suits against it.

After appellee vacated the office of city solicitor, he brought a great many suits against the city of Paducah, on behalf of persons who had been fined in the police court and required to work on chain gangs in improving the streets of Paducah. The Register Newspaper Company, taking the position that the institution of these suits by a former city officer was unprofessional, and claiming that it was acting in behalf of the public interests, published numerous articles concerning appellee, reflecting more or less upon his character and integrity as an attorney.

Appellee thereupon instituted this action to recover damages for certain alleged libelous articles published in the Paducah Daily Register, from November 22nd, 1904, to October 24th, 1905. The petition, exclusive of the preamble and conclusion, contains nine distinct paragraphs, each setting out distinct and different publications upon which appellee sought to recover. The second paragraph originally set out a number of distinct publications, but before the trial the plaintiff dismissed his action as to all of the publications set forth in that paragraph except that of March 21, 1905, entitled "Mark Worten Heard From." Appellants, Register Newspaper Company and James E. Wilhelm, its editor, answered separately, admitting the publications as explained and corrected by them; but denied all malice or bad intent in the publications, and alleged that they were made as a matter of news; that the same as criticisms were privileged; and they attempted to justify such publications by pleading that they were all literally true except one small and unimportant mistake in respect to the publication set forth in the ninth paragraph of the petition, which will be noticed hereafter. Appellee, Worten, denied these matters by reply, and on the issues thus made, the case came on for trial in the Livingston Circuit Court. Upon submission of the case the jury rendered a verdict in favor of appellee for $1,000. From an order overruling the motion and grounds for a new trial, the Register Newspaper Company and Wilhelm prosecute this appeal.

The articles alleged to be libelous will be set forth in the order in which they appear in the instructions of the court. In Instruction No. 1, will be found the following, which appeared in the Paducah Daily Register, October 24th, 1905:

"Mark A. Worten in the circuit court yesterday, lost another of his suits filed against newspapers of this city, this one being that of J. R. Duncan against the News-Democrat Publishing Company. * * *

"Worten got J. R. Duncan to let him file a suit against the paper in which Worten formerly owned stock. The suit was instituted, but Markie loses."

In Instruction No| 2, will be found the following publication, which 15, 16):

"The Paducah Register is to be congratulated on the result of its latest libel suit. It was brought by a pestiferous damage suit lawyer without foundation, in a county in which neither the plaintiff nor defendant had ever lived, and in which the publisher of the Register had never been.

"There ought to be some way to punish the unprincipled sharks who, with or without a grievance, file suits of the character of that against the Register. One of these creatures was once asked his object in filing such a suit. He replied, 'This paper will make a great fuss about it, and I will get the benefit of the advertisement.' It is a bad sort of notoriety, but seems suited to bad men."

In instruction No. 3, will be found the following article published in said newspaper on the 22nd day of November, 1904, and being the same article set forth in paragraph 1 of plaintiff's petition (Record, page 3.):

"Sult Unauthorized.

"George Wright, colored, went to Chief Collins yesterday and stated that he had seen where a lawyer, Mark Worten, had sued the city of Paducah for $10,000 in Wright's name on account of the latter being worked upon the street chain gang while serving out fines imposed in the police court. Wright said he wanted the officers to understand that he had not authorized any lawyer to bring suit in his name."

In paragraph 2, of the petition, and in said instruction No. 3, will be found the following article published in said newspaper on the 21st day of March, 1905:

"Mark Worten Heard From.

"Mayor Yeiser informed the board that five more $10,000 damage suits had been filed against the city by ex-prisoners for damages on the ground that they had been worked illegally on the street chain gang while serving out lockup sentences. These suits were filed for the prisoners by the lawyer who is so popular with them and draws so much clientele from those quarters, Mark Worten, the lawyer, or fellow with a license to practice, who sues the Register, which considers it a compliment to be sued from such a source."

In paragraph 3. of said petition, the following article appears, and which is copied in instruction No. 3, of date, April 22nd, 1905:

"In the years 1902 and 1903, J. Mark Worten served the city as the legal adviser of the administration, composed of the mayor and council and general counsel. For the alleged services Worten was paid $75 a month, or $900 a year, or $1,800 in all, which he no doubt drew with commendable regularity. Among the 'decisions' which he rendered from time to time, the Register was convinced that he lacked considerable of being a reliable lawyer, or well up in the profession, and had no hesitancy in saying so through these columns. Some of his 'decisions' were the laughing stock of the community, and it is a known fact that the mayor, on several occasions, when he wanted legal advice, went to a first class lawyer and got it, and paid for it out of his own pocket.

"The police department is authority for the statement that Worten, while still in office and drawing a salary from the city treasury and taxpayers, made frequent visits to the office of the city judge and made notes from the docket book of the city court. The police aver that it was their belief that Worten was obtaining the names of the persons convicted in the city court and who had been worked on the chain gang, and that he was getting data for some of the suits he afterwards instituted."

And on the 23rd day of April, 1905, in the paper of that date. appeared the following article contained in paragraph 4, and said instruction No. 3:

"The verdict rendered yesterday at Smithland in favor of the Register, in the case in which it was sued for $10,000 for alleged libel, placed the seal of disapproval, according to our belief, upon one of the most malicious and infamous suits ever instituted against a newspaper.

"Mark Worten, the attorney, was born and reared in Livingston county. For some years he practiced law at Smithland, and until he emigrated to Paducah, which fact, as we are informed, almost caused some of the people at Smithland to meet and congratulate themselves over his departure.

"The scheme to take the case to a county where it would be before strangers and there to attempt to prejudice their minds against 'one of the greatest corporations of Paducah' was well laid, but it failed.

"Worten can attribute his defeat to but one of two causes, to-wit: Either he had no case or it was his prime unpopularity; and if he has any doubt on the latter proposition the sentiment in Paducah and Smithland should be enough to convince him, beyond a doubt, that it is time for him to take an inventory of his standing and act accordingly.

"In 1902, Worten was elected city attorney and prior thereto this paper had never had anything to say in regard to the man. One of his first acts as a sworn officer, either through ignorance or purposefully, was to give the city council a piece of legal advice that was not the law, in order to prevent the Register from obtaining the city printing.

"Worten has the right to dislike this paper and the people connected with it, but as a sworn officer, at that time, it was his duty to give the law as it really existed. But no, with that vindictive spirit, which seems to be a cardinal characteristic, he took advantage of his official position and did not give the council the law.

"Convinced of his enmity, spleen and incompetency, we took the stand which we were forced to take, and according him the right to do and say what he pleased, we took unto ourselves the same privilege. That we have made him smart at times is quite certain.

"Yet we believe that we can hold our own with Worten and his kind of people. He is at liberty to do and say what he pleased of a lawful nature, for this is a free country, and he will likewise find that there are some people who will stay with him until sheol freezes over.

"Men who engage in such questionable practices are a menace to the peace and welfare of a community. Worden was afforded every opportunity to mulct the Register for any amount up to $10,000, which no doubt was to be divided between him and Stone, but it will be some days before he gets his hands on any of the dollars of 'one of the greatest corporations in Paducah.'"

In the issue of said paper of date, the 15th of August, 1905, the following article was published, and which is set up in paragraph 6 and copied into said instruction No. 3. (Record, page 17):

"J. M. Worten Sues The Register Some More.

"Another One of His Kind of Law Suits Instituted

"Against The Paper in Another County For Elden Stone.

"Wants Only $5,000 This Time."

"It will be remembered that several months ago this same fellow, Worten, brought suit against the Register for $10,000, in Livingston county, where he, Worten, was reared, and at the trial of the case a jury of his former fellow-citizens—not friends, for it is understood that where Worten is best known he has few, if any, friends—gave a verdict in favor of the Register.

"Worten, in order to harass the paper, filed the suit in another county.

"Worten was the only man with a license to practice law in Paducah who got mixed up with the ex-chain gang suits, and this conduct about cooked his goose in Paducah. More than one good citizen was heard to say that Worten ought to be run out of the city, and a little agitation at that time would have brought trouble to him, for it was a species of work that had never before been attempted on such a large scale.

"The Register is no doubt blamed by Worten for some of the sentiment against him, and just for revenge, he is now making a specialty of suing the Register in another county, and resorting to tactics that reputable lawyers eschew.

"In the $10,000 suit Worten brought against the Register for Sam Stone, and last at Smithland, he deliberately omitted part of the language used in the Register so as to mislead the court and jury by distorting what was really published. The public may draw its own conclusions as to such reprehensible acts."

In the issue of said paper of September 15th, 1905, the following articles appeared, and are set forth in paragraph 7, of the petition and copied into said instruction No. 3, (Record, page 20):

"The verdict of the Livingston county jury yesterday, against this paper, for $350, came as a surprise to the good people of Paducah, where the Stones and their attorney, Mark Worten, are so well known.

"That there was a sinister motive in bringing this suit in Livingston county can not be denied, for it is a fact that in December last, Mark Worten brought a suit for Sam Stone in the McCracken Circuit Court against the editor of another Paducah newspaper and also another suit for Sam Stone against the newspaper itself in this county three weeks ago for alleged libel. Those cases are yet to be tried. Therefore, it may be assumed that these suits are really Worten's and that the Stones are merely being used as his tools in the matter.

"When Worten struck this city we were on friendly terms, but it was not long before he saw fit to take up another's differences and begin to denounce this paper, but no attention was paid to it. Finally, as city attorney, he either ignorantly or maliciously gave the council the wrong advice to keep this paper from obtaining the city printing and deprived us of $1,000 worth of business."

In the issue of said paper of September 27th, 1905, appears the following articles, which are copied in said instruction No. 3, and in paragraph 8, of the petition, (Record, page 22):

"The public has not forgotten that only six months ago this same Paducah Sun was backing up a so-called lawyer, who, after drawing a salary from the city as its legal adviser, became the attorney for a lot of ex-chain gang prisoners and filed nearly a million dollars worth of damage suits against the city for that class, many of whom are the scum of the city.

"The Sun did all in its power to bluff the city into cease working the fellows on the chain gang and predicted that the city would lose the suits, and distorted reports of peonage cases and used every effort in its power to aid in the dirty and contemptible scheme to hold up the city.

"The tenor of the Sun's articles was for a surrender on the part of the city to the criminals and their patron saint of a lawyer, but the city stood pat and the courts decided favorable to the city, and instead of housing that element up in the city jail, to be fed at a dead loss to the city, those convicted in the city courts are still worked on the chain gang and no more detestable suits are being brought.

"According to the court dockets, the lawyer who brought the contemptible suits 'has got his'n,' and if the Sun persists in fighting the best interests of the city, the decent citizens should cut it out and let it look to the ex-chain gang prisoners for patronage, just like some other people are doing.

"The Sun failed to pull Mark Worten and his clients through and it will also fail to fasten the bitulithic contract on the people. The stuff's off."

It is the contention of counsel for appellant that there is considerable doubt as to whether any of the articles published are libelous. Many of these articles we deem it unnecessary to discuss at all. We shall take up and consider only those which are claimed by counsel for appellant not to be libelous.

Counsel insist that the matter complained of in the first paragraph of the petition, under the heading of "Suit Unauthorized," is not libelous. Following the heading the article proceeds as follows: "George Wright, colored, went to Chief Collins yesterday and stated that he had seen where a lawyer, Mark Worten, had sued the city of Paducah for $10,000 in Wright's name, on account of the latter being worked upon the street chain gang while serving out fines imposed on the police court. Wright said he wanted the officers to understand that he had not authorized any lawyer to bring suit in his name." Counsel for appellant argue that there is nothing in this article authorizing the conclusion that it charges appellee with unprofessional conduct; that there was no allegation to the effect, nor was there proof of the fact, that the bringing of a suit without authority is unprofessional in Paducah or elsewhere. We can not agree to this view. We know of nothing that would be more damaging to the reputation of a lawyer than to create the impression on the public that he was so unprofessional as to bring a suit without being employed for that purpose. No man has a right to bring a suit in another's name without being authorized so to do.

The law is well settled, that a written or printed publication which is false and defamatory, and calculated to expose one to ridicule or contempt, or to render him odious, or injure him in his business or calling, or in his social standing, is a libel. The publication of the article complained of would necessarily have the effect of holding appellee up to the contempt and ridicule of his associates and acquaintances. Where the effect of the language is to hold a person up to contempt and ridicule, we do not deem it necessary that the petition should have alleged that the bringing of a suit without authority was unprofessional in Paducah or elsewhere. According to the ordinary rules of common sense and reason, it is unprofessional to bring a suit under such circumstances. When the article in question charged appellee with bringing an unauthorized suit, the libel was complete. It was unnecessary to add the words which counsel for appellants insist should have been in the petition. We are, therefore, of opinion that the demurrer to the paragraph containing the above quotation should have been overruled.

The next article referred to by appellants' counsel is the one which is contained in the second paragraph of the petition, and is headed in bold letters: "Mark Worten Heard From." In this article the public are told that Mayor Yeiser "informed the board that five more $10,000 damage suits had been filed against the city by ex-prisoners for damages on the ground that they had been worked illegally on the street chain gang while serving out lockup sentences." To this extent there is nothing objectionable in the article complained of; it contains simply an item of news in which the public would have taken more or less interest. Had the publication stopped there, it could not be said to contain anything libelous. The article, however, proceeds in the following language: "These suits were filed for the prisoners by the lawyer who is so popular with them and draws so much clientele from those quarters, Mark Worten, the lawyer, or fellow with a license to practice, who sues the Register, which considers it a compliment to be sued from such a source." We think that mortification and shame would necessarily follow the reading of the above article. No self-respecting lawyer, would care to be referred to as "the lawyer, or fellow with a license to practice." Such a reference could not fail to bring into contempt, ridicule and ill repute, the one so spoken of. The article contains the further information that Worten was the friend and companion of criminals, and that by reason of his intimacy and popularity with them he secured a large part of his practice. There can be no doubt that this article was libelous, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the paragraph in which it was contained.

The only other article especially commented upon by counsel for appellants is the one published in paragraph 9, of the petition, which is couched in the following language: "Markie Worten, in the circuit court yesterday, lost another one of his suits filed against newspapers of this city, this one being that of J. R. Duncan against the New-Democrat Publishing Company. * * * Worten got J. R. Duncan to let him file a suit against the paper, in which Worten formerly owned stock. The suit was instituted, but Markie loses." From time immemorial it has been considered unprofessional for a lawyer to solicit business. This fact is recognized not only by members of the bar, but by the public in general. When, therefore, a news article charges an attorney with soliciting business, we necessarily conclude that it is libelous. Its effect is to charge him with unprofessional conduct, and thus expose him to ridicule or contempt, and injure him in his calling. We are, therefore, of opinion that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to that paragraph containing the publication complained of.

We shall next consider the instructions.

The court, after setting out the alleged libelous articles in the instructions, directed the jury to find against the defendants unless they believed from the evidence that all of said publications were true, or in substance true. Inasmuch as the articles complained of contained several alleged statements of fact which were immaterial in so far as the libels themselves are concerned, it is insisted by counsel for appellants that, under the instructions, the jury were authorized to find for the plaintiff if the immaterial averments were not true, or in substance true, although they might believe that the libelous portions of the articles were true, or in substance true. We do not see any merit in this contention. The jury could not have failed to understand the case which they were called upon to try. The question was, whether the plaintiff was libeled or not. No jury, under the circumstances, would have found for the plaintiff, simply on the ground that the defendants had failed to prove that some immaterial statement contained in the libelous articles, and which contained nothing that reflected upon the character or reputation of the plaintiff, was true, or in substance true. The instructions given were in effect the same as those approved by this court in the case of Louisville Press Co. v. Tenny, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1231. Manifestly the expression "or in substance true" was sufficient to exclude from the consideration of the jury all those immaterial statements of fact which had no real bearing upon the case. The instructions contained the correct measure of damages, as approved by this court in the case of Louisville Press Co. v. Tenny, supra. The jury were furthermore told that, if all the alleged libels were not proved to be true, but that some parts of them were proved to be true, or in substance true, they should consider such as were proved to be true, or in substance true, in mitigation of damages, should they find for the plaintiff. The court also defined compensatory and punitive damages and libel. There was a further provision in the instructions, that the jury should not find for the plaintiff any sum in damages on account of any statements referring to his acts, qualifications or conduct as attorney or solicitor for the city of Paducah, unless they believed that one or more of such statements were not substantially true as published, or were not reasonable and fair criticism of plaintiff's acts, conduct or qualifications as such officer, and were not made in good faith and without malice.

Instruction No. 11, was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that any part of the damage which the plaintiff has sustained, if any, resulted from the filing by him of the actions called the 'chain gang suits,' they will not award him any sum in damages to compensate him for any of the injury or damage caused by plaintiff's said acts." Counsel for appellants complain of this instruction, but it is manifest that it is much more favorable to appellants than it should have been.

We are of opinion that the instructions fairly presented the law of the case, and are not subject to the criticisms contained in the brief of counsel for appellants.

Further complaint is made of the fact that plaintiff below did not declare upon and set forth the entire articles containing the alleged libelous matter. We think the rule is well established, that in pleadings of this character it is only necessary for the plaintiff to set forth that portion of the publication which he considers libelous. The plaintiff makes out his case when he proves the publication of such libelous matter. If, as a matter of fact, the publication contains other matter which has the effect of giving a different meaning to the libelous portion, the defendant has the right, of course, to present to the jury the other portion of the publication so declared upon by the plaintiff, for it may affect the question of malice, and, consequently, the amount of damages.

The record contains many objections and exceptions to the testimony introduced by the plaintiff below. These objections relate principally to the introduction of other publications by the defendants than those upon which this action is based. It is insisted that such other publications are not properly admissible. It has long been the law, that any other words written or spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff, either before or after those sued on, or even after the commencement of the action, are admissible to show the animus of the defendant; and for this purpose it makes no difference whether the words tendered in evidence be themselves actionable or not, or whether they be addressed to the same party as the words sued on or to some one else. (Pearson v. Lemaitre, 5 M. & Gr., 700; 12 L. J. Q. B., 253; 7 Jur., 748; 6 Scott, N. R., 607; Mead v. Daubigny, Peake, 168.) Such other words need not be connected with or refer to the libel or slander sued on; provided they in any way tend to show malice in defendant's mind at the time of publication. (Barrett v. Long, 3 H. L. C., 395; 7 Ir. L. R., 439; 8 Ir. L. R., 331; Bolton v. O'Brien, Ir. L. R., 97, 483.) And not only are such other words admissible in evidence, but also all circumstances attending their publication, the mode and extent of their repetition, &c.; the more the evidence approaches proof of a systematic practice of libeling or slandering the plaintiff, the more convincing it will be. (Bond v. Douglas, 7 C. & P., 626; Barret v. Long, supra.)

In the case of Smith v. Lovelace, 1 Duvall, 215, the rule is thus stated:

"As, in such a case, the degree of malice prompting a slander either aggravates or mitigates the wrong, and consequently may either augment or diminish the rightful damages, proof of reiterated utterances of the same or other defamatory words may be admissible to show the malignity which impelled the publication charged in the suit, and the spirit and intention of its utterance." (1 Greenleaf, section 52, and the cases therein referred to.)

In admitting such evidence, however, the jury should be told, whenever the other words so tendered in evidence are in themselves actionable, that they must not give damages in respect of such other words, because they might be the subject-matter of a separate action. The record in this case shows that all the articles admitted to be read in evidence to the jury, by the trial court, on behalf of the plaintiff that were prior or subsequent in point of time to the articles sued on, were read under proper admonitions of the court. In each instance the jury were told that the articles in question should be considered by them as affecting the question of malice only, and that they should disregard such articles in estimating the damages, should they find for the plaintiff.

Upon the hearing of this case the plaintiff introduced evidence which tended to show that prior to the time of the publications by the defendants, he enjoyed a good law practice; that because of these publications his practice fell off to almost nothing. On the other hand, the defendants' witnesses testified that the falling off of plaintiff's practice was due to his own conduct in filing the 'chain-gang suits against the city of Paducah. Appellants earnestly insist that all the publications made concerning the plaintiff were shown to be true. Under our system, however, questions of fact are for the jury. As the court committed no errors in the admission of testimony, and, as the instructions properly presented the law of the case, the questions, whether or not the publications were true, or in substance true, whether or not they were maliciously made, and whether or not plaintiff was thereby damaged, were all peculiarly within the province of the jury. Being unable to say that their conclusion is flagrantly against the evidence, their finding will not be disturbed.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

MILLER v. JONES, &c.

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Partnership—Notice to Partner—(32 Ky. Law Rep., 1078.)—There being no evidence that M. was a partner of O. in the purchase of the timber involved in this controversy, that part of the former opinion in this case embodying that idea, is withdrawn. While notice to one partner is notice to the other of any transaction occurring after the formation of the partnership, it appears that the parties were not partners at the time O. conveyed the timber.

Lewis McQuown, W. L. Brown, Eli H. Brown and McQuown & Brown for appellant.

Sam C. Hardin for appellees.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

An opinion was delivered by this court, in the above styled action, affirming the judgment of the lower court on Feb. 21, 1908 (32 Ky. Law Rep., 1078), which is referred to and approved with the exceptions hereinafter stated.

It is conceded that M. A. Miller and her husband and agent, H. E. Miller, did not have notice of the re-conveyance of the timber on the one hundred and sixty-two-acre tract of land made in January, 1883, which deed was not recorded until 1905. This court, in its opinion, held that notice to one partner was notice to the other of any transaction occurring after the partnership was formed, which is a correct rule of law, and then concluded that there was sufficient evidence to authorize an affirmance of the judgment upon the ground that Miller and Owsley were partners from the beginning, and that Owsley, while a partner, re-conveyed the timber on this land to Wardrupe, and Miller was presumed to have had notice of the transaction, although he in fact did not know it. After a careful re-consideration of the record, we are of the opinion that in this we erred. Appellant purchased this timber from Owsley in 1903, for a valuable consideration, and as appellees' claim to the timber was evidenced by an unrecorded deed, it was necessary for them to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that appellant, or her agent, had actual notice of their right to the timber before appellant purchased it, to enable them to hold the timber against appellant. The only evidence introduced on this point was given by Uthank Jones, who gave his deposition in 1905, and stated that he had cut timber upon this land for appellant, Miller, and he 'thought' it was twenty-two years before the date he testified, and he 'guessed' that Miller and Owsley were partners. The witness, Merrit Whit, testified that he worked for Miller, at his mill, situated at Hazelpatch, several miles from the land, and that Miller was getting out timber on this tract of land to saw at the mill, and his 'recollection' was that this was between the years 1883 and 1885. Ezekiel Wardrupe testified that Miller got some tan bark on the land about the year 1889. These two witnesses fix the date after the re-conveyance of the timber by Owsley to Wardrupe. The witness Uthank Jones only made a 'guess' as to the time, and he put it twenty-two years prior to September, 1905, the time at which he gave his deposition, which would have placed it September, 1883, and the re-conveyance by Owsley to Wardrupe was made in January, of 1883. This is very slight evidence that Owsley and appellant were partners in this timber from the beginning, and as against this the deed from Wardrupe to Owsley, of 1882, made Owsley the sole vendee, and the conveyance by Owsley, to appellant and Hutchings recited that Owsley was the sole owner of that timber, and the conveyance was made in compliance with a written agreement between Owsley and Miller dated 1886; and the presumption is that if Owsley and Miller were partners, it commenced at that date. In fact, there is no evidence that Miller was a partner of Owsley in the purchase of the timber, nor until after Owsley had re-conveyed it to Wardrupe in January, 1883.

Having arrived at this conclusion that part of the former opinion referred to is withdrawn, and the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and remanded, with directions to the lower court to give judgment in behalf of appellant for the timber on the land referred to.

THOMAS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Housebreaking—Evidence—Motion For New Trial—On the trial of appellant for housebreaking, there was but one question before the jury, and that was one of fact, and the evidence was sufficient to warrant their finding that appellant was guilty. Under section 281, Criminal Code, this court can not reverse for any matter arising on the motion for a new trial, and therefore, affidavits as to newly discovered evidence, filed after the trial, can not be considered on appeal.

J. Franklin Wallace for appellant.

James Breathitt, Tom B. McGregor and Chas. H. Morris for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Alvin Thomas was indicted for housebreaking. He was found guilty and his punishment fixed at one year in the penitentiary. The proof by the Commonwealth, on the trial showed that W. C. Thomas, the father of Alvin Thomas, had a blacksmith shop in Lexington, Kentucky; a man named Green kept his horse in the shop at night. One morning in January when Green went to get his horse, the harness was gone. The door was locked, but one of the windows, which was ordinarily fastened on the inside by a hook, was open about six inches. The staple upon which the hook rested had been drawn out; the plank showed signs of the window having been prized open. The window was closed the night before. The harness was sold that morning by the defendant, Alvin Thomas(to a man named Lawrence, for $2. The defendant admitted, on the trial, that he had stolen the harness and sold it; but pleaded that he had done this while he was drinking. He said that he did not break into the shop; that he had a key to the shop with which he unlocked the door and that he had spent the night there; that in the morning, when he went out he took the harness with him and sold it. He produced on the trial the key with which he said he unlocked the shop; but the officer who arrested him testified that he had searched him and that he had no key. The father of the defendant said that he had tools in the shop, and had a key to it and had the right to go in whenever he wanted to. It however, appeared from the father's evidence that he had no key to the shop at the time of the trial, and it was evidently the claim of the Commonwealth that the father had given the son the key which he had and produced on the trial. Under the instructions which aptly submitted the question to them, the jury found the defendant guilty. Under the instructions and the evidence there was but one question before the jury and that was: Did the defendant break into the shop by going in through the window or did he have a key to the shop and go in regularly through the door, having a right to enter the shop? There was sufficient evidence before the jury to warrant them in their finding although the evidence was by no means conclusive. There was no error of the circuit court in the admission or the rejection of evidence. After the trial was over the defendant filed with his motion for new trial, numerous affidavits as to newly discovered evidence. If this evidence had been produced on the trial, the verdict of the jury might have been different, but under section 281, of the Criminal Code, this court can not reverse for any matter arising on the motion for new trial; and therefore, we can not consider these matters at all.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. BERRY.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Injury to Pedestrian on Track—Run Over by Hand Car—Evidence—Incompetency—On the trial of an action against a railroad for damages by one run over by a hand car, while walking on a railroad track, evidence that the foreman told the men in charge of the handcar to make a quick trip was incompetent as the mere direction to make a quick trip is not evidence of excessive speed.

2. Lookout Duty—Incompetent Men—Defective Appliances—Wherever a lookout duty is imposed, the further duty is imposed to have the train properly manned and properly equipped. A lookout duty would avail nothing, if, because of incompetent men or defective machinery, and appliances, the train or car could not be stopped.

3. Same—Punitive Damages—Erroneous Instructions—In an action for damages by one injured by being run over by a hand-car while walking on a railroad track, the instructions were erroneous that did not impose on the plaintiff the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety, and an instruction authorizing punitive damages is erroneous where there was no evidence tending to show gross negligence in the railroad company's employes.

Benjamin D. Warfield and J. D. Black for appellant.

J. M. Robsion for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellee, W. F. Berry, instituted this action in the Knox Circuit Court against appellant, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been due to its negligence in running a hand-car over him. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellee in the sum of $2,150, and the railroad company appeals.

Appellant asks for a reversal on the following grounds: First, the admission of incompetent evidence; second, errors in giving and refusing instructions; third, the verdict is not sustained by the evidence; fourth, the verdict is excessive. Before passing upon these questions, it will be necessary to give a brief statement of the facts.

Corbin is a town of 4,000 inhabitants. Appellant's depot is located near Center street. On each side of the depot, but some distance therefrom, a street is located. As appellant's two main tracks approach Corbin from the north, they diverge as they get near to the depot; then one track passes to the east, and the other to the west of the depot. After passing around the depot, they converge as they approach Center street. The main track on the east is called the "C. V." track, while the main track on the west is known as the "K. D." track. Connected with each of these main tracks is a switching track, thus making two tracks on each side of the depot. There was testimony to the effect that the public in general had been accustomed, for a long time to use the railroad tracks, between Center street and the depot, in going to and from the depot, and that this customary use of the tracks was with the knowledge and acquiescence of the company.

On the occasion of the accident, appellee had been to the express office, which is located in appellant's depot. After attending to the business which he had in hand, he started toward Center street, between the "C. V." and "K. D." tracks. As he approached Center street, the space between these tracks became gradually less. At this moment, a freight train approached on the "K. D." track. Appellee, claiming that he felt unsafe between the tracks, moved over on the "C. V." track and had proceeded southward about twenty or thirty steps when he was struck from the rear by appellant's hand-car. He also claims that he looked to the north before he crossed over to the "C. V." track, and did not see the hand-car. Appellee alleges that he was badly bruised across the small of his back; that his hip was dislocated and his knee turned in, and that his thigh and knee were bruised all the way down. The other knee was cut two and a half inches to the bone. He was also bruised on the back of his hand and on the side of his neck, and had some little bruises on his head. His thigh-bone was pulled out of the socket. He suffered for a long time from his injuries, and is still suffering from them.

Without detailing the facts more at length, we shall consider appellant's objections to the evidence.

The court permitted the men in charge of the hand-car to testify that the foreman told them to make a quick trip. This evidence was clearly inadmissible, as the mere direction to make a quick trip can not be considered as evidence of excessive speed.

The court also permitted several witnesses to testify as to the amount of travel on the various streets of Corbin. This was irrelevant to the issue. On this point the only issue was the amount of travel on appellant's tracks between Center street and the depot, and the evidence should have been confined to this issue alone.

The court further permitted certain witnesses to testify to the incompetency and inexperience of those in charge of the hand-car, as well as to the defective condition of the brakes on the hand-car. It is true that this court has laid down the rule that a trespasser upon the tracks of a railroad company, who is injured by the company's train, can not complain of the size or weight of the train, or of the insufficiency of its machinery or brakes, or of the fact that it was improperly manned. (Brown's Adm'r v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 144.) It does not appear, however, that the railroad company in that case owed a lookout duty.

Wherever a lookout duty is imposed, we are of the opinion that the further duty to have the train properly manned and equipped is also imposed. A lookout duty would avail nothing, if because of incompetent men or defective machinery and appliances, the train or car could not be stopped. We therefore, conclude that the court did not err in admitting the testimony complained of.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"No. 1. If you shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was walking on or near the defendant's railroad track between its station and Center street, in Corbin, Kentucky, and that the people of Corbin and vicinity, as well as the traveling public, generally, had been in the regular habit of walking along and over the defendant's railroad tracks at that point and along the same between its depot and express office and Center street in Corbin, Kentucky, for many years and for a time sufficient as that the agents and servants of defendant and its superintendent in charge of its depot grounds and railroad tracks at that point knew of such regular and habitual use of the public generally and had known same before the time complained of herein, and that plaintiff moved from the space between the defendant's railway track on to another railroad track, in order to avoid a passing freight train and that while such train was passing and while he was on such other railroad track, the defendant by its agents and servants, ran a hand-car up behind plaintiff at a time when he was not noticing and did not know of the approach of such car and could not hear the approach thereof by reason of the noise made by such passing freight train, and that the agents and servants of defendant in charge of such hand-car saw the plaintiff and saw and understood that he did not know of the approach of such hand-car in time to have stopped such hand-car and in time to have thereby prevented its running over or against the plaintiff, or that they might have seen and understood that the plaintiff did not know of the approach of such hand-car, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, in time to have avoided running the same against him, or that the agents of the defendant saw the plaintiff and saw and understood that he did not know of the approach of such hand-car and that the brake on such car was defective or broken and useless so as that those in charge of the car, after they had seen the peril of the plaintiff, in time to stop the same and prevent his injury, if they did so do, but could not do so by reason of the defect of the brake on the car, then you ought to find for the plaintiff such a sum in damages as is a fair equivalent in money for the mental and physical pain, if any, as it is reasonably certain, from the evidence, that he will hereafter endure by reason of such injury, if any, and a fair equivalent for the permanent impairment of his ability to earn wages by work or labor as is the proximate result of his injuries, and such a sum as the plaintiff may have expended for medication, not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars in that behalf, and if you shall further believe from the evidence that the agents and servants of the defendant in charge of such hand-car were grossly negligent in running the same against the plaintiff, if they did so do, then you may in your discretion, give the plaintiff a such further sum by way of punitive damages and by way of punishment for the wrongs and injuries done the plaintiff, if any, as may seem just and proper to you, not exceeding in all, the sum of ten thousand dollars for damages and one hundred and fifty dollars for medication, the amount claimed in the petition.

"No. 2. (A.) Gross neglect, or gross negligence, within the meaning of the terms as used in instruction No. 1, above, is the absence of slight care.

"(B.) Ordinary care and prudence, within the meaning of the terms as used in instruction No. 1, above, is such care as an ordinarily prudent man usually exercises under the same or similar circumstances.

"No. 3. Unless you shall believe as required by instruction No. 1, above, you will find for the defendant; or if you shall believe from the evidence that plaintiff went upon the railroad tracks of the defendant at a place he knew the defendant was in the habit of running its cars and trains, and that while walking thereon, he saw or heard the approach of the hand-car, mentioned in evidence, in time to have stepped off the track and prevented the injury, and failed to do so, then he was, himself, negligent, and you ought to find for the defendant.

"No. 4. If you all agree upon a verdict, you will sign it by your foreman. If you do not all agree, but as many as nine or more of you and less than twelve can agree, then you may bring a verdict, but those who bring it must sign it. Less than nine of you can not bring a verdict."

It will not be necessary to discuss these instructions at length. Suffice it to say that they did not impose upon appellee the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety. Instruction No. 1, authorizes the jury to give punitive damages. This instruction was erroneous, because there was no evidence tending to show that appellant was guilty of gross negligence. Upon the next trial the court will instruct the jury as follows:

No. 1. If you believe from the evidence that the defendants tracks between Center street and its depot in Corbin, Kentucky, were habitually used by the public in going to and from Center street to its depot, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant, then it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary care to discover the presence of such persons on its said tracks, and to use ordinary care to avoid injuring them after discovering their peril. And if, upon the occasion in question, you believe from the evidence that while plaintiff was walking along defendant's said tracks, the defendant, its agents or servants, failed to use ordinary care to discover the presence of plaintiff, or failed to use ordinary care to avoid injuring plaintiff after the discovery of his peril, and that by reason of such failure, if any, on the part of the defendant, its hand-car was run against plaintiff, and plaintiff was thereby injured, you will find for the plaintiff. If, however, you believe that plaintiff went upon defendant's tracks at a time and place when defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have discovered plaintiff's peril in time to avoid injuring him, you will find for the defendant.

"No. 2. It was the duty of the plaintiff in going upon and walking along defendant's tracks, to exercise such care as may be usually expected of an ordinarily prudent person to learn of the approach of defendant's cars or hand-car, and keep out of their way; and if he failed to exercise such care, and, but for this, would not have been injured, the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find.

"No. 3. If you find for the plaintiff, you will award him such damages as will fairly compensate him for his physical and mental suffering, if any; for his reasonable physician and medical bills, if any, not exceeding the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars; and for the permanent impairment, if any, of his power to earn money, that may have directly resulted from his injuries, but not exceeding in all, the sum of ten thousand dollars—the amount claimed in his petition.

"4. Ordinary care, within the meaning of these instructions, is such care as an ordinarily prudent person usually exercises under the same or similar circumstances."

In view of the conclusion of the court, it will be unnecessary to discuss the other errors assigned.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

MCCORMACK v. CITY OF HENDERSON.

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

A city ordinance providing for the sprinkling of streets, at the expense of abutting lot owners, the cost being made a lien upon the abutting lots, according to their frontage on the street, is unconstitutional and void. (City of Henderson v. Sweeney, decided June 17, 1908.)

Thos. E. Ward for appellant.

Jas. W. Clay and Clay & Clay for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

This appeal involves the validity of an ordinance of the city of Henderson, providing for the sprinkling of certain streets of that city at the expense of the owners of lots abutting thereon, the cost of such sprinkling being made a lien upon the abutting lots at the rate per front foot, apportioned to each by a proper survey and assessment. It is admitted that the street in front of each of the appellant's lots was sprinkled as provided by the ordinance; that the cost thereof was properly assessed against and apportioned to each lot as therein required, and that the bills against appellants were required by the tax collector for collection. Appellants contending that the ordinance was unconstitutional and void, brought suit to enjoin the collection of the tax. The circuit court held the ordinance constitutional and the assessment valid; therefore, the injunction was dissolved and the action dismissed. To reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

In the case of City of Owensboro v. James J. Sweeney, decided June 17, 1908, an ordinance of the city of Owensboro, identical in its provisions, meaning and object with the one before us, was involved. It, too, was assailed upon the ground here urged. This court held the ordinance unconstitutional. The reasons for so holding are set forth by the opinion with exceptional force and clearness. The case was considered by the whole court. Not only are the two ordinances alike, but the cities of Owensboro and Henderson belong to the same class, both being in the third class. The decision in that case is conclusive of this and the elaborateness of the opinion exhausts the subject and makes it unnecessary to extend this opinion beyond its present limits.

Upon the authority of the opinion in the case, supra, the judgment herein is reversed, with the directions to the circuit court to set aside the former judgment and in lieu thereof enter one perpetuating the injunction.

L. & N. R. R. CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Intoxicating Liquors—Shipping to Local Option Territory—Package—Quantity—Druggists—Under the act of March 21st, 1906, in reference to public or private carriers, or other persons bringing intoxicating liquors into local option territory in unbroken packages not to exceed five gallons at one time, a druggist, may have an unbroken package, not exceeding five gallons shipped to him, and at the same time a five gallon package of alcohol or wine to be used in his business as druggist.

2. Same—Object of Act—Construction—Evasion—The purpose of the act was not to prevent the druggist from keeping up his stock but to prevent him from buying at any time, more than five gallons of any one intoxicant. If he should have more than one package of the same liquor shipped to him at one time, it would be an evasion of the act, but he may have as many packages as he needs of the different kinds shipped to him at the same time.

Chas. H. Moorman, Benjamin D. Warfield and Sims, DuBose & Rodes for appellant.

James Breathitt and Theo. B. Blakey for appellee.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

The act of March 21, 1906, contains among other things, these provisions (Act of 1906, page 320):

"It shall be unlawful for any person or persons, individual or corporation, public or private carrier to bring into, transfer to other person or persons, corporations, carrier or agent, deliver or distribute, in any county, district, precinct, town or city, where the sale of intoxicating liquors had been prohibited, or may be prohibited, whether by special act of the General Assembly, or by vote of the people under the local option law, any spirituous, vinous, malt or other intoxicating liquor, regardless of the name by which it may be called; and this act shall apply to all packages of such intoxicating liquors whether broken or unbroken."

"Provided, Individuals may bring into such district, upon their person or as their personal baggage, and for their private use, such liquors in quantity not to exceed one gallon: And Provided, The provisions of this act shall not apply to licensed physicians or druggists, to whom any public carrier may deliver such goods, in unbroken packages, in quantity not to exceed five gallons at any one time.

"2. Each package of such spirituous, vinous, malt or other intoxicating liquor, regardless of the name by which it may be called, whether broken or unbroken packages, brought into and transferred to other person, corporation, carrier or agent, delivered or distributed in such local option territory, shall constitute a separate offense."

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was indicted under this act for delivering to Leach & Ellis, licensed druggists at Glasgow, Ky., where the local option law is in force, a consignment consisting of five boxes of drugs, two boxes of ink, one box of whisky, and one box of grain alcohol, the box of whisky containing five gallons and the box of grain alcohol containing less than five gallons; but there was in the consignment more than five gallons of whisky and grain alcohol altogether. On these facts the circuit court fined the railroad company $60, and it appeals.

The question for decision is whether the delivery of the alcohol and whisky in unbroken packages which each contained not more than five gallons was a violation of the law because both of the packages were delivered at one time?

In construing a statute we must look to the reason for its enactment, and the evil which it was intended to remedy. It is a matter of common knowledge that where the local option law was put into effect in many communities whisky was sold largely in the drug stores, so that the trade was simply shifted from the saloonkeeper to the druggist. To remedy this, restrictions from time to time have been made by the Legislature upon the power of druggists to sell intoxicants in local option districts. The Legislature recognized that grain alcohol, whisky, brandy, wine and other intoxicating liquors were often necessary in time of sickness, and so, in the act in question, licensed physicians and druggists were excepted out of its operation. But it was seen that if there was no limit to the exception, druggists might evade the statute and so the carrier was only allowed to deliver the goods in unbroken packages in quantity not to exceed five gallons at one time, and by the second section each package should constitute a separate offense. The unit which the act has in mind, is the package, and the provision is that the package must not exceed five gallons. If a druggist might have shipped to him: a barrel of whisky at one time, there would be much more temptation to him to violate the local option law, than if he was required to have the goods shipped to him in small quantities. A properly supplied druggist must keep on hand alcohol for the compounding of medicines. He often needs whisky or brandy or wine in the filling of prescriptions. It was not the purpose of the act to cripple the drug stores and thus disable them from properly fulfilling their duties to the sick; and if a druggist could have no more than one kind of intoxicating liquor delivered to him at one time, hardship might result. This is not the meaning of the act. A druggist may have an unbroken package, not exceeding five gallons of whisky shipped to him and at the same time a five gallon package of alcohol or wine. The purpose of the act was not to prevent the druggist from keeping up his stock, but simply to prevent him from buying at any time, more than five gallons of any of these intoxicants. If a druggist should have more than one package of the same liquor shipped to himself at one time, this would be an evasion of the act; but he may have as many packages as he needs of the different things shipped to him at one time.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the prosecution.

EASTERN KY. COAL LANDS CORPORATION v. COMMONWEALTH.

TWYMAN v. COMMONWEALTH.

GILL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Lands—Failure to List for Taxation—Forfeiture of Title—Act of March 15, 1906, Ky. Legislature—Constitutionality—The questions involved in this action have heretofore been fully considered in former appeals of Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth (32 Ky. Law Rep., 129), and Ky. Union Company v. Commonwealth, decided March 25, 1908, to which reference is made. In conformity with those opinions we hold that article three of the act of the Kentucky Legislature of March 15, 1900, as construed by this court, does not violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution denying the passage by any State of ex post facto laws, or laws impairing the obligations of contracts, or laws denying in any person the equal protection of the law or depriving any person of his property without due process of law.

Wehle & Wehle and L. B. Wehle for appellant Gill.

Kohn, Baird, Sloss & Kohn, Hager & Stewart, Thos. H. Paynter, James Breathitt and J. Morgan Chinn for appellee Commonwealth.

Appeals from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirmed in part and reversed in part.

These appeals were sued out upon the same record, involve the same questions, were argued, and will be considered together. Under the provisions of article three of the act of the Legislature, entitled, "Revenue and Taxation," approved March 15, 1906, the Commonwealth of Kentucky filed its petition in equity in the Pike Circuit Court against appellants, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation, J. C. Twyman, and others, seeking to forfeit the title of appellants to the lands described in the petition upon the alleged ground that they had not complied with the provisions of the article with respect to the listing of the same and payment of taxes thereon as of September 15, 1901, September 15, 1902, September 15, 1903, September 1, 1904, and September 1, 1905. Appellants, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation and J. C. Twyman were served with process. Appellants, G. B. Gill, &c., were made defendants as unknown defendants, owners and claimants, as authorized by the article and were constructively served with process by warning order, as required by the Code against non-resident and absent defendants, and also by publication, as required by the Act.

The petition described the land, the title to which was sought to be forfeited, by giving the patents, their dates, where recorded, and number of acres contained in each. It also described the land by metes and bounds, courses and distances; and there was filed with it copies of each of the patents, containing in the aggregate over 300,000 acres. It was further alleged that the defendants, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation, J. C. Twyman and the unknown and absent defendants were the owners or claimants of the land under the patents named, and that neither the original patentees nor any person in privity with them, nor the Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation, J. C. Twyman, nor the other named but not appealing defendants, nor the unknown defendants had ever listed the land, or any part of it, for taxation, or paid any taxes thereon, alleging specifically that they had so failed to list or pay taxes thereon levyable and assessable as of the dates above named. Appellants, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation and J. C. Twyman, filed general demurrers to the petition. After these had been overruled they filed separate answers; the former setting up claim to all of the land described in the petition; the latter claiming, in connection with the other heirs of one Reuben Twyman, one of the three patentees named in one of the patents to be the owner of the land described in that patent, containing about 7,500 acres.

The answer of the corporation, in addition to traversing some of the allegations of the petition, pleaded affirmatively that, in compliance with the provisions of article three, it had filed its petition in the County Court of Pike county before January 1, 1907, seeking to have the land claimed by it assessed as of said dates, and filed therewith copies of the proceedings, in that action in the county court and upon appeal in the circuit court. By this record it was shown that the corporation appellant, in December, 1907, had filed its petition in the Pike County Court, claiming to comply with the provisions of the act, and at the same time attacking its constitutionality; that the county court, denying the sufficiency of the petition, but sustaining the validity of the act, dismissed the petition; and that a similar judgment had been entered in the circuit court upon appeal to it.

The answer of J. C. Twyman was similar in all material respects, but he prosecuted no appeal to the circuit court from the judgment of the county court. While the action of the Commonwealth v. Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation, J. C. Twyman, and others, seeking to forfeit their title was pending, and before trial and judgment, this court, in the case of Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 129, affirmed the judgment of the Pike Circuit Court in dismissing the petition of said corporation to list, upon the ground that it did not comply with the mandatory provisions of the act, and sustaining the constitutionality of article three, upon which this forfeiture proceeding is now based. The suit in equity was thereupon tried before a jury, as the act provides it shall be, and a verdict having been rendered in favor of the Commonwealth against all defendants, judgment was entered forfeiting the title of appellants and each and all defendants to the land described in the petition under the patents named. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is shown by the evidence that neither appellants nor any of the defendants, nor the original patentees, nor any person in privity with their title, either listed the property as of September 15, 1901, September 15, 1902, September 15, 1903, September 1, 1904 and September 1, 1905, or paid any taxes thereon levyable and assessable as of said dates, nor paid any taxes whatever thereon since the year 1825, although the patents were issued prior to the year 1800, in fact the majority of them were issued by the State of Virginia prior to the year 1792, when Kentucky became a State. Prior to the year 1825 there was only an intermittent listing and payment of taxes upon some of the patents, the whole amount so paid not exceeding, perhaps, $100.00.

The various objections to the act upon constitutional grounds were urged in the original appeal of Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 129, and in the case of Kentucky Union Company v. Commonwealth, decided March 25, 1908, not only upon oral argument, but also in exhaustive briefs filed on behalf of appellants upon the appeal, and again with the petition for re-hearing. Because of the importance of the questions involved, the time for oral argument was extended in each case, and the questions presented in argument and brief received careful consideration. In each of these cases we concluded that the act in question violated no provision of the Constitution, either Federal or State. This conclusion is not shaken by the able re-argument on this appeal, and we now approve of and adhere to the opinions in those cases. In conformity with those opinions we hold that article three, as construed by this court, does not violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution denying the passage by any State of ex post facto laws, laws impairing the obligations of contracts, or laws denying to any person the equal protection of the law, or depriving any person of his property without due process of law. This construction of said article is abundantly supported by the following authorities:

Polk v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, &c., 207 U. S., 310; Soper v. Lawrence Bros., 201 U. S., 359; Kelly v. City of Pittsburg, 104 U. S., 78; Fay v. Crozier, 156 Fed., 496; Asbill v. State of Kansas, U. S. Supreme Court, March 23, 1908; King v. Mullins, 171 U. S., 404; Reed v. Dingess, 60 Fed., 21-24.

The opinions in the former appeal of Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation and Kentucky Union Company v. Commonwealth, do not conflict with the cases of Commonwealth v. Ingalls, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 164, and Spalding, Revenue Agent v. O'Callahan's Executrix, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 629, relied upon by appellants. In those cases, the effort was to list the same property for the same years in the name of different persons in privity with each other—a pure sample of double taxation. It was held that such was not the intention of the Legislature and that the Commonwealth, like any other litigant, would not be allowed to play fast and loose. In argument it was admitted by appellee that the lower court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the answer of Twyman. This answer set out at length the petition filed by him in the county court. In this the land which he sought to have listed was specifically described so it could be identified. He sought to list the whole tract, without indefinite exclusions or exceptions; he did not seek to shift to the court the burden imposed upon him by the act; so far as his petition disclosed, he was the owner of the entire tract which he sought to list, and not merely such parts thereof as were not owned by others. His petition was unlike that of appellant, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation. He was seeking to avail himself of the provisions of the act and had done all that could be reasonably required of him.

Appellants, G. B. Gill, &c., did not appear in the lower court, but sued out an original appeal in this court. The action against them not only conformed to the provisions of the Code as against non-resident and absent defendants, but also to the additional requirements of the act as against such defendants, and they are bound by it.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed as against appellants, Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation, G. B. Gill, &c., but reversed as to appellant, J. C. Twyman, and remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Judge Hobson does not dissent from the opinion because he deems the matters concluded by the former opinions of the court, although he adheres to the conclusions stated in his dissenting opinion in those cases.

RENSHAW v. COOK.

(Filed June 20th, 1908—Not to be reported.)

S. Y. Trimble, Downer & Russell, Trimble & Bell for plaintiff.

McQuown & Beckham and John C. Duffy for defendant.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Dissenting opinion by Judge Hobson.

The facts of the case are these: David Smith was elected Sheriff of Christian county at the November election, 1905. He qualified and gave bond. In the fall of 1907, the fiscal court appointed Frank Rives as commissioner to settle with Smith as sheriff. Smith got his papers ready; but before the settlement was made, Rives, who was a member of the State Senate, came to Frankfort to attend the session of the Legislature. He remained in Frankfort until the Legislature adjourned, something after the middle of March. Smith being unable to get his settlement made, as Rives was absent, saw the county judge. A new act had been passed requiring a sheriff to have a quietus from the fiscal court. Smith could not get his quietus as the settlement had not been made; so he went to the county judge asking if he would allow him to renew his bond before he got his quietus. The county judge said no, but he would give him time after the first of March to execute his bond. Smith, relying upon this statement of the county judge was waiting until his settlement was made so that he could get his quietus, when without notice to him, the county judge made an order removing him from office, and appointing Renshaw in his place. When this was done, the bonds that Smith had given were amply good for all the liabilities which he was under and he was prepared on that day to execute a bond if he had been allowed to do so. The county judge denies that he told Smith what Smith says; but Smith is sustained by the oath of two bystanders and so as the case stands, it must be concluded at least that Smith was misled by the county judge. In Mechem on Public Offices, sec. 454, after stating the rule as to offices held at pleasure, the learned author says:

"But on the other hand, where the appointment or election is made for a definite term or during good behavior, and the removal is to be for cause, it is now clearly established by the great weight of authority that the power of removal can not, except by clear statutory authority, be exercised without notice and hearing, but that the existence of the cause, for which the power is to be exercised, must first be determined after notice has been given to the officer of the charges made against him, and he has been given an opportunity to be heard in his defense."

In no State in the Union has this doctrine been maintained with more vigor than in Kentucky. In Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 648, where the Governor had removed the Secretary of State without notice the order was held void. This opinion was followed in Todd v. Dunlap, 99 Ky. Law Rep., 460, and was recognized in Stokes v. Fitz- patrick, 1 Met. 142, and Johnson v. Ginn Co., 105 Ky., 654. The court undertakes to distinguish this case from those cases by saying that failure to execute a bond makes a vacancy in the office. Unfortunately for the court the statute does not so provide. The statutes now on the subject are the same as when the case of Schuff v. Pflanz, 99 Ky., 97, was decided. This is shown by the opinion by Judge Barker which is copied into the opinion of the court. One section of the statute provides that on the failure of the sheriff "to execute bond and qualify as hereinbefore provided he shall forfeit his office." Another provision of the statute is in these words:

"It shall be the duty of the county court to cause the sheriff, annually, to renew his bond required by this chapter, and oftener, if the court may deem proper; and upon his failure to do so, the court shall enter up an order suspending him from acting until he gives said bond, or the court may vacate his office."

With these two provisions of the statute, before it, this court, in schuff v. Pflanz, thus construed it:

"Section 4143 provides: 'On the failure of the sheriff to execute bond and qualify, as hereinbefore provided, he shall forfeit his office.'

"The right of forfeiture under this section is made to depend upon his failure to qualify; and, by section 4130, he is permitted to execute bond at any time before the first of January, Pflanz, as appears, did qualify in the proper time, by giving bond satisfactory to the county court, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, but failed to execute his annual bond on or before the first Monday in January, 1896, and it is maintained that the failure to execute this bond worked a forfeiture and authorized the county judge to declare the office vacant.

"Pflanz was still in the office of sheriff; had qualified with the execution of a bond that afforded ample protection to the State and the county for all the revenue that might come to his hands. The sureties on his bond at the date of his qualification, bound themselves as such for and during the entire term of his office. This bond, provided for by section 4133, was not for the collection and payment over of the revenue for the year 1895, but stipulates that 'we, A. B., sheriff, and C. D. and E. F., his sureties, bind and obligate ourselves jointly and severally to the Commonwealth of Kentucky, that the said A. B., sheriff, shall faithfully perform his duties, &c.' And the next sections (4134) empowers the county to require the sheriff to give an additional bond or bonds where the interest of the State or county demands it. And the sureties on all the bonds shall be jointly and severally liable, for any default of the sheriff during the term in which said bond may be executed, whether the liability accrued before or after the execution of the bond or bonds. These bonds are not taken for one year, but bind the sureties for any default during the term for which they may be executed; and it can not well be said the sureties in these additional bonds are liable for the whole term and those on the original bonds are liable for one year only. So we have a case where the qualification has been perfect and complete and a statute providing only that a failure to execute bond and qualify shall forfeit the office. Qualification means the execution of the bond, the oath of office. The question then arises, if the sheriff fails to give this annual bond for the collection of the revenue, can the county judge declare the office vacant?

"The sheriff is required to give two bonds—one for the collection of the revenue and the other known as the general official bond.

"Under the title of 'Sheriffs,' section 4557, it is provided: 'It shall be the duty of the county court to cause the sheriff, annually to renew his bond required by this chapter, and oftener if the court may deem proper, and upon his failure to do so, the court shall enter up an order, suspending him from acting until he gives said bond, or the court may vacate his office.'

"This statute should be construed in connection with the revenue statute, and it is manifest that a fair interpretation of the legislative meaning is that, upon the failure to execute any bond required of this official, for the protection of the State, county, or citizen, the county court may remove him from office; and particularly where by statute it is made the plain duty of the official to execute the bond on a particular day. The duty then devolves on the sheriff and he must comply with the law; but it does not follow because the sheriff fails to renew his general bond or to give an annual bond for the collection of the revenue, that the county judge is powerless to accept a bond after the first Monday in January. He may, it is true, vacate the office but before he does this, he accepts a bond that is in addition to or a new bond, upon which the last sureties became jointly liable with the sureties on the first bond. It is a bond sufficient to satisfy the court that all will be protected who are interested in its execution, and when accepted, the sheriff having previously qualified, it is then too late to enter an order vacating the office."

The Legislature has since re-enacted the statute, and so must be conclusively presumed to have re-enacted it under the construction which it received from this court. If the Legislature had been dissatisfied with the statute as construed by this court, it must be presumed that it would have changed it. Nothing can be plainer than that what we have quoted from Schuff v. Pflanz, shows that the sheriff's office was not rendered ipso facto vacant or forfeited by his failure to execute the renewal bond. Smith did not fail to execute bond and qualify. As he had executed bond and qualified two years before this trouble arose, his whole failure here was to execute a renewal bond. The statute plainly recognizes that his office does not become vacant upon his failure to execute the bond; for the language is "upon his failure so to do, the court may enter up an order suspending him from acting until he gives said bond, or the court may vacate his office." That the court has power under this statute to vacate his office is admitted; but that is a very different thing from saying that his office is vacant when he fails to execute his bond and before the court makes any order. The power of the court to vacate his office depends upon its jurisdiction over him. His office is not vacated until it is vacated by the court, and the court has no jurisdiction to make any order until it obtains jurisdiction over him by notice to him. I concede the doctrine that where the statute so provides an officer may be removed without notice, because he takes the office subject to this condition; but the statute in this case does not so provide. The county court is given a discretion. It may suspend the sheriff until he executes bond, which plainly implies that he may execute it after the time has passed in which it should have been given. The power given the county court to suspend the sheriff "from acting until he gives said bond," necessarily implies that the sheriff acts unless suspended; and, as the statute confers upon the county court a discretion, manifestly, the defendant must have notice that he may show to the county court how that discretion should be exercised. The cardinal error of the court is in this, that it overlooks the rule that the officer is entitled to notice unless the statute expressly otherwise provides. The statute here not only does not expressly or otherwise provide, but its provisions show, beyond controversy, that it contemplates judicial action by the county court; and judicial action can not be taken against any one unless he is before the court. The case in hand well illustrates this. Who can believe that any self-respecting county judge would have removed a sheriff from office when the sheriff proved to him by two witnesses, that he had told him that he could not execute his renewal bonds until he got his quietus, and that he would give him time to execute the bonds and also showed him that he had his sureties at hand and was prepared to give the bonds. Under the former statute the sheriff was required to execute his bonds by a certain time, and if he failed to execute his bonds, the office became vacant. The Legislature intentionally changed the rule and this court so declared in Schuff v. Pflanz. The statute, which was then in force, having been since re-enacted, should now receive the same construction as was then given it by the court.

The case which Judge Cook had before him when he granted the injunction now complained of, was entirely a different case from that before Judge Barker. An appeal had been taken from the order of the county court to the circuit court. If the circuit court had jurisdiction, the county judge had no authority to make any orders in a matter that had been appealed to the circuit court. The county judge was a defendant to Smith's suit, and was, therefore, not qualified to sit in the case in which he proposed to act. The circuit court made his order under facts which were not before Judge Barker at all. That an appeal may be taken to the circuit court under section 978, Kentucky Statutes, from an order of the county court vacating the office of a sheriff depends upon whether the amount in controversy is over $50. The court draws a distinction between "amount" in controversy and "value" in controversy. This is too fine to be substantial. The meaning of the Legislature is the same, the only reason that "amount" is used the second time in place of "value" is that the writer wished to avoid tautology. There is no substantial difference in the sense. Under a precisely similar provision the United States Supreme Court has repeatedly sustained appeals. The question was fully discussed by the Supreme Court of West Virginia in the case of Dryden v. Swinburne, 15 W. Va., 246. Many authorities are collected in that opinion, and no contrary authority has been referred to. In Boyd Co. v. Ross, 95 Ky., 167, an appeal was taken from the county court to the circuit court from an order approving a sheriff's bond and from the circuit court it was brought to this court, this court taking jurisdiction and affirming the judgment of the circuit court which had set aside the order of the county court. Certainly there is no distinction, so far as section 978 goes, between an order approving a sheriff's bond and an order removing a sheriff. If an appeal may be taken in one case because the amount in controversy is over $50, how can it be said that an appeal can not be taken in the other, under the same statute? To say that the statute does not contemplate an appeal in such cases is to beg the whole question; for there is nothing in the statute except the general provision, and a provision that in certain other cases appeals may be taken from the orders of the county court without regard to amount.

The sheriff's sureties in his old bond continue bound, and, in order to appeal, he must execute a bond that he will perform the judgment of the court so there can not possibly be any loss.

The holding in the opinion that a circuit judge is bound by the opinion of a judge of this court where the facts are the same, leads to some very peculiar consequences. If the circuit court does what he is required to do, his judgment can not be reversed on appeal; for certainly it would not be held that a circuit court should do the vain thing of entering a judgment so that it might be reversed in the Court of Appeals. If the circuit court decides as he is bound to decide, his judgment is right, and can not be reversed by this court; but certainly the court does not mean that the opinion of one judge of this court would be binding upon this court, if the case, in the regular course of events, reaches this court. The rule has heretofore been that all decisions of the court on interlocutory motions were subject to be changed by the court in entering a final judgment. Thus it has been held that if the court sustains or dissolves an injunction, he may, when he comes to enter his final judgment, disregard his order entered on the injunction; although made on a motion to dissolve the injunction on the whole case. The order of a judge of this court in dissolving an injunction granted by a circuit court, is of no more authority than a similar order made in the first place by the circuit court. The circuit judge may not, in that action by an interlocutory order, disregard the order of a judge of this court; but when he comes to enter his final judgment, this interlocutory order is no more binding on him than any other interlocutory order made in the case. (Matthews v. Rogers, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 905.)

For these reasons I dissent from the opinion of the court.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Chief Justice O'Rear delivered the following dissenting opinion:

While admitting the scope of the police power in the State to regulate the ownership and control of property within its borders so as to minimize the injuries that may be inflicted on others because of the predatory nature of the property, still I am unable to go as far as the majority opinion does in this case. One man's property may need regulation for the public safety, but that is far from meaning that it may be taken from him and given to somebody else. Admitting that the Legislature has the power to impose a tax upon dogs as a police regulation, the tax can not be imposed, in my judgment, for the benefit of a few persons, or for any special class of persons, for the State is as powerless to take one citizen's property and confer it upon another, under the guise of police regulation, as it is under the tax regulation. By whatever name you call the act it is the same, if the inevitable result is the same. It will not be maintained that a tax could be levied upon sheep, and the sum realized given over to those who raise horses alone, upon the idea that the horse-raising industry was of more benefit to the State than sheep husbandry. Nor would the fact that the State could appropriate its general revenues to fairs at which horses alone were exhibited, as a means of stimulating an enterprise that would be beneficial to the whole State, affect the question, in my opinion. Dogs are personal property. (Section 66, Kentucky Statutes; Commonwealth v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky., 681; 8 Ky. Law Rep., 586.) The State may regulate their ownership, as it may any other property; but I deny that it can regulate the ownership so as to confer the sole benefit directly and exclusively upon any other class of property. Nor can the fact that one class of property sometimes preys upon another class justify such legislation. Hogs are also a danger to other property. They may break into fields of corn and other grain and destroy them. Consequently, the State may regulate the ownership of hogs, by requiring them to be kept up by their owners; and may impose a liability on such owners for their depredation; but has the State the power to impose a license tax on hogs for the benefit of all who raise corn, or even of those engaged in raising corn who suffer damage by breachy hogs? The imposition of a tax upon a class of property is to that extent the taking of that much of the property taxed, whether the tax be for revenue or for police regulation. And whether one or the other, it must be for the public. The exercise of every power of government is necessarily for the public. Hence, private property can not be taken by the government for any other than a public use. The exercise of the police power is as subject to this overruling principle of our government as is any other governmental power. When the Legislature exercises its power of police regulation of the ownership of dogs, as it may do, it must exercise it in behalf of the whole public, but has not the power to do so for the exclusive benefit of a special or favored class. If the principle be admitted that the only test of such legislation is whether it is within the police power to regulate the ownership of a particular species of property, no matter what may be done with the proceeds of the license fees collected by virtue of such statute, then it would be competent for the Legislature to bestow that much of the citizens' property upon any object which the Legislature might choose. I think that all such legislation is subject to two tests: First, is the subject one which the State, under the police power, may regulate; second, if it is, is the regulation imposed for the benefit of the public, i. e., does the public receive the benefit? Not indirectly, but directly. For it may be assumed that the public is, in a sense, benefited by every industry carried on in the State, which adds to the sum of the wealth, or contributes to the happiness of any of its citizens. The State has not the power to tax one class of property and give the proceeds directly to owners of another class, upon the idea that the latter contribute more to the good of society. I submit that the State could not levy a tax, or appropriate money out of the treasury (which is the same thing) for the benefit of unfortunate sheep owners who had lost their sheep by ravages of dogs or disease; nor for one any more than for the other. Nor does the State propose to do so in this legislation. It is attempting to compel all men who own dogs to pay to those who own sheep the loss sustained by the latter from some of the dogs of some of the former. It visits vicariously a penalty which some ought to bear, upon many nowise responsible for it, merely because it is difficult to say who ought rightfully to bear it. The real effect of the statute is to make all of one class of property holders pay the losses incurred in a private business by another class, because this loss has been occasioned by the property of some of the first class. I do not believe such legislation is a valid exercise of the police power. We all recognize that sheep husbandry is a business of great value to the State. It may be admitted that the ownership of dogs is of doubtful value. The interests of the former, as weighed against the latter, may overwhelmingly preponderate from an economic standpoint. Notwithstanding all which, the principle of the law must be the same. It is unsafe to allow mere utilitarianism to bear down those safeguards of the citizens' rights—those checks imposed by the people in their Constitution against the power of the majority and in favor of the individual, that which gives, if anything gives, one man a right safe from the encroachment of all other men; that which recognizes the supreme right of individual taste and judgment in the matter of acquiring property and in the pursuit of happiness. The legislation here involved makes a breach, I fear, in the dyke of the people's liberties—makes one class of people contribute to the business success of another class by the fiat of government without any direct benefit received by the former.

Hence, I feel constrained to dissent from the opinion delivered by the court in this case.

Judges Nunn and Carroll concur in this dissent.

1. Injunctions—Granting or Refusing—Discretion of Court—The granting or refusing of an injunction depends upon the facts of each particular case and rests in the sound discretion of the court.

2. Same—Public Interest—Public Inconvenience—Consideration—Where the interests of the public are to be taken into consideration by the court and when the issuance of an injunction will cause serious public inconvenience or loss without a correspondingly great advantage to the complainant, no injunction should be granted.

3. Same—Interests of Complainant—Where an injunction would have the effect of greatly injuring or inconveniencing the public it may be refused even though as against the defendant, the complainant would be entitled to its issuance.

4. Application to Close Sewer—Long Continuance—Absence of Complaint—Damages Ascertainable—Refusal of Injunction—Where it is made to appear that a sewer in a city had been constructed for many years with the consent of the then owner of the property, that it was afterwards extended at the request of one of the joint owners of the property; that many years elapsed without any action looking to its abatement being taken, that its discontinuance would work a great hardship upon a large portion of the public in the city and would be a menace to the health of the inhabitants; that the injury to the plaintiffs is of a permanent character for which she may, in one action, recover for all damages past and present, the injunction sought was properly refused by the court.

O. H. Waddle & Son for appellant.

Sharp & Cooper for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

This is an action on the part of appellee, Mattie T. Hyde, wherein she seeks a mandatory injunction requiring appellant to abate a nuisance caused by the discharge of sewage on appellee's premises, through pipes constructed and maintained by appellant. The injunction was granted by the trial court, and from that judgment the Somerset Water, Light & Traction Company prosecutes this appeal.

The facts, briefly, are as follows: A number of years ago certain citizens of Somerset formed a company for the purpose of constructing a sewer for the drainage of the principal business portion of the city. The sewerage system so constructed finally became the property of the Somerset Water, Light & Traction Company, and this company is now operating the same. The system drains the principal hotel of Somerset, the courthouse, jail, Somerset Sanitarium, other public buildings, and a few of the principal business houses of the central portion of the city. At the time it was constructed, an arrangement was made between the Somerset Water Company and the city, whereby the water company was authorized and agreed to construct a system of sewerage that would accommodate the central portion of the city. The agreement provided that the sewer should be constructed exclusively by and at the cost of the Somerset Water Company, and that those of the inhabitants of the town who desired to connect therewith, should pay the water company such proportionate amount as would be reasonable and fair considering the cost of the sewer and the use to be made thereof. The district in which the public buildings were located, and to be accommodated by the sewer, and, in fact, a large portion of the city, is so situated that the natural drainage flows into a large depression of the earth's surface or deep hollow, from one side of which flows a large spring known as the "Town Spring." This spring creates a branch which flows southward until it connects with Sinking Creek. The latter creek flows through the town and on for several miles until it empties into Pittman Creek. Pittman Creek flows into the Cumberland River.

At the time it was proposed to construct the sewer, J. B. McBeath, was the owner of a parcel of ground lying in the hollow above referred to, a short distance below the town spring, and through which the town spring branch flowed. The water company, conceiving that McBeath might raise some objections to or claim some damage on account of, the discharge of this sewage into the branch just above his property, advised him of what it proposed to do, and he thereupon consented to the construction of the sewer and the deposit of the sewage in the branch above his property. The situation thus remained for several years, during which time McBeath sold his parcel of land to J. E. Tomlinson and T. V. Ferrell; Tomlinson being the father of appellee, Mrs. Hyde, and holding the title to one-half of the lot as her trustee. Thereafter Tomlinson and Ferrell erected a number of small houses on the property in question, for the purpose of renting them to negroes. After the erection of these houses, Ferrell, who was one of the joint owners and who knew of the location and use of the sewer before the purchase was made, applied to the water company to extend the sewer under the street in front of their property and under one of the houses built over the branch, so as to discharge the sewage into the branch below the building. This was accordingly done, and conditions so remained until the Somerset Water, Light & Traction Company purchased the property of the Somerset Water Company in 1905. At this time Ferrell sold and conveyed his half interest in the property to Mrs. Hyde, the deed being made to Tomlinson as her trustee. At the time Mrs. Hyde purchased the property she knew of the location and use of the sewer. Soon after her purchase she demanded of appellant that it should either pay to her $1,000 in damages on account of the construction and maintenance of the sewer as connected with her property, or it should discontinue the use of the sewer altogether. Appellant declining to accede to her proposition, she instituted this action.

The evidence shows that the natural flow of sewage is towards the point where appellee's property is located. It would be practically impossible to construct a sewerage system that would drain in any other direction. While it is true, that by far the greater portion of the inhabitants of Somerset use cesspools, constructed on their premises, and that the sewage system in question covers only a small portion of the thickly populated part of the business district of the city, it appears from the evidence of several reputable physicians, that the discontinuance of the sewerage system would work great hardship, annoyance and inconvenience, upon those occupying the hospital, public buildings and principal business houses, as well as constitute a menace to the public health. A cesspool may be constructed upon the premises of a residence, but in the case of a public or other building, occupied by a large number of persons, such cesspool would fill up very rapidly and become injurious to the health of the occupants.

While Mrs. Hyde claims that she did not know of the location and use of the sewer at the time she and T. V. Ferrell originally purchased the property, it is, nevertheless, true, that Ferrell, who jointly owned the property with her, did know of such location and use. Furthermore, she admits that, after owning the property for a period of three years, she did learn of the fact that the sewer was located and deposited sewage upon her property. At the time of the institution of the suit she and Ferrell had owned the property for about seven years. Thus, it will be seen that, during a period of about four years, she failed to apply to the courts for any relief. The evidence further shows that the construction of a sewer pipe through appellee's premises, and the deposit of the sewage thereon, is offensive in the extreme and constitutes a nuisance.

It can not be doubted, that, in many instances where municipal corporations discharge, or assist the discharge of sewage, directly on to private land, from the outlet of a permanent sewer without having acquired the right so to do, the owner is entitled to restrain the injury committed, by the judgment of a court of equity, and is not confined to a recovery of his damage in actions of trespass. (Beach v. City of Elmira, 22 Hun., 158; Chapman v. City of Rochester, 110 N. Y., 273; Stoddard v. Village of Saratoga Springs, 127 N. Y., 261; Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 928.) In all such cases, however, the injury must be irreparable and such as can not be compensated for in damages. (Palestine Building Association v. Minor, &c., 27 Ky. Law Rep., 781.) After all, the granting or refusing of an injunction depends upon the facts of each particular case, and rests in the sound discretion of the court. (City of Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind., 531.) Where the interests of the public are to be taken into consideration by the court, and when the issuance of an injunction will cause serious public inconvenience or loss without a correspondingly great advantage to the complainant, no injunction will be granted. If the injunction would have the effect of greatly injuring or inconveniencing the public, it may be refused even though as against the defendant the complainant would be entitled to its issuance. The doctrine has been applied where the issuance of the injunction asked would result in cutting off the public water-supply, or the supply of electricity for lights and power, or where it would deprive the public of a necessary highway, or prevent the necessary discharge of sewage or interfere with the public system of taxation. (22 Cyc., 784.) In the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Smith, &c., 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1459, this court said: "An injunction ought not to be granted where the benefit secured by the party applying therefor is comparatively small, whilst it will operate oppressively and to the great annoyance and injury of the other party and to the public, unless the wrong complained of was so wanton and unprovoked as to properly deprive the wrongdoer of all consideration for its injurious consequences."

And citing with approval the case of Stanford Water, Light & Ice Co. v. Murphy, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 2001, which was an action to obtain an injunction to prevent the diversion of water from its natural channel, to the injury of plaintiff, and wherein it was said: "If the appellants' damage is clearly shown to be caused by the appellee, still, we think there is an ample legal remedy, and this great public benefit should not be crippled or hindered, unless it be absolutely necessary to protect appellants' rights." In the recent case of Devou v. Pence, &c., 32 Ky. Law Rep., 697, this court said: "The trial court was warranted in refusing to grant the injunction. Besides the injury or damage which will result to appellant can be easily ascertained, as the property is real estate. The value of this real estate before the construction of this sewer, and its value since the construction of it, can be as easily ascertained as can be any other damage to real estate. Nor is this such an injury as would require a multiplicity of suits. This sewer, by its construction, will necessarily empty all of the water which passed through it upon appellant's property, and the damage to her property is, therefore, of a permanent nature, and is easily ascertained. As the injury to appellant's property is not an irreparable one, but one for which the damages can be ascertained, and appellees are solvent, she was not entitled to the relief sought."

Furthermore, this court has held that an injury to property, such as the facts of this case show, that appellee's property has sustained, is of a permanent nature, and the party whose property is so injured may, in one action, sue and recover for all damages, past and present. (City of Madisonville v. Hardman, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 253.)

In view of the particular facts of this case, wherein it is made to appear that the sewer in question was constructed many years ago, with the consent of the then owner of the property; that it was afterward extended upon the request of one of the joint owners of the property; that several years elapsed without any action looking to the abatement of the nuisance being taken; that the discontinuance of the sewer would work a great hardship upon a large portion of the public in the city of Somerset, and would prove a great menace to the health of its inhabitants; that the injury to appellee's property is of a permanent character, and she may, in one action, recover for all damages, past and present, and will not be required to go the trouble of bringing a number of suits, we are of opinion that appellee was not entitled to an injunction. Upon the return of the case the court will impanel a jury and submit to it the question of the extent of the damages to appellee's property.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

THE NEW GALT HOUSE CO. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported)

Hotels — Restaurants — License — Tax Required — Changed From "American Plan" to "European Plan" — Liability to Double Tax — Under the statute requiring first-class hotels to pay a license of $150 per year, and a like tax on all restaurants or eating houses where the yearly sales amount to $50,000, the fact that a first-class hotel changed its plan of serving meals from the "American Plan" to the "European Plan" would not make it amenable to a license tax of $150 for the hotel and separate tax of $150 for keeping a restaurant, where all the meals are served from the same table.

Henry W. Sanders for appellant.

A. E. Richards and Elmer C. Underwood for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

The appellant, The New Galt House Company, and its predecessors have for many years conducted a hotel in the city of Louisville known as the Galt House. Formerly this hotel was conducted on what is called the "American Plan;" that is, meals were provided at regular hours for its patrons who paid a stipulated sum per day, which included both meals and room rent. Some time prior to this litigation, the management of the hotel changed the manner of conducting it from the "American Plan" to what is known as the "European Plan;" the difference being simply, in the fact that under the latter the guests patronize the hotel table or not, as they please, and, when they do so, pay for what they order. The proprietors of the hotel in question, have always paid a hotel license, but the city, after the change in the management above mentioned, conceiving that the appellant was conducting and operating a restaurant in addition to the hotel, demanded an additional license for the operation of the former. This being refused, an ordinance warrant was sued out with the result that the appellant was fined sixty dollars in the circuit court; and of this judgment it now complains.

There is no contrariety whatever about the facts of the case. The appellant has paid the hotel license of one hundred and fifty dollars for the year 1907. It provides no table or meals for its guests other than the restaurant in question, and any person, whether he be a lodger or not, may visit the restaurant and obtain such food as he desires upon payment of the price charged therefor; and undoubtedly it is true, that many persons who do not lodge in the hotel patronize the restaurant. The question is, therefore, whether or not the change in the management of the hotel from the "American Plan" to the "European Plan" authorizes the city to charge a restaurant license in addition to the hotel license.

Section 46 of the license ordinance of the City of Louisville, relating to the subject in hand, is as follows:

"Every person, firm or corporation operating or conducting a tavern, hotel * * * in the city of Louisville shall pay a yearly license as follows:

"First-class. One having one hundred and fifty rooms or over, one hundred and fifty dollars per year. (Remainder of grading omitted.)"

Section 37 of the ordinance is as follows:

"Every place where food or refreshments of any kind—not including spirituous, vinous or malt liquors—are prepared for casual visitors, and sold for consumption therein, shall be deemed a restaurant or eating house, and every person, firm or corporation conducting or operating any such place shall pay a license as follows:

"All restaurants or eating houses, wherein the yearly sales amount to the sum of fifty thousand dollars and over, the license shall be one hundred and fifty dollars per year. (Remainder of grading omitted.)"

Undoubtedly, if the city's contention is upheld, the appellant must pay two licenses of one hundred and fifty dollars each. It may be admitted that, if the restaurant, as conducted by appellant, were separate from the hotel, the owner would be required to pay a restaurant license therefor; but the question remains, whether or not the mere change from the "American Plan" to the "European Plan" authorizes the city to impose upon the appellant two licenses of one hundred and fifty dollars each—one for keeping a hotel and the other for operating a restaurant; and assuming that this may be done, are we authorized to conclude that such was the intention of the municipality when the ordinance above set forth was enacted? We do not think such a deduction is maintainable. It is a matter of common knowledge that hotels or taverns, whether conducted upon the "American" or "European Plans," permit persons other than the regular guests to purchase meals whenever desired. The main business, of course, is the conducting of the hotel or tavern. The furnishing of meals to persons other than the regular guests is a mere incident to the business. This incidental business does not change the nature of the regular business, or impose upon the proprietor a double license. It is immaterial whether the hotel is conducted on the "American" or "European Plan." Hotels as they are ordinarily conducted (perhaps universally so) furnish both lodging and food to their patrons. Indeed, a hotel could hardly be conducted, successfully, if the proprietor did not afford the guests an opportunity to obtain food within the building. Some men might readily lodge in a hotel and secure their meals at another place; but the general traveling public, including women and children, could not do this; and we may assume that no hotel could be successfully conducted, which did not provide food for its guests. If the appellant operated on the "American Plan," and, in addition, conducted a restaurant in connection with its business, there would be some ground to claim that a double license was due. But it must be assumed that, when the city imposes upon appellant the payment of a license of one hundred and fifty dollars for conducting a hotel, that it intends that it shall have the privileges ordinarily included in the business of the hotel; and certainly, if this was not the intention, it was incumbent upon the city to declare a contrary intention in clear and unmistakable language. If appellant is required to pay a restaurant license of one hundred and fifty dollars per annum, then it will have paid twice the sum that any other first-class hotel in the city of Louisville pays which simply conducts a hotel on the "American Plan." We do not feel authorized to assume that the city intended to segregate the different parts of the business of keeping a hotel, and charge a separate license for each.

The conclusion we have reached—that the city did not intend, by the ordinances under discussion, to impose upon the proprietor of a hotel, who had paid the regular license, the additional burden of a restaurant license, when that constitutes the only means adopted for furnishing his guests with food—renders it unnecessary that we should discuss or decide whether or not, under the charter, the city has the power to separate the different parts of the hotel business and charge a license for each; and, therefore, this question is not decided. We simply hold that, putting a reasonable and just construction upon the ordinance under consideration, the appellant is not required to pay the additional license under the facts as developed in this record.

Judgment reversed, with directions to dismiss the warrant

JAMES, AUDITOR v. HELM.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Special Counsel—Employment by Governor—Assisting County Attorney—Refusal of Commonwealth Attorney to Act—Compensation Recoverable—Section 118, Ky. Stats., provides that the Governor may employ counsel to assist the Commonwealth's attorney in civil cases, the fees to be paid out of the State treasury, upon a voucher signed by the Governor. Section 127 provides that, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, the county attorney shall attend to all the Commonwealth's business in circuit court. Where, upon the application of many good citizens of the city the Governor was urged to enforce the Sunday closing law in the city of Louisville, he called upon the Commonwealth's attorney to enforce the law, who declined to do so and the county attorney offered to do so with the assistance of employed counsel, the Governor had a right to employ a competent attorney to assist the county attorney in enforcing said law and agree with him for compensation therefor.

2. Enforcement of Law—Duty of Governor—It is the policy of the Commonwealth to see that the laws are enforced and this is the proper duty of the executive who acts through officials subordinate to himself.

3. Same—The primary object of the statute in authorizing special counsel is to see that the State's interests are properly looked after, and in the management of the State's civil suits, the county attorney, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney is clothed with all his authority, and to say that the governor can employ special counsel to assist the latter and not the former, would place it in the power of the Commonwealth's attorney in declining to act, to prevent the employment of special counsel, no matter how urgent the need therefor might be.

4. Public Offenses—Statutory Provisions—Construction—Section 11, of the Criminal Code, provides that "public offenses of which the only punishment is a fine, may be prosecuted by a penal action in the name of the Commonwealth * * * which trials are regulated by the Code of Practice in civil actions." Section 118, Kentucky Statutes, expressly authorizes the employment of counsel in civil actions. Where a statute is capable of two constructions, one of which is calculated to defeat the ends of justice and the other would be in furtherance thereof, the latter will be adopted.

5. Question Involved—The importance of litigation to the State can not be measured by the amount involved in the controversy; especially is this true where the State is fighting to enforce a principle rather than making an effort to recover money.

6. Action for Penalty—Civil Code Controls—In a proceeding where a penalty only is sought to be recovered the action is civil and is tried according to the Civil Code, although no answer, other than the plea of "not guilty," is required of the defendant.

7. Commonwealth—Anomalous Position—Enforcing Law—Civil Actions—The Commonwealth in this case, occupies an anomalous position. She elected to proceed against the violators of the Sunday closing law, by civil suits, and the Governor, believing that the best interests of the State demanded that special counsel be employed to assist in their prosecution, arranged with appellee to render the Commonwealth certain service. Under his employment he rendered valuable service. Now, when he asks for his compensation, he is met with the answer that, although he was employed to bring civil suits and did so, that the suits were not in fact civil. In our opinion the suits instituted by appellee were civil suits and the Governor acted within the scope of his authority under section 118, of the Kentucky Statutes, and the judgment of the lower court enforcing the contract is affirmed.

James Breathitt for appellant.

Helm Bruce and Alex. P. Humphrey for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This litigation grows out of the efforts of Governor J. C. W. Beckham, to have the Sunday closing law enforced in the city of Louisville. In the early part of 1906, an effort was made to have the statute, which required all saloons to be kept closed on Sunday, enforced. Prosecutions were instituted in the criminal branch of the Jefferson Circuit Court, and in the Police Court of the city of Louisville, under section 1303, of the Kentucky Statutes. Those tried under these prosecutions, upon one ground or another, escaped punishment, and the violations of the Sunday closing law by the saloon-keepers, continued. In May, 1906, a suit was instituted in this court by Paul Barth, Mayor, against John McCann, Judge of the City Police Court, wherein the mayor sought to have the judge of the Police Court directed by a writ of mandamus, to try the violators of the Sunday closing law. This suit resulted in a decision of this court, construing section 1303, of the Kentucky Statutes, which is to be found in 29 Ky. Law Rep., page 707. For a short time after this opinion was delivered, it appears that the saloon-keepers observed the law and the saloons remained closed on Sundays, but about the first of August, thereafter, many saloon-keepers openly refused to observe the law, and kept their places of business open on Sunday, and were guilty of selling liquors on that day as on other days.

It is alleged that evidence of these violations were presented to the grand jury, but no indictments were returned; that when warrants were issued for the offenders and returned to the police court, the judge thereof held that the Commonwealth must show that the saloon-keepers actually sold liquors on Sunday by the evidence of those who drank; that appearances were deceiving, and it was not enough for the prosecuting witness to swear that he saw drinks served which looked like beer, whisky, &c. It also appears that the police judge, during this time, refused to accept the testimony of police officers or detectives, on the ground that they were paid and unworthy of belief. Under this condition of affairs many of the citizens appealed to the Governor for assistance and in compliance with their request, the Governor called upon the Commonwealth's attorney and requested him to enforce the law. The Commonwealth's attorney responded that he stood ready and willing to prosecute any saloon-keeper for violating the Sunday closing law, who might be indicted by the grand jury. As this means of reaching the offenders had proven futile, the Governor urged the Commonwealth's attorney to proceed against the saloon-keepers, who violated the law, under section 11, of the Criminal Code. This the Commonwealth's attorney declined to do, for the reason that he did not believe this was the proper mode of procedure. Upon being further urged to take this step, he stated that while he was unwilling to institute penal actions himself, against violators of the Sunday closing law, he would not object to such steps being taken by the county attorney, and that he would not interfere in the event that the county attorney, and any special counsel employed by the Governor on behalf of the Commonwealth, should proceed against the violators of the Sunday closing law by penal action. Following this announcement on the part of the Commonwealth's attorney, the Governor, at the solicitation of various persons in the city of Louisville, interested in the enforcement of the Sunday closing law, selected appellee to assist the county attorney in the preparation and trial of the penal suits against all violators of the Sunday closing law, and entered into the following agreement with him:

"That, whereas, in the opinion of the Governor of Kentucky, it is advisable, and necessary, that special counsel be employed for and on behalf of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, to assist the county attorney and other authorities in the enforcement of the State laws relating to Sunday closing of saloons and other places where spirituous, vinous or malt liquors are or may be sold on Sundays.

"And, whereas, the parties of the second part are willing to take such legal action or bring such civil suits as may be found expedient and available to that end; therefore, it is agreed,

"That the second party shall diligently and in good faith assist the county attorney and other local authorities in the institution and prosecution of such civil suits as may be necessary to determine the questions involved and such as may appear reasonably necessary to enforce the law, and therefor shall be paid for such services, upon the termination of the case or cases, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500), in each case until the total payments for such service in all cases that may be brought or prosecuted amounts to four thousand dollars ($4,000). But the fee provided to be paid to the party of the second part shall not exceed four thousand dollars ($4,000), in the aggregate, which amount shall be paid out of the treasury of the State, upon proper warrant."

This contract was signed by the Governor and by appellee.

Thereafter, appellee and the county attorney secured evidence against 102 saloon-keepers of from two to six violations of the law each, and instituted eleven penal actions in the Common Pleas Branch of the Jefferson Circuit Court. Each action contained six paragraphs, and each paragraph sought to recover the penal sum of $50. Twelve similar proceedings against other persons, containing from two to four paragraphs were instituted in the Jefferson Quarterly Court, and proceedings on notice for a fine and forfeiture of license, and under the law applicable thereto, were instituted against seven hotel keepers in the Jefferson County Court, and thirty-five penal actions, prosecutions by warrants and on information, were instituted in the court of Irvine Hampton, a justice of the peace for Jefferson county, and four warrants were taken out in the City Police Court in the city of Louisville, making a total of sixty-nine proceedings in court, which were instituted by appellee and the county attorney. In some of these proceedings judgments were returned and fines imposed. In the cases in the circuit court, the contention of appellee, and the county attorney, that the saloon-keepers could be proceeded against for keeping open on Sunday without proof of actual sale, was upheld, as was the contention of the county attorney and appellee, that the claims of the Commonwealth for different violations could be joined in one suit, upon the ground that these actions were civil in their nature. Two of the Common Pleas judges held that they might be joined, while one held to the contrary, but agreed with his associates that the suits were civil, and that, if a separate suit was brought in the quarterly court for each violation, an appeal might be taken from the quarterly court to the circuit court. These suits, in the different courts, were prosecuted with so much vigor and zeal that an agreement was reached between the Retail Liquor Dealers Association, representing the saloon-keepers, on the one side, and appellee and the county attorney on the other, whereby the saloon-keepers agreed that if the county attorney and appellee would not further prosecute them, they would cease violating the law as to Sunday closing. This being the end sought to be accomplished by the Governor and by those citizens of Louisville, who were seeking to have the law, as to Sunday closing, enforced, the agreement made by the Retail Liquor Dealers Association and the county attorney was approved by the Governor, and the suits were accordingly dismissed. It appears from the pleadings in the case that the agreement on the part of the saloon-keepers was faithfully carried out, up to the time of the filing of this suit, on the 31st day of January, 1908.

On November 15, 1907, appellee presented his claim against the State to the Governor for his fee of $4,000, as per his contract. The claim was approved by the Governor and referred to the Auditor for payment. The Auditor refused payment on the ground that there was no warrant in law for the payment of a claim of this character. Thereafter appellee brought suit against the Auditor in the Franklin Circuit Court, to compel the payment of the fee. The Commonwealth demurred to his petition, the demurrer was overruled, the Commonwealth elected to stand on its demurrer and declined to plead further; judgment was entered in favor of appellee for the amount of his claim, to-wit: $4,000, and the Commonwealth appeals.

The value of the services is not questioned, but the Commonwealth insists that the Governor had no authority to make this contract. That the statute does not authorize in any state of case, the employment of special counsel to assist the county attorney, but that section 118, under which it is claimed by appellee that authority is given the Governor to make such employment, only authorizes the appointment by the Governor of special counsel to assist the Commonwealth's attorney in the prosecution of civil cases in the circuit courts in which the Commonwealth is interested.

The Commonwealth further contends that even if the Governor had the right and authority to employ special counsel to assist the county attorney where the Commonwealth's attorney declined to proceed, still, in the case at bar, the employment was not authorized as the suits were not civil cases, but were criminal proceedings. On the question of the Governor's right and power to appoint special counsel to assist the Commonwealth's attorney in the discharge of duties which devolve equally upon the county attorney and the Commonwealth's attorney, the following sections of the Kentucky Statutes must be considered:

Section 118, provides:

"It shall be the duty of the Commonwealth's attorney, to attend each circuit court holden in his district and prosecute all violations of the criminal and penal laws therein and discharge all other duties assigned him by law; and he shall also, except in Franklin county, attend to all civil cases and proceedings in the circuit courts of his district, in which the Commonwealth is interested, but in civil cases, the Governor may employ counsel to assist the Commonwealth's attorney, the fees of such counsel to be paid out of the State treasury, upon a voucher signed by the Governor."

Section 127, regulating the duties of the county attorney, provides:

"He shall attend to the prosecution of all cases in his county in which the Commonwealth or the county is interested and, when so directed by the county or fiscal court, institute or defend and conduct actions, motions and proceedings of every description before any of the courts of this Commonwealth, in which the county is interested, and shall, in no instance, take a fee or act as counsel in any case in opposition to the interests of the county. He shall also attend the circuit courts held in his county and aid the Commonwealth's attorney in all prosecutions therein, and in the absence of an acting Commonwealth's attorney, he shall attend to all the Commonwealth's business in said courts."

Section 135, provides:

"The county attorney shall not dismiss or otherwise control any prosecution or proceeding in the circuit court when the Commonwealth's attorney, or the attorney appointed in his place, is present, except by the advice and with the consent of such attorney."

These three sections, when considered together, clearly charge the county attorney with the same duties as the Commonwealth's attorney. When the latter is present in court, he controls all suits or proceedings in which the Commonwealth is interested, and when he is absent, this duty devolves upon the county attorney.

In the case at bar the Commonwealth's attorney was not absent from the city of Louisville during the time that appellee was employed as special counsel to assist the county attorney, so far as the record shows, but he was absent from the cases which were being prosecuted by the county attorney and appellee, and he was refusing to proceed against the saloon-keepers who violated the law, by penal action, and the management of these suits was, so far as the Commonwealth's attorney was concerned, left entirely to the county attorney and appellee. In fact, it appears that the Commonwealth's attorney consented and agreed, in advance of the employment of appellee, that the county attorney might take charge of all such cases as it was proposed to proceed against by penal action. It is the policy of the Commonwealth to see that the laws are enforced. This is the proper duty of the executive. He acts, of course, through officials subordinate in power to himself, and these, in turn, frequently act through others. In the case of the Commonwealth's and county attorney, each is charged with the duty of looking after the business of the Commonwealth in the circuit court; when both are present, the management and control of suits is, by statute, placed in the Commonwealth's attorney; in his absence, in the county attorney. If, for the purpose of the presentation of this point, it is admitted that the suit in question is a civil suit, counsel for the Commonwealth would admit that the Governor would have a right to appoint special counsel to assist the Commonwealth's attorney, and since, as by statute, it is made the plain duty of the county attorney to take charge of the business of the Commonwealth in the circuit courts in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, we are clearly of opinion that if the Governor knew, at the time of making the appointment, that the Commonwealth's attorney was absent, or declining to act, he could appoint such special counsel to assist the county attorney. In fact, in a case like the case at bar, where the Commonwealth's attorney is refusing to act, it would have been idle to have appointed special counsel to act with him. The Commonwealth's attorney, not being in sympathy with the plan which the Governor desired to set on foot, and carry out, in order to try and enforce the observance of the Sunday closing law, he could not look to him for assistance, but was compelled to seek the aid of the county attorney, who was in sympathy with the movement, and who was willing to co-operate with him.

The primary object of the statute in authorizing employment of special counsel at all is to see that the State's interests are properly looked after and protected, and, as it is the duty of the Commonwealth's attorney to have charge of the civil business of the Commonwealth, in the circuit court, the statute authorizing the employment of special counsel to assist in that class of business, referred only to Commonwealth's attorney; but this statute, when read in connection with the statute, defining the duty of the county attorney, shows plainly that the Legislature had in mind that the special counsel, when so employed, should assist the attorney for the Commonwealth in looking after the State's business. In fact, so far as the management and conduct of the State's civil suits are concerned, the county attorney, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, is clothed with all the power and authority of the Commonwealth's attorney, and to say that the Governor may employ special counsel to assist the former and not the latter would, in cases like the one at bar, defeat the very purpose of the statute, and would place it in the power of the Commonwealth's attorney, by declining to act, to prevent the employment of special counsel, no matter how urgent the need therefor might be. The purpose of the lawmakers evidently was to provide for the employment of special counsel in the conduct of the Commonwealth's civil business, where the exigencies of the case were such as to require it. The object of such employment was the protection of the business of the State, rather than the lending of aid to a particular man, and the only reasonable and fair construction that can be placed upon the statute is that which the lower court evidently placed upon it; that the Governor has authority to employ special counsel in civil cases in the circuit court, to assist the attorney representing the Commonwealth in such cases, be he Commonwealth's attorney or county attorney.

We come next to a consideration of the second objection raised by the State to the allowance of this claim, which is that the suits which it was proposed to prosecute were, while civil in form, criminal and not civil in their nature, and that, therefore, the Governor was without authority to employ special counsel to prosecute same. Section 11, of the Criminal Code, provides:

"A public offense, of which the only punishment is a fine, may be prosecuted by a penal action in the name of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, or in the name of an individual or corporation, if the whole fine be given to such individual or corporation. The proceedings in penal actions are regulated by the Code of Practice in civil actions."

And section 92, of the Civil Code, provides that actions must be brought in the county where the action, or some part of it, arose, for the recovery of a fine, penalty or forfeiture, imposed by statute. It will be observed that the right to an action is given the Commonwealth, and that the Civil Code regulates the proceedings in penal actions. A penal action for the recovery of a fine, where no imprisonment can be imposed, has uniformly been classified by courts of last resort, State and Federal, as a civil action for debt. Our own court, in the case of Commonwealth v. Avery, 14 Bush, 627, expressly so held. There suit had been brought in the name of the Commonwealth to recover a forfeiture of the money won on an election bet. The defendant demurred to the jurisdiction of the Common Pleas Court, claiming that the circuit court, which was a court of criminal jurisdiction, alone had jurisdiction. The demurrer was sustained, and, upon appeal to this court, in reversing the judgment of the lower court, it was said:

"It is conceded that the common pleas court has no criminal or penal jurisdiction, and whether it has jurisdiction in this action or not, must depend on the question whether it is a civil action.

"That the Legislature may authorize a civil action to be maintained for the recovery of a forfeiture has not been disputed. The action of debt has always been esteemed an appropriate action for the recovery of a penalty imposed by the statute. This statute, though not in name an action of debt, is such in its nature, and it is an appropriate action for the recovery of the alleged forfeiture, and was within the jurisdiction of the Jefferson Court of Common Pleas. * * *

"This is not a 'criminal prosecution,' nor 'an indictable offense' within the meaning of the Constitution. Betting on an election was never a crime or indictable offense at common law, nor is the offense as prescribed by the statute to be visited with any infamous punishment, and it does not therefore, come within the meaning of the 12th and 13th sections of the Constitution, above quoted, either as a 'criminal prosecution' or as an 'indictable offense.'" * * *

We have seen that the offense in this instance is purely statutory, that the Legislature having limited punishment to a fine, has the constitutional power to prescribe that the punishment should be inflicted by a proceeding in a civil action, or by an indictment, one or both, and that neither was dependent upon the other.

It is urged that in the Avery case, the proceeding was for the recovery of a forfeiture, but, in that case the court dealt with a fine, penalty or forfeiture alike, when it held that the "action of debt has always been esteemed an appropriate action for the recovery of a penalty imposed by statute." We are unable to draw a distinction between a penalty imposed for the violation of the Sunday closing law and a penalty imposed for violating the statute against betting on an election.

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Sherman, 85 Ky., 688; a penal action was instituted in the Common Pleas Court of Jefferson county to recover a fine imposed against an insurance company for the illegal collection of a premium. In that case a demurrer was sustained to the jurisdiction on the ground that it was a criminal proceeding. Upon appeal here, the case was reversed, this court holding that the common pleas court, which was a court of exclusively civil jurisdiction, had jurisdiction to try the case, as the action was civil and not criminal. Not only has our own court held a prosecution for the enforcement of a penalty for the violation of a statute, where no imprisonment is imposed, to be a civil action, but other jurisdictions, as well have, with a degree of uniformity so held. In Mitchell v. State, 11 N. W., 848, an action was instituted to recover a fine for the sale of intoxicating liquors to an infant without the consent of his parents. The point being raised by the defendant that the proceedings should be criminal and not civil, the court said:

"The action on a penal suit to recover money as a penalty is a civil suit."

And, in the case of Brophy v. City of Perth Amboy, 44 N. J. L., 217, an action was brought to recover a fine imposed for a violation of a city ordinance, regulating beer saloons, &c. The ordinance provided for either a fine or imprisonment, and in a civil suit imprisonment was enforced. On appeal, the question was raised as to whether or not appellant was entitled to a discharge under an act providing for the release of persons imprisoned on civil process. In passing upon the right to proceed against the defendant by civil suit, the court said:

"Where such an action is brought, the proceeding is civil and not criminal, and the rules of procedure in civil cases, unless otherwise provided, are applicable to it."

In Campbell v. Board of Pharmacy, 45 N. J. L., 241, an action was brought to recover a fine against a druggist for not complying with the law, as to registering, &c. It was insisted that it was a criminal proceeding, and that the defendant's constitutional guarantees were being invaded, &c. In response to this contention, this court said:

"An action for a penalty is a civil action as much so as an action for money had and received."

In the case of Stearns v. U. S., F. C. 13,341, in passing upon a similar question, the court said:

"This was not a criminal prosecution, but a civil action to recover a penalty for breach of a statute. * * * Actions for penalties are civil actions, both in form and substance."

And, in the case of U. S. v. Elliott, F. C., 15,043, an information in the nature of a debt, was filed by the United States to recover a fine imposed upon the owner of a vessel for failing to provide medical stores. The defendant insisted that it was a criminal proceeding, and should be on information or indictment. To this contention, the court responded:

"It is well settled that when pecuniary penalties are affixed by statute, to an act or a neglect, and there is no imprisonment provided for, or other reason to suppose that a mere punishment is intended, and no special remedy is pointed out in the statute, a civil action (formerly always debt) will lie for their recovery, although the penalties are for the sole use of the sovereign."

This last opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, who was then acting as circuit justice.

Section 118, of the Kentucky Statutes, which authorizes the employment of special counsel, expressly says, that in civil actions, they may be so employed. Where a statute is capable of two constructions, one of which would be calculated to defeat the ends of justice, and the other would be in furtherance thereof, the latter will be adopted. The importance of litigation to the State can not be measured by the amount involved in the controversy, it quite frequently happening, as in the case at bar, that the State is fighting for the enforcement of a principle rather than making an effort to recover sums of money. She was seeking to have the law observed, and the local authorities having failed in its enforcement, the Governor was called upon to lend his assistance. He recommended to the Commonwealth's attorney a plan which he thought would be effective. His recommendations were turned down. The plan suggested by him was neither approved, nor acted upon by the Commonwealth's attorney. The law was being openly and flagrantly violated; citizens were appealing to him for assistance; the county attorney offered to proceed against the violators along the line suggested by the Governor, and the Commonwealth's attorney, while declining to act, agreed that he would not interfere. The Governor employed special counsel and, at once, set on foot the institution of the penal actions, as above set out. The wisdom of his course was demonstrated by the success with which the efforts of the county attorney and appellee were attended. The observance of the law was enforced, and it was clearly demonstrated that violations of the character complained of could be stopped by proceeding against the offending parties by civil suits.

But, it is insisted for the Commonwealth that because in civil suits for the enforcement of a penalty, the defendant is entitled to certain privileges and immunities, such as freedom from giving evidence against himself, the benefits of the plea of not guilty, and the reasonable doubt instruction, that therefore, the claim should not be paid. It is true that it has time and again been recognized that the defendant in a civil suit, wherein the enforcement of a penalty is sought, is entitled to certain constitutional guaranties, but these immunities to the defendant can not, in any wise, militate against the nature of the action, and that is the question that we are dealing with. The Legislature clearly had the right to determine the nature of the action, subject to the immunities guaranteed by the Constitution, and where a penalty only is sought to be recovered, the action is civil and is tried according to the provisions of the Civil Code, although no answer other than the plea of "not guilty" is required of the defendant.

The Commonwealth in this case occupies an anomalous position. She elected to proceed against the violators of the Sunday closing law by civil suits, and the Governor, believing that the best interests of the State demanded that special counsel be employed to assist in their prosecution, arranged with appellee to render the Commonwealth certain service. Under his employment from the Governor, at considerable labor, he rendered the services, which proved valuable. Now, when he asks for his compensation, he is met with the answer that, although he was employed to bring civil suits for the State, and did so, yet, notwithstanding that fact, the suits were not in fact civil. Under the facts stated in this case the position of the Commonwealth is not tenable.

The suits instituted by appellee on behalf of the Commonwealth were civil suits, and we are clearly of opinion that, in making the employment, the Governor acted within the scope of the authority given him by section 118, of the Statutes, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

BOARD OF ALDERMEN OF THE CITY OF COVINGTON v. CITY OF COVINGTON.

CITY OF COVINGTON, EX PARTE v. RENSHAW AND OTHERS.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

Municipalities—Second Class Cities—Superintendent of Streets—Appointment of Street Overseer—Under Sec. 3118, Ky. Statutes, part of charter of cities of the second class, authorizing the mayor to appoint a superintendent of public works, subject to the approval of the board of aldermen, providing that "he can not undertake any improvement or perform any work or make any appointments until said work and improvements * * * and the number and compensation of the employes shall have been fixed by ordinance" it was intended to confer upon the superintendent the right to appoint the employes connected with the improvement of the street, subject to the approval of the council. But while this discretion is lodged in the council it can not take away from the superintendent the naming of the persons he is authorized to employ or appoint.

John E. Shepard, City Solicitor, for appellant.

F. J. Hanlon and Harvey Meyers for appellees.

Appeals from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

These two appeals, involving the same question of law, will be disposed of together.

The only question in the cases is, can the board of councilmen of the City of Covington create the position of overseer of the street cleaning department, and elect a person to hold such position.

The board of councilmen contend that they may do this, while the mayor and the superintendent of public works contends that the council has no power to create this place or appoint or elect a person to fill it.

Section 3118, of the Statutes, provides in part that:

"The mayor shall appoint a superintendent of public works, subject to the approval of the board of aldermen, for a term of two years; and he shall be subject to removal by the mayor, upon the approval of the board of aldermen. But said superintendent shall not undertake any improvement or perform any work, or make any appointments or employments, until said work and improvements shall have been authorized by ordinance, and until the number and compensation of appointees and employes shall have been fixed by ordinance, and the city shall not be held to any liability incurred by said superintendent in violation of this provision."

The ordinance creating the place of overseer of the street cleaning department, reads as follows:

"Be it ordained by the general council of the City of Covington:

"That in accordance with the charter governing cities of the second class, it is hereby made the duty of the superintendent of public works to supervise the cleaning, sprinkling, repairing and improving of all streets, avenues, alleys and public places in the city; and in order to assist him in his duties, there is hereby created the office of overseer of the street cleaning department, which office is subordinate to that of superintendent of public works, and created for the purpose of assisting the superintendent in the discharge of his duties. Said overseer shall at all times be subject to the orders and under the authority of the superintendent of public works. It shall be the duty of said overseer of the street cleaning department to superintend and regulate the cleaning of streets, alleys and public places, and catch basins, and the removal of refuse in said city, under the direction of the superintendent of public works; and that for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this ordinance, the city shall be divided into two districts. * * * Said overseer of the street cleaning department shall be elected as other officials are elected by the general council and shall hold office for the term of two years from the date of his election. He shall receive for his services the sum of $65.00 per month, payable as other salaries are paid."

After a careful consideration of the record, we have reached the conclusion that, in disposing of the case, it will not be necessary to pass upon many of the interesting and important questions presented by counsel in argument and brief.

The superintendent of public works is a statutory officer, and his powers and duties respecting the streets, alleys and public places are specifically defined and described in the section of the statute relating to this officer. Under section 3118, supra, the superintendent "can not undertake any improvement or perform any work, or make any appointments or employments, until said work and improvements shall have been authorized by ordinance, and until the number and compensation of appointees and employes shall have been fixed by ordinance." It was manifestly intended by this section to confer upon the superintendent the right to make such appointments or employments in connection with improvements and work required to be done upon the streets and public places of the city, as the council gave him the right to appoint or employ. The superintendent has no power to do any work or make any appointment until so authorized by the council, and it is entirely within the discretion of the council whether or not they will adopt the recommendations made by the superintendent respecting the appointments he desires to make or the work he desires to do. But, while this power and discretion is lodged in the council, it can not take away from the superintendent the naming of the persons that it authorizes him to employ or appoint. Charged with the general supervision of the work in connection with the streets, it is proper that he should have the appointment, subject to the approval of the council, of the persons who are to assist him in the performance of his duties. If the city council could make all of the subordinate appointments, the employes might be upon unfriendly or hostile terms with the superintendent, and thus impair the usefulness of the department under his control. This right of appointment in the superintendent, although not expressly conferred, follows, by reasonable implication, from a fair interpretation of the law, and it is apparent that the interests of the city and public will be better protected by making the superintendent responsible for the efficiency of the employes under him and for the prompt and faithful performance of the duties placed in his keeping. This construction does not in any wise interfere with the right or authority of the council to superintend, control and direct what improvements shall be made, and how many persons shall be employed, and what compensation shall be paid them; nor does it take from the council the power to abolish at its pleasure any appointments authorized. The statute by express terms leaves all these matters in the control of the council. Everything that the superintendent does in making appointments or doing work is subject to the approval of the council. All that he can do is to represent to the council the number of employes necessary, and it is with the council to say whether they shall be appointed. But, when the council, by ordinance, authorizes the appointment and fixes the number and compensation of the employes to perform any work in connection with the streets and public places, the superintendent of public works has the right of their appointment.

Wherefore, the judgment in each case is affirmed.

CHESPEAKE, OHIO & SOUTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY,
&c. v COMMONWEALTH. FOR USE, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

Fiscal Courts—Order Levying Taxes—Failure to Specify—Purpose of Levy—Validity of Order—The following order of the Fiscal Court of Ohio county was made January 9, 1897: "On motion of Esq. Wilson it is ordered that the county levy be the same the ensuing year as the preceding years—50 cts. on one hundred dollars worth of property and $1.50 poll tax on each poll." Held—That said order is void under sec. 180, of the Constitution, because it fails to specify for what purpose the said levy is made.

Trabue, Doolan & Cox and J. M. Dickinson for appellants.

J. S. Glenn, W. H. Barnes, Ben D. Ringo and E. M. Woodward for appellees.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, reversing.

When this case was heard, our attention was not called to the order of the order of the fiscal court levying the tax in controversy, and we did not consider its sufficiency.

Section 180 of the Constitution provides:

* * * "Every act enacted by the General Assembly, and every ordinance and resolution passed by any county, city, town, or municipal board or local legislative body, levying a tax, shall specify distinctly the purpose for which said tax is levied, and no tax levied and collected for one purpose shall ever be devoted to another purpose."

It is insisted that the order of the fiscal court does not specify distinctly the purpose for which the tax is levied. The order is in these words:

"Orders Fiscal Court of Ohio County,

"Regular Term, 9th day of January, 1897.

"On motion of Esq. Wilson. it is ordered that the county levy be, the same the ensuing year, same as the preceding year, 50 cts. on one hundred dollars worth of property and $1.50 poll tax on each poll.

"JOHN P. MORTON, Judge.

"A copy, attest:

"M. S. RAGLAND, C. O. C. C."

In the case of Commonwealth v. The United States Fidelity and Guaranty Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep. 362, the court had before it the validity of the following order made by the Taylor Fiscal Court:

"Ordered by the court that there be and there is a tax of 37½ cents levied on each $100 worth of taxable property in Taylor county for the year 1901 and $1.50 on each poll in Taylor county for the said year."

The order was held void under section 180, of the Constitution, on the ground that it did not specify the purpose for which the tax was levied. The same conclusion was reached in City of Somerset v. Somerset Banking Company, 109 Ky., 49. In that case the order read as follows:

"E. M. Rousseau made a motion to fix the tax levying at seventy-five cents on each one hundred dollars, and one dollar poll. The motion was seconded by R. Kolker, and carried on a call of yea and nay."

Similar levies were held void in United States Fidelity Co. v. Board of Education of Somerset, 119 Ky., 355, and Morrell Refrigerator Car Co. v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1383.

It is insisted that the levy in this case is similar to that in Pulaski County v. Watson, 106 Ky., 505. But in that case the levy contained these words, which are not in the levy before us: "for the purpose of paying claims against the county." These words show for what purpose the levy in that case was made. It is also insisted that, by section 1839, Ky. Stats., the fiscal court is given jurisdiction to levy each year for county purposes a poll tax not exceeding $1.50, and an ad valorem tax not exceeding 50 cents on each one hundred dollars worth of property. But in Combs v. Letcher County, 107 Ky., 379, it was held that under this section the fiscal court was authorized to levy a tax to build a court house or to do anything else which it was authorized to do for county purposes. Under the provisions of the Constitution, if a tax is levied to build a court house or to maintain the roads of the county under section 4307, Ky. Stats., it should be specified in the order making the levy. In some cases the statute specifies how much taxes may be levied for a given purpose, as in the case of the roads; and if the order does not specify how much tax is levied for this purpose, it can not be determined whether the tax limit has been exceeded. We do not determine that great minuteness is necessary in these orders of the fiscal court. We only determine that the order before us does not show for what purpose the tax was levied, and that when taxes are levied for other purposes than the ordinary current expenses of the county, or there is a road tax, the order should specify the purpose for which the tax is levied. The remedy of the fiscal court for a defect of this sort in its order is pointed out in the opinions referred to.

The opinion herein delivered is extended as above indicated, and to this extent the former opinion and mandate are modified.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

COMINGOR v. LOUISVILLE TRUST COMPANY, TRUSTEE OF SIMONSON, WHITESON & CO.

(Filed June 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Alfred Selligman and N. M. Smith for appellant.

Geo. Weisinger Smith, Smith & Sprague and Barnett & Barnett for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Judge Settle delivered the following response to petition for rehearing and modification, overruling.

Appellee's petition for modification and extension of opinion herein, insists that this court, on the cross-appeal, should, in reversing the judgment of the circuit court, have directed the entering in that court of a judgment in its behalf against appellant for $48,000, instead of the amount named in the opinion. We have concluded to adhere to the conclusion expressed in the opinion. Appellee's contention on this point is based on the amount realized for the stock of Simonson, Whiteson & Company, after its purchase by Henry Stern, under the fraudulent arrangement with them. This is not a fair criterion, as the sum thus realized for the goods was obtained by disposing of them in the usual course of trade and by making such additions to the stock as would enable them to be sold to the best advantage.

A fairer basis of valuation was that adopted by the opinion which fixed the value as of the date of sale, at what the stock and fixtures, in view of their condition at that time, should reasonably be expected to bring at a forced sale, such as was ordered. The valuation thus made should stand, as we have not been convinced by anything said in the petition that it was not approximately correct.

It is further insisted by appellee that the affirmance of the judgment on the original appeal entitled it, under section 764, Civil Code, to ten per cent. damages on the amount thereof. In this we concur. The section, supra, seems to give damages upon an affirmance, as a matter of right in money judgments to the extent that they have been superseded for the purpose of appeal. On this appeal, prosecuted by appellant, Comingor, the judgment of the circuit court which he superseded was affirmed. The effect of which was that the judgment was proper as far as it went. The appeal and supersedeas prevented appellee from taking out an execution on the judgment pending the appeal.

The affirmance of that judgment, in view of its having been superseded, entitled appellee to ten per cent. damages upon the amount thereof, and the right to such damages is not affected by the additional or increased amount to which appellee will be entitled upon the return of the case to the lower court, by reason of the reversal of the same judgment upon their cross-appeal.

The case of O'Connor v. Henderson Bridge Company and Henderson Bridge Company v. O'Connor and McCulloch, 95 Ky., 633, is in point. O'Connor and McCulloch were original appellants and the Henderson Bridge Company cross-appellant. In response to the petition for re-hearing, filed by the Henderson Bridge Company, the court said:

"Section 757, Civil Code, as amended March 24th, 1888, provided: When a party recovers judgment for only part of the demand or property he sued for, the enforcement of such judgment shall not prevent him from prosecuting an appeal therefrom as to so much of the demand or property sued for that he did not recover. So that the contractors were entitled to an execution upon the judgment of the lower court for $61,536.55, at the same time prosecuting an appeal therefrom as to so much of the demand sued for that they did not recover, but the company prevented them obtaining an execution and thereby collecting the amount of the judgment by a separate appeal and execution of the supersedeas bond, whereby it covenanted to pay to the contractors, appellees, all costs and damages adjudged against appellants on that appeal, and also satisfy the judgment appealed from if affirmed. The decision of this court was that, on the appeal of the contractors, they did not recover all the demand sued for they are entitled to, and that the judgment pro tanto be reversed. But upon the appeal of the company, the judgment had to be necessarily affirmed, because it was not erroneous to its prejudice. And, as a consequence, under section 764, ten per cent. damages on amount of the judgment superseded has to be awarded."

The petition of appellee as to the claim for ten per cent. damages is sustained and the damages allowed. In other respects it is overruled

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. BLACKABY.

(Filed June 18th, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Obstructing Public Highways—Piling Freight Therein—Frightening Horse in Buggy—Injury to Occupant—Damages Recoverable—A pile of sixty sacks of ship stuff out on a pike is calculated to frighten a horse, and where a railroad company received and piled up sixty sacks of ship stuff at a flag station, where it had no depot, extending the pile out to the centre of the pike, at which a horse, in a buggy, took fright, throwing out and injuring the occupant, the company was properly held to be liable in damages for the injury inflicted.

Benj. D. Warfield and Willis & Todd for appellant.

J. C. Beckham & Son for appellee.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Gathright is a flag station on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, between Shelbyville and Bloomfield. There is no depot there and no agent; but only a small platform. Both freight and passengers are received and delivered there. Near the station a turnpike crosses the railroad track. While driving over this turnpike with her husband, in March, 1906, Mrs. Blackaby was painfully injured by the horse taking fright and running away, in consequence of about sixty sacks of ship stuff piled along the railroad and running out into the pike to about the center of it. She brought this action against the railroad company to recover for the injuries, on the ground that the railroad company had put the ship stuff there and thus obstructed the pike and caused the horse to run off. On a trial in the circuit court, she recovered a judgment and verdict for $500, and the railroad company appeals.

It is insisted for the railroad company that there was no evidence on the trial that it placed the ship stuff where it was; and in answer to this, it is urged by the plaintiff, that there was no issue on the question, the answer not properly traversing the allegations of the petition on the subject. It is evident from the bill of exceptions that the parties treated the matter as in issue on the trial. The instructions offered by both parties so treated it and both parties offered evidence upon the question without objection being taken on the ground that the matter was not in issue. We think the answer a sufficient traverse of the allegations of the petition, and it was properly so treated on the trial. But we also think there was some evidence that the defendant put the ship stuff where it was. It was alongside of the railroad within its right of way, and was evidently either put there to be carried away by the train, or was brought there by the train and left to be hauled away by the consignee. There is proof that the railroad, from time to time, in March, was hauling ship stuff to Mr. Gathright, and unloading it at this station. It not appearing that any ship stuff at that time was being shipped from the station, the jury were warranted in inferring that this stuff had been brought there by the train, especially in view of the fact that the way the sacks were bursted, and piled indicated that they had been thrown there hastily. The defendant, if it had not placed this ship stuff there, could show the fact. The proof indicated was sufficient to make out a prima facie case. The ship stuff piled out to the middle of the pike was an unlawful obstruction of the pike and the person so putting an obstruction in a public highway, must answer for the damages directly resulting from it, where the injury was the proximate result of the obstruction. A pile of sixty sacks of ship stuff out on a pike was calculated to frighten a horse.

The court by its instruction told the jury, in substance, that they could not find for the plaintiff unless the defendant placed the sixty sacks of ship stuff on the pike. The finding of the jury for the plaintiff is a finding that the defendant did place the ship stuff there. The defendant showed by five witnesses that on March 6, it hauled about this quantity of ship stuff to Mr. Gathright, and delivered it to his agents on the platform; that they took away all but 15 sacks, which they left there until they could go home and return with the team, the whole of the ship stuff being more than they could carry away at once. We have no doubt this proof is true, but if this was the shipment at which the horse took fright, there could have been only 15 sacks there. The proof for the plaintiff by three or four witnesses, is that when the horse took fright, which was an hour or two after the train left, there were sixty sacks piled out in the pike. These witnesses could not be mistaken in taking what they saw for the 15 sacks that Gathright's men testified to leaving there. And so the natural conclusion from all the evidence is, that the ship stuff at which the horse took fright was a different shipment from that shown by the evidence for the defendant. The jury evidently so concluded and their verdict is not against the evidence, especially in view of the fact that the proof for the defendant, especially by the last witness it introduced, is by no means conclusive that the shipment they referred to, was the stuff that was on the ground the day that the plaintiff was hurt. Some complaint is made of the instructions of the court, but we can not see how the instructions could possibly have misled the jury; for the question before the jury was simply whether the stuff at which the horse took fright was that referred to by the proof for the defendant or ship stuff it hauled there on some other day in March and left at the station for Mr. Gathright.

Judgment affirmed.

POYNTER, &c. v. PHELPS, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Church Schism—Two Equal Factions—Absence of Church Judicature—Under Ky. Statutes, sec 322, providing that "in case of a schism or division shall take place in a society the trustees shall permit each party to use the church and appurtenances for divine worship a part of the time proportioned to the members of each party. The ex-communication of one party by the other shall not impair such right except it be done bona fide on the grounds of immorality." Where a Baptist church, composed of about 250 members, became divided into two factions of about equal numbers, neither having withdrawn, and both claiming to be in the majority, and there being no church judicatory of appellate jurisdiction to decide the controversy, the case manifests a schism, or division, of the church under the provisions of said section 322. Held—In such case the appellants, even if in the minority, are entitled to the use of the church building for worship one Saturday and the succeeding Sunday in each month. They are not, however, entitled to recover possession of the old book of church record, claimed in the petition, but are entitled to a copy thereof, the cost of making which should be divided between the two factions.

Virgil P. Smith and O. H. Waddle & Son for appellants.

Jas. Denton, T. Z. Morrow and H. S. Robinson for appellees.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

Appellants claiming to be members of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, and three of them, viz: J. H. Poynter, W. R. Ping and R. M. Testerman, to be trustees of the church, brought this suit in equity in the Pulaski Circuit Court, against appellees, members of the same church, three of whom, Andrew Phelps, Perry James and Arthur Hubble, also claim to be trustees of the church, to obtain, by judgment of the court, the right to use the church building one Saturday and Sunday of each month, for purposes of divine worship, and to recover of appellees a record book containing a list of the members of the church and the minutes of meetings held by the church since its institution in 1779.

The church in question is what is known as a Missionary Baptist Church, and is situated in Pulaski county.

The grounds set forth in the petition for the relief sought are, in substance:

1. That on February 28, 1903, some of the appellees, at a meeting in which only twenty of the membership of 250, composing the congregation of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, participated, by a vote therefor of twelve of the twenty mentioned, procured the adoption of certain resolutions that were and are inconsistent with and contrary to the faith, doctrine and rules of government of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, and to which a majority of the members of that church were and are opposed.

2. That at that and subsequent church meetings appellants, and such other members of the church as were opposed to and failed to comply with the resolutions in question, were refused participation in the church proceedings and threatened with ex-communication.

3. That the then pastor of the church, who was the moderator of its congregational meetings, together with appellees and others who had voted for or continued to favor the resolutions, arbitrarily refused to entertain a motion to rescind them.

4. That although at another and later meeting a majority of the congregation present, including the appellees, voted to rescind the resolutions, appellees did not act in good faith or in the interest of harmony in so voting, but persisted in their mistreatment of appellants and others of the congregation who had opposed the resolutions from the beginning; deprived them of their rights and abridged their privileges as church members to such an extent that they were compelled to organize themselves into a distinct party of worshipers, though of the same faith and same church; which appellants and those associated with them claimed to have accomplished without withdrawing from the Flat Lick Baptist Church.

5. That appellants and their associates, constituting, as alleged, a majority of the membership, by electing as trustees the three persons named in the petition as such, and claiming the possession of the church building and ground, are entitled to control the church property and affairs of the Flat Lick Baptist Church and are equally with appellees entitled to the use of the church for purposes of worship, although appellees locked its doors against them and have since continued to bar them out.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

"Your committee respectfully submit the following resolutions for the government of the new enrollment of the membership of Flat Lick Church, as recently ordered by said church.

"Resolved, 1st. That said enrollment be on the new church record recently purchased by the church from the Baptist Book Concern, Louisville, Ky.

"2d. That the enrollment be begun at the next regular business meeting of the church, the fourth Sunday in March, 1903, and that it be continued at the regular business meeting the 4th Saturday in April of the same year, and that it be concluded at the following regular business meeting the 4th Saturday in May.

"3d. That at the close of said period of time, and thereafter, Flat Lick Church shall be constituted alone and consist only of such members as have complied with the conditions of these resolutions.

"4th. That all members who desire to enroll be required to subscribe to the articles of faith and the church covenant contained in said new record, and that a request to be enrolled shall be construed as embracing a solemn promise to comply with these resolutions and others.

"5th. That all members who desire enrollment and who may be scriptural subjects of discipline shall be required to make suitable reparation and acknowledgement before they are permitted to do so. Any member may object to such a person enrolling at the time the request is made, and they will not be permitted to enroll until an investigation of the charge has been made by the church. This shall be done at as early date as practicable.

"6th. That any member who may fail to enroll within the proper period of time as fixed by these resolutions may do so any time thereafter by complying with the terms herein set forth.

"7th. That after the 4th Saturday in May, 1903, the old church book shall be regarded as a reference book only, and shall be retained by the church as a historical record of its past.

"8th. That the clerk of the church be directed to correspond with all members who may be absent from the county or State and notify them of this action in order that they may take such steps as they may desire in the matter, the church to pay expenses of such correspondents.

"9th. That all members who wish to enroll be required to be present and make the request themselves, except such as are prevented from being present by sickness, absence from the county or State, or other providential cause. Those who are thus prevented from being present may make the request in writing, or through a suitable proxy.

"10th. That each member enrolled shall give, according to his or her ability, financial aid to the expenses of the church.

"11th. That each member enrolled will abstain from the use of intoxicants as a beverage, and that they will not aid and abet the cause of intemperance by selling apples or grain for distilling purposes, nor labor for or at a distillery or similar institution nor knowingly cast their suffrages for any person for any office who uses intoxicants in above sense, or is a friend in any application of the word to this great evil

"The use of intoxicants in cases of sickness, when prescribed by a regular practicing physician of good character, shall be permitted.

"12th. That a failure after enrollment, to comply with the provisions of these resolutions and the said articles of faith, and covenant, shall constitute grounds for discipline and expulsion from the membership after the necessary scriptural steps have been taken to reclaim the erring brother or sister.

"13th. That the pastor make public announcement of this act from the pulpit, and that the membership seek to notify all who are concerned as they may have opportunity.

"14th. That the pastor or clerk read and explain said articles of faith, church covenant, and resolutions before such enrollment, so that all may have full knowledge of the purpose and scope of same."

Appellees filed a general demurrer to the petition, which the circuit court overruled, and to which ruling they excepted. They thereupon, filed an answer which traversed the averments of the petition, and in substance, averred that appellees, Andrew Phelps, Perry James and Arthur Hubbell, as trustees duly elected by the members of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, held the title to the church grounds and building for the use of the congregation; that they (appellees) and the members of the church associated with them, constitute a majority of the congregation, and by reason of that fact, are entitled to control the church property and rule the church; that appellants and those associated with them have been and are disloyal to the church and are trying to disrupt and destroy it.

All affirmative matter of the answer was controverted by reply. On the hearing the circuit court dismissed the action; hence this appeal.

The record contains a great deal of testimony, much of which is conflicting. It will serve no good purpose to discuss it in detail, but will be sufficient to say that it shows the existence among the members of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, of a serious division. The faction represented by appellants being known as the "Old Book" members, and that represented by appellees as the "New Book" members. This division arose out of the adoption of the resolutions copied above and as to the conduct of the pastor. According to the evidence about half, of the members, including appellees, headed by the pastor, favored the resolutions, and demanded that all the members of the church subscribe to them and obligate themselves to obey them, by re-enrolling their names in a new book, or church record, containing the resolutions and discarding, except for purposes of reference, the old church book containing the names of all the members and the record of all the meetings and proceedings of the church since its institution. On the other hand the evidence also shows that practically an equal number of the members, including appellants, opposed the resolutions, complained that they introduced innovations in the church, imposed unreasonable restrictions upon individual conduct and liberty of conscience, and were otherwise violative of the faith and doctrine of the Missionary Baptist church, and its rules of government; for which reasons, and because of the alleged arbitrary and harsh manner in which their adoption was attempted to be forced upon the congregation of the Flat Lick Baptist church, appellants and those holding with them, refused to be bound by the resolutions, or to enroll their names in the new church book containing them.

The dissatisfaction existing among the members of the Flat Lick Baptist church on account of the resolutions and the manner of their adoption, manifested itself in an attempt on the part of appellants, made at one of the church meetings, to rescind them, but it proved abortive, because the pastor in his capacity of Moderator, refused to entertain a motion to that effect. Incensed at this action of the pastor, backed as it appeared by the approval of appellees and other members following his leadership, appellants and others of their faction, held a meeting at which action was taken declaratory of their rights as members of the Flat Lick Baptist church. At the same time they elected the appellant, J. H. Poynter, W. R. Ping and R. M. Testerman, trustees to hold the title of the church property and attempted to confer upon them authority to that effect. They then elected a delegate, known as a messenger, to represent the Flat Lick Baptist church at the approaching meeting of the Cumberland Association of the Baptist church, to which the Flat Lick Church belonged, and furnished him a letter to the association which purported to constitute his credentials as a messenger, convey the greeting of the Flat Lick Baptist church to that body and recite the alleged wrongs sustained by appellants at the hands of appellees. The latter, likewise, claiming to represent the Flat Lick Baptist church, also elected a messenger to the same association, and by him forwarded the usual church letter to that body.

The Cumberland Association being attended by the two messengers, and required to determine which of them was entitled to represent the Flat Lick Baptist church in the association, decided the matter in favor of appellant's messenger, who thereupon took his seat in the association as such. In view of this decision and the condition to which appellees had brought the Flat Lick Baptist church, by the adoption of the resolutions in question, they and others of their faction, at the June meeting, 1906, of the congregation of the Flat Lick Baptist church, by a majority vote of the members present, rescinded the resolutions. But the manner in which this action was taken, did not seem to manifest a motive or spirit calculated to remove the dissatisfaction of the opposing faction, for it did not, in rescinding the objectionable resolutions, require their obliteration from the new book, or remand the congregation to the use of the old book. The use of the new book seems to have been continued for recording the proceedings of church meetings and for the enrollment of the names of members, with the understanding, express or implied, that members known to be opposed to the previous action in respect to the adoption of the resolutions, might or might not enroll their names in the new book, at their option; but they were not accorded the privilege of enrolling them in the old book.

In the meantime, and before the action last referred to was taken, appellants requested of appellees and especially Andrew Phelps, Perry James and Arthur Hubbell, who had been elected trustees of the Flat Lick Baptist church before any division occurred in the congregation, that appellants and their faction be allowed to occupy and use the church building one Saturday and Sunday in each month for purposes of worship. A similar request was made of the church janitor, but in each instance the request was refused.

It is contended by appellees that the acts and proceedings of which appellants complained were legal and necessary to rid the church, without publicity or the scandal of trials, of a few members whose immoral lives and practices had placed them beyond the reach of the ordinary methods of church discipline, while appellants insist that such action was illegal, unprecedented and revolutionary. Thus the warring factions have contended for two years with increasing bitterness and hostility until what was at first a mere breach that might, by judicious handling on the part of the pastor and wiser heads of the church, have readily been healed, has widened into an apparently impassable chasm of dissension and division. In the meantime the cause which the Flat Lick Baptist Church was designed to advance, viz: the propagation of the Christian religion, has been, as in all such cases, the chief sufferer. It is deplorably true, that church dissensions are conspicuously bitter and violent. In such controversies the Christian spirit is too often laid aside for that of mischief or spite; sight being lost of the ultimate fact that it is the mission of the church to prevent and not cause strife among men, and that the individual church which would more nearly approach the divine conception of its mission and constantly keep "its windows open toward Jerusalem," must be founded upon the same brotherly love, though it be of lesser nature, that moved the Savior to sacrifice his life for the redemption of mankind.

It would be profitless to speculate as to whether or by what means the division in the Flat Lick Baptist church might have been averted or healed, or to decide which of the two factions was in the right as to the original grounds of controversy; the fact remains that the division exists, and that the contending factions are about equal in numerical strength and too widely apart to be reconciled at this time by any advice that we may volunteer to give them. It is further apparent that the cause of the division was not removed by the action of appellees in merely rescinding the objectionable resolutions. Appellants contend that they should have been expunged and the old church book restored to use for the enrollment of church members and recording of all proceedings of church meetings; and that members of the church, whose conduct subjects them to church discipline, should be tried and dealt with in due form and according to Baptist usage and precedent, instead of being coerced into withdrawing from the church by such a regulation as would require them to re-enroll their names as church members in a book containing resolutions, however proper, at which it was known they would revolt.

The differences affecting the Flat Lick Baptist church are not precisely of faith or doctrine, nor such as grow out of interpretation of ecclesiastical law, but rather of church polity or government. The Baptist church does not, as a religious sect or denomination, possess a constitution or creed, like the Presbyterian, Methodist and many other churches. Its form of church government is congregational and therefore, purely democratic. Each church is a distinct organization, independent of all others. There are no intermediate judicatories, or a judicatory of final revisory power in Baptist government; consequently, the right of appeal does not exist. Every Baptist church is, therefore, a law unto itself in matters ecclesiastical. While what are known as Baptist associations, both district and State, exist, they possess neither appellate jurisdiction nor revisory power, but may advise the churches without in any way binding the latter to accept such advice.

In the Baptist church, the majority of the congregation is ordinarily entitled to rule, and it is but doing justice to the sect to say that the majority rarely abuses its power. To this fact and the simplicity of its government, much of the evangelistic success of the Baptist church is manifestly due.

The case presented by the record is that of a church divided upon questions of local church government, the opposing factions being of practically equal numerical strength, and each faction so embittered against the other as to make it impossible for them to continue members of the same church organization, yet each having some, if not an equal right, to the use of the church building for worship. Neither faction has withdrawn from the church or been ex-communicated. On the contrary, each claims to constitute a majority of the congregation of the Flat Lick Baptist church, and the right to use the church property for purposes of worship. In view of the situation, what should have been the judgment of the circuit court?

With respect to church buildings and other property of independent self-governing congregations—such as the Baptist—which are controlled in the management by a majority of voices, if there be no specific trust involved, in case of controversy following a division and complete separation of one part of the congregation from the other, the civil courts, will as a general rule, give the property to the majority of the members, without inquiry as to whether there has been any change in the religious views of the congregation. But the rule with respect to the property of churches such as the Presbyterian, Methodist and some others, is different. That is the church building or other property of a denominational church, like the Presbyterian, Methodist, &c., in case of controversy or division, will be given by the civil courts to those persons or members of the congregation who are recognized by the highest ecclesiastical court or judicatory of the denomination as being the church or congregation, though they constitute but a minority of the congregation. (Gibson v. Armstrong, 46 Ky., 481; Lamb v. Cain, 14 L. R. A., 529; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wallace, 679; Trustees v. Harris, 73 Conn., 217; Nance v. Busby, 91 Tenn., 303.)

In the case before us, however, neither faction having withdrawn from the Flat Lick Church, each claiming to be in the majority and, by reason thereof, the right to rule, and there being no church judicatory of appellate jurisdiction to decide the controversy, we think the case simply manifests a schism or division in the meaning of section 322, Kentucky Statutes, which provides: "In case a schism or division shall take place in a society, the trustees shall permit each party to use the church and appurtenances for divine worship a part of the time, proportioned to the members of each party. The ex-communication of one party by the other shall not impair such right, except it be done bona fide on the grounds of immorality." Appellants, even if in the minority, are entitled, under the statute, to the relief asked in the prayer of the petition, viz: To the use of the Flat Lick Baptist Church, one Saturday and the succeeding Sunday in each month; and this the court should have given them, being careful not to allot them the same Saturday and Sunday of each month now used by appellees for worship. The right here claimed by appellants has been conceded by this court in many similar cases, and in at least one instance, to the minority in a case of division in a Baptist Church, even holding that "the ex-communication of one party by the other does not impair the right of the former to the use of the church and appurtenances for divine worship, unless the ex-communication be on the ground of immorality. The mere refusal of a minority to obey the wishes of a majority, or to subscribe to every view the majority may express as to their religious convictions, does not amount to immorality; but, to have that effect, the conduct must be such as amounts to dishonest, wickedness or injustice, such actions as contravene the moral or divine law." (Ransom v. Rogers, 6 Ky. Law Rep., 290; Brook v. Yaden, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 863.)

The case of Igleheart, &c. v. Rowe, &c., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 821, relied on by appellees, is not in conflict with the view here expressed. In that case only six or eight persons, who had been excluded from membership on charges of immorality, were claiming a right to the use of the church, under section 322, Kentucky Statutes. The court, therefore, very properly held that this did not constitute a schism or division in the meaning of the statute for which reason the action brought by the minority was dismissed.

Appellants are not, however, entitled to recover possession of the old book or church record claimed in the petition, but are entitled to a copy thereof, the cost of making which should be divided between them and appellees. (Brook v. Yadon, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 863.)

It is not too late for the opposing factions of this congregation to agree upon some just basis for a settlement of the dispute out of which this controversy has grown; that the controversy may soon so result, is "a consummation devoutly to be wished." For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment and enter in lieu thereof another in conformity to the opinion.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, overruling:

The statement of the opinion as to when the defendant learned of the judgment is not material; a clerical misprision is only correctible from the record. No parol evidence can be heard. The purpose of the motion is simply to make the record conform to itself. The opinion is not based on any concession of counsel, but on the record.

Petition overruled.

L. F. Wethers for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson on motion to file additional transcript.

We do not find it necessary to consider but one question on the pending motion. Upon an inspection of the record we find no error to the prejudice of appellant.

The motion is, therefore, overruled without a consideration of the other objections made by appellee.

MORSE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 17, 1908—Not to be reported.)

B. F. Graziani for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion:

In this case the circuit court allowed the Commonwealth to prove other acts of embezzlement committed at about the same time as the principal offense and under the same agency, charging the jury that this proof was only to be considered by them on the question of the defendant's guilty intent; and it is held by this court that in so doing he committed an error. The ruling of the circuit court is in accord with the authorities. In a note to Calkins v. State, 98 Am. Dec., 163, the rule is thus stated:

"Evidence of other acts of embezzlement committed at about the same time with the principal offense is admissible to show guilty intent; but such evidence can have no further legitimate effect, and must be confined by the court within its proper scope by means of appropriate instructions; and a failure so to do would be ground for a new trial."

This statement of the rule is sustained by numerous decisions in England, by the courts of the United States, and by the Supreme courts of the different States. In a note to People v. Molineux, 62 L. R. A., 227, the rule is thus stated:

"As has been stated, intent is an essential ingredient of all crimes at the common law. In some offenses, the creatures of statute, it is not. Again, in some instances the act by which the crime charged is committed is, in and of itself, evidence of a guilty knowledge or intent, or malice; while in others such act may, of itself, be innocent or justifiable, or guilty; and to show the latter it is necessary to prove that such act was done with guilty knowledge or intent.

"It is in proof of crimes of the latter character that the exception to the rule inhibiting evidence of independent crimes is most liberally extended. These in general are, false pretenses or fraud; forgery; counterfeiting; embezzlement; and receiving stolen property.

"It should not be thought, however, that evidence to prove intent is confined to the class of cases just mentioned, but in those cases first spoken of, where the commission of the act is of itself evidence of intent, the actual existence of intent, like that of motive, may be shown, to amplify and intensify the theory and position of the prosecution." (1 Wigmore on Evidence, section 329; Rice's Criminal Evidence, section 460; 1 Robinson Criminal Law, section 465.)

The court admits that the evidence is competent, but in substance holds that it should be introduced in rebuttal and then only where the defense is that there was no fraudulent intent. There are two objections to this ruling. The first is that the law is not so written. The administration of the law is uncertain enough at best. The circuit courts must be governed by the rules of law as given in the recognized text-books, based upon the course of judicial opinions; and when in so doing they are not sustained by this court, by what principles are they to be governed? The other objection is, that embezzlement is a fraudulent conversion of the principal's property by the agent; our statute makes the fraudulent conversion the gist of the offense. To show a fraudulent conversion is, therefore, a part of the Commonwealth's case, and the Commonwealth should make out its case in chief; not in rebuttal. Where the agent collects the principal's money, a fraudulent intent may be inferred from the fact that he does not pay it over, but this is an inference which the jury may or may not make under the proof; and so where the Commonwealth can affirmatively show a fraudulent intent by other evidence, it should do so just as the Commonwealth may show affirmatively expressed malice in a prosecution for murder. In an action for malicious prosecution, the law implies malice from a want of probable cause; but it has not been held that the plaintiff may not show express malice, and certainly such evidence would not be allowed in rebuttal. The fraudulent intent in embezzlement may be shown in chief by the Commonwealth just as express malice may be shown in prosecution for murder or in actions for malicious prosecution.

I concur in the affirmance of the judgment, but I do not concur in so much of the opinion as holds that the circuit court erred in admitting the evidence referred to in chief.

RENSHAW v. COOK, JUDGE.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Writs of Prohibition—Granted by Appellate Court—Restraining Circuit Courts—Legality of Action—Under section 110, of the Constitution, providing that "The Court of Appeals * * * shall have power to issue such writs as may be necessary to give it general control of inferior jurisdictions," whenever any inferior jurisdiction, particularly a circuit court, is proceeding beyond its jurisdiction a writ of prohibition may issue out of the appellate court on a proper application to prevent the exercise of the usurped jurisdiction, or when the inferior court has jurisdiction, but there is not an adequate remedy by appeal, the appellate court may, in its discretion, exercise a supervisory control over the inferior court so as to prevent irreparable injury or injustice.

2. Same—Action of Circuit Courts—Invading Jurisdiction of Inferior Court—Authority of Appellate Judge—In the exercise of discretion vested in them by law, inferior courts will not be subjected to interference by the appellate court merely because its views on the subject may be at variance with those of the lower court. There must, in such case, be such an abuse of discretion as would indicate a failure to hear, or a bias in the consideration of the question by the trial judge. But where there is not a discretion, and the inferior court is proceeding out of its jurisdiction, or is invading the jurisdiction of another court or officer, the appellate court may grant the writ to prevent the unauthorized interference.

3. Sheriffs—Failure to Execute Bond—Under act of 1906, chapter 22, article 8, section 2, Sessions Acts of 1906, and Kentucky Statutes, section 4557, requiring sheriffs to execute bond each year, the execution of a bond each year at the time fixed by the statute is a condition precedent to his right of incumbency, and his failure to give such bond for any one of the years works a forfeiture of his office, subject to the discretion of the county court to allow further time as to the bonds subsequent to the first one and without such extension of time the office becomes vacant and he may be removed from his office by the county judge without notice.

4. County Courts—Record Authority—Individual Action of Judge—A county court must speak through its records. A county judge, when off the bench, has no power to bind the county by anything he says or does in his individual capacity.

5. Interlocutory Injunctions—Granted by Inferior Court—Jurisdiction of Appellate Judge—Dissolution—Re-Instatement—By statute a judge of the Court of Appeals is given jurisdiction to dissolve an interlocutory injunction granted by a circuit judge or any other inferior officer, and the judgment of the appellate judge in that matter, is the law of that case so long as the facts shown in the record are substantially unchanged, until it is reversed by the Court of Appeals. Interlocutory injunctions, if dissolved by the trial court or judge, when re-instated by a judge of the appellate court, may not thereafter be disregarded by the inferior tribunal where the matter may be pending, so long as they remain interlocutory.

6. Same—Jurisdiction of County Judge—Order Removing Sheriff From Office—Revisory Authority of Circuit Judge—In the absence of the circuit judge from the county, the county judge may hear and grant or refuse motions for interlocutory injunctions of a prohibitory nature (section 273, Civil Code), and where a county judge granted an injunction restraining a sheriff from exercising the duties of an office who had refused to execute his annual official bond, the circuit judge had no jurisdiction to grant a temporary writ of prohibition and could not do so without invading the rightful jurisdiction of the county judge.

S. Y. Trimble, Downer & Russell and Trimble & Bell for plaintiff.

McQuown & Beckham and John C. Duffy for respondent.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, granting plaintiff's prayer for writ of prohibition.

This is an application in this court for a writ of prohibition against His Honor, Thomas P. Cook, judge of the Third Judicial District of Kentucky, restraining him from interfering by order or judgment of his court, with the trial of an application for an injunction before County Judge Prowse, of Christian county, in an action in the Christian Circuit Court between J. M. Renshaw, as plaintiff, and David Smith, as defendant. The last-named action was brought by Renshaw against Smith to oust the latter from the office room in the county courthouse set apart for the sheriff of the county, and to enjoin his using the furniture, &c., or interfering with plaintiff in the occupancy of the said room and furniture, or the handling of judicial process, the collection of taxes, &c. Smith was elected sheriff of the county and qualified, but having failed to renew his bond, as required by statute, his office was declared vacant and Renshaw appointed sheriff, who qualified by executing the bond and taking the oaths required by law. Smith, conceiving his removal to have been irregular, sued out an injunction against Renshaw's interfering with his incumbency of the office. The injunction was granted by Circuit Judge Cook. Application was made to Judge Barker, of this court, to dissolve the injunction. Upon hearing, Judge Barker did dissolve the injunction. Smith, notwithstanding, refused to give up possession of the office in the courthouse set apart for the sheriff. It was then Renshaw sued him for its possession, and sought an injunction against his continuing to occupy it and thereby interfering with the plaintiff's discharge of his official duties. As the circuit judge was absent from the county, notice of application for a temporary injunction in the case was given to be heard before the county judge of the county. Before that application could be heard, Smith applied to the respondent, as circuit judge of the district, for a writ of prohibition against County Judge Prowse, restraining him from hearing or granting the injunction. In his petition, Smith raises again the question of the validity of the order of the county court declaring his office vacant, claiming it was void, for want of notice to him, of the contemplated action. The respondent granted the temporary writ of prohibition against County Judge Prowse.

By section 110, of the Constitution, it is provided: "The Court of Appeals * * * shall have power to issue such writs as may be necessary to give it general control of inferior jurisdictions."

Whenever any inferior jurisdiction, particularly a circuit court, is proceeding beyond its jurisdiction, the writ may issue out of this court on a proper application to prevent the exercise of the usurped jurisdiction. The party complaining will not, in such case, be put to the annoyance, expense and jeopardy of a trial before the tribunal without jurisdiction. Or, when the inferior court has jurisdiction, but there is not an adequate remedy by appeal, this court may, in its discretion, exercise a supervisory control over the inferior court so as to prevent irreparable injury and injustice. But it does not follow that, because this court may do so, it will, as a matter of right in a claimant, use his extraordinary writ in either of the instances above indicated. The matter rests in a sound judicial discretion, to be exercised upon the merits of the particular case. It is exercised most sparingly. For it is believed that ordinarily the usual process of the law, the remedy by appeal and the like, is sufficient to rectify any error that may be committed in the course of the trial below. There are many cases where no appeal is allowed to this court. It would be rare when this court would feel justified in interfering with the exercise of its jurisdiction by the inferior tribunal in such matter. And in the exercise of discretion vested in them by law the inferior courts will not be subjected to interference from this court merely because our views on the subject may be at variance with those of the lower court. There must, in such case, be such an abuse of discretion as would indicate a failure to hear, or a bias in the consideration of the question by the trial judge. But when there is not a discretion, and the inferior court is proceeding out of its jurisdiction, or is invading the jurisdiction of another court or officer, this court may grant the writ to prevent the unauthorized interference.

In the suit at bar there is raised the question of the validity of the action of the county court of Christian county in declaring a vacancy in the office of sheriff, and in appointing plaintiff Renshaw to fill the vacancy. The facts upon which this question is raised fully appear in the opinion delivered by Judge Barker on the motion to dissolve the injunction above alluded to when the case was before him on that question. We now adopt that opinion as the opinion of this court, and the questions passed upon in that opinion are, for the reasons there given, now similarly approved by this court. That opinion is as follows:

"At the regular November election, 1905, the plaintiff, David Smith, was elected sheriff of Christian county, and thereafter qualified by taking the oath of office and executing the bonds required by law. On the first Monday in January, 1907, he executed the annual bonds required by the statute for the year 1907. On March 1, 1908, he failed to execute either of the three bonds required to be executed for that year, and on March 11, the judge of the county court entered an order declaring the office of sheriff vacant, and appointing the defendant, J. M. Renshaw, to fill the vacancy until the next general election for the office of sheriff.

Thereupon the plaintiff filed this action in equity for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining Renshaw from taking possession of the office of sheriff of Christian county, or in any way interfering with the plaintiff in the execution by him of the duties thereof. A temporary restraining order was entered by the judge of the circuit court, according to the prayer of the petition, and thereupon the defendant, upon notice, made a motion before me, as one of the judges of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, to dissolve the injunction so obtained. After hearing the oral argument of counsel, I deemed the matter of such importance that I brought it before the eastern division of the Court of Appeals, and submitted the various questions involved in the adjudication of the motion to the judges composing that division as if the motion were a case regularly pending in the Court of Appeals.

"The proper adjudication of the pending motion will involve a construction of the following sections of an act, entitled 'An act relating to revenue and taxation,' enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky in 1906 (Sessions Acts, 1906, pages 152-153), and of the Kentucky Statutes.

"Article 8, section 2. The sheriff or collector shall, on or before the 1st day of March next succeeding his election, and on or before the said day annually thereafter, enter into bonds with surety for the faithful performance of his duties. A quietus by the Auditor of Public Accounts, and from the fiscal court of his county for the preceding year shall be produced by each sheriff or collector to the county court on or before that day, and no tax-book shall be delivered to the sheriff or collector after the first year of his term, who shall fail to exhibit such quietus on or before that date. He may execute bond at any time after he receives his certificate of election up to and including the 1st day of March succeeding his election, and it shall be the duty of the judge of the county court to hold a court at any time the sheriff may request for that purpose. The county judge shall judge of the sufficiency of the surety, and in no case shall sureties be taken who are not jointly worth, subject to execution after the payment of all their debts and liabilities, a sum equal to the aggregate amount of money, which may probably be received by the sheriff or collector during the year succeeding the execution of the bond.'

"Article 8, Section 3. On the failure of the sheriff or collector to execute bond and qualify as hereinbefore provided, he shall forfeit his office, and the county court may appoint a sheriff or collector to fill the vacancy until a sheriff or collector is elected.' * * *

"Section 4557. It shall be the duty of the county court to cause the sheriff, annually, to renew his bond required by this chapter, and oftener, if the court may deem proper; and upon his failure to do so, the court shall enter up an order suspending him from acting until he gives said bond, or the court may vacate his office.'

"Section 1058. There shall be a regular term of the county court held by the county judge in each county once every month, on Monday, and until changed, as herein provided, shall be held on the same day it now is. The time of holding the county court in any county may be changed by an order made by the county judge, and entered upon the records of the county court at the last regular term held in the next year preceding the year in which the change is to be made. Special terms of the county court may be held at any time for the transaction of any business except the probating of a will, or granting tavern, liquor or druggist license; and the court may adjourn from time to time until the business is disposed of, but no adjournment shall be to a time beyond the commencement of the next regular term.'

"Section 4134. The county court may require the sheriff to give an additional bond or bonds, with good surety, to be approved by the county court, whenever it may deem the interest of the State or county demands; and the sureties on all the bonds executed by the sheriff shall be jointly and severally liable for any default of the sheriff during the term in which said bond may be executed, whether the liability accrued before or after the execution of such bond or bonds.'

"There is no difference made by the revenue act of 1906, in the law bearing upon the question in hand, except the change in the date upon which the sheriff is required to execute bonds. In the prior statute the day fixed was the first Monday in January of each year. The language of section 2, of article 8, of the act of 1906, peremptorily requires the sheriff to execute, on or before the 1st day of March of each year of his term, bonds with sufficient surety conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties; and it is not disputed in this record, that the plaintiff failed to discharge this duty on or before the 1st day of March, 1908.

"Section 4557, of the Kentucky Statutes, provides that it shall be the duty of the county court to cause the sheriff, annually, to renew his bonds, and upon his failure to do so the court is required either to suspend him from acting until he does give bond or may vacate his office. So far as this phase of the case is concerned, I am of opinion that it is concluded by the reasoning in Schuff v. Pflanz, 99 Ky., 97. That case is similar in principle in all respects to the case at bar, except that, after the sheriff failed to give bond at the proper time, the county judge accepted his bond and then entered an order vacating the office and appointing a successor. Two questions arose from his proceeding: First, the right and duty of the county judge to declare the office of sheriff vacant upon the failure of that officer to execute the bonds as required by law; and, second, the effect upon this right and duty in permitting the officer to execute the bonds after the time required by law. The court held, construing section 4130 (identical with section 2, article 8, acts of 1906, except as to date of bonds to be given), with section 4557, of the Kentucky Statutes, that the county court had the right to vacate the office of sheriff upon the failure of the officer to execute the bonds as required; but having accepted the bond from him, the court could not afterwards vacate the office. In other words, it was there held that the court, under the language of section 4557, could do either of two things: First, suspend the officer until he executed the bonds; or, second, vacate the office. The first alternative authorized the court to force the officer to give bond without vacating his office, and what the court did was to practically adopt this method, although the order of suspension was not entered; but it was clearly held that the court might have vacated the office for the failure to give the bonds at the proper time. In the opinion it is said:

"This statute (section 4557) should be construed in connection with the revenue statutes (now section 2, article 8, acts of 1906), and it is manifest that a fair interpretation of the legislative meaning is that, upon the failure to execute any bond required of this official, for the protection of the State, county or citizen, the county court may remove him from office; and particularly where, by statute, it is made the plain duty of the official to execute the bond on a particular day. The duty then devolves on the sheriff and he must comply with the law; but it does not follow because the sheriff fails to renew his general bond or to give an annual bond for the collection of the revenue that the county judge is powerless to accept a bond after the first Monday in January. He may, it is true, vacate the office, but before he does this he accepts a bond that is in addition to or a new bond, upon which the last sureties became jointly liable with the sureties on the first bond. It is a bond sufficient to satisfy the court that all will be protected who are interested in its execution, and when accepted, the sheriff having previously qualified, it is then too late to enter an order vacating the office.' In the case at bar the county judge did not accept the bond from the sheriff, or permit him to execute one and this differentiates it from the phase of Schuff v. Pflanz; and it necessarily follows from the principle of that case, as applied to the facts of this, that the county judge had the right to vacate the office of the plaintiff upon his failure to execute the bond at the required time, and to appoint the defendant sheriff in his stead.

"It is, however, insisted by the plaintiff that the language of section 4557 requires the county judge to give the sheriff notice that he has failed to execute his bond. This position is based upon the language of the statute, that 'It shall be the duty of the county court to cause the sheriff, annually, to renew his bond,' &c.; it being said that this language requires the county judge to exercise a supervising oversight as to the sheriff, and, at least, to give him notice, of his failure in regard to the execution of his bonds, and afford him an opportunity to rectify the omission. It seems to me that this would be a very strained construction to place upon the language of the statute. Taking the section as a whole, it is clear that the county court shall cause the sheriff to execute his bond, either by suspending him until he does so, or vacating his office, if he chooses. The duty of executing the bond was upon the sheriff, and he knew whether he had performed this duty or not, and upon his failure to do so, the statute cast upon the county judge the duty of forcing the delinquent officer to execute the bond by suspending him, or of vacating the office and filling it with one who would execute the bond required by law.

"The plaintiff pleaded (and introduced evidence to support it) that in October, 1907, one Frank Rives had been appointed by the county judge (the predecessor of the county judge involved here) as special commissioner to settle his accounts as sheriff as the basis for a quietus to be thereafter obtained from the fiscal court; that the plaintiff did not settle his accounts with Rives in 1907, because he was advised by the county attorney not to do so until after the railroad tax was collected, and that upon the advice of the county attorney, he deferred the settlement; that in January, 1908, Rives, who had been elected to the State Senate, left Christian county and went to Frankfort, Kentucky, in the discharge of his legislative duties, and remained there until March 1, 1908; and that not being able to make the settlement of his accounts, he could not obtain a quietus, and, therefore, did not execute his bond; that anticipating this result, he spoke to the county judge, and that officer told him that if he did not execute the bond on the 1st day of March, as the law required, he would permit him to execute it afterwards and date it March the first. All of this was controverted in the pleadings, and contradicted most emphatically by the county judge in the evidence. But assuming the facts to have been as contended for by plaintiff, can it avail him as a legal excuse for the non-performance of his duty in the premises? In the first place, the obtaining of the quietus required by the statute is not a condition precedent to the execution of the bond, and is entirely separated from it by the statute. The plaintiff was, indeed, required to have the quietus, but the failure to obtain it did not prevent his executing bond, and the execution of the bond in nowise prevented the consequence from the failure to obtain the quietus. Without the quietus the statute provides that the tax book shall not be delivered to the sheriff; but this would be true whether the bond was executed or not. The execution of the bond and the obtaining of the quietus are separate duties, and the failure to perform these duties imposes separate and distinct consequences.

"Furthermore, the county court must speak by its records. The county judge, when off the bench, has no power or authority to bind the county court, and it would entail most disastrous consequences if those having business with the county court could come in and set up conversations had with the judge on the street, or out of office, in bar of the consequences of the judgments of the court. Nothing that the county judge may have said as an individual can be allowed to militate against the judgment of the county court. It is an elementary proposition that even written opinions of the court do not bind; but it is the decree entered upon the judgment roll that has force and effect. Therefore, admitting to be true all that the plaintiff contends took place between the county judge and himself with reference to the execution of the bond involved here, it can not be allowed to avail him upon this motion.

"It is also said that the regular term of the county court of Christian county commenced on the second day of March, 1908, and there was no order of adjournment to the eleventh day of March, 1908, when the judgment vacating the office of plaintiff was entered. I think the record conclusively refutes this as a matter of fact; but whether it does or not, section 1058, of the Kentucky Statutes, expressly permits the county judge to hold special terms of court at any time he may see fit, for any business but certain named exceptions, of which that involved here is not one.

"It was not necessary that the county judge should give plaintiff notice that he intended to enter a judgment vacating the office. The court only had jurisdiction to enter the order provided the bond had not been accepted and filed. This was a matter of record, and its existence jurisdictional. There was but one question: Had the bond been filed? This could only be established by the record. Upon the failure to execute the bond and file it on the day required by the statute the authority of the county court arose to vacate the office. The record shows (and it could not be contradicted) that no bond was filed. The right to vacate the office was absolute, and the judgment of vacation removed the plaintiff from office.

"For the foregoing reasons, I am constrained to dissolve the injunction granted by the circuit court; and it is so ordered.

"In this conclusion I am authorized to say that Chief Justice O'Rear and Judges Lassing and Carroll, concur."

Just why that opinion was not deemed binding upon the parties to the litigation, and upon the circuit judge, whose official action is reviewed and reversed, we are not told. It was ignored, or attempted to be, by Mr. Smith and his counsel, and seems to have been regarded by the circuit judge as not binding upon him, either because it was not the authoritative action of the Appellate Court, or was made inapplicable by other facts occurring subsequent to its rendition, and which materially affected the status of the case. The circuit judge has not filed a response in this proceeding. Hence we are left in some doubt as to what he based his action upon. If counsel who appear here for him correctly present his views, then we may assume that his action was based upon one or both of the following propositions: First. That the action of the county court declaring the office of sheriff vacant, was had without notice to the former incumbent, Smith, and was a judgment depriving him of his office without a day in court: and for that reason was void; that being void, the opinion of Judge Barker delivered upon the motion to dissolve the injunction in the first action raising the question, holding that it was not void, was erroneous and not binding upon anybody in another action, although the same question might be again raised. Second. That since the opinion was delivered, Mr. Smith has prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court from the judgment of the county court, and has executed the necessary appeal bond, which in appeals in those courts operates as a supersedeas; that the order of the county court appointing Renshaw was therefore suspended until the circuit court should act on the appeal; and that in the meantime Smith was entitled to discharge the duties of sheriff and occupy the room set apart for that office; that Prowse, the county judge, was made a party to the suit enjoining Renshaw from taking possession of the office (the first suit) and was disqualified by that fact from sitting in judgment on the motion in the second suit, the one brought by Renshaw against Smith for an injunction and possession of the office rooms, &c.

The writer feels that nothing can be added to the reasoning in Judge Barker's opinion, delivered upon the motion to dissolve the injunction. But counsel for respondent assail its soundness on the ground that it is in conflict with certain opinions heretofore delivered by this court, and which hold that one elected to an office who has qualified can not be deprived of his office by the judgment or action of any tribunal without having had his day in court—that is, notice of the action in which it is sought to oust him. It is conceded that if the statute authorized his removal without notice, the act would be valid. (Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon., 648, and Todd v. Dunlap, 99 Ky., 460, are relied on in support of the respondent's contention.)

Page v. Hardin, supra, was the removal of the Secretary of State from office by the Governor, because of the former's alleged neglect of official duty. The act was done upon the Governor's own motion, and without trial or notice. The Secretary of State was then removable from office by the Governor for cause. The court found the fact to be that the alleged cause did not exist. Aside from certain deficiencies in pleading upon which the court, in a large measure, rested its decision, it was stated, and we think correctly, that an appointment of one to office for a definite term, vests the appointee with such right to its emoluments that he can not be ousted without cause and a hearing, unless the statute provides for dispensing with such procedure.

The same principle was restated in Todd v. Dunlap, supra, where it was averred that the mayor and aldermen of Louisville were threatening to remove certain members of the Board of Public Works, without cause or notice. But we are of opinion that the principle relied on is not applicable in this case. Here the incumbent had not the right to the office at all, unless he first executed certain bonds. The execution of the bonds each year at the time fixed by statute, is a condition precedent to his right of incumbency. The second and third years are not different from the first. If he failed originally to qualify by executing bonds after his election, no one would say that the elected sheriff must first have a notice that the office would be declared vacant before the county court could so declare. The statute is explicit, and the reasons are as important that the second and every subsequent annual bond be executed as the first. The failure to execute one of them works a vacancy in the office, subject to the discretion of the county court to allow further time as to the bonds subsequent to the first one. It is not a forfeiture or a penalty for something done, but is the equivalent of a resignation. The office became vacant, because the statute declares that is the result, unless the county court extend the time. The provisions of the statute are for the benefit of the taxpayers and the public. The office is one of vast importance. That official collects all the taxes, in his county, for the State and county. The Legislature has taken great pains to safeguard the public by exacting the prompt execution of sufficient bonds, and vesting the county courts with large discretion in the matter of seeing that the bonds are solvent and are executed when they should be. The order of the county court did not deprive Smith of his office. It was the statute. The county court was given the power to stay the operation of the statute by extending the time to the sheriff within which to execute the bond. But without such extension the office was vacated and the sheriff and all the world had notice of that fact from the statute itself.

In Schuff v. Pflanz, supra, the court did extend the time by accepting the bond subsequent to the date fixed by the statute; or, in other words, waived the failure by accepting the bond after the time fixed by statute. That case goes no further, and it should not. Such statutes affect the State revenue and are not to be dealt with lightly, and played with as at shuttle-cock, according to the convenience or partiality of public officials. They should be held to mean what they say, and when the statute says that if the sheriff fails to execute a bond to secure the collection of the public revenue, on or before the first day of March, that the office shall thereupon become vacant, and the county court shall thereupon appoint his successor, there ought not to be read into the statute something different, for instance, that if the sheriff, without good excuse, fails to renew his bond, the county court may, upon notice and after trial, adjudge the office to be vacant, and fill the vacancy by appointment. It does not make any difference under this statute, what the reason was that prevented the sheriff from executing the required bonds; it is his failure that vacates the office. There is nothing for trial. No extraneous fact to be ascertained; no dereliction of conduct to be adjudged. Whether the bond had been executed, the records of the court will show, and if not executed the statute takes effect, unless the court sees proper to extend the time, as it was held in Schuff v. Pflanz, it might do under section 4557, Kentucky Statutes. It was suggested in argument that the sheriff might tender a good bond within the time, and the county court might, from partisan or other improper motive, refuse to accept it, or to allow the record to show any fact connected with the tender. It is sufficient to say that the suppositious case is not here; it is quite likely, as is usual, a good tender would be upheld to be the equivalent of doing the act required, and that a court of competent jurisdiction would compel the acceptance of the bond, its solvency being conceded.

We adhere to the conclusion on this point stated in Judge Barker's opinion herein adopted.

By statute, a judge of the Court of Appeals is given jurisdiction to dissolve an interlocutory injunction granted by a circuit court judge, or any other inferior officer. The judgment of the appellate judge on that matter, is the law of that case, so long as the facts shown in the record are substantially unchanged, until it may be reversed, or departed from by the Court of Appeals. The jurisdiction is conferred by statute—as all appellate jurisdiction is—and when exercised, neither the parties to the record, nor the inferior courts, are at liberty to set it aside; for the time being it is as binding upon everybody concerned as if rendered by the Court of Appeals, sitting in banc. Like other judgments, it is binding not only in the particular case, but as between the same parties or their privies, and before whatever judicial tribunal it may come, it is binding upon them all if the same subject-matter is involved. It can not be avoided by bringing a new suit about the same thing, presenting for decision again the same or substantially the same disputed question of law and fact. To allow such practice would bring the authority of the law into disrespect, and unsettle that which it was intended by the statute conferring the jurisdiction should be put at rest for the time being. Final authority in such matters must be vested somewhere. And wherever vested, when exercised it should be respected and must be obeyed. When the circuit judge's action in such matters is final by the operation of the statute, it binds everybody, including this court, till such time as it may be overborne by the means allowed by law. Interlocutory injunctions, if dissolved by the trial court or judge, when re-instated by a judge of the Court of Appeals, may not thereafter be disregarded by the parties or the inferior tribunal where the action may be pending, so long as they remain interlocutory. If upon the complete preparation of the case, the record presents a different state of facts, substantially, from that made to appear on the interlocutory hearing, the trial court may then refuse to grant the permanent injunction, thereby dissolving the temporary order. When, this court may, in the manner allowed by the Code(section 747, Civil Code) re-instate the interlocutory injunction pending the appeal, or by reversing the judgment on final hearing, order it to be re-instated by the trial court. On the other hand, if the trial court grants a temporary injunction, which, on application to a judge of this court, is dissolved, it must stand dissolved throughout the litigation, and until a final trial in the circuit court, when, if the facts are materially different from those shown on the interlocutory hearing, a permanent injunction may be granted by the trial court. Any other procedure would beget unseemingly conflict in authority and a possible war between jurisdictions.

But it may be that the circuit judge proceeded upon the idea that by the appeal prosecuted by Smith from the order declaring the office of sheriff vacant, and appointing Renshaw to it, that order was superseded, and that Renshaw had no right to the office whilst the order appointing him was suspended.

All appeals are regulated by statute. Those to this court, from judgments of circuit courts include all matters not excluded by the statute: (section 950, Kentucky Statutes); those to the circuit court from county and other inferior courts such only as are expressly named and allowed by the statute. (Section 978, Kentucky Statutes.) The statute conferring appellate jurisdiction upon the circuit court reads as follows:

"Appeals may be taken to the circuit court from all orders and judgments of the fiscal court or quarterly court in civil cases where the value in controversy, exclusive of interest and cost, is over twenty-five dollars; and from all judgments of the county court where the amount in controversy is over fifty dollars, exclusive of interest and cost; and from all judgments and orders of said court in cases of bastardy, or in the settlement of the accounts of personal representatives, assignees, guardians, trustees, curators and other fiduciaries, and from orders granting, revoking or refusing letters testamentary or of administration, or appointing or refusing to appoint, or removing curators, guardians, trustees or committees of estates, or granting or refusing to grant druggist, tavern or liquor license, and from judgments in proceedings to condemn land for any purpose, and in all other cases allowed by law."

It will be observed that in allowing appeals from quarterly and fiscal courts to the circuit court, the jurisdiction is restricted to "civil cases, where the value in dispute" exceeds twenty-five dollars; but the language granting appeals from judgments of county courts is significantly different:

"All judgments of the county court, where the amount in controversy is over fifty dollars, exclusive of interest and cost, may be appealed from."

Then follows a list of other judgments of county courts that may be appealed from, including most of the matters over which that tribunal has jurisdiction, but not including the order of the county court removing or appointing a sheriff. It must be presumed that the Legislature was not so particular in this matter, without intention. Knowing that they were creating an appellate jurisdiction from the county to the circuit courts, and naming specifically so many of the matters over which that tribunal had jurisdiction, most of them of much less importance than the one of appointing or removing a sheriff, it must be taken that they meant to exclude the latter from the appellate jurisdiction thereby created. But it is argued that the value of the office of sheriff is far in excess of fifty dollars, and we have no doubt that is true. But the value of the thing in controversy is not the test in allowing appeals from the county court, although, it is in appeals from quarterly and fiscal courts. It is the "amount in controversy" that controls the question in appeals from such county court judgments are not otherwise specified. The word "amount" can apply only to a judgment for money, while "value" may be applied to judgments for a number of things other than money. The office of sheriff ought not to be left vacant, nor ought the solvency of the bonds required, or their prompt execution be delayed or determined by any other official than the one upon whom the Legislature has imposed that duty. For a great many years the county courts alone have had that jurisdiction. They are peculiarly qualified, as the Legislature seems to have considered to discharge it acceptably and safely. County judges are elected with that duty in view, and it may be safely supposed, that they are chosen by the electors with some particular reference for their fitness to discharge it. Circuit judges serve a district more frequently made up of a number of counties—they have not generally the acquaintance nor the means of personal knowledge touching the financial standing of the sureties who may be offered on sheriff bonds. Nor are circuit clerks who accept appeal bonds so well qualified, generally, as are the county judges to pass on such questions. The county judge's jurisdiction is mainly over the fiscal affairs of his county. He has many means and opportunities afforded by the daily affairs of his office for knowing who are safe sureties, and the amount that will probably pass through the sheriff's hands, not open to other officials. The situation and the studied language of section 978, Kentucky Statutes, supra, and the rule of construction that the expression of some indicates the exclusion of all others, leave us in no doubt that orders of the county courts removing and appointing sheriffs, are not the subject of appeal to the circuit court. Hence the appeal attempted by Smith, did not suspend the county court's order, but being void, left it in full force.

In the absence of the circuit judge from the county, the county judge may hear and grant or refuse motions for interlocutory injunctions of a prohibitory nature. (Section 273, Civil Code.) As Circuit Judge Cook was absent from Christian county when the application was made in the case of Renshaw against Smith, county Judge Prowse had jurisdiction to hear and determine the question, whether the temporary injunction applied for in that case should be granted. Nor did the fact that he had been joined as a defendant in a former action of Smith against Renshaw, disqualify him from acting. His being joined in the other case was merely formal; he had no personal interest in it. Nor has he now any, so far as this record intimates. The action of the respondent in granting the temporary writ of prohibition was beyond his jurisdiction, as he could not do so without invading the rightful jurisdiction of the county judge in the matter, conferred upon him by statute, so long as he was in the county and not disqualified from acting, and the circuit judge was out of the county.

The respondent is directed to forthwith set aside his order prohibiting County Judge Prowse from trying the action for injunction in the action of Renshaw against Smith, pending in the Christian Circuit Court, and the writ of prohibition prayed for in this application is granted.

The whole court sitting.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. VAUGHN.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Collision of Trains—Injury to Flagman—Negligence of Company—Contributory Negligence of Employee—A caboose on a work train is the proper place for the flagman of such train to ride. Where a work train which was loaded with railroad track rails, was run into by a freight train, it was not negligence of the flagman to jump off from the rear end of the caboose and the fact that he was injured by the loose rails on the flat car being driven against him in attempting to escape from the caboose, did not make him guilty of contributory negligence preventing his recovery for damages against the railroad company whose negligence had placed him in peril.

2. Same—Evidence—Resumption of Work—Discharge—Cause—In an action by a flagman for damages for an injury in a collision of trains where he testified that he resumed work for the company after he had partially recovered from his injury but was discharged because of his inability to work on account of his injury, it was competent for the company to prove that he was discharged for inebriety and not for inability to labor otherwise.

3. Same—Evidence—Contract of Settlement—Meaning—Instructions to Jury—Where, in an action by an employee against a railroad company for damages for an injury, a written contract was introduced in evidence, purporting to be a complete settlement of plaintiff's entire claim, the court should have told the jury that such writing alone must be looked to for the meaning of the parties, if an intent may be gathered from its terms; and its intent is governed solely by the law and not at all by the mental consideration of one of the parties to it; there being no plea of mistake.

4. Same—Accepting Compensation—Tender Before Suit—Where, in an action for damages by an employee, against the railroad company, a written compromise of settlement was pleaded by the company for the entire claim which the plaintiff claims was intended for and was accepted by him solely for his lost time caused thereby, he was not required to tender back the money he claims was paid for lost time, but if he recovers in his action he should be required to account for the money he received.

5. Evidence—Pleadings of Adverse Party—Competency—Where there is no admission of fact in the pleadings of the defendant against its interest, they were not competent to be read on the trial as evidence for the plaintiff.

Trabue, Doolan & Cox and Lockett & Worsham for appellant.

Dorsey & Stanley and J. Morgan Chinn for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, reversing.

Appellee was flagman on a work train on appellant's road. The work train, in going into Clarksville, Tenn., ran into a freight train standing on the track, near the city limits of Clarksville. The work train was composed of the locomotive, caboose and a flat car, the latter loaded with railroad track rails, and owing to a defective draw-head, or coupler, was coupled back of the caboose. Appellee's duty was to look after the rear of the train, where the caboose is ordinarily. He was riding in the caboose, when, noticing the engineer, fireman and conductor jump from the engine, he ran to the rear of the caboose to jump off. At that moment the collision occurred, some of the rails on the flat car being driven forward by the impact, pinning his body to the car. He claims to have sustained permanent injury to his leg and kidneys, and painful injuries elsewhere upon his person. He sued for and recovered $2,000 as damages.

The peremptory instruction asked for by appellant was properly overruled. A collision of two trains under the circumstances shown, of itself proves that those operating the trains, or one of them, were negligent. Furthermore, it was gross negligence in those in charge of one or the other of the trains, certainly, and may be of both, to have so disregarded orders, in running on the time of the other, or of the train dispatchers in letting two trains out on the same track running in opposite directions, at the same time, at the meeting point without notifying either of the other's presence. So that, on that score, there was enough evidence of gross negligence in the fact of the collision to have taken the case to the jury. Nor is there any merit in the contention that plaintiff was not in his proper place when he was injured. The company had not the right to injure or imperil him by its gross negligence, wherever he, an employe, rightfully upon the train, may have been upon it. But the caboose was shown to be the usual place for the flagman to ride while the train was running between stations. He was therefore in his proper place. When put in peril by an imminent collision, he was not obliged to exercise a correct judgment as to the course he should pursue for his own safety. His act in attempting to jump from the rear of the car was natural under the circumstances, and he was not negligent in his choice of means to avert or escape from the peril in which his master's negligence had placed him.

Appellee testified on the trial that he was so severely injured that he could not thereafter follow his former avocation, and was indeed physically unfit for hard manual labor. It was shown, however, that some two or three months after his injury he again went to work for appellant railroad company, in his old capacity as a flagman on freight trains. But he testified that he was compelled to quit the job on account of his injuries having so impaired his strength as to make him incompetent for such hard labor. He also testified that owing to his being unable to do the work, appellant discharged him. He was asked, on cross-examination, if he had not been discharged because of his inebriacy, instead of his physical disablement. He denied it. The appellant then offered to prove that he had, on returning to work, after the injury, been as able to perform his duties, and did so as competently as ever before, and was so employed for several months, making the same wages as before his injury; but that owing to his intemperate habits as to the use of intoxicants, he was discharged.

The trial court refused to allow the evidence offered by appellant as to the reason for discharging appellee. We think that was error. If appellee had not by his testimony endeavored to make, and probably had made, the impression on the jury that he had been discharged because of his weakened and impaired physical condition to do the work of a brakeman, the evidence on that point offered by appellant would have been irrelevant. But appellant was entitled to rebut the statement made by appellee on this point. It was not collateral.

Appellant pleaded that some days after appellee's discharge from the hospital, he entered into a compromise agreement with it, by which, in consideration of $100, then paid to him by appellant, his claim for damages on account of the injuries sustained in the collision was settled, and compromised. The written agreement was filed with the pleading. Appellee replied that he was procured by fraud to sign the agreement; that he did not read it; that appellant's agent, with whom the settlement was made, represented that the only matter that was being settled was the time which appellee had lost from work while laid up by his injuries, and that he was assured that his claim for damages, if any there was, was not affected by the settlement. He also pleaded that owing to his intense suffering and being under the influence of morphine, taken to ease his pain, he did not comprehend what he was doing. The evidence on this issue was, as might be expected, sharply conflicting. Appellee and his brother who was present at the settlement, each in his testimony, sustained appellee's plea. On the other hand, appellant's claim agent denied, positively, that such representations were made. The testimony as to appellee's suffering and his use of the opiate is rather hazy. The court instructed the jury on this issue as follows:

"The court further instructs you that if you shall believe from the evidence that the one hundred dollars mentioned in the evidence as having been paid to plaintiff was paid to and accepted by him in full settlement of all of plaintiff's demands growing out of the alleged injury complained of, then in that event you should find for the defendant, although you may believe that the receipt read in evidence was obtained by fraud or misrepresentation."

This instruction is erroneous. If plaintiff executed the writing understandingly, and without being deceived by the fraudulent misrepresentations of appellant's claim agent, he is bound by it, no matter whether he "accepted the payment" of the $100 in full settlement or not. The first question is (having admitted its actual execution) did he have mind enough, at the time, to comprehend the nature of his act; then, was he induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the agent of appellant to sign it without reading it, being lead thereby to believe it was only a receipt for payment for certain time he had lost and not for his injuries; if he was not so imposed upon, and did have mind enough to have comprehended the nature of the contract, it remains only for the court to construe the writing. The writing purports a full and complete settlement of the plaintiff's entire claim for damages growing out of that injury. The court should have told the jury so. Where parties set down their contract in a written memorial, it alone must be looked to for their meaning, if an intent may be gathered from its terms, and its effect is governed solely by the law, and not at all by the mental consideration of one of two parties to it, there being no plea of mistake. Suppose it were so that plaintiff's mind was not impaired at that time, and that the writing was signed by him without fraudulent imposition. Could he still say "I did not accept the $100 in settlement of all my demands?" Yet this is what the instruction allows. No; if he signed it in his right mind and without imposition, that should be the end of this case. The plaintiff's weakened physical condition; his state of mind, not yet being accustomed to his maimed condition; his anxiety to return to his work, and unwillingness to believe he was permanently injured; the inequality of the position of the parties to the transaction; the assuring manner and words of the claim agent; perhaps the use of the opiate; all these are evidence which tend to sustain plaintiff's claim of imposition, aside from the direct representations claimed by plaintiff to have been made to him. The situation was such as to relax the rule that a party who signs a contract without reading it will not be heard to say that it does not express his intention; besides the gross inadequacy of the compensation, if the plaintiff was injured to the extent he says he was, requires but slight additional evidence of fraud in its obtention or execution to overturn such a settlement. (Railroad Co. v. Harris, 158 U. S., 331.)

The plea in this case was broad enough and the evidence sufficient, to have authorized the submission to the jury of the question of fraud, as well as of mental condition when the paper was executed, if the pleadings had justified it. But, under the instruction given, the jury might well have found that the plaintiff was not imposed on (the question as to his mental condition was not submitted), and yet that he did not "accept" the $100 in settlement of all his claim—for he testified that he did not so intend. Then their verdict for the plaintiff not unnaturally followed.

Plaintiff did not tender back the $100 before his suit. This he should have done (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. McElroy, 100 Ky., 158) unless, as he pleads, it was paid to him on account of lost time alone. In that event a tender of repayment was not required. (McGill v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1245; Ingram v. Cov., &c., R. Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 508; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Belt, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 421-3.) But, if he should recover, he ought to be required to account for the $100, as loss of time from the date of the injury was one of the elements of his damage.

Under the state of pleadings in this case, the question of appellee's mental condition was properly not submitted to the jury. Nor should the fact of fraud practiced by appellant's agent be submitted at all, except as it bears upon the one phase allowed, namely, the alleged substitution by appellant's agent of agreement settling the demand sued on in full for the agreement alleged by appellee of settling only for his lost time. The reason other features of fraud may not be submitted is, that, as the plaintiff failed to tender back the consideration received by him after he became aware of the fraud that was practiced upon him he is deemed in law to have ratified it. Having ratified it, he can not now disregard his ratification. But as to the claim of fraud for which, under the authorities cited, he does not have to tender repayment of the consideration, the question of such fraud may be submitted to the jury. The instruction given without defining fraud, left to the jury every element that they may have supposed constituted it; whereas it should have been limited as above indicated.

Plaintiff was allowed to read the pleadings of the defendant to the jury as evidence. There was no admission of fact in the pleadings of the defendant against its interest which entitled plaintiff to have the pleadings read to the jury. We think the court erred in admitting them as evidence.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for proceedings consistent herewith.

MAYFIELD WATER AND LIGHT CO., &c. v. WEBB'S ADM'R.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Electric Light Wires—Injury to Children—Elevations Beyond Danger—As long as electric light wires are not required to be put under ground, they must be put on poles, and where they are placed as high as eighteen feet above the street, the company should not be required to anticipate that children will climb up to them and get hurt and the company should not be held liable in such a case.

2. Same—Trespassers—Risk Assumed—Children, as well as adults, when they trespass upon the property of another, take the risk, unless, the circumstances bring the case within the principle of what is known as the Turn Table cases, where a dangerous instrumentality is used that is attractive to children.

Robbins & Thomas for appellants.

W. B. Stanfield for appellant Telephone Co.

W. J. Webb, Webb & Seay and Weaks & Weaks for appellee.

Appeal from Graves Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

The Mayfield Water and Light Co., maintains a system of electric lights in Mayfield. It erected, along College Cross street, a line of poles eighteen feet high, and at the top of the poles, on a cross-arm, it placed two electric wires, twenty inches apart, and eighteen feet from the ground. After this had been done, the Home Telephone Company put up a line of poles along the street thirty feet high, and on these poles it placed wire cables containing its telephone wires. At the intersection of Sixth street, the telephone poles turned in Sixth street, and to keep its pole straight at this point, it attached two guy wires to the top of the pole and ran them out to a deadman, or log, buried in the ground, the guy wires running down from the top of the pole at an angle of about 45 degrees, being about four feet apart at the ground and coming together at the top of the pole. The guy wires passed in about eight inches of the electric wire. The children of the neighborhood would hold on to the upper guy wire with their hands and walk on the lower wire and then slide down, using the wires to play upon. Charles M. Webb, a little boy eleven years old, was playing upon the wires in this way when his head touched the electric wire thus completing the circuit, and he was instantly killed. This suit was brought against both the electric light company and the telephone company to recover for his death. A recovery was had in the circuit court for $1,000, and the defendants appeal.

There was proof on the trial that the insulation on the electric light wire was defective; and there was also proof that whatever the condition of the insulation might have been, the result would have been the same, when the little boy's head touched it, while he was standing on the other wire which ran into the ground, the proof, being, that the insulation will not protect from injury when such a high current of electricity is carried as was used on this wire. The ground upon which the recovery is rested is that in the construction of the wires, they were made attractive and inviting to children, and that the defendants were guilty of negligence in so maintaining the wires and permitting them to remain in this dangerous and unprotected condition. This court has in a number of cases held electric light companies responsible where it permitted live wires to hang in the street. Thus in City of Owensboro v. York's Adm'r, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1397, a little boy twelve years old, discovered that a wire was hot, and being dared by one of his companions to touch it, got on a board, took it in his hands and was killed. A judgment for the plaintiff was sustained. (Macon v. Paducah Street Railway Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 46; Lexington Railroad Co. v. Fain, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1443; Thompson v. City of Somerset, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 131; Maysville Gas Co. v. Thomas, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1690, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 403.)

But in all of these cases the wire was in the street; here the wire was eighteen feet above the street. It could only be reached by a person climbing the electric light pole or walking up the guy wire of the telephone company. In all the cases where a liability has been imposed for what is known as an attractive nuisance to children, the nuisance has been placed within their reach. We know of no case where this has been applied to things put eighteen feet above the ground which may only be reached by climbing a pole or walking up a wire. Such structures are not an invitation to children to use them. A child may climb a dead tree and thus get hurt, but the owner of the tree can not be said to maintain an attractive nuisance, because he keeps a rotten tree on his land. To climb this pole or walk this wire was as difficult as to climb a tree and no reason would exist for holding one an attractive nuisance more than the other; for if the limbs of the tree were brittle or rotten, there would be no great danger in climbing out on them. In Simonton v. Citizens Electric Light Co., 67 S. W., 530, the defendant had placed spikes in its poles for the use of its men in ascending and descending them. Children in the neighborhood got to using the pole in the same way. One of them went up on the pole and lost his balance and fell to the ground. It was held that the company was not liable. The spikes on the side of the pole would offer a much greater inducement to a child to climb the pole than the guy wire offered in the case before us. In Johnson v. Paducah Laundry Co., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 59, the defendant had upon its open lot an open vat of hot water. The plaintiff, walking upon the lot in the night for a purpose of his own and without right, fell into the vat of hot water and was burned. It was held that he could not recover. In Schauf v. City of Paducah, 106 Ky. 228, a little boy wading out into an open pond on the property of the city to catch a bird, got over his depth and was drowned. It was held that there could be no recovery. Other authorities are collected in these opinions. The tendency of the more recent cases is to restrict rather than enlarge the application of the principle laid down in what are called Turn Table cases; and to hold that the defendant is not liable unless he knows or ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to know that his structure is alluring to children and endangers them (Barnes v. Shreveport R. R. Co., 49 Am. St. Rep., 416 426.) In Harris v. Cowles, 107 Am. St. Rep., 847, a child was injured by a revolving door at the entrance to a building, the door being similar to those in common use in winter to keep out the cold. It was held that the trespasser, though a child of tender years, could not recover, on the ground that to extend the rule would be to impose a burden upon the property owners that would be unreasonable. The same principle was applied in Fitzmaurice v. Connecticut R. R. Co., 112 Am. St. Rep., 159, where a child was burned at a pile of hot ashes left upon the defendant's premises; and in Foster-Herbert v. Cut Stone Co., 112 Am. St. Rep., 881, where a child climbed into a low wagon and was there hurt. As long as electric light wires are not put under ground, they must be put upon poles, and where they are placed above the street as high as eighteen feet, the company should not be required to anticipate that children will climb up to the wires and get hurt. Guy wires are necessary on high poles at street corners, where the line turns. A guy wire placed on a high pole to keep it in place, or some such contrivance, can not well be dispensed with. Such a wire is not a dangerous instrumentality, attractive or alluring to children within the meaning of the Turn Table cases. The little boy was a trespasser upon the defendant's wire, and being a trespasser he can not complain that the premises were unsafe. Children, no less than adults, when they trespass upon the property of another, take the risk unless the circumstances bring the case within the principle of what is known as the Turn Table cases, where a dangerous instrumentality is maintained, with knowledge actual or constructive, that it is alluring to children and endangers them. A wire eighteen feet above the ground, which can only be reached as this wire was, can not be said to fall within the exception to the general rule.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE GAS CO., &c. v. KENTUCKY HEATING CO.

(Filed June 20, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Actions—Injunction and Damages—Separate Actions—Bar—While an action for injunctive relief and for damages may be joined, they are separate and distinct causes of action and the plaintiff may elect to prosecute each by a separate action, and the fact that he prosecuted an action for an injunction does not bar a subsequent action for damages resulting from the injury he sought to enjoin.

2. Natural Gas—Rival Companies—Owning Adjacent Territory—Damages for Wasting Gas Supply—Appellee, Kentucky Heating Company, owned a natural gas well in Meade county and conveyed its product in pipes to Louisville for sale. Appellant, Louisville Gas Company, manufactured gas in Louisville for sale therein and also owned a gas well in Meade county, adjacent to the well of appellee. Appellee, in an action in equity obtained an injunction against appellant from wasting the Meade county gas by burning it in a pretended effort to make lamp-black, and in subsequent action obtained a judgment for $60,000 in damages for wasting the gas in the Meade county gas territory from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the burden was on the appellee to make out its case, and it must do this by evidence other than the finding of the jury in the equity case which was incompetent in this action.

3. Same—Gas Reservoir—Reservoir of Adjacent Owners—Wasting Gas Supply—Measure of Damages Recoverable—The right of surface owners to take gas from subjacent fields or reservoirs is a right in common. There is no property in the gas until it is taken. The right of owners of the surface to take it is only limited by its being taken for a lawful purpose and in a reasonable manner, but any unlawful exercise of this right which results in injury to the natural right of any other tenant in common is an actional wrong, and in such case the measure of damages is the difference in money at the point where taken between the value of the natural flow of the gas and that of the diminished flow directly and independently of all other causes attributable to the wrong.

4. Same—Punitive Damages—When Recoverable—In an action by a surface owner against a like owner for damages for wasting the gas under their common territory there can be no recovery for punitive damages unless it is shown that the defendant willfully wasted the gas or acted maliciously with a design to injure the plaintiff's business, in which case punitive damages may be recovered.

5. Same—Argument to Jury—Discretion of Counsel—In an ordinary action no argument should be permitted in making the opening statement to the jury by counsel, but counsel may, with propriety, in the closing argument, discuss such facts as are in evidence without limit or restriction so long as he confines himself to the evidence and its application to the law as given by the court.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

In December, 1901, the Kentucky Heating Company brought suit in the Meade Circuit Court against the Louisville Gas Company and others, seeking to enjoin them from wasting the natural gas in that field. This suit proceeded to a judgment, in which the injunction was granted, and, upon appeal to this court, it was affirmed in 117 Ky., 71. After this judgment, the Kentucky Heating Company, in January, 1904, filed the present suit against the same defendants, in which it sought to recover damages for the alleged wasting of gas in the Meade county field. This suit was prosecuted to a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $60,000. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The parties, plaintiff and defendant, in the suit for an injunction and in the suit from which this appeal is prosecuted, are the same. The Kentucky Heating Company in the present case, pleaded the recovery of the judgment in the equity suit, which is affirmed in 117 Ky., 71, as an adjudication of the fact as between them, that the appellants, during the time complained of had, in the operation of a certain lamp-black factory, wasted a great quantity of gas, and thereupon laid its damages therefor at $250,000. The defendants, the Louisville Gas Company and others, answered traversing the allegations of the petition, pleaded the statute of limitation, and also pleaded the judgment in the equity suit as a bar to the maintenance of this action. The plea of the statute of limitation has been abandoned upon this appeal and will, therefore, not be considered.

The judgment in the suit in equity was pleaded and relied upon by the plaintiff as an adjudication between it and the defendants of the fact that the defendants had wrongfully wasted gas in the Meade county field, and the same judgment was pleaded by defendants in bar to the plaintiff's right to maintain the action. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the defendants' plea of the judgment in bar, and held that the judgment in the equity suit was an estoppel against the defendants from proving that they had not wrongfully wasted the gas, and the only issue to be tried was the ascertainment of the damages sustained by the appellee, the Kentucky Heating Company, by reason of the wrongful wasting of gas by appellants. The weight of the argument on both sides is devoted to the respective contentions of the parties as to the force and effect of the judgment in the suit in equity upon the rights of the parties in the present action.

Upon this contention we have had little difficulty, and it is unnecessary to consider at length, the numerous cases cited. It is contended by appellants that the appellee, in its suit in equity to enjoin the appellants from wasting the gas, could have joined with that action their claim for damages, presented in this action; that a court of equity had jurisdiction to grant complete relief, by way of assessing damages, in addition to the relief of injunction, and this being true, appellee had its day in court, and having elected to sue for only the injunction, it is now estopped from maintaining another action against the same parties for damages. In other words, it is claimed that the cause of action for injunctive relief and for damages was one entire cause, and having taken only partial relief, the present action is a splitting of the cause. Some decisions of courts of other States are cited in support of this contention, but such a rule does not apply under the laws of this State. The claims do not constitute a single cause of action. It is true they might have been joined, and a court of equity might, after taking jurisdiction to grant the equitable relief, have retained jurisdiction of the case to assess the damages, but it does not follow that both claims constitute a single cause of action, or that plaintiff was compelled to present both in the same petition. While they might be jo'nable, they are, nevertheless, separate and distinct causes of action, the one calls for the protection of a right, the other indemnity or compensation for wrongs done. While, under the Code, there is one form of action, they are by title divided into two classes, ordinary and equitable, and had a claim for damages been made in the equitable action it would have required a separate and distinct trial, had either party demanded it, and an issue out of chancery to a jury, as a matter of right. This being true, the trial court properly sustained a demurrer to appellants' plea of the judgment in bar of the action.

It is further contended, by appellants, that if the judgment in the equity suit was not a bar to the action, then it had no probity of relation to any matter at issue in the present action. With this contention we can not agree. While the parties to the two actions are the same, the subject-matter being different, the judgment is not a bar, but the parties being the same it is conclusive proof of any fact at issue and adjudged on the merits. The main issue in the suit in equity was whether or not appellants would wrongfully waste the gas in the Meade county field, and, in order to show that they would do so, appellee introduced proof to the effect that they had theretofore wasted it, and upon this proof the chancellor based his finding, upon which the injunction was issued. The fact that they had wasted the gas was an issue only for the purpose of showing that they would thereafter waste it, but appellants are not precluded in this suit, by the judgment in the equity suit from showing that they did not waste it. They have made an issue upon this point with appellee, and the law casts upon appellee the burden of making out its case. and they must do this by evidence other than the finding and judgment of the chancellor in the equity suit. The equity judgment is not in itself the evidence of any wrongful, willful or malicious act on the part of appellants or any of them in the use which they made of the gas, but is merely the result of the impression which the evidence offered in the equity suit made upon the mind of the chancellor. Upon this same evidence a trial jury might or might not find, as a matter of fact, that the gas in that field was wasted by appellants; at all events appellants were entitled to have the evidence upon which appellee sought to hold them responsible in damages, submitted to the trial jury for their determination.

Had the matter, now in dispute, been tried at the same time that the equity suit was tried, appellants, as above indicated, would, as a matter of right, have been entitled to have submitted to a jury the question of fact which is now involved in this case, and if this had been done at that time it would hardly be contended that the chancellor should have told the jury what effect they should give the evidence. It would not have been proper to have done so in that suit, and he erred in permitting it in effect to be done on the trial of the case at bar by reading the opinion to the jury.

He likewise erred in embodying the opinion in the equity suit, or any part of it in his instructions.

Upon another trial appellee should be permitted to show, if it can, that appellants or any of them, willfully, wantonly or designedly wasted the gas for the purpose of injuring appellee in its business; in other words that they acted in bad faith. On the other hand appellants should be permitted to show, if they can, that they acted in good faith in operating the lamp-black factory.

Appellants also complain that the petition is insufficient in its allegation of damages, and that for this reason, no damages being alleged, their demurrer should have been sustained. It is true the petition alleges only general damages, but this is sufficient. Under it, however, appellee was entitled to recover only such damages as proximately and naturally flowed from the wrongs complained of, and might not recover any special damages. The trial court erred in admitting any evidence of special damages. The error into which the trial court fell in defining appellee's measure of damage seems to have been brought about by a misconception of the rights of appellee. The gas which appellants were wasting was not the property of appellee, and therefore, appellee could not recover for this gas as a conversion of his property. Appellants had the same right to take gas in the Meade county field that appellee had, as decided by this court in the cases of Louisville Gas Company v. Kentucky Heating Company, 117 Ky., 71; Commonwealth v. Trent, 117 Ky., 34; and, Hamby v. City of Dawson Springs, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 814. The right of the surface owners to take gas from the sub-jacent fields or reservoirs, is a right in common. There is no property in the gas until it is taken; before it is taken it is fugitive in its nature, and belongs in common, to the owners of the surface. The right of the owners to take it is without stint, the only limitation being that it must be taken for a lawful purpose and in a reasonable manner. Each tenant in common is restricted to a reasonable use of this right, and each is entitled to the natural flow of the gas from the sub-jacent fields, and any unlawful exercise of this right by any tenant in common, which results in injury to the natural right of any other tenant or surface owner is an actionable wrong. The damage sustained is only that which results from an improper interference with the natural flow of the gas in the wells and pipes of another. It is not the value of the gas at the point of distribution, or at any point where it enters artificial conduits, but the value in money for the diminution of the natural flow of the gas at the wells, directly and independently of all other causes attributable to the wrongs complained of. In other words, the measure of damages is the difference in money, at the point where taken, between the value of the natural flow and that of the diminished flow, directly and independently of all other causes, attributable to the wrong. Appellants had the right, as had every other surface owner, to take from the field, in its natural flow, gas without stint, and had the same quantity or more been taken in rightful use, and the same damage ensued, or, even had the field been destroyed thereby, appellee would have no just cause of complaint. Its cause of complaint, therefore, against appellants for damages, is due to the diminished flow of the gas, directly attributable to the wrongful act of appellants, independent of any other cause. This is the measure of damages which the trial court should have submitted to the jury.

Appellants also complain because the jury were told that they might award punitive damages, or "smart money." It is insisted for them that as there must have been a willful or wanton waste of the gas to entitle appellee to recover at all, if they are liable they are liable for compensatory damages only.

This objection is without merit for, while it is true appellants are not liable in any event unless it is shown that they willfully or wantonly wasted the gas, still, if in so doing they acted maliciously, and with a design of injuring appellee in its business, a case would be made out which would authorize a recovery of punitive damages as well. Under the allegations of the petition, a punitive damage instruction was authorized if there was any evidence to support it.

Appellants also complain of the conduct of counsel for appellee in his opening statement of the case, and in his closing argument.

A statement of the case in advance of the trial is controlled by section 217, of the Code. This section provides that after the jury has been selected and sworn, "the plaintiff must briefly state his claim, and the evidence by which he seeks to sustain it. * * * The defendant must then briefly state his defense, and the evidence he expects to offer in support of it."

No argument should be permitted in an opening statement, and for the expedition of business, as well as to insure a fair trial to each of the litigants, the court should confine the parties to a substantial compliance with these Code provisions. No statement of evidence which could not possibly bear upon the issue should be permitted. We do not intend to be understood as announcing that a departure from the rule, as stated in the Code, would be a reversible error, but as this Code provision was adopted with a view of dispatching the business of the court in an intelligent and satisfactory manner, the trial judges should, as far as possible, see that it is substantially complied with.

As to the strictures passed by counsel for appellants upon the closing argument of counsel for appellee, we must say that great latitude is necessarily allowed counsel in the presentation of his case, and while it is never his privilege to state in argument, as a matter of fact, anything which is not before the jury in evidence, he may, with perfect propriety, discuss such facts as are in evidence without limit or restriction, and so long as he confines himself to the evidence and its application to the law, as given by the court, his conduct is not open to criticism. Much that is complained of in this case, in the argument resulted, we think, from the errors of the trial court, with reference to the substantive rights of the parties and the issues, as set out in this opinion, and is not likely to be the subject of further complaint.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RICHARDSON v. L. & N. R. R. CO.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Carriers—Principal and Agent—Contracts—The principal who accepts the benefit of a contract made for himself by his agent not only ratifies the action of the agent, but the ratification relates back to the beginning, and it has been held by this court, in a number of cases, that the second carrier, when it accepts stock from the initial carrier, is bound by the contract made with it.

2. Limitation—The plea of limitation can not be sustained because the contract was in writing and within the meaning of section 2514, Ky. Stats.

Grant E. Lilly for appellant

Benjamin D. Warfield and Fred P. Caldwell for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

On January 19, 1893, C. Richardson shipped from Irvine, in Estill county, Kentucky, to Cincinnati, Ohio, a car load of hogs. The car was carried by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company to Richmond, Kentucky, and then turned over to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to be carried by it to Cincinnati. When the car reached Cincinnati and was delivered, the hogs were in bad condition, and some of them were dead. Richardson thereupon brought an action against the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company to recover damages, charging that the loss was due to the negligence of the carrier. That company showed that it transported the hogs to Richmond in due time and turned them over to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company in good condition. On this proof, it was held that he could not recover against that company. (R., N., I. & B. R. R. Co. v. Richardson, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1495, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2234.) After his action against that company had been dismissed, Richardson, on April 13, 1905, brought this suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, charging that the losses were due to its negligence. Among other things, appellee pleaded the five years statute of limitation, the action not having been brought until something over twelve years after the cause of action accrued. The circuit court held the plea good and dismissed the action and Richardson appeals.

The hogs were shipped under a written contract, which is as follows:

"Irvine, Ky., Station, Jan. 19, 1893.

"This memorandum of a special contract of carriage between the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine & Beattyville Railroad and C. Richardson, of Irvine, Ky., Witnesseth:

"Whereas, the said Richardson has this day shipped a car load of hogs to be carried by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine & Beattyville Railroad from Irvine, Ky., to Richmond, both points on its own line of road, and by it as agent of shipper to be forwarded to Green and Embury at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the same terms as this contract. In consideration of the special rate of $36.00 for car guaranteed by said railroad company between said point of shipment and Cincinnati, Ohio, the shipper hereby agrees to load, unload, feed, water and take all proper care of said stock, and insure the said railroad company and all connecting lines over which said stock may pass between point of shipment and destination from all loss or damage which may be incurred by delays in transportation, or delivery, or arising out of its responsibility as master over its agents, or servants (gross and wanton negligence excepted) growing out of this shipment. The shipper hereby further agrees that the actual value of said stock at the time and place of shipment shall govern the settlement of all damages for which the carriers may be liable, and declares the value of the stock herein described does not exceed $12 for each hog.

"In witness, thereof, the agent of the company and the owner of the stock, or his authorized agents, have fixed their signatures to two copies of this agreement.

"(Signed)

C. RICHARDSON, Owner.

"J. W. ROCK, Agent,

"For R., N., I. & B. R. R. Co."

The plaintiff alleged in his petition that, by agreement between the two railroad companies, freight was received by either, destined to points on the line of the other, and by mutual agreement the rates were made and charged by each for the entire carriage to the point of destination, this charge being, by mutual agreement, divided between the two companies; that the written contract above quoted was made by the initial carrier pursuant to this agreement. That the defendant was to receive, and did receive, its part of the price charged for carrying the hogs. That Rock making the written contract was acting for, and on behalf of, both roads. That both roads accepted and carried the stock under the written contract and that the defendant company was the only connecting carrier between Richmond, Ky., and Cincinnati, O.

By section 2514, of the Kentucky Statutes, an action upon a written contract may be commenced within fifteen years after the cause of action accrued. By section 2515, Kentucky Statutes, an action upon a contract not in writing, signed by the parties, express or implied, may be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued. It is insisted that this action is upon an implied contract, within the meaning of sec. 2515, supra, and hence barred by the five years statute. But this action is not based on an implied contract. The contract was in writing, signed by Richardson and J. W. Rock, agent for the R., N., I. & B. R. R. Co. It is made in consideration of $36.00, which is the entire charge for the transportation of the cattle from Irvine, Ky., to Cincinnati, O. If there was a traffic agreement by which the initial carrier was authorized to make this contract for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, or if the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company accepted the goods and carried them under the contract with the R., N., I. & B. R. R. Co., its acceptance of the goods would be a ratification of the act of its agent in making the contract, and would relate back to the time it was made. The principal who accepts the benefit of a contract made for him by his agent not only ratifies the action of the agent, but the ratification relates back to the beginning. (1 Parsons on Contracts, side pages 50, 51.) That the second carrier, when it accepted the stock from the initial carrier, was bound by the contract made with it, has been held by this court in a number of cases. (Nashville, & C. R. v. Carico, 95 Ky., 489; P., P. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Viers, 113 Ky., 526; L. & N. R. Co. v. Chestnut, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1846; I. C. R. Co. v. Curry, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 513.)

It is insisted that the written contract only obligates the initial carrier to carry the freight from Irvine to Richmond, and to forward it as agent of the shipper from Richmond to Cincinnati. That there is nothing in the contract placing any obligation upon the second carrier. But, when the L. & N. R. R. Co. accepted the freight under the contract made with the initial carrier, it bound itself to transport the freight to its destination, which was upon its line of road. The legal effect of the acceptance was the same as if the connecting carrier had in the first place signed the contract. The initial carrier was the agent of the connecting carrier and it was liable on the contract made with the initial carrier.

As the contract was in writing, this action was upon a written contract made by the defendant within the meaning of section 2514, of the Kentucky Statutes, and the demurrer to the plea of limitation should have been sustained.

Judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

The whole court sitting. Judges Hobson and Barker dissenting.

NICKELS v. BOARD OF COUNCILMEN OF CITY OF FRANKFORT.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Towns and Cities—Street Improvements—Apportionment Warrant—Assignment—The lot owner having failed to make the improvement required by ordinance, the work was let to James Lillis. In this action by the city against the owner to enforce the lien, he defends on the ground that the work was done by Ed Lillis and that he assigned the apportionment warrant to Collins and that the title did not pass. Held—That these parties worked together, sometimes taking contracts in the name of one and then in the name of the other, the city discharged a debt appellant owed and is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the person to whom it paid the money.

2. Ratification—The fact that the city had become the owner of the claim for paving, did not affect the power of the council to ratify the contract.

John W. Ray for appellant.

Wm. Cromwell for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

The Board of Councilmen of the city of Frankfort, by an ordinance adopted Sept. 4, 1900, ordered property holders owning property on both sides of Clinton street, from the colored city school to Wilkinson street to make side walk improvements in front of their respective lots by laying good and sufficient side walks, curbing and gutters in front of their lots, to be of granitoid, and sidewalks to be five feet wide from property line to outside line of sidewalks. The property holders, at least appellant, did not obey the ordinance. After advertising and receiving bids, the contract for certain lots, including that of appellant was made by the city with James Lillis at 60 cents a lineal foot, for curbing and guttering of the walk. The work was completed as contracted for, and was accepted by the city. Lillis assigned his apportionment warrant to Collins, who presented the claim against the city and it paid it. The contract with Lillis was not reported to the council for action before the work was done, but was subsequently reported to and ratified by the council. This suit was brought by the city against the lot owner, appellant, to enforce the lien given by statute for the improvement. Appellant resisted on several grounds, and in this court has presented two or three additional grounds not relied on by pleading in the circuit court. But we confine our notice to such as were raised in the court below.

It is contended that as the evidence shows that the work was done by Ed. Lillis, instead of James Lillis, and that it was he who assigned the apportionment warrant to Collins, the title to it did not pass. Ed. Lillis and James Lillis did work of this class together. Sometimes taking the contract in the name of one, and sometimes in the name of the other. James Lillis was made a party to the suit by amended petition. By answer and in his deposition he disclaimed any further interest in the claim. Collins was paid by the city. So he has no further interest in it. The city was not primarily liable to the contractor, but only in event it failed to so provide by ordinance as that the contractor got a lien upon the property for the work done. The city evidently paid for the work under a mistake as to its liability. It thereby discharged a debt which the appellant owed, and which he ought to have paid. In equity the city is subrogated to the rights of the person to whom it paid the money.

It is next claimed that the council could not ratify the contract in 1906, some years after the work was done. The statute permits the council to ratify legal, but incomplete acts, so as to save harmless those who have contracted through it. Ratification, in its essence, presupposes something done, but incomplete or invalid for want of sufficient authority. It is therefore no argument against the power of ratification to say that the thing ratified had been done. Nor does the fact that the city had become the owner of the claim in the meantime affect the power of the council to ratify the contract. The council was not acting for itself in the matter, but for the public, including appellant.

It is also contended here that the ordinance provides for the improvement of more than a block, but that the whole of the block in which appellant's lot is situated was not improved. Section 3449, Kentucky Statutes, regulating this matter, provides that the city may order the improvement of an entire street, or any part of it, but not less than a block. But for a re-curb-ing and re-guttering a street, the statute does not require the work to be done in entire blocks. This work was reconstruction. Hence the provision relied on by appellant does not apply.

Appellant asserted as a set-off and counterclaim that the contractor, under the direction of the mayor and city engineer, changed the established grade of his sidewalk, so that it was raised above the level of his lot, which necessitated his filling in his lot to avoid the creation of a pond in it, which cost him $33, and which he pleaded as a counterclaim and set-off. The plea is not good in form, without going further into its merits. It does not claim that the lot was damaged or impaired in value; or that its natural drainage was interfered with. To say that he was "compelled to bring the grade of the lot up to that of the sidewalk to avoid a pond in his front yard" does not charge that there was not already a pond there. Nor does appellant claim in his pleading that the grade on which the street was re-bult was not the one established by the engineer and council as required by the council.

The contractor used some stone that was in the old gutter and curbing. There was an issue as to its value.

The chancellor found the value under the proof and applied it as a credit. The difference between the sum claimed and the credit given is too small to form a ground of reversal, even if the chancellor was mistaken in the matter.

The judgment is affirmed.

VAN-JELLICO MINING CO. v. ROLLINS.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Greene & VanWinkle for appellant.

C. W. Lester for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Judge Lassing delivered the following response to petition for re-hearing, overruling.

The following statement, to-wit:

"It is most earnestly insisted by counsel for appellant that there was no consideration for this promise. This might have been a good defense had it set up in the answer, and the proof directed in support thereof, but as appellant did not choose to avail itself of such defense by pleading, it comes too late and without force when offered for the first time in counsel's brief. The plea of 'nudum pactum,' like pleas of non est factum, infancy, limitation, and other affirmative defenses, to be available, must not only be specifically pleaded, but supported by proof, if denied."

In the opinion heretofore delivered is not sound in law and is withdrawn. In response to the objection that there was no consideration for appellant's agreement to construct four crossings for appellee's use on its right of way we deem it but necessary to say that the deed from appellee, under which appellant acquired title to the right of way over appellee's farm, contains the following provision:

"Said second party is to construct the necessary crossing for the use of said Rollins."

Thus, under the very contract by which appellant acquired title to the land the obligation to build and maintain the necessary crossings was imposed. It was a part of the consideration for the conveyance, and appellant, by accepting the deed, is bound by its terms, one of which is to construct the necessary crossing for appellee's use. The proof abundantly shows that four crossings are necessary and that appellant agreed to construct four, there can be no doubt.

The chancellor who tried this case having so held the judgment was properly affirmed.

BRACKETT'S ADM'R v. L. & N. R. R. CO.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Injury to Person Crossing Track—Gross Negligence—There can be no recovery by appellant in this action for the death of his decedent for the reason that deceased was injured at a place where she had no right to be, and where the railroad company was not required to anticipate that any one might be between the cars. The act of deceased in attempting to pass between the cars was one of gross negligence.

2. Duty of Railroad Company—Presence of Persons About Stations—While it is the duty of the railroad companies to anticipate the presence of persons about their stations when a train is arriving, and to use ordinary care for their safety, this rule does not extend to persons who pass between cars where no invitation has been held out for them to do so.

N. J. Weller and Weller & Points for appellant.

Benjamin D. Warfield, C. W. Metcalf and J. W. Alcorn for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Mrs. China Brackett was killed by being mashed between two cars at Four Mile, a station on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Pineville and Corbin, Ky. It is a small place; the depot is on the west side of the main track, and the storage track is east of the main track. East of the storage track is the post-office and two restaurants. There are coal mines in the neighborhood at which the coal cars are loaded. They are then brought to Four Mile, and put on the storage track until some train comes along to take them out. On the day on which Mrs. Brackett was killed, the storage track was pretty well filled with loaded coal cars; although there were, at different places along the track, spaces between the cars. About midway between the two restaurants, there was a short space between two coal cars. One witness stated that the space between the cars was six feet; another witness says three feet. Perhaps one meant that the space was six feet from one car to the other, while the other meant that the space was three feet from one of the bumpers to the other. As the passenger train was pulling in from the south, Mrs. Brackett who had been at the post-office, and wished to go over, to the platform, thinking that her husband might come in on the train, walked from the post-office down the track, until she got to this space between the two cars. There she was joined by three other ladies who were also going over to the platform. Just at this time, a freight train going in the opposite direction was at the north end of the switch, and pulling in on the side track to get out of the way of the passenger train. To do this, it pushed the cars standing on that track ahead of it, and just as Mrs. Brackett was between the two cars, as she was going across the track, the cars closed in on her, catching her between the two bumpers and so injuring her that she died. The situation is shown on the following map, the point A indicating where she was caught between the two cars:

There is a walk way from the post-office out to the track, made of plank, and a similar walk way from the Spurling restaurant out to the track. She did not follow these walks, as there was no opening in the cars at the end of either of them. The space between the two tracks was filled with cinders, so that it was a good place for walking. There was some proof offered by the plaintiff to the effect that no signal for the movement of the cars was heard just at the time they came together; and it is very evident that none of the four ladies who were crossing the track had any idea that the cars were about to be moved. It is also evident from the proof that those in charge of the freight train could not see the ladies on account of the cars obstructing the view, and that they had no idea that anybody was between the cars or would be endangered by their moving them. The freight train had whistled for the station and was ringing its bell as it pushed in on the side track; but the noise of the incoming passenger train, which was then just rolling past, prevented the ladies from hearing the noise or the signals of the freight train. At the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

It is manifest from the proof that the space between the two cars at the point A, was not left as a passway for persons. There was no crossing at that point and the space was so narrow that manifestly it simply was left there by the cars rolling apart when they bumped together as they were not coupled. It is insisted for the plaintiff that in as much as it was train time and persons were expected to be passing about, these tracks going to and from the station, the company should have anticipated the presence of persons between these cars and therefore is liable to Mrs. Brackett. To so hold, would be in effect, to say that before moving cars situated like these, the company should send a man along the cars and warn everybody to get out of the way; for it is manifest that nothing short of this would have done Mrs. Brackett any good. All that occurred was that the short space between these cars was closed up when the freight train came in at the switch and pushed the other cars down in front of it, closing up the other spaces between them, until they ran back against the cars next to Mrs. Brackett. Where the space between cars has not been left as a passway for people, especially where it is as narrow as the one shown here, the company is not ordinarily required to anticipate that persons will be in the space, and persons who thus go between cars take the risk of the space being closed up. The freight train, at the other end of the switch, could have plainly been seen by these ladies before they undertook to pass across the track, and if they had considered at all, they would have known that the train had to come in on the side track to get out of the way of the passenger train. If there had been a public crossing there, or even a private crossing at which the cars had been opened to allow people to pass, the case would be different. But it would be a hard rule to hold the railroad responsible for an accident like this where the person injured had no right to be where she was, and where the railroad company was not required to anticipate that any one might be between the cars. The movement of the cars was made with as little force as it could reasonably have been done. They were simply forced back out of the way of the freight train; and in a number of cases, it has been held that people who go between cars which are liable to be moved, take the risk and can not recover where the danger to them was not known to the servants of the railroad company in time to avert it. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Waide, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 549, Waide was standing or walking between the rails of the side track in Woodburn, Ky., at a place very much like that here shown in evidence, and was struck by a piece of timber that was on one of the cars and extended out beyond the car. It was held that he could not recover. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky., 707, Hocker, finding the path that he wished to walk along obstructed by cars, stepped in between two cars and while standing there was seriously injured by the cars being moved without a signal. It was held that he could not recover. In Southern R. R. Co. v. Thomas, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 79. Thomas was a laborer in the service of the railroad company and was sent to the office for a rake. When he got opposite the office, he found there were some cars between him and the office. He thereupon, climbed between the cars and went over to the office; and as he was returning in the same way a car bumped against the cars which he was on and seriously injured him. It was held that he could not recover, although no signal or notice of the movement of the car was given. To the same effect are the authorities in other States. In 23 Am. & Eng. Cyc. of Law, page 764, the rule is thus stated:

"To pass under or between the cars of a train which one knows, or ought to know, is liable to move at any moment, or between cars to one of which a train in full view is about to couple, is an act of gross negligence. Unless the person attempting it is assured by some one in authority that it is safe to do so."

We recognize the rule that it is the duty of the railroad company to anticipate the presence of persons about its stations when a train is arriving and that it is its duty to exercise ordinary care for their safety but we do not think that this duty extends to persons passing between cars, or under them, or over them, where no invitation express or implied, has been held out to them to do so. The space between the two cars before us was too narrow for a person to understand that it was left there as a passway; and when any one undertook to go between the cars at this place without the knowledge of the railroad company, they took the risk. (Stillson v. Hannibal, &c. R. R. Co., 7 Mo., 671.)

C., C. C. & ST. L. RY. CO. v. LOUISVILLE TIN AND STOVE CO.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Action Against For Damages—Shipment of Goods—Injury To—Defective Car—In this action against appellant for damages to appellee's goods which it is alleged appellant transported to it in such defective car as that they were damaged, appellant sought to avoid liability on the ground that it did not know of the condition of the car, but that the shipper of the goods did, and that appellant had no right or power to inspect the car. Held—That a demurrer was properly sustained to this plea. A railroad, as a common carrier, is an insurer of goods entrusted to it for transportation and must provide proper cars. The owner of the goods is not required to see that the cars are suitable or safe. He is only required to show the loss of his goods.

Humphrey & Humphrey and Alex. P. Humphrey, Jr., for appellant.

James Quarles for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

The Louisville Tin and Stove Company brought this suit against the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company, alleging, in its petition, that on Jan. 8, 1907, there was delivered to the defendant at Muncie, Ind., in good condition, a car load of oil cans, which it agreed for hire, safely to transport and deliver to the plaintiff in Louisville in good condition but that in violation of its agreement, the defendant loaded the cans in a defective and leaky car, by reason of which they were exposed to the elements, became wet and rusted, and thereby rendered unmarketable, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $258. The defendant filed an answer to the petition in two paragraphs. The first paragraph was afterward withdrawn. The court sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph, and there being a stipulation filed that the plaintiff's damages amounted to $258, the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for that sum and the railroad company appeals.

The only question to be determined on the appeal is the sufficiency of the second paragraph of the answer to which the court sustained a demurrer. It is in these words:

"Defendant further answering, states that the car mentioned in the petition had been filled with soda ash, a chemical, the action of which causes boards to shrink and metals to rust; that defendant had delivered said car to another railway company, to-wit: the Muncie Belt Railway, and that the Muncie Belt Railway had delivered said car to the Muncie and Western Railway Company, which latter company had delivered said car to the factory of Ball Bros., near Muncie, Ind., upon a private switch of said Ball Bros.; that said Ball Bros. unloaded the soda ash from said car and without the knowledge or consent of defendant placed the cans of which complaint is made in the petition in said car; that said car, having been loaded with soda ash was not in fit condition to carry any sort of metal; that said Ball Bros. knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care could have known, that said car was in no condition for said shipment; that said car was delivered by said Ball Bros., to the Muncie and Western Railway and by the latter delivered to the Muncie Belt Railway, and by the Muncie Belt Railway delivered to the defendant; that the defendant had no power or right to inspect the contents of said car, or to inspect said car for any other purpose than to determine whether its running gear was in a sufficiently safe condition to carry over its road."

The railroad as a common carrier, is an insurer of the goods entrusted to it for transportation, with certain exceptions not material here, and for its own protection must provide proper cars. The owner is not required to see that the cars are suitable or safe. He is not required to show negligence on the part of the railway company. All that he is required to show is the loss of his goods. No defect in the vehicles can excuse the common carrier from its common law liability. (Hutchison on Carriers, section 497, Elliott on Railroads, section 1478.) The answer does not deny the allegations of the petition as to the defectiveness of the car. It was the duty of the company to furnish a car which would protect the goods from the elements. The defense set up in answer is in effect that Ball Bros., by ordinary care, could have known that the car was defective; but it is not shown in the answer that Ball Bros. selected the car or assumed to be responsible for its condition. There are cases holding that where the shipper selects the car himself, trusting to his own judgment, the railroad company is not responsible if he selects a car that is insufficient; but that is not this case. It is not alleged that Ball Bros. selected the car nor is it alleged that the car was not delivered to Ball Bros. for the purpose of the cans being loaded upon it. In Harris v. Northern Railway Co., 20 N. Y., 232, the shipper selected the car himself. In Densmore Commission Co. v. Duluth, &c., R. R. Co., 101 Wis., 563, the shipper fixed the car to suit himself. In Frolich Glass Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 101 N. W., 223, the shipper had supervision of the loading with power to reject any car unfit for loading glass and kept inspectors whose duty it was to select and inspect the cars before the glass was loaded. In these cases the railroad company was held not liable for any defect in the car. But, ordinarily, to release the carrier from his common law liability there must be a distinct agreement by the plaintiff to assume the risk of the sufficiency of the car or facts must be shown warranting the conclusion that he did not leave this matter for the carrier to determine, but assumed to determine it himself. (Pratt v. R. R. Co., 102 Mass., 557.) It was not the duty of Ball Bros. to inspect the car or to exercise care to know whether it was in condition for the goods to be shipped in it; but they had a right to put the goods in the car assuming that the railroad company would not have directed this to be done, unless the car was suitable. It is not charged that Ball Bros. were not authorized to place the cans in the car. The fact that it was done without the defendant's knowledge or consent does not show that the initial carrier did not authorize it, and it was the duty of the defendant to keep the goods safely after it received them.

COOKE, &c. v. WHITE COMMON SCHOOL DIST. NO. 7, OF BARREN COUNTY, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Principal and Surety—Contracts—Novation—The sureties of M. a building contractor, seek to be relieved in this action against them on the ground that certain named changes were made in the plans provided for in the building contract. Held—That the departures from the plans were so slight as to be presumed to be within the contemplation of the parties to a building contract.

Sims & Grider and Duff & Hutcherson for appellants.

Baird & Richardson and W. L. Porter for appellees.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

In August, 1905, the trustees of White Common School No. 7, in Barren county, made a contract with C. B. Marr, by which he undertook to build, for the district, a school house for $7,980.30, and he executed to the trustees a bond with W. C. Cooke and others as his sureties, for the faithful performance of the contract. Marr built the school house and the trustees took possession of it, but a number of persons, who had furnished Marr the materials for the house, filed in the county clerk's office, liens under the statute, and brought this suit against Marr and the school district to enforce their liens on the school house. The district made its answer a cross-petition against Marr, and his sureties, praying judgment against them for the amount which Marr failed to pay the materialmen. The sureties filed an answer in which they pleaded that the school trustees, after they signed the bond, had made other contracts with Marr, by which they had modified the original contract for which the sureties were bound, and thus released them from all liability. The trustees, by their reply, put in issue the allegations of the answer. They admitted owing Marr something over $400. He filed an answer asserting that they owed him a larger sum than they admitted. Proof was taken on all the issues, and on final hearing the circuit court entered a judgment against the sureties for the amount of the claims against the house, subject to a credit of $550, which he fixed as a balance due by the trustees to Marr. From this judgment, the sureties appeal.

The contract was made between Marr and the trustees, as a corporation representing the school district. The trustees could only bind the district by a corporate meeting held as provided by law. We do not find any evidence in the record that the trustees made with Marr any contract subsequent to the written contract sued on in any way affecting the rights of the sureties. When Marr built the foundation, one of the trustees refused to accept it, claiming that it did not come up to the contract. There was a dispute between the trustees and Marr as to whether the foundation was what the contract called for. Finally, he tore it out and made a new foundation, which was accepted. The weight of the evidence shows that the trustees were right in this matter. A dispute arose then between Caldwell, one of the trustees, and Marr, as to whether the contract required Marr to wall up the cellar! Marr insisting that it did not, and the trustees insisting that it did. Finally, to settle the dispute, they agreed to pay him $61 extra to build the wall. From the evidence we think the trustees were right, but the sureties have no cause to complain of the manner in which the dispute was settled. Marr was paid the $61. Another dispute was that the trustees claimed Marr was to put bridging between the joists. He claimed that his contract did not call for bridging. Still, the contract required the work to be done in first-class manner, and a floor laid without bridging in a schoolhouse of the size of this, would not be a first-class job. Marr put in the bridging, as he should have done under his contract. Marr undertook to build one of the gables and in doing so did not follow the plans. The trustees required him to take out the work, and it was then discovered that the plan of this gable would not harmonize with the rest of the house, and a slight change was made in the plans. He then put in the gable according to the modified plan. In all building contracts such slight modifications as this must be presumed to be within the contemplation of the contracting parties. The difference in the plans was not so great as to be beyond such changes as the parties should reasonably have contemplated. Marr claimed that the flue, if built according to the plans, would be insufficient. The trustees claimed that the flue called for by the plans was larger than Marr said. Finally, he built the flue as he said it ought to be. This, too, was one of those slight variations which should be presumed to be within the contemplation of parties to a building contract. Marr used joists 2x8 when the contract as originally drawn, called for joists 2x6; but the proof shows that this change was made before the contract was signed; so, also, was a change as to the additional flue which was put in the house.

These are in substance, all the matters which are complained of by the sureties as amounting to a novation. We concur with the circuit court in the conclusion, that nothing was done by the trustees which released the sureties or affected their liability. The finding of the circuit court, as to the amount that was due Marr on the contract is not against the weight of the evidence. Considering all the proof in the case, and, on the whole record, we do not see that the substantial rights of the appellants were prejudiced.

COX, &c. v. FOWLER.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Judgments—Void Because of Failure to Serve Process—The judgment adjudging appellee to be the owner of the land herein and directing its conveyance to him was void because the heirs of the deceased owner were not made parties, though they were necessary parties and were not before the court, process not having been served upon them. The judgment does not recite that the parties were before the court.

2. Same—A judgment taken when there has been no service of process, and the defendant has not entered his appearance, is absolutely void. (Section 63, Ky., 540.)

J. R. Llewellyn for appellants.

W. H. Clark and A. W. Baker for appellee.

Appeal from Jackson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

Many years ago Perry Cox died in Jackson county, Ky., the owner of several tracts of land. He left surviving him a wife and nine children. After his death, one O. D. Henderson, bought out the interests of the respective heirs at law in the estate of Perry Cox, deceased and, under some sort of an arrangement between himself and John Wilson and Preston Cox, a son of Perry Cox, it was agreed that if Preston Cox would pay to John Wilson the purchase money, which had been paid to the heirs, including Preston, for their respective interests in said lands, that he could take the land. The purchase money had been furnished by John Wilson. It appears that Preston Cox either did not desire to do so or was unable to pay this purchase price and, in the course of time, John Wilson, who was the real owner of the land, and had paid for same, sold it to this appellee, and appellee has been in the possession of same since his purchase thereof from said John Wilson.

He instituted a suit in 1894 in the Jackson Circuit Court against the widow and heirs at law of Perry Cox, for the purpose of having the land conveyed to him through the commissioner of the court, and such proceedings were had in said suit that an order was entered directing the master to convey said land to this appellee, and the said commissioner attempted to convey same as directed in said order, but for some reason he failed to date or sign the deed. All of the title bonds evidencing the sales, by the respective heirs, of their interests in the lands of their father, it is alleged, are on file with the pleadings in that case. No further steps were taken in that suit, which was instituted in 1894, but on February 5, 1896, appellee filed a suit in equity asking that he be adjudged the owner of the land which he had purchased from the heirs of Perry Cox, through his vendor, John Wilson, and that same be conveyed to him by the commissioner of the court by proper deed. To this suit all of the heirs of Perry Cox, deceased, were made parties defendant. This suit was prosecuted to a final judgment wherein appellee was adjudged the owner of the land, and same was directed to be conveyed to him by the commissioner of the court, all of which was done. The judgment was entered on the 9th day of May, 1897. It appears that at that time several of the grandchildren of Perry Cox, whose fathers and mothers had died, were infants under twenty-one years of age.

In December, 1907, two of the grandchildren of Perry Cox, and children and heirs at law of Preston Cox, sued out an appeal from said judgment in this court alleging that at the time the judgment was entered they were infants under fourteen years of age, and that they were at that date each under twenty-two years of age. The appeal was granted, and they now seek to reverse the final judgment of the Jackson Circuit Court, rendered in May, 1897, adjudging appellee the owner of the lands in question, and directing the same to be conveyed to him.

The grounds chiefly relied upon for reversal, are that no summons was ever issued for or served upon them, or on their three brothers, all of whom were under fourteen years of age, or on their mother for them. That the guardian ad litem, who was appointed by the court to represent them, failed to show, in his report that he had made a careful examination of the record, or of the case, and that the judgment should be reversed for that reason. That their father was the owner of the lands described in the pleadings, and that they, as his heirs at law, were entitled to same. That the evidence which was offered in support of appellee's title was too vague indefinite and uncertain to support the judgment which was rendered by the court.

The petition shows that the heirs of Perry Cox were all made parties defendant to the suit. It alleges that William Cox, a son, and Preston Cox, another son and the father of these appellants, were dead. That each left surviving him a wife and five children, all of whom were under twenty-one years of age, and all residing in Estill county, Kentucky, with their mothers. On the back of the petition there appears the following endorsement, among others: "Summons and thirteen copies issued to Estill." Neither this summons nor the return thereof is copied in the record. There is nothing in the record to show that this summons was ever served. The judgment does not recite that the parties defendant, including appellants, were properly before the court, or that they were before the court at all.

In the case of Robinson v. Mobley, 64 Ky., 196, it was held that a judgment rendered by default, when there had been no service of process, although the judgment recited that the "defendant had been duly summoned, but failing to answer, &c.," was a clerical misprision, but in the later case of Long, &c. v. Montgomery, 69 Ky., 399, such a judgment was held not to be a clerical misprision, but absolutely void, the court saying that the opinion in Robinson v. Mobley was evidently an inconsiderate and inadvertent mistake, which can not be recognized as an authority intended to overrule the then recent decision in Ruby v. Grace, (63 Ky., 540), and other opinions which held that a judgment taken in a case where there has been no service of process, and the defendant has not entered his appearance, is absolutely void.

In the case of Herman's Executors v. Martin, 107 Ky., 642, in passing upon a similar question, this court said:

"There is nothing in the record to show that there was ever any service of process upon the defendant, Herman, and the decretal recital is not sufficient evidence of service without other proof, and a judgment rendered by default, where there has been no service of process upon the defendant, or appearances, is void, and may be reversed upon appeal."

A further citation of authorities upon this point is deemed unnecessary; the foregoing establishing the rule which has been adhered to by this court for more than forty years.

There is nothing in the record before us to show that a summons was ever served upon either of appellants and the judgment is, therefore, void as to them. As the judgment must be reversed for the reasons indicated, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions raised upon this appeal. Appellants being now of full age, upon the return of the case, the services of a guardian ad litem will no longer be required, and they may file such pleadings as they desire and deem necessary to properly present their defense.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CITY OF OWENSBORO v. SWEENEY.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Geo. W. Jolly for appellant.

W. T. Ellis, C. M. Finn, Miller & Todd and C. S. Walker for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion.

The opinion of the court is based on the case of Chicago v. Blair, 149 Ill., 310, but the court fails to observe that there the Legislature had not authorized the city to provide that the cost of sprinkling the streets should be paid by special assessments. The Legislature there had only authorized the city to make local improvements by special assessments. That is not the case here. The Legislature has in express terms authorized the city to make the assessment for sprinkling the streets precisely as it was made. That case is, therefore, not in point. It was followed in New York Life Insurance Co. v. Prest, 71 Fed., 815, a nisi prius opinion by the district judge, who also failed to notice that the case rested on a want of legislative authority to the city to do what it had done. Wherever the Legislature has authorized a special assessment to pay for the sprinkling of the streets the courts have, as a rule, sustained the Legislature. (Starks v. Boston, 108 Mass., 293; Reinken v. Fuehring, 130 Ind., 382; Minnesota v. Stateler, 38 Minn., 371.) Special assessments to pay for the sprinkling of the streets are not unlike special assessments to keep the streets free from snow and ice or to keep them free from dirt by sweeping, and these have been, we believe, universally sustained. (Carthage v. Frederick, 122 N. Y., 268; 1 Abbott on Municipal Corporations, sec. 340, and cases cited.) If a tax is levied upon the whole city and applied to the sprinkling of the streets a large number of persons who pay the taxes must of necessity get little benefit from it as the sprinkling is necessarily confined in the main to the business and more populous parts of the city. It is one of those things of which the persons who peculiarly receive the benefit should bear the burden. The limitation placed by the Constitution as to the amount of taxes which municipalities may levy applies to those things which should be met by a general tax on all the people. It does not apply to those things which are local in character and ought to be paid for by those receiving the benefit. It is conceded that there is no other limitation in the Constitution affecting the matter and thus being so the discretion of the Legislature in prescribing how a matter of local benefit like sprinkling the streets shall be paid for, is unrestricted. So it is that the great weight of authority sustains the legislation in question. Any plan for paying for street sprinkling will produce great hardships. Under the plan which was held constitutional in Maydwell v. Louisville, 116 Ky., 885, precisely the same hardship might result, as is illustrated in the opinion. A man might have property worth $100,000 and be so situated that no sprinkling would ever be done in front of his property, or where he might get no benefit from it. And if his $100,000 worth of property consisted of vacant lots we would have just the hardship supposed in the opinion. What is the most just way of placing the burden may vary from time to time, and therefore, the whole matter should be left to the discretion of the Legislature and the municipal councils who represent the people that must in the end pay the taxes, and are best qualified to properly consider the interests of their constituents.

I therefore dissent from the opinion of the court. Judge Barker and Judge Lassing concur in this dissent.

OVERTON, &c. v. PERRY, JR., &c.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Lands—Adverse Possession—Contiguous to Home Place—The question involved here is one of adverse possession—The land in controversy was embraced in a tract conveyed to M. in 1883, and adjoined his home tract of which he was in possession. He had the tracts surveyed and boundary marked so as to include the land in controversy. Held—That the land being contiguous to his home place, and being surrounded by a well defined, marked boundary, it was not necessary for him to make a new entry. Upon acquiring it, it immediately extended to the whole boundary.

2. Same—M., in 1888, conveyed to appellants, who from that time have occupied it by an agent and exercised undisputed ownership over it. They are, therefore, entitled to have their title to the land quieted.

Wm. H. Holt for appellants.

McGuire & McGuire and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellees.

Appeal from Morgan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming in part and reversing in part.

This action involves the title to 44 acres of land situated on Mordecai creek, in Morgan county, Ky., and also a small tract of two or three acres situated some distance from the first tract. Appellants, A. W. Overton, John A. Brislan and William H. Holt, on March 3d, 1903, brought an equitable action averring that they were the owners and in actual possession of said tracts of land; that appellees were trespassing thereon, and committing waste and interfering with appellants' tenants. Appellants asked that appellees be enjoined from so doing, and that their title be quieted. The appellees, John M. Perry, Jr., and Lilla M. Perry, asserted title under and by virtue of a written contract of sale, made by Thomas D. Perry to E. B. Perry, whereby the former conveyed to the latter one-half of one-third of a tract of land, consisting of 500 acres, situated in Morgan county on a branch known as the Condon branch of Elk Fork of Licking river. The contract provides that the grantor is not to be responsible for the title to said land, but that E. B. Perry agrees to look to other sources for title. The consideration mentioned in the contract is $50. The other one-half of one-third of the tract of land they claim was conveyed to E. B. Perry by John E. Cooper. The consideration for the latter contract is 8,000 feet of inch sawed lumber, and the contract contains the same provision in regard to title, i. e., it requires the vendee to look to other sources for title. Afterwards, E. B. Perry conveyed to appellees, J. M. Perry, Jr., and Lilla M. Perry. The latter claiming under this conveyance and the written assignments from Thomas D. Perry and John E. Cooper, defended on the ground that they had been in adverse possession of the 44 acres of land in controversy for the required period of time. Appellee, E. B. Perry defended as to the two or three acres, by claiming that it was included in a patent to one Cassity, which was prior to the Thomas D. Perry patent under which appellants claimed. Appellants claim under the patent of Thomas D. Perry, entered in the year 1847. It appears, however, that in their chain of title, there are certain tax deeds which contain no description of the property conveyed, and we are of opinion that appellants' proof of record title is defective. On the other hand the appellees show no record title. At the time Thomas D. Perry conveyed to E. B. Perry, he had previously conveyed his interest in the land to one J. W. Sewell, and in the contract of sale he expressly provided that the vendee therein, should look to other sources for title. Furthermore, no title of any kind is shown in John E. Cooper. Under this State of case the title to the 44 acres must depend altogether upon the question of adverse possession.

It appears that the land in controversy was embraced in a tract conveyed to William Mynhier in the year 1883. The tract so conveyed adjoined Mynhier's home farm, of which he was in possession. Mynhier had the tracts of land surveyed, and the boundary marked so that it included the land in question; and from that time on he claimed to a well defined boundary, including the land in controversy. It was not necessary for him to make a new entry upon the land thus purchased in 1883, for the reason that the land being contiguous to his home place and being surrounded by a well defined boundary, Mynhier's possession, upon acquiring the land, immediately extended to the whole boundary thereof. It is true, the deed to Mynhier did not furnish him a good record title, but it was admissible for the purpose of showing the extent of his claim. Mynhier afterwards sold the tract of land in controversy to appellants herein, in the year 1888, and from that time down to the institution of this suit they had an agent in control and charge of the property purchased from Mynhier, rented it to various parties, and exercised undisputed ownership over same.

The contract of sale between Thomas D. Perry and E. B. Perry appears to have been made in the year 1885. Thereafter E. B. Perry claims to have had the land surveyed. The time fixed by him was in the year 1886 or 1887. He claims then to have made an entry on the land embraced in the contract of sale and to have occupied the same by running a saw-mill on Cox branch, some distance from the tract in controversy.

It is manifest, that, as the 44 acres were then in possession of William Mynhier, E. B. Perry's possession did not include the 44 acres, for the simple reason that he never took possession of any portion of said land. There could not be two possessions at the same time. Mynhier's possession was exclusive of E. B. Perry's, and the fact that the latter afterwards had the land embraced in a survey, made two or three years later, without entering upon the land in controversy, could not give him any possession of it, or interfere with the possession already obtained by William Mynhier. Nor did John M. Perry, Jr., ever afterwards take possession of the 44 acres. He may have moved upon the land adjoining it, but, in the absence of any actual taking, his possession did not extend so as to embrace the land in controversy. We, therefore, conclude that the appellants are entitled to the forty-four acres of land in controversy, and to the relief sought, and that the trial court erred in entering judgment in favor of the appellees.

As to the two or three acres involved in the controversy between appellants and E. B. Perry, the evidence is such as to leave the mind in doubt, and the judgment of the chancellor will not be disturbed.

That portion of the judgment affecting the land in controversy between appellants and E. B. Perry, is affirmed. The judgment as to the forty-four acres of land claimed by John M. Perry, Jr., and Lilla M. Perry, is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

ILLINOIS CENT. R. R. CO. v. EDMONDS.

1 Master and Servant—Liability of Master—Where the master directs an employe to enter a dangerous place to work and the employe complies with the order and is injured, he can recover from the master unless the danger was so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not have undertaken the work even though ordered to do so by the master.

2. Settlement for Injury—Tender—Rule as to Tender and Settlement—Had the settlement relied on by appellant been for appellee's injuries, he would not have been permitted to recover in this action for damages as the result of his injuries except as he tendered and offered to return the amount paid him before bringing the action. But this rule does not apply to a settlement which only includes loss of time.

Grassham, Berry & Threlkeld, Trabue, Doolan & Cox and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

G. W. Landram, J. Morgan Chinn and H. V. McChesney for appellee.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Appellee was employed by appellant to work in a gravel pit, or bank. He was working under a foreman. A blast had been made on the afternoon before appellee was injured, which blew out a large amount of gravel and rolled it down the bank, leaving a large lump of gravel and dirt above the place where the blast was made. There was a ledge or bench under this lump which supported and kept it from moving down the embankment. The foreman directed appellee and another hand to go and pick under this lump so that it might fall. Appellee was somewhat fearful of it, and went to picking on one side of the bump when the foreman commanded him to go and pick at this ledge or bench, which supported the bump, and told him that if he saw that there was danger he would give him notice so that he could get out of the way. Appellee obeyed him and struck two or three licks with his pick and a large mass of gravel and dirt fell upon him, carried him down the embankment and severely injuring him.

The proof showed, without contradiction, that he has entirely lost the use of one arm; that it hangs limp by his side, and that there is no hope of his ever recovering the use of it. He was carried to the Illinois Central Hospital in Paducah, where he remained, under the treatment of the physicians, for two and a half or three months, when he desired to return to his home. One of appellant's agents appeared at the hospital, as appellant claims, to make a settlement with appellee, and did pay him $250 for, as it claims, all damages for loss of time, mental and physical suffering and his bodily injuries. Appellee claims that this settlement was made and the $250 paid was for the time already lost, and for the time he would necessarily lose by reason of his injured arm; that he was lead to believe, at the time, by the agent and the company's physicians that it would not be very long before he would recover the use of his arm.

Appellee instituted this action to recover $2,000 damages for his injuries. Appellant denied that he received his injuries on account of its negligence, and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of appellee. It also pleaded the settlement, and filed the receipt of appellee, in bar of his right to recover. Appellee, by reply, denied the contributory negligence charged, and alleged that the receipt, or writing filed, was obtained by the fraud of appellant's agents; that he was unable to read, and was lead to believe that the writing, to which he made his mark, only covered the loss of time, as before stated. The parties introduced evidence tending to support the theories presented by each. The jury found for appellee $1,000 in damages.

It is the duty of the master to furnish the employe a reasonably safe place in which to work; but, from the proof in this case, appellant violated this duty. Appellant contends that appellee should not be permitted to recover in this case, because he could see and realize that it was a dangerous place, and he ought not to have obeyed his foreman and have gone under this mass of gravel and dirt and attempted to remove the ledge or bench, which was supporting it. This question was properly submitted to the jury. The foreman was standing by, saw and knew more about the danger than appellee who had been laboring there for only a short time. The rule is, that where the master directs an employe to enter a dangerous place to work and the employe complies with the order and is injured, he can recover from the master, unless the danger was so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not have undertaken to work therein, even though ordered to do so by his master. Appellant also contends that appellee should not have been permitted to recover in this case because he did not tender it the $250 received by him in the settlement before bringing the action; that he should not be allowed to retain the $250 and then litigate and recover other money from it. This is true, under the opinion in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. McElroy, 100 Ky., 153, and would defeat appellee in this case, if he had understood that he was settling and receiving remuneration for his injuries. But this rule does not apply when a settlement only included loss of time. (McGill v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1244; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Belt, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 421, and Ingram v. Covington, Flemingsburg & Ashland Ry. Co., 28 Ky. Law Rep., 508.)

The instructions of the court, while not as explicit, upon the last point mentioned, as they should have been, we are of the opinion fairly presented the issues, and no injustice was done appellant under the evidence therein.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH, ON RELATION, &c. v. BACON, &c.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Commonwealth—Action by Attorney General to Recover Money Improperly Paid Out of Treasury—The Attorney General is authorized to maintain an action to recover money improperly paid out of the treasury. One obtaining money from the treasury to which he is not entitled, is required by law to pay it back, and this obligation may be enforced in an action by the State. (20 Ky. Law Rep., 1893.)

2. Principal and Surety—Extent to Which Surety is Bound—A surety is not bound beyond the letter of his covenant. The sureties in the bond herein did not undertake that they would be responsible for any money collected by the principal from the State above what he was entitled to receive, and there is nothing in the bond to apprise the sureties that any such liability was sought to be imposed upon them.

3. Attorney and Client—An attorney who asks that his client's claim be allowed, is not responsible for the amount allowed if it shall afterwards turn out that more was paid than due, and in this case the fact that the attorney was on the bond of his client does not change the rule.

4. Sureties—The liability of a surety must be measured by the terms of his contract. The terms of the contract herein for public printing were not violated, and the sureties are, therefore, not liable for the excessive amount the principal succeeded in collecting from the State. He collected the money as the result of his own fraud, and is alone responsible for it.

N. B. Hays, Chas. H. Morris and Chas. Carroll for appellants.

Eli H. Brown, Jr., and Lewis McQuown for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming in part and reversing in part.

By section 3953, Kentucky Statutes, the Governor, Auditor, Secretary of State, Treasurer and Attorney General are ex officio commissioners to let contracts for the printing, binding and stationery used by the various State departments. By section 3954, the furnishing of all printing, papers, stationery and supplies for the use of the State, and the printing and binding of the State journals and reports, and the manufacturing and furnishing of all blank books, which are to be paid for out of the State treasury, and all other printing and binding made necessary by law, shall be let by contract to the lowest and best bidder. By section 3957, the commissioners shall, between August 1st and Nov. 1st, biennially, advertise for sealed proposals for the executing of the several classes of printing and binding in separate contracts for the term of two years from the first Monday in January next ensuing. Sections 3956, 3972 and 3984, Kentucky Statutes, provide:

"The printing and binding for the State shall be divided into four classes, to be let in separate contracts, as follows: The printing of all bills for the two Houses of the General Assembly, together with such resolutions and other matters as may be ordered by the two Houses, or either of them, to be printed in bill form, and the printing and binding of the journals of the two Houses, together with such reports, communications and other documents as enter into and make a part of the journals, the printing and binding of the volumes of public documents, and of the general and local laws and joint resolutions; the printing and binding of the State reports containings the decisions of the Court of Appeals; the printing and binding of all reports, documents and other matters, bound in either book or pamphlet form, except as shall enter into or be bound within the journals of the two Houses, and all printing for the department of public instruction, and all miscellaneous printing and binding necessary for the several departments, and not otherwise provided for in this law, shall constitute the first class, and be let in one contract. The manufacture and furnishing of all blank books used by counties, which are to be paid for out of the State treasury, shall constitute the second class, and be let in one contract. The lithographic printing and engraving shall constitute the third class, and be let in one contract; and the furnishing of all printing paper, stationery, and such other supplied for the use of the State as provided for in this law, shall constitute the fourth class, and be let in one contract." (Section 3956.)

"The commissioners may contract for any printing, binding and furnish paper and such other supplies as provided herein, and name the number of copies to be printed and bound of all matter not otherwise provided for in this law: Provided, however, The same shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder therefor." (Section 3972.)

"Any printing, binding or the manufacture of blank books, to be done for the State, and the furnishing of paper and stationery, not embraced in the foregoing provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of this law, and the Commissioners of Public Printing may advertise for proposals therefor, and let the same as aforesaid, whether provided for by law or resolution." (Section 3984.)

The statute specifies various kinds of work but as the State may need other work, section 3972, was added to provide for work not specified. The statute also specifies the rate to be paid for many classes of work; but as the rate for all classes of work is not fixed, section 3984 was added to provide how the price to be paid was to be determined where the rate was not specified in the statute.

In January, 1902, Henry Bacon, was a bidder for the second class printing and binding. His bid was in these words:

"To the Commissioners of Public Printing, Binding, &c.:

"The undersigned, Henry Bacon, of Elizabethtown, Ky., proposes to furnish the record books for the various counties and for the departments of the State government for two years from the first Monday in January, 1902, according to an act, entitled 'An act to provide how the printing, binding and stationery used by the State shall be furnished,' approved June 20, 1893, at the common rate per centum of forty-nine per cent. of the schedule of prices fixed in said act for the work of this class.

"Also for the following work not specifically provided for by said act, we bid as follows:

"For separate indexes, 'Plain' or 'Cross' as ordered, and with proper printed headings, full leather bound on the same paper required for books, with leather tabs, gold and lettered, as follows: Cap size, 50 cents, Demy, 75 cents, Medium, $1, Royal $1.25. For indexes in front or back, leather tabs, gold lettered, each fifty cents. For printed 'headings' in stock forms, whether caption or full page, any size, per book ninety cents.

"We agree to use first quality of Crane's, Byron Weston's or L. L. Brown Paper Co.'s linen ledger paper of the following weights: Cap size 18 pounds per ream, Demy 28, Medium 40, Royal 44. We agree to properly wrap and ship record books to the various counties, charging no more therefor, than we pay for the express thereon.

"A bond for ten thousand dollars accompanies this bid.

"In witness whereof, we hereunto subscribe our name, this 13th day of November, 1901.

"HENRY BACON."

Accompanying the bid was the following bond:

"Whereas, Henry Bacon, of Elizabethtown, Ky., is a bidder for the contract to furnish the Commonwealth of Kentucky with public printing and binding, known under the law as second class, for the term of two years from and after the first Monday in January, 1902.

"Now, therefore, we, Henry Bacon, of Elizabethtown, Ky., and Sam Fulton, of Lakeland, Ky., and John A. Fulton, of Bardstown, Ky., sureties, bind ourselves to the Commonwealth of Kentucky in the penal sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, that in the event the said bid of Henry Bacon, for public printing and binding of the second class is accepted, said Henry Bacon shall enter into contract, and promptly, faithfully and skillfully perform the work bid for in accordance with the law; and we further bind ourselves that in case said Henry Bacon shall refuse or neglect to accept said contract after it has been allotted to them at their bid, then the said Henry Bacon, principal, and Sam Fulton and John A. Fulton, sureties, shall pay the difference between the amount of the bid of the person to whom the same shall be awarded after such refusal or neglect as provided by law.

"Given under our hands, this 13th day of November, 1901.

"HENRY BACON,

"SAM FULTON,

"JOHN A. FULTON."

The bid was accepted by the board and a written contract was entered into in these words:

"This contract made and entered into by and between the Commonwealth of Kentucky, by its Commissioners of Public Printing, party of the first part, and Henry Bacon, of Elizabethtown, Ky., party of the second part, Witnesseth:

"That the party of the first part, in consideration of the bid and bond of the party of the second part, filed on November 14, 1901, offering to execute for the Commonwealth of Kentucky the printing and binding of the second class according to the terms and conditions of the advertisement under which said bid was made and received, and of an act approved June 20, 1893, entitled 'An act to provide how the printing and binding and stationery of the State shall be furnished,' has let the said work of the second class to the party of the second part, and in consideration of the said award, and the bid and the bond of the party of the second part

"HENRY BACON,

"J. C. W. BECKHAM,

"Chairman Board Printing Commissioners,"

The bond and contract are in accord with sections 3958 and 3959, Kentucky Statutes. George G. Fetter was the accepted bidder for the printing and binding of the first class. The Superintendent of Public Instruction decided to have printed 9,500 trustees' record books and 9,500 teachers' registers.

A dispute arise between Fetter and Bacon as to whether this work belonged to the first class or the second class. The question was submitted to the Board of Commissioners who held that the work belonged to the second class. Thereupon the Superintendent of Public Instruction delivered to Bacon the following order:

"January, 21, 1902.

"Henry Bacon, Louisville, Ky.

"Gentlemen: Please furnish this office with 9,500 each of Trustees' record books and teachers' registers. These books are to be made of Melrose paper.

(Signed) "H. V. McCHESNEY,

"Superintendent of Public Instruction."

The superintendent also delivered to Bacon sample copies of these books, which he ordered duplicated except as indicated, one of the changes being, that the back was to be reinforced by a cloth strip. The sample copies were the books which had been printed for the department under the previous administration. Bacon executed the order, printing the books on Melrose paper and binding them like the samples, with the addition of the cloth strip at the back. The superintendent examined them, found them satisfactory or as he says, better than the sample, and the books were delivered. After the books were delivered, Bacon presented to the Board of Printing Commissioners, the following account and asked its allowance:

(1.) 9,500 Teachers' Registers and Grade Books, 21-10 quires each at 65 cents per quire, $12,967.50, less 51 per cent. off	$6,354.07
(2.) Printing same at 90 cents a book.....	8,550.00
(3.) Reinforcing same with cloth strips.....	950.00
(4.) 9,500 Trustee Record Books, 1½ quires each at 65 cents
$9,262.50, less 51 per cent. off,	4,538.62
(5.) Printing same at 90 cents each a book.....	8,550.00
(6.) Reinforcing same with cloth strips.....	950.00
(7.) Packing and shipping same	148.20
(8.) Freight advanced	119.95

Total $30,160.84

The commissioners were not all present at that meeting, the Attorney General being absent. They allowed $20,000 upon the account and laid it over to their next meeting, the matter being referred, in the meantime, to the Attorney General. At the next meeting, the Attorney General reported that there was no authority of law for the two items in the account, "reinforcing same with cloth strips $950" but that the remainder of the account was correct. Thereupon, the remainder of the accounts, less the two items, was allowed by the board and was paid by the Auditor. Subsequently this suit was brought in the name of the Commonwealth on the relation of the Attorney General then in office, against Bacon and the sureties in his bond, it being charged in the petition that the books printed by Bacon were not such as the contract required and that by fraud of Bacon, and through a mistake of the commissioners he had obtained from the treasury the sum of $28,260.84, when he was only entitled to $4,000; and judgment was prayed against him and his sureties for $24,260.84 with interest from August 29, 1902, the time when the money was paid. The defendant filed an answer controverting the allegations of the petition and upon final hearing, the circuit court dismissed the petition. From this judgment the Commonwealth appeals.

The first question arising in the case is whether the allowance of the claim by the board of commissioners is conclusive. It is earnestly insisted that the commissioners having allowed the claim, the court can not now inquire into its correctness. The powers of the commissioners are thus defined by the statute:

(Ky. Stats., 3974.) "Every bill shall be presented to the Commissioners of Public Printing, who shall carefully examine and compare the same with the vouchers and orders relating thereto, and if any error is found in any account, they shall correct the same, and return the account to the contractor. If the account is found to be correct, or when it has been corrected, the commissioners or a majority of them shall indorse the same, and thereupon the Auditor shall draw a warrant in favor of the contractor upon the treasurer for the amount thereof."

This merely means that the Auditor shall not pay the claim until it is approved by the commissioners, but no judicial power is conferred upon the commissioners; they act in simply a ministerial capacity. Their approval of the claim is prima facie evidence of its correctness; but there is nothing in the statute, giving to the approval of the commissioners any greater effect than is given the approval of other officers on claims against the Commonwealth when required by statute. The purpose of the statute is simply to provide how a proper voucher may be made out, before the Auditor is to issue a warrant. If the commissioners reject any part of a claim, the contractor may maintain his action against them to require them to approve it, if it is improperly rejected; and if they approve a claim that contains errors by mistake or from their being misled by the claimant, the claimant, who thus obtains the money of the State improperly, can not thus profit by his own wrong, but is liable to an action by the Commonwealth for the money so improperly received (Ky. Stats., section 304A, sub-sec. 1; Commonwealth v. Carter, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1509.)

The Attorney General is authorized to maintain an action in the name of the Commonwealth to recover money improperly paid out of the treasury. (Kentucky Statutes, section 114, 340A, sub-sec. 3, section 4171.) Money can be obtained from the public treasury only as provided by law. He who obtains from the treasury money to which he is not entitled, is required by law to pay the money back, and this obligation may be enforced in an action by the State.

(Commonwealth v. Norman, 20 Kentucky Law Rep., 1893.)

The next question to be determined is whether Bacon received any money from the State to which he is not entitled. The last two items of the account are not controverted, and the third and sixth items having been rejected by the commissioners, the whole controversy turns on the first, second, fourth and fifth items. The first and fourth items are based on section 3982, Kentucky Statutes, which so far as material, is as follows:

"For ruling and binding blank book work (paper and all material used to be furnished by the contractor or contractors), as follows:

"Per quire, letter size or smaller, for half binding, with corners, thirty (30) cents.

"Half binding, with spring backs, fifty (50) cents.

"Full binding, with spring backs, sixty-five (65) cents.

"For binding with Russia corners, seventy-five (75) cents.

"For binding, Russia ends and bands, ninety (90) cents."

The charge of sixty-five cents a quire less 51 per cent off is based upon the ground that the books in controversy are of full binding with spring backs. The terms used in the statute are fully understood in the printer's trade and must be given the meaning they have in the trade. According to the undisputed evidence, a half bound book with corners, is one which has a leather back and corners; with paper or muslin sides. A loose back book is one which is sewed with twine, the twine being interlaced into the sides, and is put together in such a manner that when the book is spread open, it will come away from the back. A spring back book is one that is heavily reinforced with board or some such material, in such a way as will make the back close quickly. The books in controversy are saddle stitched pamphlets bound in card board glued to the back. They differ from an ordinary pamphlet only in that card board is used for the cover instead of paper. The cover is not loose from the back but is fastened tight to it. They are made of letter size paper but manifestly they can not be charged under the clause of the statute fixing the price for half binding with corners for these books have no leather about them and no corners upon the cover, nor are they loose bound books; that is the back of the cover is not loose from the book, so that when the book is opened it will spring out. The loose back adds to the strength and durability of the book and is much more costly than a back which is fastened to the back of the book. As these books can not be charged under the clause of the statute for half binding with corners, it is still more manifest that they can not be charged under the clause of the statute fixing the price for half binding with spring backs or full binding with spring backs. In a full bound book the card board of the cover is wholly covered by the leather or other material used and the cover extends out beyond the edges of the book so as to protect it. In these books the flexible card board covers are cut even with the edges of the book. Appellee, Bacon, undertakes to justify his charge for these books as of full binding with spring backs, on the ground that when opened, they open to the cover and relies upon a definition found in Webster's Dictionary. But the rights of the parties are not to be determined by a dictionary definition; for such definitions are necessarily more or less inadequate. The statute uses the technical words of the trade. When Bacon did bid, he bid as a printer and with knowledge of these technical terms, which must be construed and understood according to their well understood meaning in the trade. (Kentucky Statutes, section 460.) We, therefore, conclude that these books can not be charged for as of full binding with springbacks, and that they do not come under any clause of the statute fixing the price for such work.

The second and fifth items of the account are not based upon any provision of the statute, but upon the following clause of Bacon's contract, "for printed headings in stock forms, whether caption or full page, any size, per book, 90 cents." The books in controversy were gotten up under section 4438, Kentucky Statutes. They have printed forms for the guidance of the teachers and trustees in keeping the records required by statute. They also contain the proper headings and directions. But they are not printed upon first quality of Crane's Byron Weston's or L. L. Brown's linen ledger paper. They are letter size and not cap, demy, medium or royal. These terms are well understood in the printer's trade and designate an expensive paper of larger size than a letter sheet, on which blank books, used for permanent records are printed. It is said that Bacon was directed to print these books on Melrose paper, and that therefore he was justified in not using the paper called for by his contract. The proof shows that the paper called for by his contract is an expensive paper about four times as costly as the paper Bacon used, which is a cheap paper. He can not be permitted to contract with the State for a price agreed to be paid for a larger, expensive book and then furnish the State at this price a smaller, cheap book. The books in controversy are not of the size nor of the material called for by his contract, and, therefore, he is not entitled to the contract price for them. A very common way in which contractors with the public get the better of it, is by contracting for first class material at a given price and then putting in cheaper material. The order of the superintendent, to make the books like the sample, carried with it no right for Bacon to charge for the books, when they were made, the price fixed by his contract for larger and better books.

As neither of these four items were warranted by any provision of the statute or by the contract which Bacon made with the State, none of them can be allowed. What then, are the rights of the parties? Bacon has done work for the State which was not called for by his contract. It was done under the written order of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction and has been accepted by the Board of Printing Commissioners. The statute not fixing the price for such work, the rights of the parties must be determined by the reasonable value of the work. The State is not entitled to Bacon's work without paying a reasonable price for it; and the work not being included in Bacon's contract, he can not demand the contract price for it, but must take only the reasonable value of his work. As to the reasonable value of this work, the estimate of the witnesses is as follows: L. T. Davidson, $3,000; F. P. Allen, $3,100; E. E. Owsley, $3,240; George A. Lewis, $4,780; E. D. Veatch, $5,700 and H. H. Hughes, $5,850. It also appears from the proof that under the first contract made by the State after this act was passed in 1893, the Courier-Journal Job Printing Co. was the contractor for the work of the first and second class; that it printed ten thousand teachers' registers and ten thousand teachers' record books. The work being assigned to it under its contract for the first class printing; it received therefor $11,162.86, the State furnishing the paper. It also appears that under the next administration, the Soule Printing Co. was the contractor for the second class printing; as such it made fifteen thousand teachers' registers and grade books for which it received $16,515.64, it furnishing the paper. But the amount which these contractors received is not entitled to great weight in determining what would be a reasonable price of the work; for the reason that the contractor's bids are at a level rate per cent. on the prices fixed by the statute, and might be less than reasonable for some work and more than reasonable for other. We have also reached the conclusion that little weight can be given to these figures for another reason, and that is, that the statute does not fix the price for such work as this, and it may have been fixed by the contracts made by these contractors with the State. Our construction of the statute is that these books are not blank books used by counties and are not therefore included in the printing of the second class. The blank books used by counties and referred to in section 3956, are the record books used in the different county seats of the State and the statute contemplates that they are to be bound in some of the ways specified in section 3982. We are also of opinion that these books are included in the words "all printing for the department of Public Instruction" and therefore, fall under the contract of the contractor for the printing of the first class. But the statute not specifying at what price such work is to be done, it must be a matter of special contract as provided in section 3984. The Legislature realized that it had not specified all the work which the State might require to be done, and therefore section 3984 was added to cover all unspecified work. The rates given in the statute are only to be paid for the work specified in the statute. The rate for work which is unspecified must be a matter of contract. As there was no contract in this case covering the work, the rights of the parties must be determined by its reasonable value which under all the evidence we fix at $4,000 to which must be added the amount of the last two items on the account, $268.15, making in all, $4,268.15. Deducting this amount from the sum paid Bacon, $28,260.84, we have a balance of $23,992.69, which is the amount he owes the State with interest from August 29, 1902.

By way of explanation, it may be stated that the printing known as "first class" is the cheapest grade of printing, and that designated as "second class" is a much more expensive grade.

It remains to determine whether the sureties are also liable. A surety is not bound beyond the letter of his covenant. The only covenant in the bond relied on to charge the sureties is in these words:

"That in the event the said bid of Henry Bacon for public printing and binding of the second class, is accepted, said Henry Bacon shall enter into contract, and promptly, faithfully and skillfully perform the work bid for in accordance with the law."

It is conceded that Bacon entered into the contract and the only ground upon which the sureties are sought to be charged is the claim that he failed promptly, faithfully and skillfully to perform the work bid for in accordance with the law. It is insisted that it was the duty of Bacon to do the work put in his hands according to his contract and that McChesney, as Superintendent of Public Instruction, could not waive the terms of the contract which had been made with Bacon by the commissioners. The rights of the sureties do not depend upon anything that McChesney as Superintendent, did. McChesney indicated the character of work he wanted done; the Board of Printing Commissioners then decided that Bacon should do the work. Bacon took the work and did it under the decision of the Board of Printing Commissioners. When he had done the work literally as he was ordered to do it he presented his work to the Board of Commissioners and the board accepted it as done according to the order. The undisputed proof shows that the order was executed just as all the parties at the time contemplated it should be executed. The trouble here does not arise from the fact that Bacon did not execute the order according to its terms; it arises from the fact that after the work had been done according to the order, Bacon improperly obtained from the State money to which he was not entitled. The sureties did not undertake that they would be responsible for any money collected by Bacon from the State above what he was entitled to receive. There is nothing in the bond to apprise the sureties that any such liability was sought to be imposed upon them.

It is insisted that one of the sureties, John A. Fulton, is estopped to say that he is not liable as he was present as Bacon's attorney and argued that the work should be assigned to him, and was also present when the claim was allowed asking its allowance, and in fact received from Bacon on a debt due him, a large part of the money which Bacon drew from the treasury. When Fulton asked the work for his client, all the parties had in mind, books to be made like the sample. Bacon did the work just as Fulton asked he should be allowed to do it. It is not a case where the surety consented for certain work to be assigned to his principal and the principal failed to do what the surety agreed for him to do. If Bacon had failed to do the work according to the order, there would be much force in holding John A. Fulton liable for any damages that the Commonwealth had thereby sustained. But that is not the case. as Bacon did the work just as Fulton asked that he should be allowed to do it. He did all that Fulton, by implication agreed that he should do. The trouble here arises, not from the way the work was done, but from the price that was received for it. An attorney who asks that his client's claim be allowed, is not responsible for the amount allowed, if it shall afterwards turn out that more was paid than was due.

The commissioners were imposed upon and deceived by Bacon, and the Legislative Committee, who subsequently investigated the transaction and reported that Bacon had received no more than he was entitled to, was evidently unacquainted with the technical terms of the printers' trade and were likewise deceived or else, their investigation was not thorough enough to enable them to learn the truth. The expert testimony which has been furnished us, explaining the terms of the printers' trade, as applied to the statute, has made our task comparatively easy, and we have had no difficulty in determining that the printing, which is the subject of this litigation, clearly belongs to what is known as "first class" and should have been done by Fetter, who had the contract with the State for such work.

It appears that the commissioners had implicit confidence in Bacon, and accepted any statement that he made to them relative to the printing as true. This enabled him to secure from them an order to do the work, which clearly did not belong to the class which his contract called for. With his skill and experience as a printer he was bound to know that this work was properly assignable to the "first class" and we can not escape the conclusion that in deceiving the commissioners and inducing them to permit him to do this work, he was then laying the foundation for the perpetration of the fraud which he later practiced, in presenting and procuring the commissioners to pay a bill which all the evidence shows to have been more than five times as large as it should have been; but for this, he alone is liable. The liability of his sureties must be measured by the terms of their contract, and this, as above stated, was not violated.

For the reasons indicated the judgment of the lower court is affirmed as to the sureties on the bond, but reversed as to Bacon, and the case is remanded, for a judgment against him, as above indicated.

HOCKER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Indictments—Failing to Charge Intent—Acts Necessary at Common Law—The law looks not to form so much as substance, and when an indictment states concisely all of the acts necessary at common law to constitute the crime of murder, it is a good indictment for such. The failure of the indictment to charge that appellant shot deceased "with the intention of killing him" does not render it defective for the reason that it states all the facts constituting the offense with which he is charged, and the statements are sufficiently certain to enable the court to pronounce judgment of conviction.

2. Evidence—Competency of—While it appears to this court that the testimony with reference to appellant's intention to flee the country was immaterial, yet it was competent and it was the province of the jury to weigh and determine it.

3. Same—Although he killed deceased with a gun, it was competent that he bought pistol cartridges an hour before the killing, on the theory that he was making preparations to kill deceased.

4. Instructions—Each to Be Read in Connection with All the Others—Often the whole law can not be put into one instruction, and in such a case each instruction must be read in connection with all the others. When so read, in this case, the instructions aptly present the whole law of this case and particularly that of self-defense.

5. Same—A number of authorities hold that the word "passion" includes anger and terror, therefore the court did not err in refusing to embody in the manslaughter instruction, that the killing was done in a sudden impulse of terror.

John M. Stucky, Stoll & Bush and J. William Mitchell for appellant.

James Breathitt and Maury Kemper for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

Appellant was indicted, charged with the murder of Newton Drummond Veal, tried, convicted and his punishment fixed at death. To reverse the judgment predicated upon that verdict he prosecutes this appeal, and assigns three reasons why it should be done. First, because the indictment was fatally defective and his demurrer thereto should have been sustained. Second, because the court admitted improper evidence over his objection. And, third, because of errors in the instructions.

Deceased lived with his mother and brothers on the Todd Road, which runs from Lexington to Winchester. The house stood back some 180 or 190 feet from the road. Appellant lived two miles or more east of deceased's home. About 250 yards west of Veal's front gate, the Walnut Hill turnpike intersects the Todd Road, and a blacksmith shop stands on the northwest corner of the intersection of these roads. This shop is run by a man named Pemberton. On the south east corner is the dwelling of D. E. Eldridge. It is about 200 yards from the front gate, leading from the Todd road into the Veal residence, to the blacksmith shop, and the ground in between the shop and the gate is slightly elevated.

Appellant, Hocker, had been in the employ of the Veal family as a day laborer from sometime in the fall of 1906. About two weeks before deceased was killed they were engaged in making a pond, the day was warm and the work was hard; along in the afternoon, Hocker, on his own initiative, quit work, for the alleged reason that he was hot and tired, and, after some words between him and deceased and Thomas Veal, a brother of the deceased, he left the place where they were working and went in company with Thomas Veal to the residence where Mr. Thomas Veal made a settlement with him in which he stated that appellant owed them (the Veal Bros.), $3 on account of provisions and a hog, which they had let him have. He had no money at that time and, although he alleges that he did not in fact owe them anything but that they owed him money, he did not make this known to them. After he left their employ he commenced work for one Charles Dodd, who lived on the Walnut Hill pike, something like a mile south of its intersection with the Todd road. He went from home to his work each day, and in so doing passed the Veal residence. On the morning of the day upon which Veal was killed, appellant went to Lexington, in a spring wagon, taking with him a negro, named Lige Brooks. Upon their return, as they were passing the Veal residence, Newton Drummond Veal was at a point near the gate. He called to appellant and asked him when he was going to pay that money, meaning the $3. Appellant answered "next Saturday," and asked if that would do and Veal responded that it would. Nothing further was said and appellant went on his way home. Brooks got out of the wagon and went to his home before appellant reached his house. This was about noon.

Appellant testifies that after Brooks left him, he went home, ate his dinner, and went to a neighboring store for the purpose of buying some groceries. The grocer and his brother testify that he came there at the time he says he did; that he bought no groceries but did buy some 38 center fire pistol cartridges. He returned home and started out in the spring wagon, for the alleged purpose of going to see Mr. Dodd about working the next day. He took with him a single barrel shotgun and several loaded cartridges, for the ostensible purpose of shooting some birds for a child who was sick. He arrived in front of the Veal farm about four o'clock in the afternoon; when he reached a point nearly opposite the gate, according to his own statement, he was halted by Newton Drummond Veal, who came down to the gate, opened it, came through and approached him in a threatening manner: this so frightened him that scarcely before he realized what he was doing he drew his gun and fired the fatal shot.

Thomas Veal testifies, that when Hocker reached the gate he stopped and called his brother Newton, who was whitewashing at the barn, down to the road, telling him that he had his money for him and asked him to come and get it. That when his brother passed through the gate, and turned to chain or latch it, appellant fired the shot into his back, and that immediately the shot was fired, his brother sank to the ground, and, although he reached him very shortly thereafter, his brother was dead when he got there. After the shooting, appellant drove rapidly away from that neighborhood and escaped. He was captured about a month afterward in Cincinnati.

There is practically no difference between the testimony for the Commonwealth and appellant to the point where appellant reached the gate on the afternoon upon which deceased was shot; the Commonwealth's witness testifies that appellant called deceased down to him, whereas, appellant testifies that deceased accosted him, stopped him and cursed and abused him and threatened to kill him and was approaching in a threatening manner when he fired the fatal shot. The principal witness for the Commonwealth, Thomas Veal, testifies that at the time appellant called his brother to come down to the road, he was with him, whitewashing at the barn, which was some 190 feet away. That he saw his brother go down to the road, go through the gate and turn to fasten it when he was shot. That he immediately ran to the house to arm himself, that appellant jumped out of his wagon and ran parallel with him down the road a piece, exclaiming, "you need not run, I will get you too." Appellant denies that he left his wagon at all, or that he threatened to do any violence whatever to Thomas Veal. It is urged for appellant that as the blacksmith, Pemberton, upon walking the length of his shop, after he heard the shot fired, saw appellant driving rapidly down the road, this testimony of Thomas Veal is necessarily untrue; for had appellant, after shooting deceased, left his wagon and run down the road, as it is alleged by Thomas Veal, he did, he could not have returned to his wagon in the time that elapsed between the firing of the shot and when the witness, Pemberton, walked out of his shop and looked in that direction. There is an irreconcilable conflict between the testimony of the witness, Thomas Veal, and appellant upon this point. Pemberton does not pretend to say that appellant did not leave his wagon after firing the shot, and his testimony does not corroborate appellant, for he only testifies that after he got out of the shop, where he could see and looked in that direction, appellant was driving rapidly away from the gate. Thomas Veal testifies to the same fact; so that the question as to whether or not appellant left his wagon after shooting deceased and ran down the road, as Thomas Veal says he did, was left an issue between these two. It is not contended by counsel for appellant that the admission of this testimony was error, their objection to it is that it was untrue, but the argument which they so forcibly present upon this point has no place here, it should have been, as it doubtless was, addressed to the trial jury, who were the sole judges of the facts.

The Commonwealth introduced a witness, G. H. Farney, who testified that on the afternoon of the day upon which Newton Drummond Veal was killed, he had a conversation with appellant, in which appellant told him that if it developed that he owed him money for the season to a boar he would pay him, and if he did not, his wife would. The Commonwealth introduced another witness, Sarah Taylor, to whom appellant said he wanted her to tell her daughter, who owed him some money, to leave the money with his (appellant's) wife. The testimony of these two witnesses is that of which appellant chiefly complains; the Commonwealth insists that it was competent, as it showed that appellant was contemplating killing Newton Drummond Veal, and was making preparation to leave, and wanted to get his business affairs straightened up before he did so. Appellant denied having the conversation either at the time indicated, or about that time; and his counsel insists that, even if he did, it was but such a conversation as would naturally occur in the conduct of one's every day business affairs, and was not in any sense evidence that appellant was contemplating the law and fleeing the country.

The indictment is in words and figures as follows:

"Fayette Circuit Court.

"Commonwealth of Kentucky,	}	Murder.
v.
Robert Hocker.

"The Grand Jury of Fayette county, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse Robert Hocker of the crime of murder, committed as follows, to-wit: the said Robert Hocker on the 29th day of June, 1907, in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully, willfully and feloniously, and with malice aforethought, shoot and wound Newton Drummond Veal, with a gun, loaded with powder and leaden balls and other hard substances, from which shooting and wounding said Veal died in Fayette county, Kentucky, within a year and a day, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

To this indictment, appellant filed a general demurrer which was overruled, and of this ruling he complains. It is insisted for him that the indictment is defective for two reasons. First, it fails to charge that appellant shot deceased "with the intention of killing him." Second, that in the body of the indictment the word "murder" is not used and that it is fatally defective because of this omission. Was it necessary that the indictment should state that the shooting was done with the intention of killing deceased? This precise question has been before us in several cases. In the case of Jane v. Commonwealth, 3 Met., 18, the defendant was charged with the murder of the deceased by the use of poison. The indictment alleged that the defendant "willfully and maliciously, and with malice aforethought, killed one Jane Porter, by administering to her strychnine, from the effects of which she died." It did not allege that the strychnine was administered with the intention of killing deceased and, although the indictment in that case was attacked as defective, it was held to be sufficient. And in the case of Wilson v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1251, the accused was charged with having murdered one Mary Cloyd, by administering to her drugs, and inserting into her womb, for the purpose of producing an abortion, instruments and other contrivances, which caused her to abort, and that by reason thereof, and the drugs administered she became sick and died soon thereafter. This indictment, although it failed to state that the drugs were administered or the instruments used for the purpose of producing death, was, nevertheless, held to be a good indictment for murder.

The law looks not to form so much as to substance, and where an indictment states concisely all of the acts necessary at common law to constitute the crime of murder it is a good indictment for such. There are certain essential elements which an indictment must contain. These are defined in section 122, of the Criminal Code, as follows:

"The title of the prosecution, specifying the name of the court in which the indictment is presented and the names of the parties.

2.

"A statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, on conviction, according to the right of the case."

And section 124, states what must be set out with certainty in the indictment, to-wit:

"1. The party charged.

"2. The offense charged.

"3. The county in which the offense was committed.

"4. The particular circumstances of the offense charged, if they be necessary to constitute a complete offense."

The use of the word "murder" in the accusatory part of the indictment would not make it a good indictment for murder if it was lacking in the essential elements which go to make up that crime.

Although its use can not make an indictment good where some of the essential elements are lacking, would its absence, in a case where all of the constituent elements of the crime are present, render an indictment defective? We think not. In the case of Kaelin v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky., 354, this court defined the following to be the true test of a good indictment for a felony:

"If the defendant should admit on the trial all of the material facts alleged in the indictment as constituting the crime with which he was charged, he would not be permitted to plead or give in evidence any fact that would acquit him, such as self-defense."

Applying this rule to the indictment before us, we are of opinion that it is clearly sufficient; for, if appellant admits that he "unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and with malice aforethought shot and wounded the deceased, from the effect of which shooting and wounding, he died within a year and a day," he has admitted all of the constituent elements which go to make up the crime of murder, and in doing so has cut himself off from every defense. In this indictment the facts constituting the offense are clearly and concisely stated and the appellant, upon even a casual reading thereof, was fully apprised of the offense with which he was charged, and the statements therein are sufficiently certain to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon conviction. In the case of Britton v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 858, the indictment was for murder, and in the exact language of the indictment in the case at bar; although the same question was not raised in that case as in this case, the indictment was held to be good.

In the early history of our criminal practice, prosecutions were hedged about by so many forms and ceremonies that it was extremely difficult to draw a good indictment. In many instances there was a partial, if not a total, miscarriage of justice, because of the lack of skill or inadvertence on the part of the prosecutor in the drafting or preparation of the indictment. To remedy this evil and place the Commonwealth, as nearly as possible, upon an equal footing with the accused, the rigidity of the old rule of procedure has, by statutory provision, in most States, been so relaxed that now, if the constituent elements, constituting the crime are set out in apt and appropriate language, in the body of the indictment, it is held to be good. The pleader is not now confined or limited to the use of any particular words, phraseology or form in the preparation of the indictment, so long as he sets out with particularity, in apt and appropriate language the constituent elements of the offense, except in that class of cases where a constituent element of the crime can only be defined by the use of a particular word, then that particular word must be used.

It is urged that the use of the word "murder" in the indictment is as essential to its validity as is the use of the word "feloniously," or, "with felonious intent," but to this we can not agree. This court has repeatedly held that the word "feloniously" has fixed and well-defined legal meaning, understood by bench and bar. As said by Mr. Wharton, in his work on Criminal Law, section 399:

"The word 'feloniously' is essential to all indictments for felony, whether at common law or statutory; and in several cases technical and appropriate words are frequently requisite in adding to the description of the offense. Thus, in an indictment for murder, it is essential to state, as a conclusion from the facts previously averred, that the said defendant * * * feloniously did kill and murder—a term of art which in no case can be dispensed with—on the same principle, it must also be alleged, that the offense was committed of defendant's malice aforethought—words which can be supplied by the aid of no other; and if any of these terms be omitted the indictment is defective."

The use of the word "feloniously" is necessary because it defines one of the constituent elements which go to make up the crime of murder, and there is no other word in the English language which is a perfect synonym for it that can be used to supply its place, hence, as said by Wharton, it is, in criminal procedure, a "term of art" peculiarly adapted to define one of the constituent elements of a felony, and its presence in every indictment for felony is absolutely essential; but not so with the word "murder." It defines the crime itself, and is not a constituent element thereof. In the accusatory part of the indictment it should appear, and in the indictment in the case at bar it does so appear. Measured by the standard which this court has adopted for a good indictment, and tested by the provisions of the Code and the adjudicated cases of this court, we are of opinion that the objections raised by counsel for appellant to the indictment in the case at bar are not well taken, and the trial court did not err in so holding.

We come now to the second ground urged for reversal. Did the court err in permitting the Commonwealth's witnesses, Farney and Taylor, to testify to certain conversations had with them by appellant, on the day of the killing, relative to matters of business? This evidence was offered by the Commonwealth as tending to show that on the day of the killing, appellant was making preparations for flight. The Commonwealth had a right to show all of the acts and conversations of appellant which would tend to throw any light, even though small, upon the killing, and to establish appellant's guilt.

It was the duty of the Commonwealth to bring before the jury every fact and circumstance which would tend to show that appellant maliciously killed deceased. If, on the day, or even a week or month, or at any time before the killing, he had stated he intended to kill him, clearly this evidence would have been competent. It is not usual for one who contemplates committing a minor offense, much less the most serious crime known to the law, to advertise the fact in advance, and where such an intent exists, it must usually be shown by acts and circumstances, rather than by direct or positive declaration. While, to our minds, the testimony offered by the Commonwealth for the purpose of showing that appellant contemplated fleeing the country, was so unimportant that it might almost be deemed immaterial, yet, it was competent, and being so it was peculiarly the province of the jury to weigh this testimony, and determine whether or not it tended to show that at the time the conversations were had, appellant was preparing for the commission of the crime, and subsequent flight from the country.

It is likewise complained that the court erred in permitting the witness, Lynch, to testify to the purchase of the pistol cartridges, inasmuch as deceased was not killed with a pistol, and it was not shown that appellant had, at the time of the shooting, upon or about his person a pistol, or cartridges. He admitted he had a pistol at home, while it is true he stated he had it with him when he killed deceased, and he introduced a witness whose testimony might be regarded as, in a degree, substantiating him upon this point; still the fact that he had bought the cartridges only an hour or so before killing deceased, was properly submitted to the jury for their consideration, along with the other evidence, on the theory of the Commonwealth, that at the time he did so he was making preparation to kill him. If, as a matter of fact, such was his purpose, and he afterward changed his plan and adopted other means of carrying out that purpose, the testimony would be none the less competent for the purpose of showing that, in killing deceased, he acted with malice aforethought.

Appellant likewise complains of the instructions, which are as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Robert Hocker, in Fayette county, Kentucky, and prior to the 29th day of June, 1907, willfully and intentionally shot and killed Newton Drummond Veal, by shooting said Veal with a gun loaded with powder and leaden ball or other hard substances, and that said shooting was not necessary, and did not, at the time, reasonably appear to the defendant to be necessary, to save the defendant from death, or from suffering some serious bodily harm at the hands of said Veal, the jury should find the defendant guilty—guilty of murder—if said shooting was done by the defendant with malice aforethought—guilty of voluntary manslaughter, if said shooting was done in sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, and without previous malice.

"The jury should find the defendant not guilty, unless the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did, in Fayette county, Kentucky, and prior to the 29th day of June, 1907, willfully and intentionally shoot and kill Newton Drummond Veal, by shooting said Veal with a gun loaded with powder and leaden ball, or other hard substances.

3.

"If the defendant did shoot and kill Newton Drummond Veal, but at the time defendant shot said Veal, the defendant was in danger of death, or of suffering some serious bodily harm at the hands of said Veal, or if the defendant at the time, believed and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he was in danger of death, or of suffering some serious bodily harm at the hands of said Veal, and if it was necessary, or to defendant, reasonably appeared to be necessary, to shoot said Veal, to avert the danger, or what, to the defendant, appeared to be such danger, this was a shooting and killing in self-defense.

"And if defendant did shoot and kill Newton Drummond Veal, yet the jury should find the defendant not guilty, unless the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that said shooting was not done in self-defense.

"If the jury find the defendant guilty of murder, they should fix his punishment at death, or confinement in the penitentiary for life, in the discretion of the jury.

"If the jury find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, they should fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two, nor more than twenty-one years.

"The law presumes the defendant innocent until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Proof, beyond a reasonable doubt of guilt, is such evidence as establishes beyond a reasonable doubt, every fact necessary to constitute guilt, and unless the defendant has been proved guilty, the jury should find him not guilty.

"If the defendant has been proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, but the jury entertains a reasonable doubt, whether he has been so proved guilty of murder, or of voluntary manslaughter, they should find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, the lower degree of the crime charged."

It is insisted that the whole law of self-defense was not given to the jury, and that the instruction on manslaughter was defective. That instead of the words:

"That said shooting was not necessary, and did not, at the time, reasonably appear to the defendant to be necessary to save defendant from death or from suffering some serious bodily harm, &c.," the court should have said that if the shooting was not done:

"In his necessary or apparently necessary self-defense."

That his failure to use the word "self-defense" in the first instruction was misleading to the jury, and prejudicial to appellant, and that as the word "self-defense" was not used, the court should have incorporated in instruction number one, all of the essential elements of self-defense, in order to make instruction number one a good instruction. In other words, appellant insists that if any qualifying clause whatever was inserted in instruction number one, it should have been such a qualification as embodied all of the elements of self-defense, or else the complete self-defense instruction should have been incorporated in instruction number one. That under the instruction as given, although appellant believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe that he was in danger, and although the danger was apparent and not real, still he would be guilty of murder or manslaughter, unless the jury believed that at the time he shot he was in actual danger. That under this instruction, the jury was required to believe that it was actually necessary or apparently necessary to shoot to avoid death or serious bodily harm, otherwise the defendant was guilty. That the necessity or apparent necessity applied to the use of the means employed to avoid injury, and not to the danger itself.

Instruction number one is not subject to the criticism which counsel for appellant is disposed to make of it. Nor are we able to draw the narrow distinction between instruction number one and the instruction which appellant concedes would have been proper. The distinction is very artificial, but even if it be conceded that the failure to use the exact words, "necessary or apparently necessary self-defense," was error, it was in no wise prejudicial or misleading to the jury. The law of self-defense was fully and completely given in instruction number three. When this instruction is read in connection with instruction number one, even the technical objection made thereto can not be sustained. The whole law can not often be put in one instruction, several are usually required, and, where this is the case, each must be read in connection with all of the others, and when so read in the case at bar, they aptly and correctly present the whole law of the case, and particularly the law of self-defense, upon which appellant relies. Instructions very similar to these were approved in the case of Stout v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 630.)

It is further contended for appellant that as he testified that the shooting was done under a sudden impulse of terror or fright, that in addition to the use of the words "in sudden heat and passion," in the manslaughter instruction, the court should have told the jury, in substance, that if the shooting was done in sudden fright or terror, and without previous malice, then they should find the accused guilty of manslaughter. This objection to the manslaughter instruction is novel. We know of no case where such an instruction was given. Webster defines "passion" to be:

"The state of the mind when it is powerfully acted upon and influenced by something external to itself; the state of any particular faculty, which, under such conditions, becomes extremely sensitive or uncontrollably excited."

So that, while the word "passion" usually refers to a state of mind brought about by anger, it, properly speaking, expresses that condition of the mind when it has lost its self-control and become

1. Passways—Presumption of Grant—The unexplained and uninterrupted use of a passway for a long number of years carries with it the presumption of a grant, and the burden of overcoming this presumption rests upon the land owner to show that the use has been merely permissive.

2. Grant—Adverse Use of Passway—General Use Of—The general use of this passway by the traveling public for more than thirty years, carries with it the presumption of a grant and the continuous uninterrupted and adverse use by appellees ripened into a right of which they can not be deprived.

Greene & VanWinkle, A. M. Cox, M. C. Swinford and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellants.

W. T. Lafferty and Daniel Durbin for appellees.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This appeal involves the right of appellees to the use of a passway over a small tract of land containing about ten acres, owned by appellants. More than fifty years ago, there was a public road or passway from the Cynthiana & Falmouth road, at the point "I," on the annexed map, eastward, up Indian Creek, passing the point "L" to "A," where it intersected the old Cynthiana and Claysville dirt road, which ran from Cynthiana to Claysville along the dotted line through "F," "E," "A," "B," and "D." Later a turnpike was built from Cynthiana toward Claysville and this turnpike, beginning at the point "F," bore off to the east from the line of the old dirt road, and is designated on the map by the points "F," "G," "H" and "C." The land over which the passway in dispute runs, is known as the "Dills and Zilar Distillery property," and lies between the said turnpike and the old dirt road. The old dirt road leading from Cynthiana to Claysville has long since, presumably upon the completion of the turnpike, been abandoned and closed. After it was closed, perhaps as early as 1858, but certainly not later than 1868, the passway in controversy was opened up and from that time until it was closed by appellants, it was used uninterruptedly by appellees and their vendors, who resided at "L," as the only convenient way they had of reaching the Cynthiana and Claysville pike. It was likewise used by the traveling public who desired to pass through that way, either to the Cynthiana and Falmouth pike at "I," or to the Haviland county road at "K," there being a passway from the point "L" to "K" on the Haviland road. About 1868 Willis T. Zilar owned the 150 acre tract of land, upon which appellees now live, and whose dwelling is at the point "L." He also owned the ten-acre tract now owned by appellants. He conveyed to John H. Dills, a one-half interest in the ten-acre tract and they erected a distillery thereon. Later Dills and Zilar failed, and the property which they owned was sold by their assignee, Charles Bramble because the purchaser of the ten-acre tract. The deed by which this ten-acre tract was conveyed to him was never recorded, and the exact date of this conveyance is not known, though it was somewhere in the early seventies. During all the time that the ten-acre tract was owned by Dills and Zilar the traveling public continued to use this passway in question, and after the sale by fering with their free use and enjoyment thereof, alleging that they were entitled to its use as a matter of right, by reason of its having been used by them and those whom they succeeded in the ownership of the farm upon which they lived, and the traveling public for a great number of years, and particularly for more than fifteen years. The answer, while admitting the use of said passway, alleged that it was merely a permissive use, and denied that appellees had acquired any right thereto by reason of their having been permitted to use said passway for a great number of years. Issue was joined upon the question as to whether or not the use of this passway was permissive.

Much proof was taken and upon final hearing, the court adjudged that it was not a permissive use, but that plaintiffs, as a matter of right, were entitled to the free use and enjoyment of this passway, as an outlet to and from their residence and the Cynthiana and Claysville turnpike. Being dissatisfied with the judgment the defendants appeal.

All of the proof taken by both sides shows, beyond question, that this passway, in practically the same place where it is now located, has been used uninterruptedly since the building of the distillery in 1868 or 1869; and, while some of the witnesses for appellants testify that it was merely a permissive use, they all agree that it was an uninterrupted use by the residents of appellees land at "L," and any one else who desired to pass that way, from 1869 to the spring of 1906. Much time and attention is devoted by appellants' counsel, in brief, to show that any right to the use of the passway over the ten-acre tract, which Willis T. Zilar had for the benefit of the 150-acre tract, now owned by appellees, was lost or merged in the fee when he became the owner of the ten-acre tract, and that inasmuch as he made no reservation whatever, of the passway for the benefit of the 150-acre tract, when he conveyed to Dills a one-half interest in the ten-acre tract, he necessarily lost the right to continue to pass over the ten-acre tract, as a matter of right, if such right had existed in his favor prior to his purchase and ownership of the ten acre tract in question.

This discussion presents many nice questions and points of interest, but from the conclusion which we have reached, a consideration of them will not be necessary, for we are of opinion that, without regard to what the rights of the vendors of appellees and the traveling public may have been in the use of this passway, prior to the sale and conveyance by Dills and Zilar, they have, by the uninterrupted, open and adverse use of the passway in question, since the sale by the assignee of Dills and Zilar, acquired a right thereto of which they can not now be deprived. Practically all of the witnesses agree that since Dills and Zilar became the owners of this ten-acre tract, the passway in question has been used by the occupants of the 150-acre farm, now owned by appellees, and the traveling public.

The record shows that, after the failure of Dills and Zilar in the distilling business, this ten-acre tract was sold and one Charles Bramble, became the purchaser thereof. This sale must have occurred sometime in the early seventies, though the exact date is not shown. The deed by which Bramble acquired title to this property was never recorded and is not before us, but he held it under his purchase for at least twelve years, as is evidenced by the testimony of Omer Taylor, who says that he lived there with his father, who was a tenant of Bramble's for twelve years. Bramble sold and conveyed it to N. W. Frazier. Frazier sold it to George Peddicord and wife in 1884, so that, without taking into consideration the time it was owned by Frazier, Bramble must have become the owner thereof as early as 1872. The Peddicords, who purchased from Frazier, held it three years; following them, Bridget Murphy owned and held it for six years; and David Florence purchased and held it for seven years. R. S. Cordry purchased and held it for one year, and David Florence bought it a second time and held it for four years, making an aggregate of, at least, thirty-three years since the sale by the assignee of Dills and Zilar, during all of which time this passway has remained open to the free and uninterrupted use and enjoyment of the occupants of the 150-acre farm and the traveling public.

It is true some testimony is offered by appellants which, considered by itself, would tend to show that the use thereof had been merely a permissive use and not claimed as a matter of right by the owners of the 150-acre farm or by the traveling public. Among the witnesses who have so testified, are Thomas J. Murphy, the husband of Bridget Murphy, and David Florence, who twice owned the farm, and, while each testifies that the use was a permissive use, they admit that it was at no time interrupted and that no one was ever denied the right to use it. It is urged that the witness, Florence testifies positively to an agreement, which he made and entered into with Willis T. Zilar, the then owner of the 150-acre tract of land, by which the said Zilar was permitted to pass over the land along the passway in question, but when his testimony is considered and read as a whole, his idea of a permissive use is shown to be rather confused, as evidenced by the following cross-examination:

"Q. Did you ever hear any one dispute any one's right to pass over this passway?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. So it has been by permission, as you say?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. You mean by that, when you say by permission, that no one ever objected?"

"A. No, sir, only I asked Mr. Zilar if I could go through. He said yes, if I would let him go through my land, and I told him all right."

"Q. You mean by permission that you never heard any objections?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. You never heard any one oppose it?"

"A. Of course, there was only myself. I would fuss because I could not close it up; I had no financial affairs to try to close it and I didn't want to have any trouble over it."

"Q. You don't know how that road got there in the first place?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. You don't know how it was put there?"

"A. No, sir."

"Q. It was there when you bought the place?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. And you sold it with the road on it?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. And there was nothing said about closing it?"

"A. No, sir."

The witness, Thomas J. Murphy thus testified as to the permissive use of this passway:

"Q. Was this passway, if you know, a public passway, a private passway, or merely a gateway of your own?"

"A. The only ones that passed through there were just the neighbors."

"Q. Where were these neighbors going when they passed through there?"

"A. I don't know, there were only a very few went through, but I don't know where they were going."

"Q. Did the people, neighbors, who passed over your land on this passway, go over it by your permission, or did they pass as a matter of right, or was it by your indulgence?"

"A. I never refused them, I permitted them to go through, but if they had claimed to go through by right I would have stopped them, or I would have tried to anyhow."

"Q. Do you mean to say that you permitted those neighbors to pass through and over your land to the Zilar farm, merely as a neighborly courtesy, and not because they had a right to pass over it?"

"A. I simply allowed them to go, but if they had claimed a right to go, I would have stopped them, sure."

This witness admits that the passway was over the place at the time that his wife bought it, and that the neighbors passed through there when they pleased, without asking permission. The fact that permission to pass through was not sought of him or his wife is evidence rather against appellants than for them, for if the neighbors had not regarded this passway as a public passway, they would, no doubt, have sought permission before attempting to pass through, and their failure to do so rather lends color to appellees' contention that they were using it as a matter of right. The unexplained and uninterrupted use of a passway for a long number of years carries with it the presumption of a grant. (Browning v. Griffith, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 334; Kriegler v. Newman, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 27; Schwer v. Martin, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 1221; and Boyd v. Morris, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 642.) And the burden of overcoming this presumption rests upon the land owner to show that the use has been merely permissive. (Burch v. Blair, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 641.) And, while appellants have introduced some evidence which would tend to show that the use was a permissive use, still it is out-weighted by the facts and circumstances, which are shown by the record, and the main witness, by whom appellants seek to show that the use was a permissive use, contradicted himself on the vital question.

It is most significant that during the time covering at least thirty-three years, following the date of the sale of this ten-acre tract by the assignee of Dills and Zilar no one was ever denied the right to pass over this passway in question, until it was closed up by appellants in 1906, although during this time the land in question had been owned by, at least, six different people. Another significant fact is, that during all of this time no one is shown to have ever asked permission of any owner to pass over this passway. On this old passway, as it originally ran, connecting the Falmouth road with the Cynthiana and Claysville road, there at one time stood a grist mill, near the residence at "L," a stone factory, and later a distillery. Each of these business enterprises invited custom and trade, and necessarily encouraged the general public to pass over this connecting road, which having been used by the general public for a great number of years, prior to the building of the distillery, no doubt, as alleged by appellees, had come to be regarded by the traveling public as a public road, and not as a private lane or passway; after this distillery had ceased to be used as such, the public continued to use this road, from the ford, at "P" to the point "H," as they had theretofore used it. The great weight of the testimony and circumstances brought out in the evidence of the witnesses, not only for the appellees, but for appellants, as well, justify the conclusion that appellants used this passway as a matter of right. The fact that appellees attempted to buy the land, or a portion thereof, over which this passway runs, does not militate in the least against their claim, for it appears that it was done with a view of avoiding litigation with appellants on account thereof, and not in recognition of appellants' claim that their use of the passway was merely permissive.

Appellants also urge that appellees should not be permitted to claim the use of the passway, as a matter of right, because appellee, David Cleveland, was present when appellant bought the land over which the passway runs, and failed to assert his claim to any passway over said land, and that by reason of such failure on his part to speak when it was his duty to do so, he is now estopped from asserting claim to said passway. There might be some merit in this contention if it was a conceded fact that David Cleveland, who now claims the passway over said land, stood by and saw it sell to appellant and failed to make known that he was asserting a right to a passway over the land; but David Cleveland denies that he was present at the sale, and several witnesses were introduced who testified that he was not there, and, while several persons have testified that he was there, we are of opinion that the weight of the testimony is to the effect that while some of his brothers were present he himself was not at the sale. Much testimony was introduced to show that appellees have a convenient and accessible way of going to and from their farm to a public road known as the "Haviland Road" at "K." Admitting this testimony as true, it can not be considered for the purpose of depriving them of the right to their use of the passway in question, for their right to the use of his passway, under the pleadings in this case, is not made to depend upon their having no other convenient or suitable outlet, but it is claimed as a matter of right, by the uninterrupted, open and adverse use of it for more than fifteen years; they claim they have acquired a right to its free and undisturbed use, hence its necessity or convenience can not enter into the consideration of the question before us. In the case of Estep v. Hammons, 104 Ky., 144, and in the quite recently decided case of George Johnson, v. Edna Allen, &c., it was expressly held that one could not be deprived of the use of a passway to which he was entitled because he had acquired another outlet.

The evidence shows that this passway is well-defined, and each of the several owners of the land who testified, bore evidence to the effect that it was there when he bought the land, was used uninterruptedly during his ownership, and was being so used at the time that he sold and parted with his title thereto. The general use by the occupants of appellees' 150-acre farm and the traveling public for more than thirty years, carried with it the presumption of a grant, and by their continuous, uninterrupted and adverse use thereof, appellees' claim to said passway had ripened into a right of which they could not be deprived.

We are of opinion that the chancellor arrived at the correct conclusion, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

Campbell & Campbell for appellant.

J. D. Mocquot for appellees.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellant brought this action to recover from the appellees $540.55, alleged to be due upon a contract for repairing a building. Two hundred and fifty dollars of this amount was charged for "shoring up joists," which was necessary in re-building a wall. The appellees admitted an indebtedness of $290.55, but denied any liability on account of the shoring up of the joists. Upon a trial before a jury, a verdict was returned rejecting the claim for shoring up the joists, and from the judgment upon this verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears from the evidence that J. P. Smith and the appellees owned a party wall. Smith made a contract with appellant to repair his building, of which this party wall was a part. The contract provided that appellant was to tear down and re-build the front, three stories in height; and further stipulated that appellant would do "all necessary shoring on all the floors." He further agreed "to furnish all labor and material necessary to tear down and re-build the partnership wall between Smith's building and the building owned by appellees, in a true and workman-like manner, of the same thickness and size as at present, from the front back to a separate wall which forms a part of the partnership wall; the length of the proposed new wall to be about 56 feet." It was also agreed that one-half of the cost of repairing the party wall should be paid by appellees, and because of this fact they signed the contract made between Smith and Weikel. Appellees were not concerned in the contract except as it related to the erection of the party wall. There is no controversy between Smith and appellant, as Smith paid the full contract price agreed upon. Nor is there any dispute between appellant and appellees as to the cost of one-half the party wall, that was to be paid by them, as the amount due for this was paid. So that the only question is whether appellant's obligation in the contract made with Smith "to do all necessary shoring on all the floors." embraced the shoring made necessary in the building of appellees by the tearing down of the old and the construction of a new party wall.

Appellant's contention is that the reference to shoring in the contract with Smith only embraced and contemplated the shoring made necessary in Smith's building, and on his side of the party wall, and did not include the cost of shoring up appellee's building on their side of the party wall. Whilst appellees insist that the contract with Smith, to which they were parties, in so far as the party wall was concerned, included all the shoring necessary to be done on either side of the party wall; and that this was the only contract between them in respect to the shoring.

It will thus be seen that the issue between the parties is a very simple one of fact.

Appellant testified that the tearing down of the party wall made it necessary to shore up with timbers the first and second stories of appellees' building, and this work was done at the instance and request of appellees, although all that was said between them was that appellee told Weikel "to protect his building and he would treat him right about it." Appellant says that was all the contract there was between them. This alleged contract was in parol, and was made subsequent to the written contract between Smith and appellant.

It was also shown that the wall could not have been torn down without shoring up the buildings on each side, and that the reasonable expense of shoring up appellees' building was $250.00.

Appellees' testimony was in substance that he had a contract with appellant to do other work on his building at the same time that the party wall was being re-built, and when Smith's work was going on. But that nothing was said about charging him for shoring up his building, nor did appellant inform him at any time that he would expect pay for it.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"1. It is admitted by the defendants in their answer that the plaintiff furnished the material and performed labor, on tin work, for painting and pointing the front of the house, for $279.95, and for shoring the front of the house $110, and the court now instructs you to find for the plaintiff the said sum of $290.00. And the court further instructs you that if you shall believe, from the evidence in this case, that, under the direction of the defendants, or at the special instance and request of the defendants, the plaintiff furnished the material and performed the labor in shoring up the joists of the house, then you will find for the plaintiff such additional sum, not exceeding $250.00, as you may believe, from the evidence in this case, would be a fair and reasonable compensation for furnishing said material and performing said labor.

"2. But unless you shall believe, from the evidence, that plaintiff furnished the material and performed the labor in shoring up said joists, under the direction of the defendants, or at their special instance and request, then the law is for the defendants as to the said $250.00, and you will so find."

These instructions presented clearly to the jury the only issue in the case.

It is complained that the court erred in permitting the contract between Smith and Weikel to be introduced as evidence. But this complaint is not well founded. The contract between Smith and Weikel was signed by appellees, and contained stipulations referring, not only to the party wall, but to the shoring of the building. Whether the provisions in this contract, in respect to shoring, embraced the building owned by appellees as well as the building owned by Smith was a material issue in the case, and upon this issue the jury found against appellant.

It is also urged that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence. It may be conceded that the weight of the evidence supports appellant's view, but there was evidence from which the jury might have reasonably inferred that, as the contract between Smith and appellant expressly provided for re-building the party wall, it was contemplated that the price charged in that contract included the expense of shoring on both sides of it. We can not say that the verdict is not supported by evidence, or that it is so palpably against it as to warrant us in setting it aside. It has been repeatedly declared by this court that we will not interfere with the verdict of a properly instructed jury upon a question of fact, unless it is so flagrantly against the evidence as to appear at first blush to be the result of passion or prejudice.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CITY OF MIDDLESBORO v. COAL AND IRON BANK.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

T. G. Anderson for appellant.

N. B. Hays and J. R. Sampson for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, overruling:

Mrs. Saulsberry should be credited in the judgment by anything she paid on the attempted compromise.

The order appointing the receiver was made at a regular term of court, and we must presume the court had before it facts sufficient to warrant its action. The parties must take notice of what is done by the court, when in regular session, and as Mrs. Saulsberry was a pendente lite purchaser she is bound by the order of the court made.

Petition overruled.

1. Verdicts—Instructions—Failure to Instruct—It is a rule of the Court of Appeals not to reverse a case for the failure of the lower court to give an instruction which the appellant did not ask, where the instructions which the court gave are correct as far as they go. Burdett v. Mullin's Ex'tx	691
2. Same—Against Weight of Evidence—Credibility of Witnesses—While the verdict seems to be against the weight of the evidence, the credibility of the witnesses is peculiarly for the jury, there was some evidence to support the verdict if they believed the witnesses, and this was a question for them to determine. Idem	691
3. Exceptions—Time of Filing—The exceptions to the report of sale herein, aside from being insufficient, were not filed in time. The lower court being one of continuous session has control over its orders for 60 days after they are entered, and within that time may correct them or set them aside, but the power to do so can not be exercised after that time. Sinder v. Conrad, &c.	723
4. Bill of Exceptions—Striking from Record—Presumption That Evidence Supported Pleadings—The bill of exceptions and transcript of evidence having been stricken from the record, the presumption must be indulged that the evidence supported the pleadings. The refusal of the lower court to re-docket the case and sign the bill of exceptions was not a final order from which an appeal may be taken Majors v. Con. Casualty Co.	728
5. Actions—Injunction Bonds—Supersedeas—The plaintiff in the action for an injunction, having superseded the judgment and taken an appeal to the Court of Appeals, the action on the bond should have been continued until the appeal was heard and determined by this court. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co. v. Jones, &c.	737
6. Damages—Injunctions—The ground upon which damages are sought to be recovered on the injunction bond is that plaintiff's mules remained idle from the time it was executed until the injunction was discharged. In this class of cases there can be no recovery if the damages alleged to have been incurred could have been avoided by ordinary care. If he could have gotten work by ordinary diligence, he can not recover for remaining idle. Idem	738
7. Question of Fact—Finding of Chancellor—This controversy as to the sale of some stave timber, is simply over a question of fact, the evidence is very conflicting, and it being a rule of this court not to disturb the finding of the chancellor where on all the evidence the mind is left in doubt as to the truth of the matter, the finding of the chancellor is approved. Hurt v. Services for Partnership—Payable Out of Partnership Funds—In this case evidence considered and held that a fee of $750, paid to W. for his services as attorney for a distillery firm, which had been dissolved by the death of one of the firm, being for the benefit of the partnership property, was properly payable out of the partnership funds. *Wilson, Receiver v. 2. Receivers—Settling Partnership—Allowances for Services—In allowing the fee of a receiver of a distillery company, which had been dissolved by the death of one of the partners, who was more of a caretaker than any thing else, his principal business being to sign withdrawals of whisky and looking after the distillery when not in operation for several years, the witnesses fixed the value of his services at from $5,000 to $10,000. This trial court allowed him $2,750. Held—That the allowance was not too small. Idem 716

It appearing that the son believed at the time that he had the right to sign his mother's name to the larger note, he was not guilty of any moral turpitude thereby, and the fact that the larger note was invalid, did not invalidate the smaller $440-note merged therein, as against the estate of his mother, who had subsequently died. *Corydon Dep. - Two Equal Factions—Absence of Church Judicature—Under Ky. The ex-communication of one party by the other shall not impair such right except it be done bona fide on the grounds of immorality." Where a Baptist church, composed of about 250 members, became divided into two factions of about equal numbers, neither having withdrawn, and both claiming to be in the majority, and there being no church judicatory of appellate jurisdiction to decide the controversy, the case manifests a schism, or division, of the church under the provisions of said section 322. Held—In such case the appellants, even if in the minority, are entitled to the use of the church building for worship one Saturday and the succeeding Sunday in each month. They are not, however, entitled to recover possession of the old book of church record, claimed in the petition, but are entitled to a copy thereof, the cost of making which should be divided between the two factions. *Poynter, &c. v. 1. Malicious Shooting—Self-Defense—Instruction As To—
 Under the evidence it appears that the accused commenced the difficulty. An instruction on self-defense was modified by telling the jury that the plea could not be relied on if accused "brought on the difficulty." While it is the better practice not to use these words, defendant's plea could not have availed him as he did not act in self-defense, and the jury could not have been misled by the use of these words. Wrist v. Commonwealth..... 718
2. Distance of Person at The Time of Shooting—The distance of the parties, at the time of the shooting, as it bears upon the question of the intent, is a fact to be considered by the jury like any other fact proved in the case. It should not be pointed out in an instruction any more than any other fact. Idem 719
3. Bill of Exceptions—Errors of court on the trial of a case must be shown in the bill of exceptions, not by the affidavits filed on the motion for a new trial. Bibb v. Commonwealth. 726

5. Homicide—Killing Woman on Street—Apparent Friendliness—Proof of Previous Threats—Circumstances Indicating Malice—On the trial of one for murder, who shot and killed a woman with whom he was walking on the street, although the parties were then apparently friendly, it was not error to allow proof that on the Saturday prior to the killing the accused, when informed that the deceased had had a fight with another girl with whom he was intimate, he said: "I wish I had been there," and also that he said on the day of the killing, "I would as soon kill this bitch as not," the jury was to judge whether the friendliness was apparent or real, and the proof, taken in connection with his buying a pistol and other circumstances, should go to the jury on the question of malice. *Ewing v. 6. Same—Malice Must Be Proven—Question for Jury—The doctrine of implied malice does not obtain in Kentucky, and when we reject the doctrine of implied malice, the existence of malice is a question for the jury, and the offense which would otherwise be murder becomes voluntary manslaughter where, under the evidence, the jury find, as a fact, that the killing was not done with malice aforethought. Idem 794
7. Same—Question of Malice—Reckless Shooting—Indifference to Consequences—When we do not apply the doctrine of implied malice and submit the question of malice to the jury, it must follow, that if the jury find the act was done without previous malice, they may find that the act was voluntary where it was done so recklessly or carelessly as to show an indifference to consequences. He who puts a loaded pistol at the head of another and pulls the trigger, knowing the danger attending the act, can not be heard to say he intended no harm. Idem 749

Commonwealth's Attorney—On the trial of one indicted for murder, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, it was not error in the circuit judge to refuse to appoint a pro tem. Commonwealth's attorney, where the county attorney was present and took an active part in the prosecution, though employed counsel was permitted to close the argument for the Commonwealth before the jury. The case of Keeton v. Commonwealth , 32 Ky. Law Rep., 1164, is modified so far as it conflicts with this opinion. Idem	779
12. Same—Employed Counsel—Opening and Closing Argument --This court will refuse to reverse a judgment of conviction in a criminal case upon the ground that employed counsel was permitted to make the opening statement and the closing argument where it appears that the trial was otherwise properly conducted and the defendant's guilt is reasonably certain. Idem	779
13. Misconduct of Counsel—Admonition of Court to Jury—Effect--An improper statement made by the county attorney to the jury, which the court admonished the jury not to consider, can not be considered on appeal as prejudicial to the defendant. Idem	779

- one indicted by the name of Homer Marion, alias Homer Morris, alias P. Homer Morse, for embezzlement by collecting money from S. for a Distilling Co., for which he was acting as agent, and converting it to his own use, under Ky. Statutes, sec. 1202, evidence was competent that he had sold warehouse receipts for whisky in bond to persons other than S. and collected the money, representing himself as Homer Marion, for the purpose of identifying him as the person indicted. Morse v. Commonwealth. 831
15. Same—Identification—Range of Evidence Allowed—Upon the trial of an indictment, when the defense is that it was not himself but another who committed the crime the evidence on behalf of the Commonwealth may be permitted to take a wide range for the purpose of developing the past history of the accused, and the names he has assumed, to the end that he may be identified as the person who committed the offense charged. But if, in the investigation, it should appear that the accused had been guilty of some other offenses the court should admonish the jury that they should consider such evidence only for the purpose of identification. Idem 831
16. Same—Evidence of Commonwealth—On the trial of one indicted as agent, for embezzling the money of a corporation, the Commonwealth must prove (1) that the accused was the agent of the corporation; (2) that as such agent, in the course of his employment, he received money for the corporation; (3) that he fraudulently converted the money so received to his own use. Idem . . . 832
17. Same—Guilty Intent—Evidence Showing—Acts Implying—It is not indispensable that the Commonwealth should introduce evidence to show guilty intent before a conviction can be secured for embezzlement. While such intent is a necessary ingredient and must be alleged in the indictment, the law will imply an intent from the acts of the accused when they are sufficient to establish his guilt. But the Commonwealth will not be permitted to prove that the accused has committed other and distinct crimes than the one for which he is being tried unless such evidence is necessary to establish the identity or guilty knowledge of the accused. Idem 832
18. Corporation—How Proven—On the trial of one for embezzling the money of a corporation the existence of the alleged corporation may be proven by parol evidence. Idem 832
19. Money Embezzled by Agent—Commission of Agent—Where one is shown to have embezzled money which he as agent collected for his employer, he can not be excused because he was entitled to a part of the money as his commission as such agent. Idem 832
20. Amount Charged—Proof of Less Sum—Sufficiency—One may be convicted for embezzlement although the evidence may show that the amount embezzled was less than the sum named in the indictment. Idem 832
21. Housebreaking—Evidence—Motion For New Trial—On the trial of appellant for housebreaking, there was but one question before the jury, and that was one of fact, and the evidence was sufficient to warrant their finding that appellant was guilty. Under section 281, Criminal Code, this court can not reverse for any matter arising on the motion for a new trial, and therefore, affidavits as to newly discovered evidence, filed after the trial, can not be considered on appeal. Thomas v. Commonwealth.	849

22. Indictments—Failing to Charge Intent—Acts Necessary at Common Law—The law looks not to form so much as substance, and when an indictment states concisely all of the acts necessary at common law to constitute the crime of murder, it is a good indictment for such. The failure of the indictment to charge that appellant shot deceased “with the intention of killing him” does not render it defective for the reason that it states all the facts constituting the offense with which he is charged, and the statements are sufficiently certain to enable the court to pronounce judgment of conviction. Hocker v. Commonwealth.	944
23. Evidence—Competency of—While it appears to this court that the testimony with reference to appellant’s intention to flee the country was immaterial, yet it was competent and it was the province of the jury to weigh and determine it. Idem	944
24. Same—Although he killed deceased with a gun, it was competent that he bought pistol cartridges an hour before the killing, on the theory that he was making preparations to kill deceased. Idem	944
25. Instructions—Each to Be Read in Connection with All The Others—Often the whole law can not be put into one instruction, and in such a case each instruction must be read in connection with all the others. When so read, in this case, the instructions aptly present the whole law of this case and particularly that of self-defense. Idem	944
26. Same—A number of authorities hold that the word “passion” includes anger and terror, therefore the court did not err in refusing to embody in the manslaughter instruction, that the killing was done in a sudden impulse of terror. Idem	944
DECEDENT’S ESTATES—
1. Estates—Settlement Of—Costs of Settlement—Payment Of—S. complains that the money realized from the sale of the real property, in this action to settle decedent’s estate, can not be taken to pay the costs of the settlement suit, and while this view as a principle is correct, it can not be applied here for the reason that the personalty realized more than enough to pay the costs, a part of which went to discharge a part of the prior mortgage debt. Appellant’s mortgage being inferior, can not complain of the judgment requiring him to pay the costs. (19 Ky. Law Rep., 1773.) Sumrall v. Vanarsdall’s Adm’r.	768
2. May be Brought as Soon as Representative Qualifies—The law is well settled in this State, that an action to settle the estate may be brought as soon as the personal representative qualifies. (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1366.) Appellant seeks to have her husband’s estate constituted a trust for her benefit because of his parol declaration just after he was shot and shortly before his death, and while the court properly held that she was not entitled to the whole of it, it was error to dismiss her action on the ground that she asked a settlement of the estate. McCandless, &c. v. McCandless, &c.	790

1. Cancellation of—Evidence—In this case, the evidence is examined and held that the deed was properly set aside. It was made under a misapprehension, and in view of the facts appearing, the lower court did not err in canceling it. Lockhart, &c. v. Buckner, &c. 678
2. Undue Influence—Evidence—Presumption of Law—There is an utter failure to show any undue influence or fraud in the execution of the deed. The law does not presume incapacity, fraud or undue influence, and when the deed has stood as long as this one (14 years) and has been acquiesced in by the grantor, the presumption in favor of the deed can only be overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence. Martin, &c. v. Stewart, &c...... 739

DOGS—See Taxation.

EASEMENTS—

- In Adjacent Wall—Prescription—One may acquire an easement in an adjacent wall by deed, or by prescription, which presumes a deed. Conceding that the wall stood upon appellees' lot when appellants came to rebuild their house, their easement was established and it included the right to repair or rebuild. Mann v. Reigler, &c. 774

ELECTRIC LIGHT WIRES—

1. Injury to Children—Elevations Beyond Danger—As long as electric light wires are not required to be put under ground, they must be put on poles, and where they are placed as high as eighteen feet above the street, the company should not be required to anticipate that children will climb up to them and get hurt and the company should not be held liable in such a case. Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb's Adm'r...... 909
2. Same—Trespassers—Risk Assumed—Children, as well as adults, when they trespass upon the property of another, take the risk, unless, the circumstances bring the case within the principle of what is known as the Turn Table cases, where a dangerous instrumentality is used that is attractive to children. Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb's Adm'r. 909

EMINENT DOMAIN—

1. Taking Private Property for Public Use—Jurisdiction of Courts—Whenever it is attempted, in the interest of a private corporation, to take private property and devote it to a public use, the question as to whether the use to which it is to be put is or not a public one, is for the court to decide, and an act of the Legislature which attempts to deprive the courts of jurisdiction in such a case would be inoperative and void. Henderson, &c. v. City of Lexington. 703
2. Cities—Right to Close Public Ways—Public Function—Discretion of Officials—Assumption—Burden of Proof—The streets, alleys and highways of a city are public places and under the exclusive control of the city and when the properly constituted authorities of the city declare that the welfare and convenience of the public demand that public ways shall be closed, it is exercising a public function as an agent and sub-division of the State and it will be assumed that the officers of the city, as public agents, will exercise such power with wisdom and discretion for the benefit of the public and that the proceeding is not for private or individual use or advantage, and the burden of showing the contrary is upon the person who objects to such proceeding. Idem	703

3. Same—Legislative Act—Constitutionality—Assumption of Court—The court will not assume that an act of the Legislature authorizing the closing of a street or alley of a city, in whole or in part, by the city council, is unconstitutional because it fails to provide that the question of public use was a matter to be judicially determined, and such act does not take from the courts the control of the subject. Idem	703
4. Same—Public Purpose—Jurisdiction of Courts—The question of the necessity, expediency or propriety of exercising the right of eminent domain for a public purpose, and the extent and manner of its exercise are questions of general public policy and belong to the legislative department, but when the corporation that is given this power attempts to exercise it, it is for the courts to say whether or not it is exercised for a public purpose. Idem	703
5. Act of City—Incidental Benefit to Others—Effect—The mere fact that a corporation or an individual might be interested or benefited by the taking of property by the city for its use, will not of itself deny the right of the city to exercise such power. Idem	704
6. Closing Alley—Action—Necessary Parties—In a proceeding to close a street or alley in a city, the only persons who are necessary parties thereto are those whose property abuts upon or adjoins the street or alley proposed to be closed, but in case of a fraudulent combination between these property owners and the city to close such highway, not in the interest of the public, not in the interest of the public but for private ends, the court might permit other persons not entitled to compensation to come in and resist the closing. Idem.....	704
7. Same—Trial—Separate Trials—In the matter of allowing separate trials in a proceeding to close an alley-way in a city, the discretion is largely in the trial judge. The amount of damages to which each of the parties is entitled can as well be assessed by a single jury as in separate trials by different juries. Idem	704
8. Same—Measure of Damages—Loss of Business—Difference in Market Value of Property—The measure of damages to which an owner of property abutting on an alley is entitled which has been closed by the city, does not include loss occasioned to his business. He is only entitled to compensation for loss sustained to his property which is the difference in its market value by reason of closing the alley, and where such damages have been assessed by a properly instructed jury, the verdict will not be disturbed. Idem	704

FISCAL COURTS—

- Order Levying Taxes—Failure to Specify—Purpose of Levy—Validity of Order—The following order of the Fiscal Court of Ohio county was made January 9, 1897: "On Motion of Esq. Wilson it is ordered that the county levy be the same the ensuing year as the preceding years—50 cts. on one hundred dollars worth of property and $1.50 poll tax on each poll." Held—That said order is void under sec. 180, of the Constitution, because it fails to specify for what purpose the said levy is made. C. O. & S. W. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth..... 882

FORFEITURE OF TITLE—See Lands, 4.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—

1. Affirmed on the Evidence—The case is affirmed on the evidence, which shows that appellant W., to avoid paying a judgment, fraudulently conveyed to his father-in-law, S., his farm and all his personal property for the recited consideration of $5,150, when in fact nothing was paid, which deed was set aside as fraudulent and without consideration and the property held subject to the judgment. Walker v. First Nat. Bank..... 753
2. Evidence—An examination of the facts of this record make it manifest that the conveyances complained of were fraudulent, and the lower court properly so held. Watson, &c. v. Watson's Trustee 760

GOVERNOR—See Special Counsel.

HOMESTEADS—

- Debtor and Creditor—Where a debtor is entitled to a homestead, his creditors can not have the land sold subject to the homestead right. Such a sale may be ordered after the death of the debtor, reserving the rights of his widow and children, but during his lifetime, the creditors can not demand that the land be sold subject to the homestead right. Under the evidence the lien was properly adjudged on the land in controversy. Louisville Fertilizer Co. v. Lorton, &c. 676

INJUNCTIONS—See Appeals, 5, 6; Natural Gas, 1—

1. Granting or Refusing—Discretion of Court—The granting or refusing of an injunction depends upon the facts of each particular case and rests in the sound discretion of the court. Somerset W., L. & T. Co. v. Hyde 866
2. Same—Public Interest—Public Inconvenience—Consideration—Where the interests of the public are to be taken into consideration by the court and when the issuance of an injunction will cause serious public inconvenience or loss without a correspondingly great advantage to the complainant, no injunction should be granted. Idem. 866
3. Same—Interests of Complainant—Where an injunction would have the effect of greatly injuring or inconveniencing the public it may be refused even though as against the defendant, the complainant would be entitled to its issuance. Idem 866
4. Application to Close Sewer—Long Continuance—Absence of Complaint—Damages Ascertainable—Refusal of Injunction—Where it is made to appear that a sewer in a city had been constructed for many years with the consent of the then owner of the property, that it was afterwards extended at the request of one of the joint owners of the property; that many years elapsed without any action looking to its abatement being taken, that its discontinuance would work a great hardship upon a large portion of the public in the city and would be a menace to the health of the inhabitants; that the injury to the plaintiffs is of a permanent character for which she may, in one action, recover for all damages past and present, the injunction sought was properly refused by the court.

Idem 866

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—

1. Liquor License—Discretion of County Court in Granting License—The county court has a discretion in granting tavern licenses, and unless it is shown, that that discretion has been abused, there is no cause of complaint. Schneider v. Commonwealth 770
2. Same—Appellant's license was regularly procured, the evidence is to the effect that he is a keeper of a tavern in good faith, and that there is a real necessity for a tavern at the place. The fact that he is charged in two cases of illegal sales of liquor does not show that appellant keeps a disorderly house. Idem 770
3. Shipping to Local Option Territory—Package—Quantity—Druggists—Under the act of March 21st, 1906, in reference to public or private carriers, or other persons bringing intoxicating liquors into local option territory in unbroken packages not to exceed five gallons at one time, a druggist, may have an unbroken package, not exceeding five gallons shipped to him, and at the same time a five gallon package of alcohol or wine to be used in his business as druggist. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth . . . 855
4. Same—Object of Act—Construction—Evasion—The purpose of the act was not to prevent the druggist from keeping up his stock but to prevent him from buying at any time, more than five gallons of any one intoxicant. If he should have more than one package of the same liquor shipped to him at one time, it would be an evasion of the act, but he may have as many packages as he needs of the different kinds shipped to him at the same time. Idem 855

JUDGMENTS—

1. Unsigned by Judge—Validity—Under section 390, of Civil Code, requiring the judgments of the court to be entered in the order book and section 378, Kentucky Statutes, requiring that the proceedings of each day shall be drawn up and read by the clerk, and signed by the presiding judge, it is indispensable to the validity of a judgment that it shall be entered on the order book of the court and signed by the judge who rendered the judgment, or by his successor or by the regular judge unless he is disqualified. Ewell, & Co. v. Jackson, & Co 673
2. Same—Delivery to Clerk—Entry of Record—Effect—A paper signed by a judge, although it contained the entire judgment and be delivered to the clerk of the court to enter upon the order book, is not a judgment in fact until it has been entered upon the order book of the court and signed by a judge. Idem 673
3. Same—Special Judge—Failure to Sign Record—Signature by Disqualified Judge—Validity—Section 977, Kentucky

Statutes, providing that "upon the death of a circuit judge, or when for any cause the office is vacant or when the judge is absent, his successor, no matter how chosen, may sign any orders left unsigned by his predecessor the same as his predecessor might have done," applies to special as well as regular judges. If a special judge on account of death or absence from the court or retirement from the case, should fail to sign the orders in a case in which he presided they may be signed by the special judge who succeeds him in the case or by the regular judge unless he was disqualified. But if the regular judge be disqualified to preside in the case, then his signature would not validate such judgment. Idem... 673

4. Unsigned Judgment—Execution Thereon—Validity—The defendants to an unsigned judgment may enjoin the sheriff from seizure and selling their property under an execution issued thereon. Idem 673

5. Judgment for Specific Property—(Renbaum v. Atkinson & Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 587, for a full discussion of this question.) The language of section 1665 is too plain to require construction. Wherever there is a variance between it and section 588, of the Code, the statute must prevail for it was enacted subsequently to the Code provision. Martin v. Ferguson 761

6. Void Because of Failure to Serve Process—The judgment adjudging appellee to be the owner of the land herein and directing its conveyance to him was void because the heirs of the deceased owner were not made parties, though they were necessary parties and were not before the court, process not having been served upon them. The judgment does not recite that the parties were before the court. Cox, &c. v. Fowler 928

7. Same—A judgment taken when there has been no service of process, and the defendant has not entered his appearance, is absolutely void. Idem..... 928

JURY TRIALS—

1. Actions—Equitable Issues—Right of Jury Trial—Discretion of Chancellor—The absolute right to have issues in an equity case tried by a jury is confined to issues which are purely legal in their character. Where issues are of equitable cognizance it is within the discretion of the chancellor whether he will order a jury to aid him in finding of the facts. Barnes v. Johnson 803
2. Same—Action to Cancel Deed—Consideration—Issues—In this action to cancel deed, Held—That the plaintiff failed to establish the allegation that there was no consideration for the deed or that the deed was intended for a mortgage and that the chancellor did not err in refusing to submit the case to a jury. Idem 803

LANDS—

1. Divisional Lines—Creek Changing Its Course—The proof shows that the line in controversy has existed and been acquiesced in for more than thirty years. It can not now be disturbed; if the creek has changed its course it has been gradual, and the line has followed the thread of it. It is not a sudden change of bed as by a freshet. Pack v. Stepp, &c 677

LANDS—Continued—

Page.

2. Processioners—Report of—Prima Facie Evidence—Section 2374, Kentucky Statutes, provides that the report of processioners shall be prima facie evidence against and between the parties, and the report in this action would have been sufficient to defeat appellant's claim if there had been no other evidence introduced, but the proof shows that she owns the land in controversy, and that the length of the lines stated in the deed were made by oversight, resulting in the controversy. Lee v. Wheat..... 724
3. Same—Under the provisions of section 2128, Kentucky Statutes, the husband can not deprive the wife of her land or any interest therein by a conveyance made by him, and appellant did not sign the agreement upon which the report of the processioners was based. Idem 724
4. Failure to List for Taxation—Forfeiture of Title—Act of March 15, 1906, Kentucky Legislature—Constitutionality—The questions involved in this action have heretofore been fully considered in former appeals of Eastern Kentucky Coal Lands Corporation v. Commonwealth. (32 Ky. Law Rep., 129), and Ky. Union Company v. Commonwealth, decided March 25, 1908, to which reference is made. In conformity with those opinions we hold that article three of the act of the Kentucky Legislature of March 15, 1900, as construed by this court, does not violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution denying the passage by any State of ex post facto laws, or laws impairing the obligations of contracts, or laws denying in any person the equal protection of the law or depriving any person of his property without due process of law. Eastern Ky. Coal Lands Corp. v. Commonwealth 867
5. Adverse Possession—Contiguous to Home Place—The question involved here is one of adverse possession. The land in controversy was embraced in a tract conveyed to M. in 1883, and adjoined his home tract of which he was in possession. He had the tracts surveyed and boundary marked so as to include the land in controversy. Held—That the land being contiguous to his home place, and being surrounded by a well defined, marked boundary, it was not necessary for him to make a new entry. Upon acquiring it, it immediately extended to the whole boundary. Overton, &c. v. Perry, Jr., &c...... 931
6. Same—M., in 1888, conveyed to appellants, who from that time have occupied it by an agent and exercised undisputed ownership over it. They are, therefore, entitled to have their title to the land quieted. Idem..... 931

LANDLORD AND TENANT—

1. One who takes possession from a tenant can make no defense against the landlord which the tenant could not make. Hardwick, Sr., &c. v. Karn..... 776
2. Same—Equity—(28 Ky. Law Rep., 615.) Hardwick was awarded a writ of possession against Smith, his tenant. K. can not take possession of the property from Hardwick's tenant and then enjoin Hardwick from enforcing the writ of possession which had obtained against the tenant. If the gift by K. to his daughter was void he may assert his right to the land in a proper action. Idem.... 776
3. Forcible Entry and Detainer—Statute of Frauds—Appellant does not show himself entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy. His contract was one not to be performed within a year, was not in writing and was void.

Moore v. Terrell 822

LIBEL—

1. Actions For—What Petition Should Charge—Publication in Newspaper—Where the effect of a publication in a newspaper is to hold a person up to contempt and ridicule, it is not necessary that the petition in an action seeking damages for a libelous publication should allege that the bringing of a suit without authority was unprofessional. When the article complained of charged appellee with bringing an unauthorized suit, the libel was complete. Register Newspaper Co. v. Worten..... 840
2. Same—Libelous Character of Publication—A publication referring to one as “the lawyer, a fellow with a license to practice,” and containing the charge that such person is the friend and companion of criminals is libelous, and a demurrer to the paragraph of the petition pleading it was properly overruled. Idem 840
3. Same—Charge in Publication That Attorney Solicited Business—The fact that it is unprofessional for a lawyer to solicit business is not only recognized by the bar, but by the public, and a newspaper publication containing such a charge is libelous. Idem 840
4. Pleading—Part of Publication Pleaded—In pleading a libelous publication, it is only necessary for the plaintiff to set out that part of publication which he considers libelous. He makes out his case when he proves the publication of the libelous matter. Idem..... 840
5. Same—Instructions—After setting out the alleged libelous articles, the instructions directed the jury to find against the defendants unless they believed from the evidence that all of said publication were true, or in substance true. Held—That the words “or in substance true,” were sufficient to exclude from the consideration of the jury all immaterial statements of fact having no real bearing upon the case. (Louisville Press Company v. Tenny, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1231.) Idem..... 840

LICENSE TAXES—

Hotels—Restaurants—License—Tax Required—Changed From “American Plan” to “European Plan”—Liability to Double Tax—Under the statute requiring first-class hotels to pay a license of $150 per year, and a like tax on all restaurants or eating houses where the yearly sales amount to $50,000, the fact that a first-class hotel changed its plan of serving meals from the “American Plan” to the “European Plan” would not make it amenable to a license tax of $150 for the hotel and separate tax of $150 for keeping a restaurant, where all the meals are served from the same table. New Galt House Co. v. City of Louisville.... 869

LIFE INSURANCE—

MASTER AND SERVANT—

1. Injury to Servant—Negligence of Master—Safe Place to Work—Verdict—New Trial—Appeal—John E. Nolan, in a trial before a jury, was given a verdict for $1,085 damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of his employer in not furnishing him a safe place in which to work. The trial court set aside the verdict and granted defendant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was excessive, to which he excepted and prayed for an appeal. Before the second trial, he died. The action was revived in the name of his administrator and on the second trial, a verdict was rendered for the defendant. This appeal is prosecuted by the administrator to review the first verdict and judgment granting the defendant a new trial. Nolan's Adm'r v. Stand. Sanitary Mfg. Co. 745
2. Same—Excessive Verdict—Burning by Molten Metal—Cripple for Life—Pain and Suffering—Lost Time—Where, on the trial of an action, by a servant, against his master for an injury caused by not furnishing him a safe place to work, made so by the negligence of the foreman, in causing another laborer to dig a trench near where the plaintiff was at work, in doing which he struck a ladle containing molten metal, which the plaintiff was carrying, causing it to splash upon his leg and foot, burning both severely, causing him great suffering and pain and the loss of three months time from his work, and making him a partial cripple for life, a verdict of $1,085 was not excessive. Idem 745
3. New Trials—Discretion in Granting—Review—While the circuit court has a broad discretion in granting new trials, its exercise is subject to review and where it is made manifest that it erred in the exercise of such discretion, it is the duty of this court to correct the error. It is with great reluctance that this court will interfere with a verdict on the ground that it is excessive and the circuit court should be equally reluctant to do so. Idem 745
4. Reversing First Judgment—Entry of First Verdict Ordered—Wherefore, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set aside the last verdict and judgment and in lieu thereof to enter of record the first verdict returned by the jury and enter judgment in conformity therewith. Idem 745
5. Liability of Master—Where the master directs an employe to enter a dangerous place to work and the employe complies with the order and is injured, he can recover from the master unless the danger was so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not have undertaken the work even though ordered to, do so by the master. *I. to recover in this action for damages as the result of his injuries except as he tendered and offered to return the amount paid him before the action, but this rule does not apply to a settlement which only includes loss of time. Idem 933

- MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—See Criminal Law, 13.
- MINES AND MINING—
1. Actions—Continuances—Correcting Error in Name of Party—Where the real defendant to an action is before the court, a verbal error in the name of the defendant and correction thereof, whether it be a corporation or an individual, will not of itself be grounds for a continuance. Stern's Coal Co. v. Evans' Adm'r 757
 2. Foul Air—Death of Miner—Action for Damages—Evidence—Competency—Statutory Provision—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 2731, providing for keeping fresh air in coal mines, on the trial of an action against a coal company for damages for negligently causing the death of a miner by reason of the explosion of foul air therein, evidence was competent, that a fan located on the outside, near the mouth, used to furnish pure and fresh air in the mine, was often, before the explosion, stopped and not in running order, and that the mine boss knew of this condition of the fan. Idem 757
 3. Same—This statute (section 2731), and every statute intended for the protection of laborers engaged in the hazardous business of coal mining, should be rigidly enforced and mine owners held to a strict accountability in the performance of these statutory duties. Idem 757
- MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—
1. Cities Enacting Ordinances—Constitutional Requirements—Applicability—Kentucky Constitution, section 46, requiring three readings of a bill on three separate days in each house of the Legislature before its passage, and, on its final passage, to receive the votes of at least two-fifths of the members elected to each house, applies only to an act of the State Legislature, and is not applicable to an ordinance enacted by a city council. Cumb. Tel'p & Tel. Co. v. City of Hickman 730
 2. Telephone Franchise—Granted by City Council—Authority Conferred—A franchise to operate a telephone exchange in a city, which the city may grant, is not the same thing as a franchise granted by the State. As to the latter, the right to exist as a corporate being, to exercise eminent domain, to carry on a business of a quasi public nature which is conferrable by sovereignty only, may be said to constitute a franchise, but none of these rights can be given by a municipal corporation. Idem 731
 3. Franchise—Ordinance Granting—Installing Telephone—Validity—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 3636, part of charter of cities of the fifth class, providing that no ordinance granting any franchise for any purpose shall be passed by the city council on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, nor at any other than a regular meeting, "an ordinance of a city defining a franchise for the installing of a telephone therein, providing for competitive bids introduced at a regular meeting of the council held more than five days before the passage of the ordinance, conferred a valid franchise on the bidder."

Idem	731
4. Action—Relief Demanded—Alternative Prayer—Under section 90, Civil Code, providing "if no defense be made the plaintiff can not have judgment for any relief not specifically demanded," where, in an action by a city against a telephone company for a violation of its franchise, the city asked that the company be required to remove its poles and wires from the streets, or if this could not be done, then that it be enjoined from charging its customers more than the amount fixed in the franchise, the defendant is not taken unawares if it confesses the petition when the court decides to grant either alternative of the prayer. Idem	731
5. Same—Action—Who May Sue—Remedy—In an action by a city against a telephone company for a failure to comply with its contract to build and operate a telephone therein, thereby connecting it with other cities, the city may sue for the enforcement of the contract made in its behalf, or one or more of its citizens may sue, but the remedy at law in behalf of the citizen is inadequate. The appropriate remedy was an action for its specific performance. Idem	731
6. Streets—Re-construction Of—Injury to Person in Crossing Street—Damages—Appellee, in crossing one of appellant's streets stumbled over a pile of brick that had been left following the re-construction of the street, injuring herself. It was a bright, sunshiny day, she knew the bricks were in the street and saw them as she attempted to cross it. Upon the trial for damages for the injury, there should have been a peremptory instruction directing the jury to find for the city. City Glasgow v. Crisp	768
7. Same—While it is true that persons have a right to walk across the street at all points where it can be done with safety, no one, knowing of the danger, has a right to wantonly cast himself upon it and then demand damages for the injury received as a result of his own negligence. Idem	768
8. Streets—Grades of—Damage to Property by Grading—A lot owner is not entitled to recover from a city for damage to his lot because of the original grading of the street, where the grade has not theretofore been fixed. The grade of the streets must be presumed to have been taken into consideration when the land was dedicated or acquired by condemnation. The case of City of Owensboro v. Hope, 33 Ky. Law Rep., ante, is conclusive of this question. City of Owensboro v. Singleton	775
9. Sprinkling Streets—Taxing Abutting Property Therefor—Validity of City Ordinance—The question for consideration in this case is, has the General Assembly of the State the power to enact a law "giving cities" the right to adopt ordinances imposing upon property abutting on the streets and public places of the city, a tax based upon the frontage of property, for the purpose of defraying the cost of sprinkling the streets and public places upon which the property abuts? City of Owensboro v. Sweeney	823

10. Constitution — Limitations — Arbitrary Power — Taxation Without Corresponding Benefit—While there is no limitation in the Constitution, upon the power to levy improvement taxes nor any definition of what an "improvement tax" is, it does not follow from this that the Legislature is so absolutely supreme that its authority can not be questioned. Arbitrary power exists nowhere in this republic. There is a line at which the power to tax and take for special assessments must stop, and in this character of assessments we may safely say that it must stop when it goes beyond real and substantial benefits to the abutting property distinct from those enjoyed by the public. Idem 823
11. Special taxes can not be levied unless the property charged receives a corresponding physical, material and substantial benefit from the exaction, upon the ground that it is an attempt to take private property without just compensation in violation of the Constitution, and we hold that sprinkling streets does not confer a special benefit upon the adjacent property in the sense of contributing to its value and hence a special tax for this purpose can not be maintained. Idem 823
12. a city ordinance providing for the sprinkling of streets, at the expense of abutting lot owners, the cost being made a lien upon the abutting lots, according to their frontage on the street, is unconstitutional and void. (City of Henderson v. Sweeney, decided June 17, 1908.) McCormick v. City of Henderson 854
13. Second Class Cities—Superintendent of Streets—Appointment of Street Overseer—Under section 3118, Kentucky Statutes, part of charter of cities of the second class, authorizing the mayor to appoint a superintendent of public works, subject to the approval of the board of aldermen providing that "he can not undertake any improvement or perform any work or make any appointments until said work and improvements * * * and the number and compensation of the employes shall have been fixed by ordinance" it was intended to confer upon the superintendent the right to appoint the employes connected with the improvement of the street, subject to the approval of the council. But while this discretion is lodged in the council it can not take away from the superintendent the naming of the persons he is authorized to employ or appoint. Board of Aldermen City of Covington v. City of Covington 880
14. Towns and Cities—Street Improvements — Apportionment Warrant — Assignment — The lot owner having failed to make the improvement required by ordinance, the work was let to James Lillis. In this action by the city against the owner to enforce the lien, he defends on the ground that the work was done by Ed. Lillis and that he assigned the apportionment warrant to Collins and that the title did not pass. Held—That these parties worked together, sometimes taking contracts in the name of one and then in the name of the other, the city discharged a debt appellant owed and is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the person to whom it paid the money. Nickels v. City of Frankfort 918

NATURAL GAS—
1. Actions—Injunction and Damages—Separate Actions—Bar—While an action for injunctive relief and for damages may be joined, they are separate and distinct causes of action and the plaintiff may elect to prosecute each by a separate action, and the fact that he prosecuted an action for an injunction does not bar a subsequent action for damages resulting from the injury he sought to enjoin. Louisville Gas Co. v. Ky. Heating Co.	912
2. Rival Companies—Owning Adjacent Territory—Damages for Wasting Gas Supply—Appellee, Kentucky Heating Company, owned a natural gas well in Meade county and conveyed its product in pipes to Louisville for sale. Appellant, Louisville Gas Company, manufactured gas in Louisville for sale therein and also owned a gas well in Meade county, adjacent to the well of appellee. Appellee, in an action in equity, obtained an injunction against appellant from wasting the Meade county gas by burning it in a pretended effort to make lamp-black, and in subsequent action obtained a judgment for $60,000 in damages for wasting the gas in the Meade county gas territory from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the burden was on the appellee to make out its case, and it must do this by evidence other than the finding of the jury in the equity case which was incompetent in this action. Idem.	912
3. Same—Gas Reservoir—Reservoir of Adjacent Owners—Wasting Gas Supply—Measure of Damages Recoverable—The right of surface owners to take gas from subjacent fields or reservoirs is a right in common. There is no property in the gas until it is taken. The right of owners of the surface to take it is only limited by its being taken for a lawful purpose and in a reasonable manner, but any unlawful exercise of this right which results in injury to the natural right of any other tenant in common is an actional wrong, and in such case the measure of damages is the difference in money at the point where taken between the value of the natural flow of the gas and that of the diminished flow directly and independently of all other causes attributable to the wrong. Idem.	912
4. Same—Punitive Damages—When Recoverable—In an action by a surface owner against a like owner for damages for wasting the gas under their common territory there can be no recovery for punitive damages unless it is shown that the defendant willfully wasted the gas or acted maliciously with a design to injure the plaintiff's business, in which case punitive damages may be recovered. Idem.	912
5. Same—Argument to Jury—Discretion of Counsel—In an ordinary action no argument should be permitted in making the opening statement to the jury by counsel, but counsel may, with propriety, in the closing argument, discuss such facts as are in evidence without limit or restriction so long as he confines himself to the evidence and its application to the law as given by the court. Idem	912

OFFICE AND OFFICER—

1. Action on Bond of Town Marshal—Unlawful Arrest—Necessary Parties—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest, the town is not a necessary party and is not liable for the wrongful acts of such officer, and can not protect such officer by refusing to join in an action with and for the benefit of a person injured by the wrongful acts of its officials. Commonwealth, For, &c. v. Teel, &c..... 741
2. Same—Necessary Allegations—Penalty Recoverable—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest it is not necessary to allege in the petition that the city council had, by an ordinance, fixed a penal sum to be named in the bond, for, if the plaintiff recovers, he is not limited by the amount of the penalty named in the bond. Idem 741
3. Same—Approval of Bond by City Council—In an action on the official bond of a town marshal for damages for an unlawful arrest, the petition is not demurrable because it fails to allege that the bond was approved by the city council, nor is it demurrable because there is no averment that the plaintiff had not committed any offense authorizing his arrest. Idem 741
4. Damages — Recoverable Against Sureties — In an action against a town marshal and his sureties on his official bond for damages for an unlawful arrest, the plaintiff should not be permitted to recover against the sureties anything more than compensatory damages. Idem 741
5. Jailers—Fees Allowed—Ordinances of Second Class Cities —Diverting Fees—Public Policy—By Kentucky Statutes, section 3145, part of charter of second class cities, the compensation of jailers of such cities is fixed at not less than $1,500 nor more than $2,500 per annum. Section 1730, Kentucky Statutes, allows certain compensation for dieting prisoners and other fees. By an ordinance of the city of N. (a second class city), the salary of the jailer was fixed at $1,800, payable in monthly installments, and provided that the jailer shall account to the city at 20 cents per day for each prisoner other than those from said city. Held—That where a city fixes the fees of a jailer for more than $1,500 the jailer must look to his fees for the sum so fixed in excess of $1,500, as it would be contrary to public policy to permit the city to divert to its own use the fees allowed for taking care of persons other than its own. City Newport v. Ebert..... 820

PARTNERSHIPS—See Attorneys at Law, 1—

Notice to Partner—(32 Ky. Law Rep., 1078)—There being no evidence that M. was a partner of O. in the purchase of the timber involved in this controversy, that part of the former opinion in this case embodying that idea, is withdrawn. While notice to one partner is notice to the other of any transaction occurring after the formation of the partnership, it appears that the parties were not partners at the time O. conveyed the timber. Miller v. Jones. 848

PASSWAYS—	Page.
1. Long Use—Presumption of Right—Where a passway has been used without interruption for a long number of years, the presumption will be indulged that its use is a matter of right. McCauley v. Twyman, &c.	692
2. Same—Adjoining Lands—Agreed Passway—Long Recognized—Effect—Where two brothers owning adjoining tracts of land, in order to straighten their lines, made a passway between them, each surrendering to the other a parcel of land on his side of the passway, and so recognized the passway as their dividing line for forty years, such passway controls, and their fences should be adjusted accordingly. Idem.	692
3. Long Use—Evidence to Establish—Burden of Proof—The law is now well settled in this State that, where the use of a passway extends over a long period of years, very slight evidence will be sufficient to show that it was enjoyed as a matter of right, and when the proprietor undertakes to close it the burden is on him to show that the use was merely permissive and not a claim of right. Evans v. Cook, &c.	788
4. Same—Obstruction—Erecting Gates—Points of Entry and Exit—Failure to Show—Statutory Fine—Where gates were erected across a passway that has been used and claimed as a matter of right for more than fifteen years by the public, the burden is on the owner of the land through which it runs to show that they were erected at the points where it enters and leaves his premises, and failing to do this the gates are an obstruction, for which he is liable to a fine under Kentucky Statutes, section 4354. Idem.	788
5. Permissive Use—Rights Conferred—Where the use of a passway is merely permissive on the part of the owner, a privilege extended to his neighbors without any intention to surrender his right to it, or purpose on their part to assert claim, and no act or conduct by either indicating that such use was other than a neighborly act, such use, even for fifty years, would not confer the right to claim it against the owner, or prohibit him from closing it. Berea College v. Burnell, &c.	796
6. Presumption of Grant—The unexplained and uninterrupted use of a passway for a long number of years carries with it the presumption of a grant, and the burden of overcoming this presumption rests upon the land owner to show that the use has been merely permissive. Goldberg, &c. v. Cleveland, &c.	953
7. Grant—Adverse Use Of—General Use of—The general use of this passway by the traveling public for more than thirty years carries with it the presumption of a grant and the continuous, uninterrupted and adverse use by appellees ripened into a right of which they can not be deprived. Idem.	953

- coaches, including its windows and doors, in proper condition. The question as to the falling of the window on appellee's hand was a simple one of fact, submitted to the jury in such manner that they could not mistake the law applicable to the case. C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Lorton. 689
2. Continuance—Bill of Exceptions—The record does not disclose, except the affidavit made in connection with the motion for a new trial, that a continuance was asked because of the absence of a witness, therefore, it can not be said what error was made in this respect. But it appears that the necessary steps to procure the attendance of the witness were not taken. Idem...... 689
3. Going With State Guards to Inauguration—Volunteer—Illness From Filthy Car—Action for Damages—Grounds for Recovery—One not a member of the State Guards who volunteered to go with a company of State Guards to the inauguration of the Governor is not entitled to damages against the railroad company for illness alleged to have been caused by being compelled to ride in a car that was not properly lighted or heated or not furnished with drinking water or by reason of the noisome and filthy condition of the car, as he was not a member of the guards he had the right at any time to leave the car and go into another without being subjected to military discipline therefor. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Scalf...... 721
4. Action Against—Improper Remark to Jury by Counsel—The objection to the improper remark of counsel complained of was sustained and the jury admonished to disregard it, and this was all that was necessary under the circumstances. L., H. & St. L. Ry. Co., &c. v. McDonald. 762
5. The answer of the Louisville Railway was properly permitted to be read as evidence against it. Its evidence was not rendered incompetent because appellee's counsel subsequently took the position that no blame could be attached to it. (For a full statement of the facts and circumstances in the matter of the collision in which appellee was injured, see 31 Ky. Law Rep., 617.) Idem...... 762
6. Pleading—Private Crossings—(L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Emerson, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1149, for the facts of this case.) The provisions of the Kentucky Statutes, relating to farm crossings, did not have the effect to repeal the provision in appellant's charter relating to such crossings. The petition seems sufficient to support the judgment; it does not appear that any demurrer was filed to it, and where objection is made that a private statute is not properly pleaded, it should be done by special demurrer. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Robbins...... 778
7. Railroads—Children Stealing Rides—Legal Duty of Company—Actional Negligence—There is no legal duty devolving on railroads to prevent children of tender years from stealing rides by jumping on passing trains in cities or towns. Where there is no legal duty there can be no actional negligence. Swartwood's Gdn. v. L. & N. R. R. Co., &c...... 785
8. Same—Trespassers—Duty Owing to Company—All persons who venture upon a railroad train unbidden by the company and unknown to it, do so at their own peril, and as they have no right, the company owes them no duty in

- such cases. This rule applies without respect to the age or condition of the trespasser. Idem..... 785
9. Invitation to Children to Play on Lot—Stealing Rides—Proximate Cause of Injury—The fact that a railroad company had a pile of sand on an open lot, near its track, on which children sometimes played, does not render the company liable to damages in an action by a child who ran from the sand pile and jumped on a passing train to steal a ride and was thereby injured. The sand pile had no connection with the injury, and was not the proximate cause of it. Idem..... 785
10. Volunteer—Riding On Freight Train—Where one voluntarily performs services upon a freight train on which he is riding, with the knowledge of the conductor, without having paid compensation, he can not be considered as a passenger, or as an employe, but may be classed as a volunteer. Clarke v. L. & N. R. R. Co...... 797
11. Same—Injury to Volunteer—Performing Services—Knowledge of Engineer—Care Required—Recovery—Where a volunteer riding on a freight train, received an injury in attempting to couple the engine to the cars, with the knowledge of the engineer, the only duty the servants of the company owed him was to exercise ordinary care to prevent injuring him, and, to entitle him to recover damages for an injury so incurred, there must be evidence conducing to show that the engineer failed to exercise ordinary care in handling his engine at the time he was injured. Idem..... 797
12. Death Caused by Collision of Trains—Action Against Both Railroads—Verdict Against One—Wrong Name Given in Verdict—Judgment Thereon—Validity—H. D. was killed in a collision between the trains of the P., C., C. & St. Louis Ry. Co. and the L. & N. R. R. Co. In an action by his administratrix against both roads the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find a verdict for the plaintiff to the amount of ten thousand dollars, and fix the blame on the Pennsylvania Railroad Company." The Pennsylvania Railroad Company was not a party to the action, but the evidence showed that the defendant, P., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., though a separate corporation was a subsidiary corporation of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and was, on the trial, called by the latter name. Held—That the lower court properly rendered a judgment on the verdict against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Co., sometimes called the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. P., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Darlington, Adm'x. 818
13. Same—Verdict of Jury—Intent—Duty of Court in Ascertaining—The intent of a jury is to be sought in the language they use in their verdict in the light of the record, and resort may be had to the pleadings and other parts of the record to see what the jury meant by their verdict. The court is at liberty, in the absence of a stenographic report, to consult his recollection of the evidence, as well as the file of the court, in order to understand what the jury meant by their verdict. Idem..... 818
14. Action Against Two Defendants—Verdict as to One—Effect as to the Other—Where two defendants are sued and the jury returns a verdict against one of them the effect of the verdict is to release the other. Idem..... 818

15. Injury to Pedestrian on Track—Run Over by Hand Car—Evidence—Incompetency—On the trial of an action against a railroad for damages by one run over by a hand car, while walking on a railroad track, evidence that the foreman told the men in charge of the hand car to make a quick trip was incompetent as the mere direction to make a quick trip is not evidence of excessive speed. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Berry	850
16. Lookout Duty—Incompetent Men—Defective Appliance—Wherever a lookout duty is imposed, the further duty is imposed to have the train properly manned and properly equipped. A lookout duty would avail nothing, if, because of incompetent men or defective machinery, and appliances, the train or car could not be stopped. Idem.	850
17. Same—Punitive Damages—Erroneous Instructions—In an action for damages by one injured by being run over by a hand-car while walking on a railroad track, the instructions were erroneous that did not impose on the plaintiff the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety, and an instruction authorizing punitive damages is erroneous where there was no evidence tending to show gross negligence in the railroad company's employes. Idem.	851
18. Obstructing Public Highways—Piling Freight Therein—Frightening Horse in Buggy—Injury to Occupant—Damages Recoverable—A pile of sixty sacks of ship stuff out on a pike is calculated to frighten a horse, and where a railroad company received and piled up sixty sacks of ship stuff at a flag station, where it had no depot, extending the pile out to the center of the pike, at which a horse, in a buggy, took fright, throwing out and injuring the occupant, the company was properly held to be liable in damages for the injury inflicted. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Blackaby ...	855
19. Collision of Trains—Injury to Flagman—Negligence of Company—Contributory Negligence of Employee—A caboose on a work train is the proper place for the flagman of such train to ride. Where a work train which was loaded with railroad track rails, was run into by a freight train, it was not negligence of the flagman to jump off from the rear end of the caboose and the fact that he was injured by the loose rails on the flat car being driven against him in attempting to escape from the caboose did not make him guilty of contributory negligence preventing his recovery for damages against the railroad company whose negligence had placed him in peril. I. C. R. R. Co. v. Vaughan .	906
20. Same—Evidence—Resumption of Work—Discharge—Cause—In an action by a flagman for damages for an injury in a collision of trains where he testified that he resumed work for the company after he had partially recovered from his injury but was discharged because of his inability to work on account of his injury, it was competent for the company to prove that he was discharged for inebriety and not for inability to labor otherwise. Idem	906
21. Same—Evidence—Contract of Settlement—Meaning—Instructions to Jury—Where, in an action by an employe against a railroad company for damages for an injury, a written contract was introduced in evidence, purporting to be a complete settlement of plaintiff's entire claim, the

court should have told the jury that such a writing alone must be looked to for the meaning of the parties, if an intent may be gathered from its terms; and its intent is governed solely by the law and not at all by the mental consideration of one of the parties to it; there being no plea of mistake. Idem	906
22. Same—Accepting Compensation—Tender Before Suit—Where, in an action for damages by an employe, against the railroad company, a written compromise of settlement was pleaded by the company for the entire claim which the plaintiff claims was intended for and was accepted by him solely for his lost time caused thereby, he was not required to tender back the money he claims was paid for lost time, but if he recovers in his action he should be required to account for the money he received. Idem	906
23. Evidence—Pleadings of Adverse party—Competency—Where there is no admission of fact in the pleadings of the defendant against its interest, they were not competent to be read on the trial as evidence for the plaintiff. Idem	906
24. Carriers—Principal and Agent—Contracts—The principal who accepts the benefit of a contract made for himself by his agent not only ratifies the action of the agent, but the ratification relates back to the beginning, and it has been held by this court, in a number of cases, that the second carrier, when it accepts stock from the initial carrier, is bound by the contract made with it. Richardson v. L. & N. R. R. Co.	916
25. Limitation—The plea of limitation can not be sustained because the contract was in writing and within the meaning of section 2514, Kentucky Statutes. Idem	916
26. Injury to Person Crossing Track—Gross Negligence—There can be no recovery by appellant in this action for the death of his decedent for the reason that deceased was injured at a place where she had no right to be, and where the railroad company was not required to anticipate that any one might be between the cars. The act of deceased in attempting to pass between the cars was one of gross negligence. Bracket's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co.	921
27. Duty of Railroad Company—Presence of Persons About Stations—While it is the duty of the railroad companies to anticipate the presence of persons about their stations when a train is arriving, and to use ordinary care for their safety, this rule does not extend to persons who pass between cars where no invitation has been held out for them to do so. Idem	921
28. Action against For Damages—Shipment of Goods—Injury To—Defective Car—In this action against appellant for damages to appellee's goods which it is alleged appellant transported to it in such defective car as that they were damaged, appellant sought to avoid liability on the ground that it did not know of the condition of the car, but that the shipper of the goods did, and that appellant had no right or power to inspect the car. Held—That a demurrer was properly sustained to this plea. A railroad, as a common carrier, is an insurer of goods entrusted to it

- for transportation and must provide proper cars. The owner of the goods is not required to see that the cars are suitable or safe. He is required to show the loss of his goods. C., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Louisville Tin & Stove Co. 924

RECEIVERS—See Attorneys-at-Law, 2.SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—

1. Levy of Taxes to Build Schoolhouse—Power of Trustees—Any indebtedness in excess of the income and revenue for any year is void under section 157, Constitution, but the county superintendent, having made the levy to build the schoolhouse, the trustees of the school district had the right to make the levy and allow the fund to accumulate until it amounted to a sufficient sum to warrant them in undertaking the building of the schoolhouse. They had a right to make a levy in 1903, another in 1904, and then wait until 1905 to make another levy to build the schoolhouse. Trustees, &c. v. Cummins, &c. 739
2. Graded Common Schools—District Established for Seventeen years—County Superintendent—Refusal of Pro Rata to District—Where a graded school district has been established and recognized for seventeen years as such without question, either by the State or county officials, or others, the county superintendent of schools can not refuse to pay over to the treasurer of such school district the pro rata to it from the common school fund, on the ground of an alleged defect in the election proceedings by which such district was established as a graded school. McDonald, &c. v. Parker, &c. 805
3. Same—Employing Teachers Without Certificates—Gratuitous Services—A college known as Union College, which belonged to the Methodist church, was burned, near Barbourville, in August, 1906. The professors of said college (including two young lady teachers, who had no certificates of qualification and who made no charge for their services), were employed by the trustees of a graded common school district to teach said district school for the year 1906. Held—That while the statute forbids the employment, as teachers in the common schools, of persons who do not hold certificates showing them competent to teach, it does not forbid the trustees from accepting the aid of teachers whose services are given gratuitously. Idem. 805
4. Same—Employing Teachers from Denominational College—Constitutional Inhibition—Where a denominational college was destroyed by fire, the fact that the trustees of a graded common school district employed the faculty of said college to teach its school for that year, is not a violation of section 189, of the Constitution, forbidding "the appropriation of any fund raised or levied for educational purposes to be used by or in aid of any church, sectarian or denominational school," the said teachers at the time having no connection with the burned college. Idem... 805

Section 127 provides that, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, the county attorney shall attend to all of the Commonwealth's business in circuit court. Where, upon the application of many good citizens of the city, the Governor was urged to enforce the Sunday closing law in the city of Louisville, he called upon the Commonwealth's attorney to enforce the law, who declined to do so and the county attorney offered to do so with the assistance of employed counsel, the Governor had a right to employ a competent attorney to assist the county attorney in enforcing said law, and agree, with him for compensation therefor. *James, Auditor v. 2. Enforcement of Law—Duty of Governor—It is the policy of the Commonwealth to see that the laws are enforced and this is the proper duty of the executive who acts through officials subordinate to himself. Idem..... 872
3. Same—The primary object of the statute in authorizing special counsel is to see that the State's interests are properly looked after, and in the management of the State's civil suits, the county attorney, in the absence of the Commonwealth's attorney, is clothed with all his authority, and to say that the Governor can employ special counsel to assist the latter and not the former, would place it in the power of the Commonwealth's attorney, in declining to act, to prevent the employment of special counsel, no matter how urgent the need therefor might be. Idem. 872
4. Public Offenses—Statutory Provisions—Construction—Section 11, of the Criminal Code, provides that "public offenses of which the only punishment is a fine, may be prosecuted by a penal action in the name of the Commonwealth. * * * which trials are regulated by the Code of Practice in civil actions." Section 118, Kentucky Statutes, expressly authorizes the employment of counsel in civil actions. Where a statute is capable of two constructions, one of which is calculated to defeat the ends of justice and the other would be in furtherance thereof, the latter will be adopted. Idem..... 872
5. Question Involved—The importance of litigation to the State can not be measured by the amount involved in the controversy; especially is this true where the State is fighting to enforce a principle rather than making an effort to recover money. Idem..... 872
6. Action for Penalty—Civil Code Controls—In a proceeding where a penalty only is sought to be recovered, the action is civil and is tried according to the Civil Code, although no answer, other than the plea of "not guilty," is required of the defendant. Idem..... 872
7. Commonwealth—Anomalous Position—Enforcing Law—Civil Actions—The Commonwealth in this case occupies an anomalous position. She elected to proceed against the violators of the Sunday closing law, by civil suits, and the Governor, believing that the best interests of the State demanded that special counsel be employed to assist in their prosecution, arranged with appellee to render the Commonwealth certain service. Under his employment he rendered valuable service. Now, when he asks for his compensation, he is met with the answer that, although he was employed to bring civil suits and

- did so, that the suits were not in fact civil. In our opinion, the suits instituted by appellee were civil suits and the Governor acted within the scope of his authority under section 118, of the Kentucky Statutes, and the judgment of the lower court enforcing the contract is affirmed. Idem. 872
- SPECIAL JUDGES—See Judgments.
- STATE TREASURY—
1. Commonwealth—Action by Attorney General to Recover Money Improperly Paid Out of Treasury—The Attorney General is authorized to maintain an action to recover money improperly paid out of the treasury. One obtaining money from the treasury to which he is not entitled, is required by law to pay it back, and this obligation may be enforced in an action by the State. (20 Ky. Law Rep., 1893.) Commonwealth, on Relation, &c. v. Bacon, &c..... 935
 2. Principal and Surety—Extent to Which Surety is Bound—A surety is not bound beyond the letter of his covenant. The sureties in the bond herein did not undertake that they would be responsible for any money collected by the principal from the State above what he was entitled to receive, and there is nothing in the bond to apprise the sureties that any such liability was sought to be imposed upon them. Idem 935
 3. Attorney and Client—An attorney who asks that his client's claim be allowed, is not responsible for the amount allowed if it shall afterwards turn out that more was paid than due, and in this case the fact that the attorney was on the bond of his client does not change the rule. Idem. 935
 4. Sureties—The liability of a surety must be measured by the terms of his contract. The terms of the contract herein for public printing were not violated, and the sureties are, therefore, not liable for the excessive amount the principal succeeded in collecting from the State. He collected the money as the result of his own fraud, and is alone responsible for it. Idem..... 935
- STREET RAILROADS—
1. Personal Injury—Collision of Wagon With Street Car—Injury to Boy Assisting Driver—Question of Fellow-servants—Where a boy, assisting the driver of an ice wagon in delivering ice, was injured by a collision with a street car, the boy and driver of the wagon, though fellow-servants of the ice company, sustained no such relation to each other as that the negligence of the driver should be imputed to the boy in an action by the boy against the street car company for damages in causing his injury. Paducah Traction Co. v. Sine, &c..... 732
 2. Same—Care Required to Avoid Collision—It is the duty of one driving or riding in an ice wagon, on a street to exercise ordinary care in approaching a crossing on which a street car line is running to avoid a collision, and while the street railway company is entitled to the free passage of its cars it is also its duty to use ordinary care to discover the approach of a wagon to its track and avoid injuring it or the persons in it. Idem 732
 3. Negligence of Driver—Concurring Negligence of Street Car Company—If the boy's injuries were caused wholly by the negligence of the driver of the wagon, no right of recovery exists against the street car company, but if they resulted from the joint or concurring negligence of the company and the driver, both are liable and a recovery may be had against either. Idem	793

4. Duty of Motorman—Failure to Use Ordinary Care—If the motorman of the street car, notwithstanding the negligence of the driver of the wagon, by the use of ordinary care, could have stopped the car in time to have prevented the collision and failed to do so, such failure constituted negligence for which the company was liable to the boy in an action for damages, and this would be true whether the motorman's failure to stop the car was caused by his running it too fast, or by not maintaining a lookout ahead of his moving car. Idem	793
5. Instructions After Closing Argument—The giving of an additional instruction to the jury, after the conclusion of the argument, while not proper practice, yet where a proper instruction was given, after the argument, which it would have been error to have omitted, the giving of the instruction was not a reversible error, especially where neither counsel asked to make an additional argument. Idem	793

TAXATION—

1. Taxation—Tax on Dogs—Act Regulating Sheep Industry by Taxing Dogs—The act of the Kentucky Legislature, approved March 1, 1906, entitled "An act to promote the sheep industry and to provide a tax on dogs," means that it is an act to promote the sheep industry by providing a tax on dogs, and is, therefore, not inimical to section 51, of the Constitution, providing that no "law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title." McGlone, Sheriff v. Womack, &c. 811
2. Same—Statute—Police Regulation—Remuneration for Sheep Killed by Dogs—The act is not a revenue statute, but is a police regulation, in that its object is to remunerate the owner of the sheep for any losses they may suffer by the killing of their sheep by dogs, and the license imposed was intended to be a regulation of dogs and in this way to promote the sheep industry. Idem..... 811
3. Ownership of Dogs—Legislature—Regulation—Dogs are an appropriate subject of regulation under the police power of the State. It is within the power of the Legislature to prohibit their ownership entirely and to provide, where their ownership is allowed, any regulation which the legislative discretion may impose. Idem 811
4. Special Privileges—Public Services—The statute does not confer any special privileges on the owners of sheep, but merely protects these owners from the destruction of their property by dogs, and, therefore, it is not inimical to section 3, of the Bill of Rights, forbidding the grant of exclusive privileges to any man, or set of men, except in consideration of public services. Idem 811

1. Failure to Deliver—Breach of Contract—Where a telegram is delivered to a telegraph company and the price for transmission paid, a contract is entered into between the

2. Same—Action for Breach of Contract—Limitation—Damages for the failure to deliver a telegram are not an injury to the person in the meaning of Kentucky Statutes, section 2516, requiring an action for an injury to the person to be brought within a year next after the cause of action accrued, but are recoverable under section 2515, providing that an action upon a contract * * * shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued. Idem 685
3. Measure of Damages—The measure of damages recoverable for a breach of contract in failing to deliver a telegram such as flow directly from the breach and they may be to the feelings as well as to the property. Idem 685
4. Same—Duty of Plaintiff—Effort to Minimize Damages—Where one receives a delayed telegram announcing the death of a sister whose funeral he desires to attend, he should use all reasonable means to minimize the damages for the delay. He can not stand idly by and permit the damages to increase and then hold the wrongdoer liable for the loss which he might reasonably have prevented. Idem 686

- WILLS—
1. Devise by Husband to Wife—Estate Devised—Construction—A husband by his will provided that “after my death, when all my debts are paid, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Catherine Zeller, all my personal, mixed and real estate of which I may be possessed at the time of my death for her sole use and benefit, to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper.” Held—That the will gives the testator’s wife the entire estate absolutely. The words “to use the same for her and her children as she may see proper,” do not restrict the widow’s interest to a life estate in the property devised, or constitute a limitation over. Schneiderhaus, Gd’n v. Zeller, &c. 694
2. Recitals—Disposition of Entire Estate—Testator devised (1) his house and lot to his wife for life and at her death to descend to his three daughters jointly, or, in case of the death of any without issue, to the survivor. (2) Authorized his executor to convert into money any property, real or personal, which he owned, and divide one-fifth of a $2,000 life policy to his granddaughter and to hold the same until she marries, or, in case of her death, to go to his other heirs. (3) The executors were empowered to sell all his real estate, and his wife to have all the household furniture. (4) That his wife and three daughters shall share equally in the distribution of his estate after the bequests made are complied with. Held—That, by the will, testator disposed of all his estate. Thomas’ Ex’or v. Thomas’ Gd’n, &c...... 700
3. Same—Reasonable Presumption—The natural and reasonable presumption is that when a will is made the testator intends to dispose of his whole estate, which presumption is overcome only where the intention to do otherwise is plain and unambiguous, or is necessarily implied. Idem.. 700

4. Benevolences—Funds Set Apart To—Object to Which It Should Be Applied Ceasing, to Exist—The association having long since ceased to exist, viz: in 1858, the fund sought to be set apart to its use can not be reached by the appellants who claim to be survivors of it. Testator intended to make some provision for a volunteer fire association and it ceasing to exist, his executors merged the fund intended for it in an object of charity, to which he had bequeathed the great bulk of his estate, and the refusal of the chancellor to disturb it after the great length of time the latter institution had had control over it, it will not be disturbed. Johnson v. Cook Ben. Institute. 772
5. Letter of Father to Daughter—Anticipation of Death—Probation as Will—A letter written in jail by a prisoner who was under sentence to be hanged, to his four daughters, three days before his execution, in which he said that he "wanted to make a deed to two of them (naming them) to a certain house and lot because they had attended to their mother so good," was properly admitted to probate as the will of the deceased father. Milam, &c. v. Stanley, &c. 783
6. Testamentary Paper—Situation and Intention of Maker—In determining whether a paper is testamentary or not the court will look not only at the language of the instrument, but at the situation of the maker and at his intention. Idem. 783
7. Dying Without Issue—The devise to Mrs. S. being to her for life, and at her death to her children, and having none, that the land should revert to testator's children, the chancellor correctly held that, upon the death of the devisee, the property so conveyed her by the will, passed to her surviving brother and sisters, no children having been born to her. Golladay v. Thomas, &c. 829
8. Same—Under section 4843, Kentucky Statutes, the devise having failed, by reason of the death in the lifetime of the testator, the estate must pass as in the case of intestacy, no contrary intent having been expressed in the will. Idem. 829

WRITS OF PROHIBITION—

1. Granted by Appellate Court—Restraining Circuit Court—Legality of Action—Under section 110, of the Constitution, providing that "the Court of Appeals * * * shall have power to issue such writs as may be necessary to give it general control of inferior jurisdictions," whenever any inferior jurisdiction, particularly a circuit court, is proceeding beyond its jurisdiction a writ of prohibition may issue out of the appellate court on a proper application to prevent the exercise of the usurped jurisdiction, or when the inferior court has jurisdiction, but there is not an adequate remedy by appeal, the appellate court may, in its discretion, exercise a supervisory control over the inferior court so as to prevent irreparable injury or injustice. Renshaw v. Cook, Judge. 895
2. Action of Circuit Courts—Invading Jurisdiction of Inferior Courts—Authority of Appellate Judge—In the exercise of discretion vested in them by law, inferior courts will not be subjected to interference by the appellate court merely because its views on the subject may be at variance with those of the lower court. There must, in such case, be such an abuse of discretion as would indicate a failure to hear, or a bias in the consideration of the question by the trial judge. But where there is not a discretion, and the inferior court is proceeding out of its jurisdiction, or is invading the jurisdiction of another court or officer, the appellate court may grant the writ to prevent the unauthorized interference. Idem.....

3. Sheriffs—Failure to Execute Bond—Under act of 1906, chapter 22, article 8, section 2, Session Acts of 1906, and Kentucky Statutes, section 4557, requiring sheriffs to execute bond each year, the execution of a bond each year at the time fixed by the statute is a condition precedent to his right of incumbency, and his failure to give such bond for any one of the years work a forfeiture of his office, subject to the discretion of the county court to allow further time as to the bonds subsequent to the first one, and without such extension of time the office becomes vacant and he may be removed from his office by the county judge without notice. Idem

4. County Courts—Record Authority—Individual Action of Judge—A county court must speak through its records. A county judge, when off the bench, has no power to bind the county by anything he says or does in his individual capacity. Idem

5. Interlocutory Injunctions—Granted by Inferior Court—Jurisdiction of Appellate Judge—Dissolution—Re-Instatement—By statute a judge of the Court of Appeals is given jurisdiction to dissolve an interlocutory injunction granted by a circuit judge or any other inferior officer, and the judgment of the appellate judge in that matter, is the law of that case so long as the facts shown in the record are substantially unchanged, until it is reversed by the Court of Appeals. Interlocutory injunctions, if dissolved by the trial court or judge, when re-instated by a judge of the appellate court, may not thereafter be disregarded by the inferior tribunal where the matter may be pending, so long as they remain interlocutory. Idem

6. Same—Jurisdiction of County Judge—Order Removing Sheriff From Office—Revisory Authority of Circuit Judge—In the absence of the circuit judge from the county, the county judge may hear and grant or refuse motions for interlocutory injunctions of a prohibitory nature (section 273, Civil Code), and where a county judge granted an injunction restraining a sheriff from exercising the duties of an office who had refused to execute his annual official bond, the circuit judge had no jurisdiction to grant a temporary writ of prohibition and could not do so without invading the rightful jurisdiction of the county judge. Idem

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

GABOURY, FOR USE, &c. v. COOMBS, &c.

Thos. W. Bullitt and A. Scott Bullitt for appellants.

B. F. Proctor and Greene & VanWinkle for appellee Kister.

John B. Grider and W. B. Gaines for appellee Meyler.

B. W. Bradburn for Aberdeen Coal Co.

CITY OF MIDDLESBORO v. COAL AND IRON BANK.

(Filed June 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

T. G. Anderson for appellant.

N. B. Hays and J. R. Sampson for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, overruling:

Mrs. Saulsberry should be credited in the judgment by anything she paid on the attempted compromise.

The order appointing the receiver was made at a regular term of court, and we must presume the court had before it facts sufficient to warrant its action. The parties must take notice of what is done by the court, when in regular session, and as Mrs. Saulsberry was a pendente lite purchaser she is bound by the order of the court made.

Petition overruled.

SULLIVAN v. HILL.

(Filed September 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Land—Ascertaining Boundary—Course and Distance—Marked Lines—Question for Jury—In ascertaining the boundary of a tract of land, course and distance must give way to marked lines and corners found on the ground, or to established monuments called for in the deed, and it is necessarily a question for the jury, where the proof is conflicting, to locate the lines of the tract of land actually sold.

2. Calls of Deed—Reversing Calls—Effect—One call of a deed is entitled to as much respect as another, and often uncertainty may be avoided by reversing the calls of the deed from the beginning corner, and in doing this, if the monuments called for in the deed are found this much of the survey will be located, and the location of these lines will throw great light on how other lines should be located so as to close the survey.

J. N. Sharp and H. H. Tye for appellant.

T. Z. Morrow, R. L. Pope and E. L. Stephens for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

A. J. Sullivan on September 2, 1901, conveyed to N. B. Hill a tract of land in Whitley county in consideration of $600. The deed describes the land by metes and bounds, but it does not show the number of acres conveyed. In August, 1904, Louis Stanfill brought a suit against Hill to recover a body of land which Hill claimed under the deed from Sullivan, and in that suit Stanfill recovered from Hill about thirty acres of land. Hill gave Sullivan notice of the pendency of the suit, and after it was decided, brought this action against Sullivan to recover of him damages for the breach of the warranty. The case was tried in the circuit court, and resulted in a judgment in favor of Hill for $203.22. From this judgment Sullivan appeals.

The chief question in the case arises on the instructions of the court to the jury. The court told the jury that the quantity of land which the plaintiff lost in the suit with Stanfill, which was covered by the deed from the defendant, as shown by the evidence, was thirty acres, and that they should find for the plaintiff such part of the whole consideration paid for the entire tract as the value of the thirty acres bore to the entire tract, with six per cent. interest from September 2, 1901, and his cost in the former suit. There was an issue in the pleadings as to whether the land which Stanfill recovered was covered by the deed made by Sullivan, and this issue should have been submitted to the jury. There is no dispute about the calls of the deed running from the beginning corner, until we reach a hickory on a ridge. From this point the deed calls to run with the top of the ridge "N. 55 E. 145 poles to a stake in the line of a 100-acre survey; thence N. 54 W. 14 poles to a locust corner of 75 acres, patented to John Hill; thence with it N. 55 W. 43 poles to a small chestnut." If we run from the hickory on the ridge we strike the line of the 100-acre survey before the distance gives out; and if from this point we run the courses and distances of the deed, as they are written, none of the land which Stanfill recovered will be included in the deed. On the other hand, if we run from the hickory the distance called for in the deed, and then follow the other calls for course and distance, we do not reach the 75 acres survey of John Hill or the locust corner. To reach the locust corner from the point where the distance gives out, or from the line of the 100-acre survey, we have to disregard entirely the course and distance of the deed, and when we do this and undertake to run the other calls of the deed back to the beginning, it will not close and includes a very large boundary of land, much larger, it would seem, than was contemplated by the parties in the sale of Sullivan to Hill. Where the lines and corners of the deed are located on the ground is a question for the jury, and should be submitted to them under appropriate instructions. Course and distance must give way to marked lines and corners found on the ground or to established monuments called for in the deed; but sometimes parties are mistaken as to where the lines and corners of the other surveys are, and they call for such lines and surveys deeming them at one place when they are at another, in which event the lines must be run as the parties intended them to be located (Bowling v. Siler, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 788; 42 S. W., 90); so it is necessarily a question for the jury, where the proof is conflicting, to locate the lines of the tract of land actually sold. One call of a deed is entitled to as much respect as another, and often uncertainty in a case of this sort may be avoided by reversing the calls of the deed from the beginning corner. If, when the calls are reversed from the beginning corner, the monuments called for in the deed are found, this much of the survey will be located and the location of these lines will throw great light on how other lines should be located so as to close the survey.

The court, instead of the instruction given, should have instructed the jury that they should determine from the evidence whether any of the land, which Stanfill recovered of Hill, was included in the deed which Sullivan made Hill; and, if any, how much was so included.

On another trial the court will confine all evidence as to the value of the land, or the timber on it, to the time of the making of the deed, and no evidence will be admitted of its value at a subsequent time. Hill's recovery on account of the value of the land lost must be such a part of $600 as the value of the land lost at that time bore to the entire value of the place, $600, with interest from that time.

No question of the champerty statute arises. There was no such actual occupancy of this timbered land by Stanfill as made Hill's purchase void under the champerty statute. A possession may be sufficient under the statute of limitations which is not sufficient under the champerty statute.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial.

LYNCH v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Campbell & Williams for appellant.

James Breathitt and Thos. B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellant was convicted of the statutory offense of breaking into a railroad car with intent to steal therefrom. (Section 1163. Kentucky Statutes.) He complains of the trial on the sole ground that there was no evidence of his guilt. The trial court thought there was; the jury thought so, and we think so.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. WELLS.

(Filed September 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Indictments — Construction of Statutes—Instructions—Evidence—
The evidence conducing to show that appellee did not carry away the switch light with felonious intention, the court properly instructed the jury with reference to the offense as defined by section 1256, Kentucky Statutes, as well as that defined by section 807, under which he was indicted. Section 264, Criminal Code, was enacted to meet cases like this, and authorized the instruction under section 1256, of the statutes.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellant.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, certifying the law.

Appellee was indicted for the offense named in section 807, of the Kentucky Statutes, which section is as follows: "Any person who shall willfully and maliciously tear up, displace, break or disturb any rail or other fixture attached to the track or switch of any railroad in operation, or break any bridge or viaduct of such road, or who shall place any obstruction on the track or switch of such road, or do any act whereby any engine or car might be upset, arrested, or thrown from the track of such road or switch, or any branch or turnout, shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years."

Upon the trial the court gave the jury an instruction upon the offense defined in this section, and also gave an instruction upon the offense defined in section 1256, of the Kentucky Statutes. To this last instruction the Commonwealth objected and excepted. The jury convicted the defendant of the offense defined in the last instruction, and the Commonwealth appeals.

The substance of the evidence produced upon the trial is about as follows: Appellee, a boy, and a younger companion, were in the town of East Bernstadt, from where they started to their home, about three miles in the country; it was getting dark and they tried to borrow a lantern in town, but failed; but as they passed out of town they came to a switch light on the railroad; appellee took it down, opened the frame in which the light was enclosed, took the light out and carried it home with him. The evidence tended to show that he did not do it maliciously, that he had no thought of any malicious purpose, or of throwing an engine or any cars from the track.

In our opinion, in view of the facts proven, the court properly instructed the jury with reference to the offense defined by section 1256, of the statutes; that is, if he took and carried away the switch light without a felonious intention, that he should be punished as provided by that section.

Section 264, of the Criminal Code, authorized this instruction.

That section is as follows: "If an offense be charged in an indictment to have been committed, with particular circumstances as to time, place, person, property, value, motive or intention, the offense, without the circumstances, or with part only, is included in the offense, although that charge may be a felony, and the offense, without the circumstances, a misdemeanor only."

Section 807, of the Kentucky Statutes, under which the indictment was prepared, required the jury to believe that appellee was actuated by malice in the removal of the switch light before they could convict him under that section; but no evil intention was required to be proven to authorize a conviction under section 1256, of the statutes. This section of the Code was enacted for the purpose of meeting just such cases. (Barnard v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky., 285, and Houseman v. Commonwealth, 33 Ky. Law Rep., 311; 110 S. W., 236.)

Wherefore, the clerk of this court is directed to certify this opinion to the lower court as the law of the case.

CHAPMAN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Argument of Counsel—Objection to Must be Made in Lower Court—This court will not reverse for an argument of counsel which was not objected to in the lower court.

2. Instructions—An instruction under section 240, Criminal Code, should follow the language of the section, and should not, in addition, require proof tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense.

3. Evidence—There was sufficient evidence to take the case to the jury. That of what the defendant himself said was competent against him and while it should have been offered in chief the failure to do so was not a substantial error.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Joe Rice ran a country store at Hedgeville, in Boyle county. Above the store were some rooms in which he lived with his family. In September, 1907, his family consisted of his wife, her two brothers, Frank and Fred Chapman, and her sister, Myrtle Chapman, Myrtle being thirteen years old, Fred fifteen and Frank twenty-one. Frank had been clerking in the store for Rice, and they were on good terms apparently. On the day in question they had been to the river fishing, and had returned in the afternoon about four o'clock. Rice then sent Fred Chapman for a keg of three gallons of whisky. When Fred returned with the whisky, Rice, the two Chapmans and two or three other men who were in the store, drank together. Rice and Fred Chapman got very drunk. One of the other men went home because he was getting drunk. The proof is not so clear as to how much whisky Frank Chapman drank. At about eight o'clock the attention of the neighbors was attracted by quarreling and loud talking at Rice's place. A woman whom they took to be Mrs. Rice, and a man whom they took to be Frank Chapman, appeared at the front of the store. The man was heard to say to the woman, "All I want is to kill him before this night is gone, and that's what I am going to do." About ten o'clock Myrtle Chapman appeared at a neighbor's house, asking them to come over at once to Rice's. When they got there, Rice was lying on the floor of the room in which he and his wife slept with a knife wound between the fourth and fifth rib, which penetrated the heart. He was dead; one hand was lying upon the floor, and near this hand was a bloody barlow knife. There was another knife on the mantle which had blood on it. As the neighbors approached the house, they saw, through the window, Frank Chapman bending over the body of Rice, his back being toward them; and as they saw him he was straightening up. Frank Chapman was indicted for the murder of Rice, and was found guilty of manslaughter, and his punishment fixed at eighteen years in the penitentiary.

The proof for the Commonwealth showed, in addition to the facts above stated, that when the neighbors came in, Mrs. Rice asked Frank Chapman where he had put his knife, and he answered, "on the mantlepiece." This proof also showed that just after the cutting, Frank Chapman called up Dr. Kinnaird on the telephone, asking him to come and see Joe Rice. The doctor asked, "What is the matter?" Chapman answered, "He is cut." The doctor said, "Where?" Chapman answered: "He was cut here, out here." The doctor said, "I mean what part of the body?" Chapman answered, "Near the heart." The doctor asked, "Who cut him?" and he answered, "I did."

On the other hand, the defendant testified that he did not tell the doctor that he cut Rice, and he and his sister both denied she asked him where he put his knife, or his saying that he put it on the mantlepiece. He, his two sisters, and brothers, Fred, all testified that there was a difficulty at eight o'clock, but that this difficulty was between Frank Chapman and Fred Chapman; and that Fred then tried to cut Frank with a knife, and this being taken from him by Rice, he got a hatchet which was taken from him by Mrs. Rice, and he then said of his brother that he would kill him before morning. Another witness, who was in the store at the time, substantiates them as to this difficulty. They also testified that Fred, soon after this, went to bed, being very drunk; that later Mrs. Rice went to bed; then her husband, the last of all Frank Chapman, who closed up the store; that after Frank Chapman got in bed, he heard Mrs. Rice scream, when he ran into the room and his sister said to him, "Frank, come quick, Joe is cussing and threatening to kill me. Says he is going to take my money away from me." Rice asked him what he had in his hands. He answered, "Nothing, Joe," and Rice started at him with a knife. He grabbed Rice with both hands, and in the scuffle Rice fell to the floor, and when they turned him over, his own knife was found sticking in his heart. When Myrtle Chapman got to the neighbors, as shown by the Commonwealth, she told them that Joe and Frank were in a fuss and Frank had cut Joe with a knife, and he was down in the wardrobe, and Belle (Mrs. Rice) thought he was dying. When the neighbors got into the house they found Rice's body on the floor; his feet were just inside of the door-sill of a closet used as a wardrobe. The Commonwealth also introduced proof attacking the character of Mrs. Rice and Frank Chapman. The defendant, at the conclusion of the evidence for the Commonwealth, and at the conclusion of all the evidence, moved the court peremptorily to find him not guilty. The court overruled the motion; of this he complains. He also complains that there is no evidence in the case competent to be considered, showing that he is guilty. We cannot concur in this. Frank Chapman told one of the persons who came in that he had phoned to Dr. Kinnaird. Dr. Kinnaird testified that the man who phoned to him said his name was Chapman, and this was the only message he got from the house. There was sufficient evidence, therefore, to admit the evidence as to what was said to Dr. Kinnaird over the telephone. The evidence that Frank Chapman said he had placed his knife on the mantle was competent against him. This was a declaration by him. What his sister said to him, asking where he had put his knife, was only introductory to this statement. The deceased was killed by a knife wound in the breast, and there was not only testimony that Frank Chapman said that he did it, but there was conduct on his part tending strongly to confirm the testimony of the Commonwealth.

It is earnestly insisted that a new trial should be granted because the employed attorney, in arguing the case to the jury for the Commonwealth, insisted that the proof showed that Frank Chapman had a knife and had killed Joe Rice with it, arguing that two witnesses had testified that Mrs. Rice asked Frank Chapman, in their presence, the question, and he said that he put it on the mantle, when the court had instructed the jury that they could only consider the evidence of these two witnesses as to what Mrs. Rice said in their presence, for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Rice. But, as we have said, the evidence of what the defendant himself said was competent against him as substantive testimony. It is true it should have been introduced in chief, but the failure to do so was not a substantial error, in view of all the facts of the case. It is also insisted that the Commonwealth's attorney, in his concluding argument, said that Chapman had cut Rice while in the closet, basing the argument upon the statement which two witnesses made as to what Myrtle Chapman said when she came to them and asked them to come over to Rice's, when the court had instructed the jury that this testimony could only be considered for the purpose of contradicting Myrtle Chapman. But there is no objection to the argument. If an objection had been made to it, the court would have had an opportunity to correct the matter; and we can not reverse here for an argument of counsel which was not objected to in the circuit court. The counsel also argued that other facts shown in the case, showed that this was the way the cutting was done.

The instructions of the court to the jury were more favorable to the defendant than they should have been. Instruction 4 should not have been given. When there is an instruction under section 240, of the Criminal Code, as to the weight to be given the defendant's confession out of court, it should follow the language of the section and should not, in addition, require proof tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Such an instruction should not be given where the corpus delicti is sufficiently established. (Dugan v. Commonwealth, 103 Ky., 251; Green v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky. Law Rep., 1228, and cases cited.)

Judgment affirmed.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Common Carriers—Carrying Whisky Into Local Option Territory—Act of 1906—Indictment—Allegations—An indictment against a common carrier under the act of the Kentucky Legislature of 1906 (chapter 63), for carrying whisky into local option territory in quantities more than one gallon, need not negative all the provisions of said act. While the general rule may be that in drafting an indictment under a statute, whose enacting clause contains exceptions, it must negative such exceptions, it is not necessary to do so in the terms of the statute, provided the whole indictment does so in language that leaves no doubt that the accused does not belong to the excepted class.

2. Same—Necessity to Obey the Law—Knowledge of Carrier—Question for Jury—Common carriers ought to obey the law both in letter and spirit as other persons are expected to do, and where a package of whisky is conveyed by a carrier into local option territory, it is a question for the jury to determine from the evidence whether the agents of the carrier knew, or had reason to believe that the contents of the package were whisky.

3. Agents of Carriers—Care Required—Agents of carriers, in shipping packages into local option territory, are not only required to believe that they do not contain whisky, but they must use ordinary care, or due caution, to avoid a violation of the statute.

4. Same—Inspection of Packages—Duty of Agents—While it is questionable whether or not the carrier has the right to open and inspect a package, in the absence of legislative authority to do so, where he has a reasonable suspicion that the shipper is attempting to use his vehicle to violate the law of the land, he may, as he ought, require enough evidence of the legality of the shipment to satisfy a reasonably prudent mind that the suspicion was not well founded.

John W. Lewis and Lawrence Maxwell for appellant.

James Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Washington Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellant, a common carrier, was indicted and convicted, charged with the statutory offense of bringing and delivering spirituous liquors into local option territory to another than a licensed physician or druggist. The indictment was drawn under the act of 1906 (chapter 63), which makes it unlawful for "any person or persons, individual or corporation, public or private carrier to bring into, transfer to other person or persons, corporations, carrier or agent, deliver or distribute, in any county, district, precinct, town or city, where the sale of intoxicating liquors has been prohibited, or may be prohibited, whether by special act or of the General Assembly, or by vote of the people under the local option law, * * * Provided, Individuals may bring into such district, upon their person, or as their personal baggage, and for their private use, such liquors in quantity not to exceed one gallon: and, Provided, The provisions of this act shall not apply to licensed physicians or druggists, to whom any public carrier may deliver such goods, in unbroken packages, in quantity not to exceed five gallons at any one time."

Appellant argues that the indictment is bad on demurrer, because it does not negative all the provisos of the act. It did charge that the person to whom the liquor was delivered was not a licensed physician or druggist. But it did not say that the liquor was not brought into the local option territory by the defendant upon its person, or as its personal baggage, for its own use and in a quantity not more than one gallon. Now was it necessary to have so pleaded in terms. The indictment alleges that the accused was a common carrier, an incorporated or joint stock company. Such a person being purely artificial was not intended to be embraced in the exception just alluded to, but that exception was designed for the benefit of natural persons only. An artificial person can not have personal baggage any more than it could drink the liquor. So that while the general rule may be that in drafting an indictment under a statute whose enacting clause contains exceptions, the indictment must negative such exceptions, it is not necessary to do so in the terms of the statute provided the whole indictment does so in language that leaves no doubt that the accused does not belong to the excepted class. This indictment is good under that rule of pleading.

The liquor in this case was a box containing bottles of whisky shipped from a point in Nelson county, Kentucky, to Springfield, Ky., and wholly within this State. Springfield is a local option town. The box did not have any marks upon it to indicate its contents. Nor did the way bill accompanying it, show what the box contained. The shipper and the consignee each declared that the box contained paint. The shipper was a distiller's clerk. The consignee a painter. Both were known respectively to the agents of appellant receiving and delivering the box. At the receiving point there was only a distillery—a flag station on the L. & N. R. R. The express company's agent on the train, who received the box, suspected its contents; he inquired of the distiller's agent, whom he knew, what the box contained. The receiving agent also suspected the contents of the box. He asked the consignee what it contained. Each of them testified that they believed the statements that it contained paint. The box was not marked, probably to conceal the nature of its contents. The way bill made out by the express train agent, may or may not have failed to show what the box was represented to contain for the same reason. The shipper's clerk falsely stated the box's contents for the same reason, and the consignee for like reason misrepresented the fact, though he says in his testimony, that he said to the agent jokingly, "It might be paint." Now if all these facts had actually deceived both of appellant's agents, and they had acted in good faith and with due caution, the carrier would not be liable. For although the statute contains no such qualification, it is rare when the law makes one ignorant of the fact and innocent of intent, a malefactor. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 687.) So the question for the jury was, did the agents, or either of them know, or have reason to know, of the real contents of the package, and were they, in spite of such notice as they may have had, actually deceived, although acting in good faith and with proper caution in the matter?

Common carriers ought to obey the law just like other people, not in merely keeping its letter while breaking its spirit, but keeping both letter and spirit under such circumstances as other people are expected to do. An agent of a common carrier is required to exercise the same kind of judgment, and to have as much sense in doing his employer's business as if he were doing the business for himself. And what would convince him, or ought to, that a certain fact exists, is notice to his master of its existence. He must act on knowledge, probabilities, information, experience, use judgment, infer facts from other established facts, as men generally do in similar matters when thinking or acting for themselves. In this way the corporation is humanized, is made to see, hear, know and exercise care, skill, judgment and prudence, and is made amenable to the laws where intent, motive and knowledge are elements of wrong.

The jury in this case evidently did not believe that appellant's agents were actually deceived as to the contents of the package. The following additional circumstances were in evidence, tending to show the agents to be culpable; other packages shipped from the same distillery by the same express, unlabelled as to contents, had been declared upon falsely, in order to deceive the carrier, and to evade the law; these agents had learned of the fact; they had been in the service for years, and knew the parties and their business and shipping methods, yet they took no precaution to protect themselves, their employer or the public against a repetition of evasions of this statute. No other business was done at the point of shipment, except in connection with the distillery. The train stopped there for the accommodation mainly, if not solely, of that plant. It was in the habit of shipping whisky over that railroad and by express. It is quite likely that the agent was not deceived in fact; for, although it would probably have deceived him once or twice, he would become more wary, and would refuse to believe the trick which had been used successfully upon him before. The jury's verdict is not without a probable basis of truth. If every guilty man could demand a peremptory instruction merely because he said he was deceived, there would be a quick end to most jury trials. The jury was not deceived by the same facts. No one who is at all familiar with the history of the times, the cause of the enactment of the stringent laws of which the one now being discussed is a part, the tricks and wiles of those who violate these laws, is often deceived by such matters.

The trial judge gave the jury the following instruction, among others: "If the jury further believe from the evidence that defendant's agents receiving and bringing said box of liquor from Bourbon, in Nelson county, to Springfield, in Washington county, Ky., and defendant's agent in delivering same to said Rogers acted in good faith, believing said box contained something other than whisky, you should find the defendant not guilty."

This instruction was more favorable to the defendant perhaps than it was entitled to; for in addition to the good faith of defendant's agents, they must have acted with ordinary care or due caution to avoid violation of the statute.

As Bishop puts it (Bishop on Statutory Crimes, section 132): "One who, while careful and circumspect, is lead into a mistake of facts," may be excusable.

We are not prepared to say that the carrier has a right to open and inspect, or to require the shipper to submit to an inspection of all goods shipped, unless the Legislature should so authorize, as we have no doubt it has the right to do. And in the absence of such right of inspection, the carrier will not be bound to have more knowledge than he has, or has notice of. But where he has a reasonable suspicion that a shipper is attempting to use his vehicle to violate a law of the land, he may, as he ought, require enough evidence of the legality of the shipment to satisfy a reasonably prudent mind that the suspicion was not well founded. Authorities are cited by appellant, in some of which the ground is stated as that relied on for denying the right of inspection that it would be a burden to commerce. The State and Federal governments have done much to foster commerce, and the public policy has been upheld. But the statute in question here is not for the benefit of commerce; it rests upon a different conception; the Legislature is aiming to protect men, women and children from the vices of an article of commerce, which is deemed by the Legislature an evil, and in doing so they have attempted to put a check upon a vehicle of commerce. The legislation is anti-commercial. It puts the peace and good order of society above its commerce in this particular. In construing and applying the statute, if the courts devitalize it by subordinating it to the supposed interests of commerce, the manifest legislative intent would be frustrated, which is contrary to every allowable rule of statutory construction. Yet we do not go so far as to say that the carrier may require all shipments to be subjected to its inspection before undertaking to deliver them. But we do say, that when the carrier knows that the article is contraband it must be rejected, no matter what the shipper says to the contrary, and, if the carrier believes upon reasonable grounds that it is contraband, he may require reasonable assurances that it is not; and, if an inspection is reasonable and practicable, under the circumstances, may require an inspection. Let them be as careful to obey the law as they are to further their own interests, and there will be little doubt but that the law will be obeyed.

Other questions presented are not deemed material.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. ALEXANDER.

(Filed September 23, 1908—To be reported.)

Embezzlement—Indictment—Money Unlawfully Collected and Misappropriated by Sheriff—Property Not Listed for Taxation—An indictment against a sheriff which alleges that “during the year 1898, he knowingly, feloniously and fraudulently collected from various citizens of the county the sum of $2,286, and retained and applied it to his own use, when the property of the county had not been listed for taxation,” is not a good indictment for embezzlement. The indictment shows on its face that the sheriff was not rightfully and legally in possession of the money charged to have been collected and misappropriated by him.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellant.

H. W. Alexander, W. B. Moody, W. A. Lee and H. G. Botts for appellee.

Appeal from Owen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellee was indicted in the Owen Circuit Court for the offense of embezzlement. The court sustained a demurrer to the indictment, and the Commonwealth appeals. The indictment was evidently drawn to cover the offense defined by section 1205, of the Kentucky Statutes. In substance, appellee was charged in the indictment with having collected from divers taxpayers of the county the sum of $2,286, during the year 1898; that he feloniously, knowingly and fraudulently collected this money, retained and applied it to his own use and benefit, thereby depriving the county of its use; that the property upon which he collected this money as taxes had not been assessed for taxation. The substance of the charge against appellee is that while he was sheriff, during the year 1898, he collected from various citizens of the county the sum named when the property had not been assessed, that is, had not been listed for taxation, and that he failed to turn over to the county the money thus collected. The question is: Does this constitute embezzlement as defined in section 1205, of the Kentucky Statutes? In our opinion it does not.

The section of the statute referred to provides: That when a person having custody or control of any money, or other thing named in the section, belonging to or for the use of the State or of any county, &c., or under any trust or duty, return or specifically apply same, or any part thereof, shall, in violation of such trust or duty, willfully misappropriate or otherwise dispose of such money, or other thing named in the statute, he shall be punished as provided in the section. This section assumes that the person or officer is rightfully and legally in the possession of the money, or other thing, for the use of the State or county, and then misappropriates it.

The indictment in this case shows on its face that appellee was not rightfully and legally in possession of the money charged to have been collected and misappropriated by him. Section 4067, of the Kentucky Statutes, provides: "No sheriff shall receive or receipt for any taxes until a copy of the assessor's books, as approved by the board of supervisors, has been delivered to him by the county clerk, or the list filed in the county clerk's office has been certified to him by the said clerk. For a violation of this section the sheriff shall be fined one hundred dollars for each offense."

This is a positive prohibition against the collection by the sheriff of any taxes on unassessed property. The sheriff has no power or authority to assess or list omitted property for taxation under the statutes. His powers and duties as to property omitted by the assessor and supervisors are defined by section 4241, of the statutes, which requires him to file in the clerk's office of the county in which the property is liable to assessment, a statement containing a description and the value of the property proposed to be assessed. The sheriff has no part in the assessment of property, except to report omitted property to the clerk, as directed by section 4241, of the statutes; and he is forbidden, under a penalty of one hundred dollars for each offense, to collect any taxes at all until the property is assessed by a person authorized to assess it, and its proper assessment certified to him.

The collection by appellee of the sum alleged from the various taxpayers of the county on property which had not been assessed for taxation, was a plain violation of the law; it did not relieve the taxpayers from their liability to the county, and they could have sued appellee immediately and recovered each of the various sums paid to him. It was their money; it did not belong to the county. If appellee held it in trust, it was for the persons who paid it to him, and not for the county. (Commonwealth v. Boske, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 400; 9 S. W., 316.)

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the lower court properly sustained a demurrer to the indictment.

Judgment affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD CO.

(Filed September 24, 1908—To be reported.)

Courts—Pleading—Jurisdiction—Special Demurrer—Presumptions—When the petition, to which it is desired to demur specially upon the ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the defendant or of the subject of the action, fails to disclose the want of jurisdiction, the defendant, if he desires to raise the question, should point out distinctly in an answer or other pleading, as provided in section 118, of the Civil Code, the reasons why the court has not jurisdiction, so that the court may be informed of the grounds upon which the special demurrer is rested. Circuit courts are courts of general jurisdiction, and it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that they have jurisdiction.

G. E. Lilly for appellant.

Fred P. Caldwell, Benjamin D. Warfield and John T. Shelby for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Judge Carroll delivered the extension of opinion, overruling.

In the petition for re-hearing it is suggested that the court in the opinion made no reference to the question raised by the appellee in the lower court, and urged by it in the brief filed in its behalf in this court, that the Madison Circuit Court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine this case.

The action was brought under section 73, of the Civil Code, providing that: "Excepting the actions mentioned in section 75, an action against a common carrier, whether a corporation or not, upon a contract to carry property, must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or either of several defendants, resides; or in which the contract is made; or in which the carrier agrees to deliver the property." * * *

It will thus be seen that the venue of the action is limited to either one of three counties. In the brief filed on the original hearing, as well as in the petition for re-hearing, it is stated that the contract was entered into in Estill county, that the appellee's residence is in Jefferson county, and the property was to be delivered in Kenton county. Neither of these facts appears in the record. The jurisdictional question was not properly raised or made in the lower court. For this reason it was not noticed in the opinion, and would not now be considered except for the insistence of counsel that the plea to the jurisdiction of the Madison Circuit Court should have been sustained.

Before entering its appearance in the Madison Circuit Court, the appellee filed the following special demurrer: "The defendant demurs specially to the plaintiff's petition herein on the ground that this court has not jurisdiction of this cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's petition and amended petition."

It did not file any other pleading of record stating the reasons why the Madison Circuit Court did not have jurisdiction, or setting out that it resided in Jefferson county, or that the contract was made in Estill county, or that the property was to be delivered in Kenton county. The petition did not disclose the fact that the Madison Circuit Court was not the county in which the contract was made or the county in which the defendant resided. In the absence of a pleading showing a want of jurisdiction, the lower court properly overruled the special demurrer. Section 92, of the Civil Code, provides that:

"A special demurrer is an objection to a pleading which shows:

"1. That the court has no jurisdiction of the defendant or the subject of the action; or,

"2. That the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue; or,

"3. That another action is pending in this State, between the same parties, for the same cause; or,

"4. That there is a defect of parties, plaintiff or defendant.

"Either of said grounds of objection, shown to exist by a pleading, is waived, unless distinctly specified by a demurrer thereto, except the objection to the jurisdiction of the court of the subject of the action, which objection is not waived by failing so to make it." * * *

When the petition to which it is desired to demur specially upon the ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the defendant or of the subject of the action, fails to disclose the want of jurisdiction, the defendant if he desires to raise the question should point out distinctly in an answer or other pleading as provided in section 118, of the Civil Code, the reasons why the court has not jurisdiction, so that the court may be informed of the grounds upon which the special demurrer is rested. Circuit courts are courts of general jurisdiction, and will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that they have jurisdiction of the defendant.

The Madison Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; and as the pleading to which the special demurrer was filed did not disclose the jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, and the objection was not made by answer or other pleading, it was waived.

The petition for re-hearing is overruled.

CLARK v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Evidence—Competency Of—(32 Ky. Law Rep., 63, and response to petition for re-hearing in same case.) The only complaint here is that Blair's evidence was not excluded. But the facts examined and held that his evidence was competent.

Mercer & Mercer for appellants.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Breckinridge Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

We do not deem it necessary to write an extended opinion in this case. The only ground for reversal seriously urged is that the lower court erred in not excluding the evidence of Norville Blair. Upon a former appeal by appellant (32 Ky. Law Rep., 63), the judgment of conviction was reversed because of error committed by the trial court in admitting the evidence of this witness. In a response to the petition for a re-hearing in that case by Commonwealth, Judge Hobson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"The testimony of Blair can only be competent upon the ground that it shows a confession made by the defendant. But to make the statement Blair heard competent against the defendant, the Commonwealth must show that he made the statement. The difficulty with the proof offered on this subject is that it does not establish that fact. Blair did not see the person who talked to him through the sewer pipe, and he did not know the voice. The proof does not show that only a person in the cell downstairs in the southwest corner of the jail could talk through this sewer pipe to a person upstairs where Blair was. It does not show that Clark was confined in this cell and that no one else had access to the sewer pipe. It is not common for prisoners to be allowed the use of the corridors of the jail during the day. The evidence of Blair shows this was the case upstairs where he was and there is no proof that things went differently downstairs. The Commonwealth may show by circumstantial evidence that it was Clark who talked to Blair through the sewer pipe; and if on another trial the evidence should show that Clark was confined in this cell and that no one else had access to the sewer pipe, and that no one else could talk through it to the cell where Blair was except a person in this cell, the testimony of Blair as to what was said may be admitted."

Upon the trial from which this appeal is prosecuted, the evidence is conclusive that at the time Blair had the conversation with Clark, no other person was confined in the cell occupied by Clark except himself, nor did any other person except the jailer enter or have access to the cell. The sewer pipe, through which the conversation was had extended from the cell occupied by Blair, which was immediately above that occupied by Clark, to the cell in which Clark was confined.

Blair testified that the conversation he had through the sewer pipe was with the person in the cell immediately under him. As there was no person in this cell at that time except Clark, and as the sewer pipe in Clark's cell was so located that a person who was not inside the cell could not talk into it, the evidence of Blair under the opinion delivered by Judge Hobson was competent, and the judgment must be affirmed.

FOSTER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Murder—Instructions—Upon Matter Where No Evidence—Complaint is made here that there should have been an instruction upon voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, but under the evidence there is no place for an instruction except upon the subject of murder. In such a case it would be absurd to instruct upon questions about which there was no evidence whatever.

2. Evidence—There was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, and under the well established rule of this court, there being no prejudicial error, the verdict will not be disturbed.

K. D. Perkins and W. R. Henry for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Jno. F. Lockett for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the Court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

Under an indictment charging her with the murder of James Foster, her husband, the appellant was convicted and her punishment fixed at imprisonment in the State penitentiary for life. At the conclusion of the evidence for the Commonwealth, her counsel asked the court to direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. This request being refused, they declined to offer any evidence. One of the principal grounds relied on for reversal is that the evidence introduced for the Commonwealth was wholly insufficient to support a verdict of conviction. The additional error urged is that the court failed to instruct the jury as to the whole law of the case.

The evidence upon which the conviction was had was entirely circumstantial and consisted chiefly of statements made by appellant. There were no eye witnesses to the murder. The deceased was found lying in his bed dead. His death was produced by a ball from a pistol, that entered the back or top of his head, killing him instantly. The pistol was held so close to the bed upon which his head was resting, that the fire from it when discharged burned or scorched the bed clothes. Deceased was asleep, and did not move his position in the bed after he was shot. The work of the assassin was quickly done, and the victim, without a struggle, passed from sleep into death.

Appellant and deceased, with their children, lived in a small house in a rather thickly settled neighborhood. Deceased was in the habit of getting drunk, and when under the influence of liquor was violent and abusive to his wife. They had several serious and noisy quarrels, during which each would threaten to kill the other. The murder was committed on Sunday night. On Sunday afternoon, the deceased left home for the purpose of going to a place where whisky could be obtained. Soon after his departure the appellant took her children to the house of her daughter, nearby, and said that her husband would come home drunk during the night, and that she would go away and stay until he got sober.

There was no evidence whatever, except a statement made by appellant, tending to connect any other person than appellant with the commission of the crime. The evidence conducing to establish her guilt consists of threats and the statement made to more than one person that "Foster had come home drunk, gone to sleep, and woke up in hell;" that "he never could come in drunk and put his pistol against the side of her head again;" and contradictory accounts of where she spent the night. To one person she said, that after leaving home Sunday afternoon, she became sick and spent the night at a school house about a half mile from where she lived. At another time, she said that she had gone to bed in her own house and was awakened by her husband on his way home hollering and shooting; that she went out of the house with a view of escaping from him, and within a short distance came upon two men to whom she told why she was leaving home; that they prevailed on her to return with them to her house, which she did, when one of them went in and fired the fatal shot, after which she went to the school house and remained the balance of the night.

Without relating the other circumstances of her guilt, based upon her conduct and conversations, we will content ourselves by saying that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict. Under the well established rule of practice prevailing in this State, if there is any evidence tending to show the guilt of the accused, the case should go to a jury and their finding of guilt will not be disturbed unless some prejudicial error of law has been committed. (Martin v. Commonwealth, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 657.) The only error of law complained of is the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury upon the subjects of voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. The court refused to charge the jury upon these branches of the law of homicide—giving only an instruction upon the question of murder, and the usual one as to reasonable doubt of guilt entitling the defendant to an acquittal.

It has been ruled in several cases that where no eye witness to the homicide testifies, it is the duty of the court to give to the jury the law applicable to manslaughter as well as murder. The cases so holding were reviewed in Bass v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 967; and it was there held, after fully considering them, not to be necessary to give an instruction as to voluntary or involuntary manslaughter or self-defense, unless there was some fact or circumstance developed on the trial upon which such instructions or one of them might be predicated. In the case before us, there is no room or place for an instruction except upon the subject of murder. There is not a word of proof or a single circumstance upon which an instruction as to voluntary or involuntary manslaughter or self-defense could be rested. It would be absurd to hold like this the trial court should have given instructions concerning which there was no evidence whatever. The appellant, if guilty at all, was guilty of murder. The jury, per instructions, after a trial free from prejudicial error, found the appellant was guilty, and the judgment of the lower court was affirmed.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Corporations — Actions to Recover Corporate Property Brought in Name of Corporation—An action to recover property must be brought in the name of the corporation. An action can not be maintained by one or more of the stockholders unless it be shown that the corporation or its directors brought the action, and that the interests of the stockholders require it necessary that one should be instituted.

Yost & Laffoon and Gordon, Gordon & Cox for appellant.
Waddill & Dempsey for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

Appellant, who was plaintiff below, in his petition stated his cause of action substantially as follows:

That some twenty years ago he founded a corporation, the Reinecke Coal Company, with a capital stock of one thousand dollars, which corporation continued until 1901, when a new corporation styled the Reinecke Coal Company took over the property of the Reinecke Coal Company. That he gave to Bailey, who was defendant below, one hundred shares of stock in the original corporation, and when reorganized in the original corporation, gave him the same number of shares in the new, and also made him secretary and general manager of each of the corporations. That after the organization of the new corporation, the appellee purchased 150 shares of its stock. That by this purchase all the stock in the corporation, except 100 shares, was owned by the appellant and appellee. That during the next five years appellant has owned one-half and appellee one-half of the capital stock of the corporation known as the Reinecke Coal Company, Light & Water Company, and also all the stock, except 100 shares, in the corporation known as Bailey & Company. That the management and control of each of the corporations was exercised by the appellee, and he disbursed the funds thereof. That while holding the stock in the corporations, the appellee wrongfully converted to his own use, for his private purposes, the funds of the corporations to the extent of at least $135,000, no part of which was accounted for either to appellant or the corporations. That upon discovering the fraud committed by appellee, a compromise was made between them, by which appellee assigned to appellant the sum of $50,000—$20,000 of this amount was paid by the assignment and transfer of capital stock of the Reinecke Coal Mining Company, and the balance by the transfer of stock of the Bailey Light & Water Company, and the Bailey Light & Water Company, a corporation of promissory notes. He averred that, under and this settlement, appellee assigned and transferred to him $20,000 of the capital stock of the Reinecke Coal Mining Company, but refused to comply with the other terms of the settlement; and he sought to recover from appellee $30,000 with interest. He also averred that each of the corporations was solvent, and that neither their creditors nor any other person would be affected injuriously by the settlement referred to—that the holders of the three shares of stock had really no interest in the corporations, but were stockholders merely for the purpose of qualifying them to act as directors.

Appellee filed an answer, denying the indebtedness as charged, although admitting that he did wrongfully convert certain funds of the corporations, and that no agreement to compromise or settle on the terms stated in the petition was made, and asked that the shares of stock in the Reinecke Coal Mining Company that were delivered to appellant be restored to him.

The case being submitted on the pleadings, the demurrer to the petition as amended was sustained; and an order entered directing appellant to return to appellee the shares of stock received by him.

Pending the action, the Reinecke Coal Mining Company filed an answer, consenting to the compromise settlement that was the basis of the action, and averred that it had no interest in the litigation. Neither of the other corporations were before the court.

The settlement sued on was made by the son of appellee, acting under a power of attorney. We do not, however, deem it necessary in the disposition of this case to consider the question raised as to the sufficiency of the power of attorney to authorize the settlement, or whether or not the settlement was procured by fraud. Our conclusion is that the special judge who heard the case correctly ruled that appellant as a stockholder in the corporation had no power or authority to make the compromise settlement that was the basis of the action, or to institute in his own name a suit for the embezzlement of the funds of the corporations.

The petition on its face shows that if appellee converted to his own use, or embezzled the funds, concerning which a settlement was made, the funds converted or embezzled belonged to the corporations and not to appellant. There being no averment that the corporation declined to institute the action, the right to institute it was in the corporations and not appellant, who was merely a stockholder. The argument is made for appellant that as there are only three stockholders in the corporations, that is, appellant and appellee, and the nominal owner of the three shares not held by them, and as the corporations are solvent, and the rights of creditors will not be injuriously affected by the settlement, that these facts take the case out of the general rule which it is conceded would vest the right of action as well as the right to make a compromise settlement of claims due the corporations in the corporations. But this argument is not sound, nor it is supported by any authority. There is no escape from the proposition that the wrong, if any, committed by appellee was against the corporations; that the money he embezzled, if any, was the property of the corporations. This seems conclusive of the question that any settlement concerning the wrongful acts of appellee upon which an action could be maintained must have been made by and with the corporations, and that a suit to enforce the settlement must be in the name of the corporations. No matter how many shares of stock Reinecke and Bailey owned, they were merely shareholders in the corporation. The amount or value of stock that one shareholder owns does not confer upon him any greater rights with respect to the corporate property than are vested in smaller stockholders, except in so far as his holdings may enable him to control the interests or dictate the policy of the corporation through its directors or officers. The large stockholder, no more than the smaller one, can substitute himself for the corporation, or make in his own name a settlement affecting its affairs or institute, as an individual, an action concerning its property. This controversy is not an individual matter between Reinecke and Bailey. Nor does the fact that Reinecke owns the principal interest in the stock of the corporations confer upon him the right to make the corporate business a personal matter. That a compromise of doubtful claims is a good consideration to uphold a contract we have no doubt; and if the claim alleged to have been compromised between Reinecke and Bailey related to their individual affairs, it is clear that an action might be maintained upon the compromise agreement, if one was made. But, back of this is the question, whether or not the parties making the compromise have the right to do so, or the authority to maintain an action upon the agreement resulting from it. It is well settled that an action to recover corporate property must be brought in the name of the corporation, and that such an action can not be maintained by one or more stockholders unless it should be shown that the corporation or its directors declined to bring the action, and that the interests of the stockholders make it necessary that one should be instituted. When this state of case is presented, an action to recover corporate property or to protect the interests of the corporation, may be brought by the stockholders. (Collier v. Deering Camp Ground Association, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1799; P., C., C. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Dodd, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2057; Jones v. Johnson, 10 Bush, 649; 10 Cyc., pages 963, 967.)

The judgment is affirmed.

EHRLICK & BERNERO v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Jurisdiction—The complaint that a special grand jury was empaneled to investigate appellants conduct can not be noticed here for, by the provisions of section 281, Civil Code, this court can not pass upon motions to quash indictments.

2. Admonition of Court to Witness—The witness appeared to be trifling with the court who stated in the presence of the jury that it might be a good thing if some people were prosecuted for perjury. The witness deserved disciplining and the remark did not bear on appellants' rights.

3. There was abundant evidence to take the case to the jury.

C. L. Raison, Jr., and Jno. B. O'Neal for appellants.

Jas. Breathitt and Theo. B. Blakey for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellants were convicted of maintaining a public nuisance, and fined $500 and $100 respectively. They set up and operated a pool-room, in Campbell county, just outside the corporate limits of Newport, where betting on horse races throughout the country was indulged in by large crowds attracted to the place by its facilities for betting. The crowds numbered from two hundred to two thousand and assembled daily except Sundays, when races were being run anywhere in the United States.

The principal features of the case are very similar to, if not identical with those of the case of Ehrlick v. Commonwealth, 31 Ky. Law Rep., 401. It is not deemed necessary to restate here the propositions of law there laid down.

In the case at bar appellants complain at the action of the trial court in empanelling a special grand jury to investigate their conduct, which returned the indictment under which they were tried. It is not necessary, because not permissible, for us to notice the grounds of complaint on this score. For the Legislature has seen proper to withhold jurisdiction from this court to pass in review upon motions to quash indictments. (Section 281, Criminal Code; Commonwealth v. Simons, 100 Ky., 164.) We do not mean to be understood as intimating that the action of the trial judge in selecting and empanelling the special grand jury was in any wise irregular. We have not considered that phase of the question at all.

Judgment of abatement was entered after the verdict of the jury. The complaint is that the indictment does not sufficiently describe the premises. The indictment as to the premises says, "Said room is located on the East side of the Alexandria Pike, south of the city of Newport." The preceding language describes it as a place where a pool-room was being conducted by appellants at which large numbers of persons daily congregated. The requirement of the law is that the description should be sufficiently definite to enable the sheriff to find the place. Probably in the light of this record, he could find a place which a thousand or so other people were able to locate every day in the week. "That is certain which may be made certain," is a maxim applying to descriptions of this kind as well as to forcible entry cases. If the sheriff should find it impossible to locate the premises, the order of abatement may have to be amended, as it well could be from the record. If the sheriff should accidentally close the wrong pool-room under this order the public would not suffer from that fact, provided appellants would obey the order of the court and close the right one.

One of the attendants at the pool-room being investigated, was called as a witness by the prosecution. His answers showed that his memory was woefully bad, or that he was uncandid in his statements. He testified to nothing very hurtful to appellants, and to nothing in their favor. The judge, evidently believing that the witness was trifling with the court, thus admonished him:

"I might say this to you by way of admonition; it is your duty to answer these questions frankly. This is not a place for sport. I want this conducted properly; and, I might say, gentlemen, it would be good for this community if some people were prosecuted for perjury."

Appellants object to the judge's statement. If this witness had testified to anything in their favor, it might have been argued that the effect of the statement was to discredit the witness' credibility, and therefore, have damaged their case. Such was not the fact. The witness deserved disciplining. Whether the closing remark was too harsh is a matter that does not appear to us to bear on appellants' rights.

There was abundant evidence of appellants' guilt to take the case to the jury. The rule in this court is, if there is any evidence of guilt, the weight to be given it, and the punishment (within the limits as given in the court's instructions) are questions solely for the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

PARACAMPH CO. v. COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Indictments—Omission to Use Word "Incorporated" in Newspaper Advertisement—Jurisdiction—Appellant was indicted in the Hopkins Circuit Court for its failure to use the word "incorporated" following its name in a newspaper advertisement. As its home office was in Jefferson county, the Hopkins Circuit Court was without jurisdiction, and while the question could not be raised in a special demurrer, it should have been raised in the answer in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction. The lower court should have discharged the defendant when it was made to appear in the amended answer that its principal place of business was in Louisville. (32 Ky. Law Rep., 189.)

Johnson & Jennings for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellant, Paracamph Co., whose place of business is in Louisville, Ky., was indicted in Hopkins county for a violation of section 576, Kentucky Statutes. The particular offense charged against appellant was publishing an advertisement of its business in the "Hustler," of Hopkinsville, without having under its corporate name the word "incorporated." Appellant first filed a special demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court. It then filed an answer in two paragraphs. In the first paragraph it pleaded not guilty, and in the second alleged that it had upon its letter heads, checks and envelopes, and all other written or printed matter, the word "incorporated;" that it was impossible for anyone to deal with appellant without knowing it was a corporation. Subsequently it offered to file an amended answer in which it alleged that its principal place of business was in Louisville, Ky. It then set out more specifically the allegations contained in its first answer in regard to its having the word "incorporated" upon all of its literature. The court refused to permit this amended answer to be filed. The case was then submitted to the court and judgment rendered, imposing a fine of $150 on appellant, of which it complains.

It is insisted by appellant that the Hopkins Circuit Court was without jurisdiction of the offense charged.

The question here involved was recently before this court in the well-considered case of Commonwealth v. Remington Typewriter Co.: 32 Ky. Law Rep., 189, wherein it was said:

"The offense against the statute is more certainly committed where its home office in this State is than in any other county where a stray magazine or a fugitive newspaper might find its way, or other kind of advertising be used. In prosecutions for violations like this it seems to us better for the interest of all parties concerned that the venue should be fixed in one county, if it can with propriety be done, so that persons desiring to proceed against the corporation in default may know where to institute proceedings, and the corporation may know in what court it will be proceeded against. We doubt if the Commonwealth would contend that, if an advertisement in violation of the statute was inserted in a newspaper that circulated in every county in the State, prosecutions might be instituted and convictions had in each of the 119 counties. In other words, could not a conviction in one county be pleaded as a bar to the prosecutions in the others? It is not, however, necessary to further elaborate this view. If it should be entertained by the court in a case where it was presented, only one recovery could be had, and this, it seems to us, should be in the county where its principal office or place of business in the State is located, or where its designated officer for service of process resides. Nor will the efficiency of the statute which subserves a useful purpose be impaired by this ruling."

As appellant's principal place of business or home office was in Louisville, Jefferson county, Ky., it necessarily follows that the Hopkins Circuit Court was without jurisdiction to try appellant. True, the question of jurisdiction could not be raised by special demurrer, for there was nothing in the record to show where appellant's principal place of business was located. The question should have been raised by an answer in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction. However, when it was made to appear to the trial court by appellant's second amended answer that its home office or principal place of business was in Louisville, Jefferson county, Ky., it was then the duty of the court to discharge the defendant for the reason that it was apparent that the court was without jurisdiction.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss appellant.

STANDARD SANITARY MANUFACTURING CO. v. MINOR.

(Filed September 24, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Master and Servant—Instructions—In this action by appellee to recover damages for injuries resulting from the alleged negligence of the appellant by which he was injured, held that the facts warranted the submission of the case to the jury, and they were correctly told by the trial court that if the master knew the force was inadequate to do the work assigned, and the plaintiff did not know it, and because of this he was injured, the master is liable except for the plaintiff's negligence.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

J. A. Skaggs for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellant, a laborer in appellee's employ, was set to work with three other men to unload from a car a number of iron pipes about twenty feet long and twelve inches in diameter. It was raining and sleeting, and it is charged that the force was inadequate for the task. Notwithstanding complaint was made by the boss in charge of the work to appellee's foreman, they were ordered to proceed with the work. The men handling one end of one of the pipes let it slip, and it rolled down on appellant, crushing his ankle and otherwise injuring his leg. He recovered a verdict and judgment for $500 as damages in this action. On this appeal the appellant has not argued or briefed the case. But we assume from the motion for a new trial in the Circuit Court that the grounds of complaint are that the court misinstructed the jury as to the law governing appellant's liability. The instructions, in substance, were that it was the duty of the master to furnish enough force to do the work with reasonable safety to all those engaged in it; that if it knew, or by ordinary care could have known, that the force was inadequate, and if the plaintiff did not know it, and in consequence of such lack of adequate force plaintiff was injured, the master was liable to the injured servant, except for the latter's own negligence in the matter, if any. And such we understand to be the law. The facts warranted the submission of the case to the jury, whose verdict can not be said to be flagrantly against the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. LANDIS.

(Filed September 24, 1908—To be reported.)

Indictment—Carnal Knowledge of Female Under Sixteen Years of Age—Allegations—Sufficiency—Under section 1511, Kentucky Statutes, as amended by the Acts of 1906, which reads: "Whoever shall, unlawfully, carnally know a female under the age of sixteen years, or an idiot, shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than ten nor more than twenty years," an indictment against a man charging him with carnally knowing a female under the age of sixteen years need not allege that such female was not the wife of the accused.

Jas Breathitt, Tom McGregor and B. J. Bethurum for appellant.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, ordering law certified.

Appellee was indicted charged with the offense of carnally knowing a female under the age of sixteen years. The indictment is as follows:

"The grand jury of Pulaski county, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse J. C. Landis of the crime of carnally knowing a female under the age of sixteen years, committed in the manner and form as follows, viz: The said Landis, on the last day of May, 1908, before the finding of this indictment and in the county and State aforesaid, did unlawfully, carnally know Esther Miller, who was then and there a female under the age of sixteen years, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

To this indictment the appellee entered a plea of "not guilty," was tried and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for ten years. He filed a motion and grounds for a new trial, and, upon hearing, this motion was sustained, the verdict of the jury was set aside and appellee granted a new trial. The proof offered by the Commonwealth warranted the finding of the jury, and it is alleged that the trial judge granted a new trial because the indictment failed to charge that appellee and the prosecuting witness were not husband and wife, and that the proof failed to establish this fact. The only question before us on this appeal is the sufficiency of the indictment.

This indictment is drawn under section 1511, of the Kentucky Statutes, as amended by the Acts of 1906, which reads as follows:

"Whoever shall unlawfully, carnally know a female under the age of sixteen years, or an idiot, shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than ten nor more than twenty years."

The indictment follows substantially the language of the statute. Sub-section 2, of section 122, of the Criminal Code, provides that: "An indictment must contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; and with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment, on conviction, according to the right of the case."

Section 124, of the Criminal Code, defines the facts that must be stated with certainty in an indictment to be "the party" and "the offense" charged, the county in which the offense was committed, and the particular circumstances of the offense charged, if they be necessary to constitute a complete offense. The particular circumstances of the offense charged in the case at bar are those defined by the statute as amended by the act of 1926, creating the offense. Section 136, of the Criminal Code, provides that the words used in the statute to define an offense need not be strictly pursued in an indictment, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used.

Measured by these Code provisions the indictment in the case at bar meets the requirements of the law, unless it can be said that, under sub-section 4, of section 124, above referred to, it is necessary to allege that the accused and the female whom he is charged with carnally knowing were not husband and wife, in order to constitute a complete offense. We know of no authority so holding, nor are we referred to any such.

In Roberson's Criminal Law, section 271, it is stated that, in "an indictment under the statute concerning rape on infants under twelve years of age, * * * sex need not be alleged, the indictment is sufficient if it gives a woman's name and uses the pronouns 'she' and 'her,' in speaking of the person on whom the rape was committed. The word 'female' in an indictment is equivalent to the word 'woman.' It need not be averred that the woman was not the wife of the defendant."

And, in the case of the Commonwealth v. Fogarty, 69 Am. Dec., 264 (Mass.), the court, in passing upon the sufficiency of an indictment for rape, said:

"Nor was it necessary to allege that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. Such an averment has never been deemed essential in indictments for rape, either in this country or in England. The precedents contain no such allegations. A husband may be guilty at common law as principal in the second degree of a rape upon his wife by assisting another man to commit rape upon her, and under our statute would be liable to be punished in the same manner as the principal felon. An indictment charging him as principal would, therefore, be valid. Of course, it would always be competent for a party indicted to show, in defense of a charge of rape alleged to be actually committed by himself, that the woman on whom it was charged to have been committed was his wife. But it is not necessary to negative the fact in the indictment."

In the case of State v. Williamson, 83 Am. St. Reports, 780 (Utah), it was expressly held that an indictment for rape need not specify the sex of the defendant, nor that the person ravished was not his wife.

These authorities are directly in point, and we have been able to find none holding the contrary view.

We are of opinion that the indictment is a good indictment for the offense charged, and this opinion is ordered to be certified to the lower court as the law of the case.

LATHAM v. LINDSAY.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Instructions—Motion to Strike From Record—Affirm as Delay Case—The motion to strike the instructions from the record must be sustained because there is no order identifying them, but it can not be said from the record that the appeal was prosecuted for delay. The bill of evidence is sufficiently identified to show that it is the genuine bill.

Petrie & Standard for appellant.

Trimble & Mallory and C. A. Denny for appellee.

Appeal from Todd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, overruling motion.

Appellee's motion to strike the bill of exceptions from the record must be overruled. There is no bill of exceptions in the record. The "bill of evidence," which is the stenographer's bill, attested by the trial judge, is sufficiently identified to satisfy us; prima facie, it is the genuine bill, and it may stay in the record for whatever proper purpose it may serve on the trial.

The motion to strike the instructions from the record, as copied therein by the clerk, must prevail. There is no order identifying them as the instructions given on the trial. The instructions, to constitute a part of the record, must be identified by an order of court, or be contained in a bill of exceptions, duly signed and filed in the record.

The motion to affirm as a delay case is overruled. The attorneys for appellee failed to endorse the record as required by section 759, Civil Code. Besides, when the appellee feels that he must file a brief—a long brief—on the motion to affirm as a delay case, that itself indicates that the case presents a debatable question. In addition, we cannot say from the record that the appeal was prosecuted merely for delay.

WILSON v. L. & N. R. R. CO.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Action Against—Several Causes of Actions—Code Provision—There is no authority conferred by the Code of Practice to bring an action for an injury to a passenger in the county where the carrier agrees to deliver the property, and section 83, of the Code does not remedy this, for under this section one of the conditions precedent to uniting several causes of action is that each may be brought in the same county, and there being no authority given to sue for injury to the passenger as first indicated, it follows that the two causes of action can not be brought in the same jurisdiction.

Grant E. Lilly for appellant.

John T. Shelby, Chas. H. Moorman, Benjamin D. Warfield and J. Tevis Cobb for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellant, E. Wilson, who then resided at Afton, Indian Territory, contracted with the "Frisco" line at that point, to transport a car-load of household goods and live stock from Afton to Rice's station in Estill county, Kentucky. By the terms of the contract he had the privilege of riding in the car or on the train carrying the car from Afton to his destination. The car was delivered to appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, at St. Louis, and was transported by it from that point to Richmond, Ky. There it was delivered to the Louisville & Atlantic Railroad Company, to be taken to Rice's Station, in Estill county.

After reaching Kentucky, appellant brought this action in the Madison Circuit Court against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Louisville & Atlantic Railroad Co. In the first paragraph of his petition appellant asked for the recovery of $36.80, which he alleged the Louisville & Atlantic Railroad Company wrongfully required him to pay as additional freight on the shipment. In the first clause of the second paragraph of the petition, appellant asked damages on the ground that while the car containing the goods and live stock was on the side track in St. Louis, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company carelessly and negligently ran one of its engines, or a portion of its train, against the car with such violence as to break and damage the goods contained therein to the extent of $50. In the second clause of the second paragraph appellant asked damages in the sum of $500 for personal injuries sustained by him in the same collision in which his goods were damaged. In the third paragraph of the petition appellant asked damages in the sum of $50 on account of delay to his shipment at Richmond.

Appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, filed an answer in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction of the Madison Circuit Court as to each of the causes of action set forth in the petition. The lower court adjudged that it had jurisdiction of appellee as to the cause of action for $50 damages for injury to the household goods and also to the cause of action for the delay at Richmond asserted in the third paragraph of the petition. It further adjudged that it had not jurisdiction of appellee as to the cause of action for $500 damages on account of personal injuries asserted in the second paragraph of the petition. Appellant's petition as to the last named cause of action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and from this judgment the present appeal is prosecuted.

It is the contention of appellant that his cause of action, both for the injury to himself and his property, arises entirely out of the contract of shipment; that the injury which he received, both to himself and to his property, was the result of one wrongful act; that the law does not contemplate that such an action, arising from one wrongful act, shall be split up, and one part of the damages sued for in one jurisdiction and the other part sued for in another jurisdiction. Appellant further contends that, under sections 1 and 6, of section 83, of the Civil Code, express authority is given to joint actions arising from contracts or for injuries to persons and property. For the purpose of discussing the question, we give below the provisions of the Code relative to the point involved:

"Section 73. Excepting the actions mentioned in section 75, an action against a common carrier, whether a corporation or not, upon a contract to carry property, must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or either of several defendants, resides; or in which the contract is made; or in which the carrier agrees to deliver the property. An action against such carrier for an injury to a passenger, or to other person or his property, must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or either of several defendants, resides; or in which the plaintiff or his property is injured; or in which he resides, if he reside in a county in which the carrier passes.

"Section 83. Several causes of action may be united, if each affect all the parties to the action, may be brought in the same county, and may be prosecuted by the same kind of action; and if all of them be brought:

"1. Upon contracts, express or implied; or * * *

"6. For injuries to person and property."

The first part of section 73 fixes the venue of the action against the common carrier upon a contract to carry property. Such an action may be brought at the residence of the defendant, in the county where the contract is made, or the county in which the carrier agrees to deliver the property. In this case the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company agreed to deliver the property at Richmond, Madison county, Kentucky. Therefore, it was proper to bring an action growing out of the contract of shipment in the Madison Circuit Court. But the latter part of section 73, expressly provides that an action for an injury to a passenger, "or to other person or his property, must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or either of several defendants, resides; or in which the plaintiff or his property is injured; or in which he resides, if he reside in a county in which the carrier passes." By the latter provision no authority is given to bring an action for an injury to a passenger in the county where the carrier agrees to deliver the property. On this account section 83 does not remedy the matter, for under that section one of the conditions precedent to uniting several causes of action is that each may be brought in the same county. No authority being given to bring the action for injury to a passenger in the county where the carrier agrees to deliver the property, it necessarily follows that the two causes of action can not be brought in the same jurisdiction.

It appears from the record that appellant's residence is in Estill county, Kentucky; that appellee's residence is in Louisville, Kentucky. Madison county, therefore, is neither the residence of appellee nor appellant. The Madison Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the claims for damages relating to the household goods, because the action was instituted in the county where appellee agreed to deliver the property. The Code does not authorize the bringing of a suit in such county for an injury to a passenger. We, therefore, conclude that the judgment of the trial court, in so holding, was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. MORRIS, &c.

(Filed September 24, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Landlords—Knowingly Leasing Premises for Unlawful Sale of Liquors—Evidence Necessary—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 2557, imposing a penalty against one who shall knowingly furnish or rent a house in which spirituous liquors are sold, in violation of law, in order to sustain a conviction under said act against the landlord, it is necessary that there should be some evidence, direct or circumstantial, conducing to show that the landlord knew, or had such information, as would put a person of ordinary prudence upon notice, at or before the time the lease was entered into, that it was the purpose of the lessee to sell such liquors in violation of law upon the leased premises.

2. Renting Premises in Good Faith—Legitimate Purpose—Where the owner of property or premises furnishes or rents it in good faith to be used for legitimate purposes, he can not be subjected to a criminal prosecution under the statute because the lessee violated the law.

3. Same—Right to Cancel Lease—Absence of Statute or Contract—In the absence of a statute or a provision in the contract of leasing authorizing the landlord to cancel the lease or take possession of the rented property if the lessee or occupier violates the law, the mere fact that he does so will not warrant the landlord in ejecting him.

Jas. Breathitt, Tom. B. McGregor and D. A. McCandless for appellant.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

The appellees were indicted for a violation of that part of section 2557, of the Kentucky Statutes, providing that: "Any person who knowingly furnishes or rents a house, room, wagon, or any conveyance or thing in which spirituous, vinous or malt liquors are sold, bartered or loaned, in violation of this act, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than sixty nor more than one hundred dollars; and the house, wagon, vehicle, land or other thing in which the liquors were sold, bartered or loaned, shall be liable for all fines adjudged against the person selling, bartering or loaning the same."

The charge in the body of the indictment was that they "unlawfully and knowingly furnished and rented to E. T. Willis a certain drug store, on Washington street, in the town of Glasgow, in which spirituous liquors were sold during the month of November, 1907, and at said time and place, and in said house, said Willis sold spirituous liquors, by retail, to T. B. Gibb, and said Mrs. Morris and Lewis Morris rented and furnished said house to said Willis during said month with the knowledge that he would so sell liquor in violation of law at said time and place."

Upon the conclusion of the evidence for the Commonwealth, the court directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty.

The evidence shows that in July, 1906, the appellee rented to E. T. Willis a storeroom to be used as a drug store for a term of two years, with the privilege, on the part of Willis, of renewing the lease for an additional term of two years. There is no evidence whatever that the lessors knew before, or at the time the lease was entered into, that Willis intended to, or would sell, liquor on the leased premises, in violation of law, or that they in any manner consented to, or approved, of the sale of it; although it appears that in 1907 he did sell and deliver liquor in violation of law to various persons on the leased premises, for which sales he was indicted and convicted in the Barren Circuit Court. And there is evidence conducing to show that appellees knew that illegal sales of liquor were made on the premises in 1907. The question to be determined is, do these facts constitute a violation by appellees of the statute. We think not. To sustain a conviction under this statute it is necessary that there should be some evidence, direct or circumstantial, conducing to show that the owner or controller of the leased property, or premises knew, or had such information, as would put a person of ordinary prudence upon notice, at or before the time the lease was entered into that it was the intention of the lessee to sell, in violation of law, liquor in or upon the property or premises leased. Where the owner or controller of the property or premises furnishes or rents it in good faith to be used for legal and legitimate purposes, he can not be subjected to a criminal prosecution under the statute because the lessee violates the law. Statutes in some respects similar to the one under consideration, and having the same purpose in view, have been enacted in a number of States. In some of them it is provided that the landlord or lessor becomes liable to a penal prosecution if he permits the tenant or lessee to continue in the use of the premises or property with knowledge that he is conducting in them business in violation of law. To afford the landlord the means of relieving himself from liability, these statutes also provide that he may at any time during the term eject the tenant who has been guilty of violations of the statute. But our statute does not go this far. It does not make the landlord or owner liable because the tenant or lessee, after obtaining possession of the property or premises, violates the statute; nor does it give him the right, for this cause, to eject the tenant and take possession of the premises or property during the term. In the absence of a statute, or a provision in the contract, authorizing the landlord to cancel the lease, or take possession of the rented property if the lessee or occupier violates the law, the mere fact that he does so will not warrant the landlord in ejecting him. Nor do we know of any authority that imposes upon the landlord the duty of stipulating in the contract that a violation of law by the tenant will work a forfeiture of the lease. In the absence of notice, as herein indicated, the lessor who rents his property for legitimate purposes may assume that the tenant will not violate the law, but, if he does, the landlord can not be subjected to criminal liability for his misdoings under the present statute. Judgment affirmed.

GEARHART v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 25, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Jurisdiction—Indictment Found in Wrong Court—Transferred to Proper County—Under section 230, of the Criminal Code, where, on the trial of a defendant under an indictment for a misdemeanor, it appeared that the offense was not committed in the county in which the indictment was found, it was proper for the trial court, on the motion of the attorney for the Commonwealth, to discharge the jury and transfer the prosecution to the county in which the offense was committed, as provided in sections 166 and 167, Criminal Code.

2. Same—Indictment Transferred—Proceedings Therein—Bail to Answer—When on the trial of a misdemeanor indictment it was found that the offense was committed in another county, and the indictment and trial was transferred to the county in which the offense was committed, it was not proper for the court to which it was transferred to try the case on the indictment found in another county, but the court to which the indictment was transferred should have held the defendant to bail for his appearance in the latter court to answer any indictment that might be found therein.

Henry L. Wood for appellant.

James Breathitt and T. B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Elliott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellant, Peter Gearhart, was indicted by the grand jury of Carter county for the offense of selling sperituous, vinous and malt liquors in that county in violation of the local option laws. When the case was called for trial at the special term of the Carter Circuit Court, it developed, upon the hearing, that the offense was committed in Elliott county. Thereupon the Commonwealth's attorney moved the court to transfer the case to the Elliott Circuit Court for trial, which was done over the objection of appellant. The case was not re-committed to the grand jury of Elliott county, but appellant was tried on the original indictment by the Carter county grand jury. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and fixed appellant's punishment at a fine of $60 and 20 days in jail.

This appeal involves two questions: 1. Was the case properly transferred from the Carter Circuit Court to the Elliott Circuit Court? 2. Was it proper to try appellant on the indictment returned in the Carter Circuit Court?

Section 230, of the Criminal Code, is as follows: "If, during the trial, it shall appear that the offense was committed out of the jurisdiction of the court, but within the jurisdiction of some other court of this State, the court shall stop the trial, discharge the jury, and take the proceedings in the case directed in sections 166 and 167."

While it is true that sections 166 and 167 apply only to felony cases, there is nothing in section 230 that limits its application to such cases. We, therefore, conclude that it applies alike to felonies and misdemeanors. It follows, that it was proper for the Carter Circuit Court to transfer the case to othe Elliott Circuit Court.

But was it proper for the Elliott Circuit Court to try appellant on the indictment returned by the Carter Circuit Court? The indictment in question charged appellant with the offense of violating the local option laws by selling spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in Carter county. Manifestly, therefore, the Elliott Circuit Court could not try a man for an offense committed in Elliott county upon an indictment for an offense committed in Carter county. In the first place, the Elliott Circuit Court would have no jurisdiction of the offense if committed in Carter county; in the second place, proof to the effect that an offense was committed in Elliott county would not sustain an indictment charging an offense in Carter county. We, therefore, conclude that the action of the Elliott Circuit Court, in trying appellant upon the indictment in question, was erroneous. Instead of trying him upon that indictment, he should have been held to bail to answer for his appearance to an indictment by the Elliott Circuit Court.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to hold appellant to bail to answer for his appearance to an indictment by the Elliott Circuit Court.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Obstructing Crossing—Use of Word "Willfully" in Indictment—The word "willfully" in an indictment charging a railroad with willfully suffering a train of cars to obstruct a public crossing, was used in the sense that the obstruction was intentional and not accidental, it being proved that the train of cars was intentionally permitted to remain across the street 30 or 40 minutes.

2. Instructions—The use of the expression 30 minutes in an instruction was not a prejudicial error in view of the fact that under an instruction the whole matter as to the reasonableness of time was left to the jury, and whether or not the obstruction was necessary to make repairs.

J. I. Blanton and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellant appeals from a judgment against it for blocking a street crossing in the city of Cynthiana for an unreasonable length of time. The material part of the indictment upon which it was found is as follows:

"The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, an incorporated company under the laws of the State of Kentucky, on the 8th day of September, 1907, in the county and State aforesaid, and before finding of this indictment, did unlawfully and willfully suffer, permit, and cause a train of cars under the control, management and directions of said company to obstruct a public highway in the city of Cynthiana by placing and causing to be placed a train of cars of a freight train upon and across a public highway known as the Oddville Road in the said town of Cynthiana, and between Church street and Walnut street in said town, and suffering, permitting and causing said train of cars to remain and obstruct said highway for an unnecessary and unreasonable time, to-wit: for thirty minutes, to the common nuisance of May Ammerman, Mrs. S. A. Mickey there and then and all good citizens there and then in the neighborhood, passing, repassing, and residing and being and then and there having the right to pass, repass, reside, and be."

Appellant asks a reversal, first, for the reason that it was charged that it "willfully" obstructed the crossing, and there was no proof to sustain the charge that it was "willfully" done. This word was used in the indictment as meaning that it was intentionally done and not accidentally. It was proven without contradiction that this train of cars was intentionally permitted to remain across the street for a period from thirty to forty minutes, preventing the passage of twenty-five or thirty persons, who had assembled there, for that length of time.

The defense of appellant was that this was caused by accident which it could not avoid. The stopping of this train across the street was caused by the pulling out of a draw-head in one of the cars near the rear end of the train, which was south of the crossing. The engine and a considerable portion of the train were north of the crossing. The conductor testified that he could not prevent the blocking of the crossing for the reason that he sent, as he was required to do by the rules of the company, the front brakeman up the road ahead of the train and the other brakeman to the rear for the purpose of protecting his train, and that it left no one but himself to repair the damage to the train. He did not explain why he did not cut the crossing, and let the engine move up and make an opening at the crossing while he was repairing the damage, or why he did not call upon the fireman to aid him do so. The station in Cynthiana was about one block ahead of the engine when it stopped. This station was a signal station, and no train had the right to pass it without a signal given by the agent at the station, authorizing it to do so. The front brakeman testified that he only went to that station to protect his train.

Appellant objected to the use of the words, "to-wit: thirty minutes" for the reason, its counsel says, that by this language the court determined what was a reasonable time in which to clear the crossing and the question should have been left to the jury. The use of these words in the instruction we presume, was caused by the court copying them from the indictment inadvertently, and would have been a prejudicial error but for the fact, under the evidence the jury could not have been misled, and especially when considered with instruction number three, which is as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence that by reason of an accident to the train at the time and place mentioned in the evidence it was necessary to obstruct said highway in order to make the necessary repairs on said train and further believe from the evidence that the defendant, its agents and employes did not obstruct said highway longer than it was reasonably necessary under the circumstances to make the necessary repairs, the law is for the defendant, and it should be acquitted."

Under this instruction the whole matter was left to the jury as to the reasonableness of time, and whether or not it was necessary to obstruct the crossing to make the repairs.

Finding no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

While the general rule may be that in drafting an indictment under a statute, whose enacting clause contains exceptions, it must negative such exceptions, it is not necessary to do so in the terms of the statute, provided the whole indictment does so in language that leaves no doubt that the accused does not belong to the excepted class. Adams Express Co. v. COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

LEE v. WHEAT.

(Filed September 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Goad & Oliver for appellant.

Appeal from ——— Circuit Court.

Bradburn & Basham and J. H. Gilliam for appellee.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing, overruling.

A mere mistake in the calls of the deed can not affect the title when the lines and corners are established, and adverse possession is taken and held for over fifteen years to the lines and corners thus established and recognized on the ground.

Petition overruled.

COMMONWEALTH v. BOYD, JR.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Homicide—Self-Defense—Law Of—Instruction—The single error complained of in this record is the failure of the trial court to give an instruction asked for upon the law of self-defense, and while the instruction properly expresses the law of self-defense, it was unnecessary to give it because of one previously given by the court on its own motion which it approved as a correct exposition of the law on this subject. While the verbiage of the instruction may differ somewhat, it is in meaning and substance such as have been approved by the former opinions of this court.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom. B. McGregor for appellant.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, certifying the law.

The Commonwealth prosecutes this appeal to obtain a certification of the law as to certain alleged erroneous rulings of the circuit court, made upon the trial of appellee under an indictment charging him with the murder of James Sparks. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment of acquittal.

Numerous errors were assigned in the motion and grounds for a new trial filed in the court below, but only one of them is discussed in the brief of counsel representing the Commonwealth in this court, and as to it he merely expresses a doubt, frankly admitting that in other respects the record seems substantially free from prejudicial error. We, therefore, deem it only necessary to consider this single complaint which is as to the refusal of the trial court to give instruction No. 3, asked by counsel for the Commonwealth. That instruction reads as follows:

"If you shall believe from the evidence that at the time the defendant, R. Boyd, Jr., so shot at and wounded James Sparks, as to cause or hasten his death within a year and a day thereafter, (if you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so) he believed and had reasonable grounds to believe that he was then and there in danger of immediate death, or the infliction of some great bodily harm, at the hands of the said James Sparks, and that it was necessary or was believed by the defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary, to so shoot at and kill deceased in order to avert that danger, real, or to the defendant, apparent, then you ought to acquit the defendant, upon the grounds of self-defense or apparent necessity therefor."

This instruction properly expresses the law of self-defense, but the giving of it was unnecessary as the court on its own motion had previously given the following instruction on that aspect of the case:

"Although you may believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Robert Boyd, Jr., did, in Laurel county, Kentucky, and before the finding of the indictment against him, willfully shoot and wound James Sparks, so as to cause or hasten his death within a year and a day thereafter, yet if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, believed and had reasonable grounds to believe, from all the facts and circumstances proven in this case, that said James Sparks, just preceding the firing of the first shot by the defendant, was about to make an attack upon the defendant, and that by reason thereof, the defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, believed and had grounds to believe, that he was then and there in danger of suffering loss of life or great bodily harm at the hands of said James Sparks, and that it was necessary or believed by the defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary to so shoot at and kill said James Sparks, in order to avert that danger, real, or to the defendant apparent, then you ought to acquit the defendant upon the grounds of self-defense or apparent necessity therefor."

This instruction, though in some respects differing in language from instruction No. 3, is substantially like it and equally correct. Indeed, in view of the peculiar nature of the facts and circumstances leading to and attending the homicide, we incline to the opinion that it was more appropriate than the one refused. The killing was but the culmination of a hostile attitude, maintained by deceased for a long time toward appellant, which seemed to have manifested itself in numerous insults, threats and demonstrations, which, in connection with the declaration and actions of deceased at the time of the killing, were reasonably calculated to induce appellee to believe, and have reasonable grounds to believe that he was then in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased.

The law of self-defense has, time and again, been stated in the opinions of this court, but without always employing the identical words. While the instruction given by the court may not precisely conform in verbiage to others that have received its approval, it is, in language and meaning, a correct exposition of the law of self-defense, as applied to the facts of this case.

It is therefore ordered that this opinion be certified to the lower court as the law of this case.

THOMAS v. HOBBS' EX'OR.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's Estates—Claim Against for Nursing Deceased—Absence of Contract For—The record shows that the care of deceased by appellant was in the absence of an agreement and without expectation that she should be compensated, and the presumption is that it was rendered by one member of a family to another. The claim for services, was therefore, properly disallowed.

Geo. S. Fulton and John A. Fulton for appellant.

J. D. Wickliffe for appellee.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Margaret B. Hobbs died in Nelson county, about 86 years of age, leaving an estate worth about $12,000 or $15,000. She had no children and made a will by which she disposed of her estate. After her death Alice M. Thomas asserted a claim against her estate for nursing and taking care of her at $200 a year for the five years preceding her death, amounting in all to $1,000. The claim was controverted by the executor, and proof being taken, was disallowed by the circuit court. Mrs. Thomas appeals.

Some twenty-two years before Mrs. Hobbs' death, and soon after Mrs. Thomas was married, she and her husband went to live with Mrs. Hobbs in her home, the arrangement apparently being that Mrs. Thomas and her husband would board Mrs. Hobbs for the use of her home. They lived there in this way until Mr. Thomas died, about fifteen years later; and after his death, Mrs. Hobbs and Mrs. Thomas continued to live there together until Mrs. Hobbs' death about seven years afterward. During the life of Mr. Thomas, Mrs. Hobbs paid some of the family expenses, and after his death, the weight of the evidence shows, that she paid the greater part, if not all, of the family expenses. The family consisted of herself and Mrs. Thomas and an old family servant who did the cooking and lived in a cabin near the house, her daughter and her daughter's child being there with them more or less of the time. Mrs. Thomas was a dressmaker by trade, and followed her business of dress-making. Mrs. Hobbs was a fairly well preserved old lady for her age. Four or five years before her death she had a spell of grip from which she was quite sick for about two months. Three years after this she had another attack of sickness, but this did not last very long, and in her final sickness she was sick something like three weeks. Beside these attacks, she had minor attacks from time to time. During all of these spells Mrs. Thomas waited upon her and took care of her with commendable faithfulness. But the proof utterly fails to show that there was any expectation on the part of Mrs. Hobbs to pay Mrs. Thomas for her services, or that the circumstances under which the services were rendered, were such as to warrant any expectation on the part of Mrs. Thomas that she would be paid. She can not testify as to anything that took place between her and Mrs. Hobbs, and no other witness testifies to any facts from which a promise to pay for these services can be inferred. The two ladies had lived together as one family for twenty-two years; and after Mr. Thomas' death, it is evident that Mrs. Thomas was in straightened circumstances. There is no more reason why Mrs. Thomas should be paid for the last five years' services than for the previous years. They lived together as one family during the last five years just as they had lived before. Mrs. Hobbs, as shown by the weight of the evidence, not only bore the expenses of the family and thus gave Mrs. Thomas a home, but she was a person who did not make debts. She paid for everything as she went and the proof leaves no doubt in our minds that if she had understood that Mrs. Thomas was asserting a claim against her for services, it would have been settled then and there, and the existing arrangement would have been broken up. The facts shown by the proof are sufficient to raise a presumption that the services sued for were rendered by one member of the family to another, without any expectation of a charge being made therefor, and no reason is shown why the claim for the services was not presented to Mrs. Hobbs in her lifetime; and manifestly the entire claim except for the services in the last sickness, could have been so presented.

Under all the evidence we conclude that the circuit court properly disallowed the claim.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. CONWAY.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Liquors—Illegal Sale Of—Landlord and Tenant—Construction of Statute—While it may be within the province of the Legislature to do so, it has gone no further than to make punishable the renting of a tenement for its illegal sale of liquors where the owner knew at the time the use to which the property was to be put, and the Legislature has not yet said that the owner is to be responsible for the use to which his premises are put without his knowledge when leasing it, that it was to be so used.

The indictment in this case, as above indicated, was bad on demurrer.

John McChord for appellee.

Jas. Breathitt, Tom B. McGregor and R. L. Durham for appellant.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice O'Rear, affirming.

Appellee, owner of a house which was situated in local option territory, was indicted for violating section 2557, Kentucky Statutes, penalizing one who "knowingly furnishes and rents a room to another in which spirituous liquors are sold in a territory where the local option law was in force, in violation of said local option law."

The indictment charges that appellant did "unlawfully" furnish and rent a room to one Putnam in a territory where the local option law was in force, and that appellant "knew said Putnam was selling spirituous liquors, to-wit: whisky, in said room so furnished and rented" in violation of the local option statutes. The indictment was held bad on demurrer, and the Commonwealth has appealed from the judgment dismissing it on that ground. It may be conceded that it is within the competency of the State to make the owner of real property liable for its use for illegal purposes by the tenant, but such is not the statute in this case. The Legislature has gone no further than to make punishable the renting of a tenement for its illegal sale of liquors in certain territory where the owner knew when he contracted that such was the use to which it was to be put. While the sentence in the statute does not express with grammatical accuracy the idea of the owner's liability if he lets his premises to be used for the illegal purpose, with knowledge at the time of the renting that such is its intended use, we gather such to be the legislative intent from the context of the whole section. A renting could scarcely be otherwise than knowingly done. It is a contract, in which the assent of the mind of each party to it is an essential. The adverb "knowingly" must be referable then to some other word or clause than renting or furnishing the room or house. The object of the Legislature was, we think, to reach that class of landlords who enter into the outlawed business by furnishing one of the necessary means for carrying it on, namely, the house or room in which it is to be conducted. The knowledge of the landlord that makes him criminally a party to the illegal transaction is not alone in renting the house. Nor could it well be in the fact after the renting (which might be otherwise perfectly legal) that the tenant put the premises to an illegal use. It is true that if property is rented for one use the tenant can not apply it to a wholly different use without forfeiting his lease; and in such case, if the landlord, after knowledge of the wrongful perversion by his tenant suffers the tenancy to continue, and the illegal traffic be continued in it by his tenant, the case might fall within the statute being considered. But there is no such allegation in this indictment. So, we conclude, that the purpose of the legislation in question was to illegalize the renting of the property for the unlawful traffic in liquors in local option territory, the landlord knowing when he leased it that such was to be its use.

Some States have legislated upon this subject more stringently than Kentucky has. They make leases voidable where, subsequent to their execution, the tenant puts them to use as places for the illegal sale of liquors. (Machias Hotel Co. v. Fisher, 56 Me., 321; O'Connell v. McGrath, 14 Allen, Mass., 289; Zink v. Grant, 25 Ohio Statutes, 352; Feret v. Hill, 15 C. B., 207; Gaelet v. Lawor, 16 Misc., N. Y., 59; Prescott v. Kyle, 103 Mass., 381.) And in those jurisdictions the courts hold that the landlord may be punished who rents or suffers his property to be so used. That is because, as seems likely, that the law gives the landlord a continued control over his premises as to such uses, in spite of his contract. But there is no such statute in this State; and at the common law such use by the tenant for illegal purposes does not avoid the lease, and consequently does not give the landlord the right to re-enter (Miller v. Forman, 37 N. J. L., 55.) If the appellant were a druggist, we may say, and if having rented the house in question for a drug store, yet the tenant unlawfully sold liquors therein, the main business for which he rented the property would not necessarily be abandoned, and the landlord, without some reservation in the contract of a right to declare the lease at an end, would have no control over the matter. The Legislature has not yet said that the owner is to be responsible for the use to which his premises are put, without his knowledge when leasing it that it was to be so used.

The offense denounced by section 2557, Kentucky Statutes, supra, is entirely different from those made by sections 2571 and 2572, Kentucky Statutes, the latter sections being aimed at the "person in possession" of premises in which liquors are illegally sold in local option territory, upon the idea that the one in possession of property has complete control over its use by himself and all others.

We think the indictment in this case did not state a public offense. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

SMITH v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 23, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Horse Stealing—Possession Under Pretense of Hiring—Felonious Intent—Conversion—Where one gets possession of another's horses under the fraudulent pretense of hiring them, but without intending to return them, and with the felonious intent of converting them to his own use, he is guilty of stealing, and in such case the removal of them from the owner's custody is a conversion without proof of a subsequent sale or other wrongful disposition of them.

2. Defense—Unsound Mind—Opinion Evidence—Non-expert Witnesses—The mere expression or an opinion by witnesses who are non-experts that the accused is of unsound mind, is of little weight, where no acts are given showing unsoundness of mind.

Irwin & Irwin for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

By the verdict of a jury and judgment of the Hardin Circuit Court appellant, following the return of an indictment against him for horse stealing, was convicted of that crime and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of three years. He insists that the judgment of conviction should be reversed because: 1st. The verdict of the jury was contrary to law, and without support from the evidence. 2nd. That the court failed to properly instruct the jury and should have peremptorily instructed them to find him not guilty. 3rd. That he did not receive a fair trial owing to his unsoundness of mind and consequent inability to understand the nature of the crime charged against him, or to inform his counsel of the facts upon which his defense should have been predicated, and was without money to procure the attendance of witnesses or otherwise prepare for trial.

The salient facts furnished by the bill of evidence are, in substance, that appellant went to the livery stable of Harve Bland, at Glendale, Hardin county, and representing himself to be in the employ of the Cumberland Telephone Company, hired of Bland a pair of horses with which to drive to Munfordville, thirty miles distant, for the purpose, as he said of counting the poles supporting the wires of the telephone company between Glendale and Munfordville. Appellant agreed with Bland to pay for the use of the buggy and horses at the rate of $3.00 per day and return them on the following day. Upon these terms he received the buggy and horses and leaving Glendale in the morning, reached Munfordville late in the afternoon of the same day. On the way he stopped at the village of Bonnieville at noon, and there got a meal for himself, but did not have the horses fed. Some hours after appellant's departure from Glendale, Bland learned that he did not pay his hotel bill at Glendale or for the noon meal he took at Bonnieville, and also ascertained from the manager of the telephone company owning the line in operation between Glendale and Munfordville, that it belonged to the Home and not the Cumberland Telephone Company, and furthermore that the manager was unacquainted with the appellant and knew nothing of the alleged mission upon which he had gone to Munfordville. The foregoing facts excited the fears of Bland as to the safety of his buggy and horses, and led him to believe appellant an impostor, so he telephoned the sheriff of Hart county, at Munfordville, and directed him to arrest appellant upon his arrival there, which that officer did, at the same time taking in charge the buggy and horses. On the same day the property mentioned was delivered to Bland and appellant taken by rail to Elizabethtown and placed in jail, where he remained until indicted and tried.

It was admitted by appellant on the trial that he did not pay his hotel bill, at Glendale, or for the meal at Bonnieville, but affirmed that he expected to pay both and for the hire of the buggy and horses upon his return to Glendale, and also admitted by him that he had no money when he left Glendale, or upon reaching Munfordville. Indeed, the latter fact was established by the testimony of the sheriff of Hart county, who searched the person of appellant immediately following his arrest. Appellant further admitted that he did not count the telephone poles on the way to Munfordville, but claimed it was his purpose to do so in returning from that place to Glendale.

On appellant's trial it was proved by the Commonwealth that the telephone line, the poles of which appellant claimed to have been employed to count, belonged to the Home and not the Cumberland Telephone Company, and the manager or agent of the Home Telephone Company, residing in Hardin county, and its agent at Munfordville, testified that the former was charged with the duty of keeping the poles and wires of the Home Telephone Company between Elizabethtown and Munfordville, in repair, and neither knew appellant or of his alleged employment to count the telephone poles.

Although at the time of hiring the buggy and horses of Bland, appellant represented that he had been employed by the Cumberland Telephone Company to count the telephone poles between Glendale and Munfordville, he declared upon his trial that he had been employed to do that work by one West, of Louisville, an agent of the Home Telephone Company, under whom he claimed to have worked three months in Louisville before going to Glendale. He was, however, unable to state, upon cross-examination, the first name or initials of West or what position he held in the service of the Home Telephone Company. Appellant was also unable to give the location of West's place of business except to say that it was in the second story of a house somewhere on Chestnut street in the City of Louisville.

No effort was made by appellant, before trial, to procure the attendance of any witness of the name of West, nor was there until his trial began, any intimation from appellant that West had employed him to count the telephone poles between Glendale and Munfordville. The two telephone agents introduced by the Commonwealth did not know and had never heard of West or of his connection with the Home or Cumberland Telephone Companies.

The Commonwealth introduced a witness who met appellant in the public road about three quarters of a mile from Munfordville. According to the testimony of this witness, appellant asked him how far it was to Munfordville, whether there were any horse buyers in the town and their names and how far it was from Munfordville to Rowlett's station, from Rowlett's to Horse Cave and from the latter place to Cave City. The places named are all situated upon the Louisville and Nashville Railroad in the order named and that railroad is the one upon which appellant would travel in going from Munfordville to Tennessee, of which State he claimed to be a resident.

In view of the foregoing facts, we are unable to sustain appellant's contention that there was no evidence to support the verdict of the jury declaring him guilty of the crime charged. Obviously, there was not such an absence of evidence as would have authorized a peremptory instruction, and it was for the jury to determine whether the hiring of the horses by appellant was a pretense and for the fraudulent and felonious purpose of converting them to his own use, or a hiring in good faith with the intent to return them to the owner.

Section 1195, Kentucky Statutes, provides:

"If any person shall steal a horse, mare, jack, or jennet, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two, nor more than ten years."

If appellant got possession of Bland's horses under the false and fraudulent pretense or hiring them, but without intention or returning them to the owner, and with the felonious intention of converting them to his own use and depriving the owner permanently of them, this constitutes horse stealing in the meaning of the statute. And if the possession of the horses was obtained by appellant as we have indicated the mere removal of them by appellant from the owner's custody amounted to a conversion of them to his (appellant's) own use, without proof of a subsequent sale or other wrongful disposition of them by him. On the other hand if appellant hired the horses in good faith with the intention of returning them and was prevented from doing so by the act of Bland, in having him arrested, he was not guilty of the crime charged.

The doctrine in question is thus stated in Robertson's Criminal Law, section 417:

"But if a person with the intent to steal, obtains the actual possession of property, though by delivery of the owner, or an agent authorized to transfer the ownership therein, and the latter intends to part with the possession only, and not the right of property, the taking in this manner in pursuance of the felonious intent will constitute larceny. Thus, where one with the felonious intent to convert to his own use, borrows or hires a horse or carriage or obtains the possession of any other chattel under pretense of a loan, or receives an article of clothing to be delivered to another or a sum of money with which to pay a bill for the other, he commits larceny. In such cases even proof of a subsequent sale or conversion is not necessary." (Robertson's Criminal Law, section 418; Alexander v. Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 290.)

Careful examination of the instructions given by the trial court convinces us that they substantially conform to the law as herein announced, and we have been unable to discover that any feature of the law applicable to the facts of the case was omitted from the instructions, consequently, the jury were not improperly instructed.

We do not think appellant should have been granted a new trial upon the ground that he is and was, upon the time of his conviction, of unsound mind. The several affidavits filed in support of this ground are by no means convincing. None of the affiants knew appellant before his arrest, consequently they are unacquainted with his past life or family history. Without being experts or testifying as to acts showing unsoundness of mind, they merely express the opinion that such was and is his condition. Such testimony is of little weight. If, as stated in the affidavit of one of his counsel, appellant's condition of mind during the trial was such as to prevent his giving assistance to counsel in the preparation of his defense, that fact was known to counsel at the time of and during the trial, yet insanity or imbecility of mind was not relied on as a defense, nor was it then brought to the attention of the trial court, or a continuance asked in order to procure evidence to sustain such grounds of defense.

The testimony given by appellant upon the trial shows him to be a fairly intelligent person. Indeed, many of his statements proved him to be both plausible and resourceful in protecting himself.

We find nothing in the record to convince us that appellant did not have a fair trial.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

MILLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Evidence Tending to Show Guilt—This court has no right to reverse a criminal case where there is any evidence tending to show the guilt of the accused.

2. Immaterial Error—An error in an instruction which will not mislead the jury will not authorize a reversal.

J. B. Wickliffe and H. J. Moorman for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

Appellant, Ben Walden, and Bud Miller were indicted in the Ballard Circuit Court for the murder of one Frank Price, by shooting him with a pistol and striking him with a pistol or other deadly weapon—one of them doing the shooting and the other striking him, but which one did the shooting and which one did the striking was unknown to the grand jury, the others then and there being present, aiding and abetting in the shooting and striking. Appellant was given a separate trial, which resulted in his conviction for manslaughter and his punishment fixed at two years in the penitentiary. A reversal is asked for two reasons. First. There was not any evidence presented upon the trial to sustain the charge. Second. The court erred in instruction number two. The first question raised necessitates a recital of the facts of the case. The killing occurred at a picnic and dance at the home of one Kemper, who was a merchant and farmer. His store and dwelling were under the same roof, the store in front facing the river. The dancing pavilion was back of the building, about seventy feet, an eating stand a short distance from it and a cold drink stand, where soft drinks were sold, about twenty feet from it and a little further from the pavilion than the eating stand. Price was killed when about between these two stands, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock at night. The person who killed him shot about five times, and about the time he fell he was struck over the head with a stick or some other hard substance. There were two persons making the assault—one did the shooting and the other used the stick. The Commonwealth's theory is that appellant aided and abetted the shooting and struck deceased as he fell. Some minutes before the killing of Price, one Sam Miller, a brother of appellant, was severely cut with a knife while in the dancing pavilion, and was carried and placed upon the porch of DeKemper. It appears that it was not known who cut Sam Miller. Several persons were in attendance caring for Sam Miller when the shooting of Price occurred. Several witnesses testified that Ben Walden did the shooting, but did not know the person that struck Price, but stated that he was not George Miller. George Miller testified that he was with his brother, Sam Miller, at the time Price was killed, and there was some evidence tending to corroborate him in this. The Commonwealth used Ben Walden as a witness. He testified that he did not do the shooting; that Bud Miller fired the shots and George struck Price. The testimony shows that Bud and George Miller were the only relatives of Sam at the picnic, and that Ben Walden was a hired hand on the farm where or near where they lived; that Walden was a dangerous character and had served a term in the penitentiary for kukluxing. The Commonwealth's theory is that the defendants killed Price under the belief that he was the person who stabbed Sam Miller. There was evidence that George Miller made some threats to the effect that he would avenge the injury to his brother. There was also proof that some boy in the crowd cried out, "there he goes now," and one of the two men following Price said to the other, "pull the trigger and keep pulling it as long as there is a load in the gun and I will do the rest." DeKemper testified that he was standing near the pop stand and saw a man in his shirt sleeves and two men following close behind him, coming from the lot at the back of the house; that they continued in this position until they had passed across the line between the two stands and the shooting began. He stated that the man in front was Price, but he did not recognize the two men following him as they passed down to the place of the shooting; but as they passed back by him he thought he recognized one of the men as appellant. Several witnesses testified that a few minutes before the shooting, Ben Walden and appellant left the porch where Sam Miller was, and their dress suited the description of the two men following Price. Ben Walden testified that one George Spears said to appellant, "don't hit the poor fellow again: he is killed now," and appellant answered, with an oath, "if you say any more, I will blow your brains out." Some two or three hours after Price was killed several persons were near the dead body, and, at least, two witnesses testified that Bill Spears stated, "this poor fellow was innocent and had nothing to do with it and got killed," and appellant, in reply, said, "well, he had no business bullying." Appellant testified in chief, and in answer to questions put by his counsel upon these two matters, as follows:

"Q. Did you say anything to Bill Spears immediately after the shooting about shooting him?"

"A. No, Sir."

"Q. Or that you would shoot him?"

"A. No, sir, I never made any such threats at all."

"Q. Did Bill Spears come to you directly after the man was shot and say don't hit him any more?"

"A. He was saying something there, but he was so drunk—"

"Q. I mean immediately after the shooting there?"

"A. No, s'r, he didn't come up then."

"Q. Now, then, down at the place where the corpse was some considerable time afterwards, did Bill Spears say 'This poor fellow was innocent and had nothing to do with it, and got killed,' and in reply to that did you say 'Well, he had no business bullying?' "

"A. If I said it I don't remember it."

"Q. Who was with you when you was down there?"

"A. My daddy and DeKemper and several going and coming all the time."

Without detailing the evidence, it is sufficient to say that it is reasonably certain that Bud Miller was not present at the time Price was killed; and it is reasonably certain that Ben Walden shot Price, and that someone, other than Walden, struck Price, about the time he fell. The question is: Was there any evidence produced upon the trial tending to show that George Miller was present at the time of the killing; that he struck Price and aided and abetted in the killing? Walden, his accomplice, testified that appellant was present and did the striking. As the jury was not authorized to convict appellant upon the testimony of Ben Walden, unless corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the homicide, then the further question is: Was there any evidence tending to corroborate the statements of Walden? In our opinion there was. The fact that his brother had been, a few minutes before, severely wounded, and that he had made threats to avenge his brother's injuries, and the further fact that Price was pointed out to two persons following him as the assailant of his brother, and the opinion of DeKemper that appellant was one of the persons following Price immediately before the shooting, and lastly, the manner in which he answered the question with reference to his threats to shoot Spears when requested to not hit Price any more; and his reply to Spears when he said that Price was innocent of any wrong and ought not to have been killed, to-wit: in effect excusing the killing by saying that Price ought not to have been "bullying around." These facts and circumstances tend to corroborate the statements of Walden, and, under the Code and the repeated decisions of this court construing it, this court has no right to reverse a criminal case when there is any evidence tending to show the guilt of the accused.

The only other ground presented for reversal is error in instruction number two, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in Ballard county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, that Ben Walden, George Miller, and Bud Miller, did willfully, feloniously, unlawfully and not with previous malice, in sudden heat and passion, or in sudden affray, kill and slay Frank Price, by the one or the other, the said Ben Walden or George Miller or Bud Miller shooting the said Frank Price with a deadly weapon, to-wit: a pistol loaded with powder, leaden balls or some other hard substance, or striking and wounding the said Frank Price with a pistol, a deadly weapon, so that the said Frank Price did then and there die therefrom within a few minutes thereafter, the others or the other one, being then and there present, aiding and abetting the same, then you will find defendant, George Miller, guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and will fix his punishment at confinement in the State penitentiary at not less than two nor more than twenty-one years, within the sound discretion of the jury."

Counsel's criticism of the instruction is correct. It authorized the jury, considering it technically, to convict appellant even if he was not present, if Ben Walden and Bud Miller assaulted and killed Price. But, considering all the instructions together and the facts proven in the case, the jury could not have been misled by this error. There was not the slightest testimony by any witness in the case, except Walden, that Bud Miller had anything to do with the assaulting and killing of Price. So, the words "the others or the other one, being then and there present, aiding and abetting the same," could not have been understood by the jury as referring to Bud Miller. Therefore, it left the jury to consider the instruction with reference to only George Miller and the other person who did the shooting. In addition to this the court, by instruction number five, told the jury that they could not convict appellant, unless there was evidence tending to connect him with the commission of the homicide charged in the indictment. So the jury could not have understood instruction number two as authorizing them to convict appellant, although he was not present and aiding and abetting in the killing.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

REAVES, &c. v. BAKER, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Land—Ownership—Trial by Court—Weight Given to Judgment—On considering an appeal from a judgment in a case involving the ownership of land, tried before the circuit judge, weight must be given to his acquaintance with the parties to the action and the witnesses, and no sufficient reason being shown, his judgment should not be disturbed.

J. B. Wickliffe for appellants.

Reeves & Sharp for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

This action was brought by the appellants in the court below to recover of appellees a 160-acre tract of land, lying in Ballard county, and by this appeal they seek the reversal of the judgment rendered in that court which dismissed the action at their cost.

J. F. Grice, one of the appellees, died after the rendition of the judgment, and thereafter proper orders were entered reviving the action against his heirs at law.

It appears from the answer of appellees that they claim the land in question, each being in possession of a part thereof, and asserting title respectively under deeds from W. T. Reaves, to whom it was conveyed by the master commissioner of the Ballard Circuit Court, in an action brought by C. C. Reaves as administrator with the will annexed of Patience Fondville deceased, former owner of the land, to obtain a decree for its sale to pay certain debts of the latter, there being, as alleged, no personal estate left by her with which to pay them. The decree was granted as prayed and the land sold at public outcry by the commissioner to C. C. Reaves, as the highest and best bidder. C. C. Reaves later assigned his bid to W. T. Reaves who paid for the land, and, upon confirmation of the sale, it was by order of the court conveyed him by commissioner's deed as stated.

On the other hand appellants, who are the children and only heirs at law of Margaret Reaves deceased, wife of C. C. Reaves, claim the land under an alleged deed which they contend was made by their grandmother, Patience Fondville, whereby it was conveyed to their mother, Margaret Reaves, for life, with remainder to appellants.

Appellants admit that the alleged deed thus made by their grandmother to their mother, Margaret Reaves, and her children has been lost or destroyed, but contend that it was duly acknowledged and recorded in the office of the clerk of the Ballard County Court and that the courthouse and records of the county clerk's office, including the deed in question, were destroyed by fire in 1880.

It appears from the depositions of some of the appellants and two of their witnesses, that Patience Fondville was twice married; her first husband was John Stovall, who was a widower and the father of several children at the time of her marriage to him; that her daughter, Margaret, was born of this marriage and upon growing up became the wife of C. C. Reaves, and the mother of appellants; that Patience Fondville, who seemed to have purchased the land in controversy from one Jenkins, after the death of her first husband, Stovall, was, by two of appellants' witnesses, heard to say that as John Stovall had not willed land to his daughter, Margaret Reaves, as he had to his other children, she (Patience Fondville), intended to buy the Jenkins land and deed it to her. These two witnesses and some of the appellants testified that this intention was carried into effect. The two witnesses referred to testified that they saw in Mrs. Fondville's possession, and one of them heard read, a deed from Mrs. Fondville to Margaret, but neither these witnesses nor such of the appellants as claimed to have seen the alleged deed are distinct in the recollection as to its form or phraseology. None of them had any personal knowledge of its having been recorded, or had seen a record of it in the county clerk's office. Some of the appellants claimed to have seen the original deed in the possession of their mother, Margaret Reaves, after the death of Mrs. Fondville and some years before her own death, but were unable to say what disposition was made of it, or to account for its loss. Although Patience Fondville and her first husband, John Stovall, each left a will, neither instrument appears to have been copied into the record, nor do we find in the record any testimony as to the contents of either will. The only proof as to John Stovall having excluded his daughter from sharing in the landed estate is furnished by the incompetent testimony of one or two witnesses that Mrs. Fondville had said so. Such testimony being hearsay, can not be accepted to prove the contents of the will.

Some of the papers of the action brought by the administrator, with the will annexed, of Patience Fondville, for the sale of the 160 acres of land, constitute a part of the record before us. The record of that suit shows that Mrs. Fondville left a will, but is utterly silent as to its provisions. Whether it attempted to dispose of the land in controversy we can not discover. In the action to obtain a sale of the land, Margaret Reaves, the appellant, Sidney Reaves, her eldest child, then an infant, were made defendants. According to appellees' testimony Sidney was the only child she then had; the other appellants having been born later; but from the record in that action we might, however, infer that the will devised the land to Margaret for life, with remainder to the child Sidney, and if this were the case, or the other children were then unborn, the infant Sidney Reaves was a necessary party, as well as the mother, and having been properly represented by a guardian ad litem of the court's selection, whose answer in the infants' behalf and exceptions filed to the report of sale, proved his efficiency, it is not to be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the judgment was erroneous. Whatever may have been the interest of the mother and child in the land under the will of Mrs. Fondville, the devise could not take effect so as to deprive the creditors of the testator of the right to subject the land to the payment of their debts, as there were no personal assets to apply to their liquidation.

The evidence furnished by the depositions taken in behalf of appellees presents many facts and circumstances strongly tending to overthrow appellants' claim as to the execution and delivery of the alleged deed upon which they rely. For example, it is difficult for a reflecting mind to understand why appellants, or some of them, upon first setting up claim to the land in controversy, which was before suit was brought, did so upon the ground that they were entitled to it under the will of Patience Fondville instead of under the alleged deed. 2. It is incredible that their father, C. C. Reaves, administrator, with the will annexed, of Patience Fondville, and plaintiff in the action brought to obtain a sale of the land, should have ignored the existence of a deed, conveying his wife a life estate and his children a vested remainder therein, the production and setting up of which by her would have prevented the sale. It is not less incredible that Margaret Reaves, mother of appellants, and a defendant duly summoned in that action, with knowledge of the existence of the alleged deed from her mother to herself and children, and then having it in her possession should have failed to make defense by setting up her deed and claiming the land under it; and equally strange that from 1877, the year of the institution of the action, down to the date of her death in 1898, she was never heard to complain of the loss of the land or intimate that she had, or there had ever existed, a deed conveying it to her or her children. These facts and circumstances, together with the apparent regularity of the proceedings in the former action to obtain the sale of the land, doubtless had great weight with the circuit judge and caused him to discredit appellants' contention as to the execution and delivery of the deed. Moreover, we must give weight to his acquaintance with the parties to the action and the witnesses introduced by them; this we have done, and upon the whole case can find no sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment, which is, therefore, affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. MURPHY.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

This is a controversy as to a boundary line between the parties and is affirmed on the evidence.

C. B. Wheeler for appellant.

Vaughn, Howes & Howes for appellee.

Appeal from Johnson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, affirming.

One E. S. Turner, prior to the year 1871, owned a tract of land in Leslie county, on Toms Creek, including the land on both sides of "Bear Tree Branch," which flows into Toms Creek. During the year 1871, he conveyed to his sister, Mrs. Stambough, the land on the east side of Bear Tree Branch for the consideration of something over $1,200; she conveyed it to her sons, they conveyed it to one Daniels and Daniels conveyed it to appellee. Sometime after the year 1871, E. S. Turner conveyed the balance of the survey, which is on the west side of "Bear Tree Branch," to one Smith Powers; he conveyed it to one Stafford, and Stafford conveyed it to appellant.

The issue between the parties to this action is as to the division line between their tracts of land. Appellant concedes that, as E.

S. Turner conveyed to appellee's vendor first, he can not go beyond the true line of appellee. The cause of the dispute is that Bear Tree Branch does not extend the full length of the division line. Their deeds call for top of the ridge and Bear Tree Branch falls short of that point two or three hundred yards. Appellee contends that the true line from the head of Bear Tree Branch is a straight line from a beech and maple at that point to the top of the ridge to what is known as "High Knob." Appellant claims that the true line of appellee is further east of the point named, which would include on his side of the line the timber trees which he cut, and for which alleged trespass this action was instituted. Each party had surveys made under their directions and without any particular reference to their title papers, and for this reason the reports of the surveyor and the plats filed by him are of but little aid in arriving at the true line between the parties. Appellee proved by several witnesses that the line claimed by him began at a point on "High Knob," thence a straight line to the head of Bear Tree Branch; thence down Bear Tree Branch to the point where it flows into Toms Creek, and was established thirty or more years ago; also that Smith Powers and Stafford, through whom appellee's title came, had repeatedly stated that they bought to this line and only claimed to it while they owned the land. Appellee also proved by one or two witnesses that appellant, up to within a short time before he cut the timber referred to, only claimed to this line. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the lower court did not err in adjudging this to be the true line between the parties.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MITCHELL v. ODEWALT'S EX'OR.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Judicial Sales—Exceptions—Affidavit of Widow—Consideration—In setting aside a report of sale of land regularly, exceptions should have been filed to the report, but where the affidavit of the widow of the deceased owner was filed it may be treated as her exception to the sale, and the court having so treated it there was no substantial error in the proceedings in this regard.

2. Same—Advance Bids—Consideration by Chancellor—Protecting Rights in Homestead—The chancellor will not in every case accept an advance bid and set aside a sale, but he will do so upon slight circumstances when equity demands it. He will carefully protect the rights of the widow and fatherless, and when a homestead is involved or the home of infants will be taken from them, the rule ordinarily obtaining as to setting aside judicial sales for inadequacy of price does not apply.

Noble & Graham for appellant.

J. A. Skaggs and Skaggs & Mills for appellee.

Appeal from Green Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

Jacob Odewalt died a resident of Green county, leaving a will by which he devised his whole estate to his wife, subject to the payment of his debts, and $1 to each of his children. The widow qualified as executrix, the personal estate proved of little value, the insurance on his life was uncollectible, and the real estate was practically all that was available for the payment of his debts. This consisted of three acres of land on which he resided with his family. It was encumbered with lien debts amounting to about $1,200, and there were about $300 of unsecured debts. One of the creditors brought a suit to settle the estate, the debts were proved up, and an order was entered for the sale of the land. The sale was had; R. D. Mitchell became the purchaser for the sum of $1,460. The sale was reported to the court. The widow, before it was confirmed, moved the court to set aside the sale, and offered to pay into court $1,600, the amount necessary to pay all the debts and cost. Affidavits were filed on the motion; and it appearing that the widow had paid all the debts and the cost of the action, the court refused to confirm the sale and entered an order setting it aside. From this judgment Mitchell appeals.

Regularly exceptions should have been filed to the report of sale, but the affidavit of the widow which was filed may be treated as her exception to the sale; and the court having so treated it, there was no substantial error in the proceedings in this regard.

The purpose of the proceeding was to secure the payment of the debts of the decedent; and the law requires this to be done by a proceeding in equity that the rights of his widow and heirs at law may be protected as far as possible. The chancellor's aim in all such cases is to secure the creditors without sacrifice of the rights of heirs and devisees, if this can be done. If the sale had been confirmed, a large part of the unsecured creditors would have lost their debts, and the widow and children would have lost their home. The unsecured creditors could not well buy at the sale because their debts were not large enough to justify them in so doing. The widow could not buy because she had not yet gotten her pension. The chancellor will not in every case accept an advanced bid and set aside a sale, but he will do so upon slight circumstances when equity demands it. In view of the fact that by setting aside the sale, he secured the debts of all the creditors and the costs of the action, and saved the home for the widow and children; and in view of her condition, the price the land brought, its value, and the situation of the creditors, he properly refused to confirm the sale, and set it aside. The chancellor will carefully protect the rights of the widow and the fatherless; and where a homestead is involved or the home of infants will be taken from them, the rule ordinarily obtaining as to setting aside judicial sales for inadequacy of price does not apply.

Judgment affirmed.

HOWERTON V. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal Law—Indictment—Statutory Offense—Allegation of Felonious Intent—An indictment for a crime that is felonious under the common law must charge its commission with a "felonious intent," but where the crime is purely statutory and is defined by the statute, the indictment is sufficient if it follows the language of the statute without the use of the term "feloniously" or the words "felonious intent."

2. Continuance—Absence of One Attorney—Other Competent Attorneys Present—It is not error in the court to refuse a continuance of one accused of a felony by reason of the absence of one of his attorneys, where he had two other skillful attorneys present conducting his defense.

3. Misconduct of Attorney for Commonwealth—Affidavit for Continuance—Charged to be Untrue—Reversible Error—Where, on the trial of one indicted for a felony, it was a reversible error for the trial court to permit the attorney for the Commonwealth to say to the jury that the affidavit of the absent witness for the defendant that had been filed for a continuance and admitted to be read as his deposition, "was untrue and that the Commonwealth was forced to admit it to get a trial."

4. Knowing Female Under Sixteen—Evidence of Age—Competency—On the trial of accused, for criminally knowing a female under sixteen years of age, it was error in the court to exclude evidence offered by the accused, that the monthly sickness of the prosecuting witness had regularly occurred for a period of five years preceding his alleged abuse of her, such evidence being competent to show that she was over sixteen years of age at that time.

J. H. & John A. Moore and R. L. Moore for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt, John L. Grayot and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Crittenden Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, reversing.

Appellant was tried in the court below under an indictment charging him with the crime of carnally knowing a female under the age of sixteen years. The jury, by verdict returned, found him guilty and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary ten years; judgment was thereupon entered in accordance with the verdict and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Numerous grounds were filed by appellant in the court below in support of his motion for a new trial.

The evidence introduced by the Commonwealth conduced to prove appellant's guilt of the crime charged. It was to the effect that he repeatedly, and for a period of several months, had carnal knowledge of the prosecutrix, an orphan fifteen years of age, who had been received by his parents from a Louisville asylum to rear and support, and that the girl was made to yield to his lust through fear superinduced by force, and threats, on his part, to take her life if she told of his misconduct. This testimony came from the prosecutrix alone, who was contradicted by much of the evidence introduced in appellant's behalf, which tended to show that the charge against him was devised by her as a means of enabling her to leave the home of his parents, of which she had apparently tired. It is not our province to pass upon the evidence, in view of our conclusion that appellant should have another trial, we refrain from any expression of opinion as to whether or not it was sufficient to authorize his conviction; deeming it only necessary to say that it justified the submission of the case to the jury.

It is insisted for appellants that his demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained because of its failure to allege that the crime charged was committed feloniously or with a felonious intent. The objection is without merit. The crime charged is purely statutory, and being defined by the statute, and the language of the statute followed by the indictment, an allegation of felonious intent was not essential.

In respect to crimes that are felonious under the common law, the indictment to be sufficient, must charge their commission feloniously or with a felonious intent, but the rule is different where the crime is purely statutory and is defined by the statute itself. In such case the indictment is sufficient if it follows the language of the statute, without the use of the term "feloniously," or the words "felonious intent." (Higgins v. Commonwealth, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 729; Commonwealth v. Lemon, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 480; Roberson's Criminal Law, section 392.)

We can not agree with appellant that it was error for the lower court to refuse him a continuance on account of the illness and absence of one of his counsel. It was not made to appear by his affidavit that the two attorneys who were present and conducted his defense were not equal to the task. Upon the contrary, the skill and fidelity with which they managed the case throughout the trial, demonstrated their ability, and that appellant was not prejudiced by the absence of the third attorney.

We concur, however, in appellant's contention that the court should not have permitted the following language from the Commonwealth's attorney, viz: "That the affidavit as to Clyde Nations, and what he would swear, if present, were untrue; and that he did not believe they were true, but that they (meaning the Commonwealth) were forced to admit the affidavit to get a trial of this case; that they did not want it worn out by continuances, and that they had to admit the affidavit to get a trial, but did not believe Nations would swear it if he were here."

The affidavit in question had been admitted by the Commonwealth's attorney to be read as the deposition of Nations. He had the right to contradict it by other testimony, and thereby show its falsity; but having admitted that Nations would make the statements attributed to him by the affidavit, if present, he had no right to argue that the witness would not make the statement if present.

Such declarations by the Commonwealth's attorney have repeatedly been declared by this court highly improper and prejudicial to the defendant, and because of such conduct reversals have frequently been adjudged. (Martin v. Commonwealth, 89 S. W., 226; 28 Ky. Law Rep., 295; Darrell v. Commonwealth, 88 S. W., 1060; 28 Ky. Law Rep., 27; Redmon v. Commonwealth, 51 S. W., 565; 21 Ky. Law Rep., 331; Johnson v. Commonwealth, 61 S. W., 1005; 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1885; Shepherd v. Commonwealth, 85 S. W., 191; 27 Ky. Law Rep., 376.)

Other declarations of a highly inflammatory and abusive character were made by both the Commonwealth and county attorney in argument to the jury, to which appellant, at the time, also excepted. And while we would not reverse the judgment for the latter alone, we can not refrain from saying that the declarations were improper and should not have been indulged in by counsel or allowed by the court. We do not mean to say that due allowance should not be made for the indignation counsel for the Commonwealth would naturally feel in conducting a prosecution for a crime as dastardly as that here charged; but they should not forget that it is not a part of their duty to inflict abuse upon a prisoner at the bar in the hearing of the jury, but to see that justice is fairly meted out, and the defendant fairly dealt with in calling him to account for his crime.

We also think it was error for the court to exclude, as incompetent, the testimony offered by appellant, tending to show that the monthly sickness of the prosecutrix had regularly occurred and existed for a period of five years preceding his alleged abuse of her. We think it was competent on the question of her age, for if it continued more than five years before the commission of the crime, it would tend to show that she was over sixteen years of age at that time. While by no means convincing, it would, in view of the conflicting evidence as to her age, have been a circumstance to the benefit of which appellant was entitled, as it was important for him to show that at the time of his having carnal knowledge of her, if the jury believed he did so, the prosecutrix was over sixteen years of age and, therefore, of sufficient age to consent.

Other alleged errors are complained of in the briefs of counsel, but as they seem to have been inadvertently committed, were not very material and will likely not occur on the next trial, we deem it unnecessary to consider them.

But for the two errors indicated, we feel it our duty to reverse the judgment appealed from. It is, therefore, reversed and remanded, with directions to the lower court, to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court, except Judge Nunn, sitting.

COLUMBIA BUILDING, LOAN AND SAVINGS ASSOCIATION'S ASS'EE V. GREGORY.

(Filed September 29, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Sureties—Married Women—Judgment Against—Failure to Issue Execution for Seven Years—Release of Surety—Under Kentucky Statutes, section 2548, providing that "a surety shall be discharged from all liability under any judgment or decree after the lapse of seven years without any execution issued thereon and prosecuted in good faith," the statute applies to all sureties, and where a married woman, who might have pleaded her coverture, suffered judgment to go against her, the fact that she did not make this plea, does not deprive her of the rights which any other surety would have if execution is not issued within seven years.

2. Courts—Inherent Power Over Its Process—Enforcement—The court has inherent power over its own process, and may quash it where it is issued after the time has elapsed within which it may be lawfully issued or when for any reason it may not be enforced.

S. Oppenheimer and A. B. Bessinger for appellant.

Gregory & McHenry for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

A judgment was rendered on February 19, 1898, in the Jefferson Circuit Court in favor of the Columbia Building, Loan and Savings Association against C. R. Gregory and E. B. Gregory. No execution was issued on the judgment until July 12, 1907. An execution having been issued, E. B. Gregory entered a motion in the court to quash the execution upon the ground that she was only a surety in the debt for which the judgment was rendered, and that no execution had issued upon the judgment within seven years. The court sustained the motion and the association's assignee appeals. Section

2548, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "A surety shall be discharged from all liability under any judgment or decree, after the lapse of seven years without any execution issued thereon, and prosecuted in good faith for the collection thereof."

The record clearly shows that E. B. Gregory received no part of the consideration and was only the surety of her husband on the note for which the judgment was rendered. It is true that she might have pleaded her coverture, and defeated a judgment on the note, but the fact that she did not make this plea does not deprive her of the rights which any other surety would have if execution is not issued within seven years. The statute applies to all sureties, and it is not material that the record does not show that the defendant is only a surety in the debt. It is the fact of suretyship that controls in the case of a judgment, just as the fact of suretyship controls in a suit on a note; although the note does not show that the person is surety. (Day v. Billingsby, 3 Bush, 157.-

The court has inherent power over its own process and may quash it where it is issued after the time has elapsed within which it may be lawfully issued, or after the judgment is satisfied, or when, for any other reason, it may not be enforced. (Wooley v. Louisville, 118 Ky., 897; 1 Freeman on Judgment, section 77; Garvin v. Neal, 13 B. Mon., 256.)

The proper remedy, where process has been improperly issued, is by motion to quash it. An audita querela was the ancient remedy, but the practice now is to grant summary relief upon motion in cases of this sort.

The case of Hauns v. Central Kentucky Asylum, 103 Ky., 582, involved the question whether the property levied upon was subject to levy and sale. It did not involve the validity of the process. Whether the property levied upon is subject to the execution must be determined by action; but questions which simply go to the validity of the process may be determined summarily on motion. The process here having been issued after the time allowed by law for that purpose, was properly quashed. (17 Cyc., 1154-56; Noe v. Conyers, 6 J. J. M., 574.)

Judgment affirmed.

HAMILTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal Law—Malicious Cutting—Intent—How Gathered—On the trial of one for cutting and wounding another with intent to kill him, the intent is to be gathered not alone from the defendant's declaration, but from the nature and extent of the wounds, the manner of their infliction, the acts and conduct of the accused and all the circumstances of the case.

2. Same—Facts Shown by Evidence—The facts in the case do not furnish any evidence that appellant intended to kill the party, but show he did not so intend. If guilty at all he is guilty of a malicious prank constituting the offense of assault and battery.

Campbell & Campbell for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, reversing.

The appellant, William Hamilton, and Will Alexander, alias Coots Eggleston, were jointly indicted for the offense of malicious cutting and wounding with intent to kill, Hamilton being charged as principal and Eggleston as accessory. Appellant was tried and convicted, and his punishment fixed at five years in the penitentiary. A new trial was refused, and he appeals.

One of the principal grounds urged for reversal is that there was no evidence of an intent to kill. For the purpose of discussing this objection it will be necessary to give a brief review of the evidence.

According to the testimony for the Commonwealth, appellant and Coots Eggleston, both negroes, met the prosecuting witness, Mat McKinney, another negro, near Roy Nelson's saloon on Third street, in the city of Paducah, at about 1 o'clock p. m. They were all drinking at the time, and appellant was trying to induce McKinney, the man whom he afterwards cut, to give him a dollar. After remaining at the saloon a while, they left and went up Third street, appellant still insisting that McKinney give him a dollar. After proceeding some distance they separated, McKinney continuing up Third street until he came to the old iron furnace, and then passing along the railroad track until he came to the grounds of the Lack Singletree Company, which he entered for the purpose of seeing a man by the name of Hickory Jones. Not finding Jones there, McKinney came out of the alley leading from the Lack Singletree Company's grounds into Third street, near where it crosses the railroad track. There he met appellant and Eggleston at a point in the alley near a pile of lumber about sixty feet from Third street. Appellant proceeded to curse McKinney and demand of him a dollar. McKinney refused to give appellant the money. Appellant and Eggleston then pulled down McKinney's pants and placed him on the pile of lumber, after which they cut a slit in McKinney's scrotum. This cut was large enough for one of the testicles to go through, but was not such as would of itself result in death. After thus wounding McKinney appellant and Eggleston left him.

The above facts are testified to by McKinney and Eggleston on cross-examination.

According to the testimony for the defendants, Hamilton was not present when the cutting was done. When he heard he was charged with the offense he immediately went to McKinney and inquired what he meant by saying that he had cut him. Several witnesses testified that McKinney was crazy. Whether this be true or not, it is certain that he is a sexual pervert.

The court instructed the jury both as to malicious cutting and wounding with intent to kill, and assault and battery. The jury concluded that appellant intended to kill McKinney. Was there any evidence authorizing this conclusion?

The intent in a case of this kind is to be gathered not alone from the defendant's declarations, but from the nature and extent of the wounds, the manner of their infliction, the acts and conduct of the defendant and all the circumstances of the case. It can not be doubted that, if appellant and Eggleston had intended to kill McKinney, they could have easily done so. He was completely at their mercy. The cutting was done with great deliberation. There was nothing to prevent appellant from plunging his knife into McKinney at any other point in his body, or from making the wound where McKinney was cut so severe that death would have probably ensued. Of course, there may be numerous instances where the use of a knife resulting in a slight cut will authorize a conviction for malicious cutting and wounding with intent to kill. If a defendant strike at another and wound him but slightly, the jury may conclude that the defendant intended to kill. Even in this case, if the appellant, instead of deliberately laying McKinney on his back and cutting him, had struck at him and produced the same wound, the jury might have concluded, from the manner of the infliction of the wound, that appellant intended to kill McKinney. The facts as developed by the record, however, do not furnish any evidence in support of the charge that appellant intended to kill McKinney; instead, they strengthen the view that he did not so intend. If guilty at all, he is guilty only of a malicious prank constituting the offense of assault and battery.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with direction for a new trial consistent with this opinion. Judge Carroll dissents.

HAMILTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Campbell & Campbell for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Judge Carroll delivered the following dissenting opinion:

The court holds, as a matter of law, that the accused did not intend, by the cruel and dangerous wound inflicted on McKinney, to kill him, ruling that the question of his intent to kill should be taken from the jury, and that he could only be punished for a mere assault and battery.

Under the facts stated in the opinion I can not agree to this conclusion. In my opinion, whether the accused intended or not to kill McKinney was a question for the jury to determine under appropriate instructions. The mind or heart of the accused in cases of this character, or indeed in any case, can not be looked into to ascertain his intention in doing a particular act. Whether his intention was innocent or malicious, or the deed committed with the purpose to kill, must of necessity be ascertained from the act done and the circumstances surrounding it. That fatal wounds are not inflicted when they might be, or that the person injured does not die as a result of the wounds, does not authorize the court to say, as a matter of law, that the assailant did not intend to kill. When the assault is deliberately and wantonly committed with an instrument that may produce death, and the wound is of such a nature that death may result from the injury inflicted, then, in my opinion, the question of intent should be left to the jury. It is for them to say, from all the evidence and the fair and reasonable inferences that may be deduced therefrom, whether the purpose of the defendant was to commit an ordinary assault and battery or the statutory crime; and when the acts are such that it is difficult to conclude with accuracy what the purpose of the accused was, and depending on inferences to be drawn from them, they might constitute either a simple assault and battery or an assault with intent to kill, the finding of a properly instructed jury should not be disturbed. The doing of the act does not raise the legal presumption that it was done with the intent to kill, nor the legal presumption that it was not the intention to kill. In other words, the law will not rest either a conviction or an acquittal upon the legal presumption that the accused is guilty or innocent. The presumption that every man intends the natural and reasonable consequences of his acts is as far as the law will go. It is for the triers of the facts to say what the intention was. To hold that a person who, with a knife or other sharp instrument, intentionally, deliberately and wantonly cuts the legs or arms of another, or with a hammer beats and bruises his body, is only guilty of an assault because he did not kill him when he might have done so, does not strike me as being good law. The fact that the accused does not see proper to inflict a fatal wound when he has the means and opportunity to do so, does not, in and of itself, create any presumption of law that he did not intend to kill. If the accused had stabbed McKinney, wounding him in such a way as to imperil his life, leaving the chances of recovery against him, and if the manner of their infliction and all the circumstances surrounding it showed that he intended to kill, it would, nevertheless, be improper for the court to instruct the jury that he intended to kill the person assaulted. The other side of the question should be ruled in the same way.

For these reasons I dissent.

WARD, SHERIFF V. HALL.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Bailbond—Forfeiture—Action to Enjoin Collection—Evidence Conflicting—Affirmed—In the matter of the liability of defendant on forfeited bailbond, the evidence being so conflicting as to leave the mind in doubt, the matters testified to having occurred in the presence of the court, and he being acquainted with the parties, his judgment will not be disturbed.

H. C. Clay, H. L. Howard and J. B. Carter for appellants.

Greene & VanWinkle for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, affirming.

Appellee, W. F. Hall, was on the bail bond of James Nichels for his appearance in the Harlan Circuit Court at the November term, 1905. Nichels failed to appear, and a formal order of forfeiture was taken and entered. At the February term, 1906, the proceeding was on the Commonwealth's docket near its close. Prior thereto summons had been served on appellee. Judgment was taken against appellee, and he thereafter instituted this action against appellant to enjoin the collection of the judgment and execution issued thereon. The chancellor gave appellee the relief asked for, and M. S. Ward, the sheriff, appeals.

According to the testimony of appellee, he was present when the case was called, but understood that it was to be passed and called again before the expiration of the term, at which time he was to be given an opportunity to make a defense. The judgment, contrary to such understanding, was entered without any knowledge or notice on his part. It also appears that James Nichels, whose bondsman the plaintiff was, had been arrested and returned to the Harlan Circuit Court, and the case against him filed away by the Commonwealth. The testimony for appellants shows that the case was regularly called; that the appellee was in court when it was called, and when the Commonwealth's attorney asked judgment no objection was made with me until I kill some of them." To yet another he said, in talking about Gayle's hog getting into his garden, that "if the hog got back in the garden he intended to kill the hog, and if Gayle said anything about it he would kill him." And to others he made remarks of a less threatening nature about deceased, tending to show a hostile feeling.

The homicide occurred on Monday about midnight. On the Saturday previous the Clark woman went to Leach's house to visit her son, who had been there since the May previous, and she remained until after Gayle was shot, and was in the house with her son, Leach, and his wife when the shooting was done. About 10 o'clock on Monday night Leach said to John L. Butler as he, Leach, and the deceased and his brother, Bob Gayle, were on their way home from Butler's store, where Leach and the Gayles had been transacting some business: "You tell Gayle that he has got to take that woman away from here right now." This message Butler at once delivered to Gayle. Mrs. Clark testifies that when Leach returned to his house from Butler's store, Gayle came with him and said to her in the presence of Leach that he had come to take her away, and would be back after her in fifteen or twenty minutes, or as soon as he could hitch up his buggy; that then Gayle left, and in a short time came to the front door and knocked, when Leach said, "whose there" three separate times, and Gayle to each request replied: "Tom, it is 'Dutch' (Gayle's nick-name); open the door." While this conversation between Leach and Gayle was going on the witness testifies that Mrs. Leach and herself said to Leach, who had his gun in his hand, "don't shoot, it is 'Dutch;'" but notwithstanding this warning and information he fired through the door, which was closed, the shot taking effect in the body of Gayle, who was standing immediately outside on the porch.

Leach's version of the affair is that Monday afternoon Gayle took Mrs. Clark out buggy riding, and that night on their return from Butler's store Gayle, who was drinking, came to his house and said, "I am going to take this woman away," when he replied, "it would not do to take her away at night;" to this Gayle answered, "all right," and then left, saying that he would see him in the morning; that Gayle did not, with his knowledge or consent, come to his house again that night; that during the night some person walked upon the front porch and scratched on the door, when the dog growled and he heard the person say, "I'll shoot your brains out if you bite me;" that he then asked three times who it was, and not receiving any reply fired, but did not know that it was Gayle he had shot until after he fired. Leach further testified that he had about forty dollars in his house, and that the night preceding the killing of Gayle a person unknown to him put paper in the door lock so as to prevent it from locking, and he felt some uneasiness about his money.

From this brief history of the case it appears that there was ample evidence from which the jury might well conclude that Leach deliberately, willfully and without excuse or provocation shot and killed deceased. It remains to be seen whether or not the trial court committed any prejudicial errors of law.

Three alleged errors are relied on by his counsel. First, the failure of the trial court to permit witnesses to testify as to the relations that existed between the deceased and the Clark woman; second, in giving to the jury an instruction upon the subject of the insanity of the appellant, and third, in failing to properly instruct the jury as to the right of Leach to shoot if he believed the person he shot was at the time attempting to break into his house or commit a felony.

Rebecca Clark, who was the chief witness for the Commonwealth, was not inquired of concerning her immoral intimacy with the deceased, but Bassitt and other witnesses introduced in behalf of the accused were asked if they knew what the relations between Mrs. Clark and Gayle were. The court refused to permit the witnesses to answer this question. What answer the witnesses would have made the record does not disclose, as no avowal was made. It would have been competent to have inquired of Mrs. Clark what the relations had been between herself and the deceased, and she might have been required by the court to disclose them, although improper; and this fact might have been shown independent of her by other witnesses if she was not questioned on the subject, or, if questioned, had denied the immoral relations. (Morrison v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 2923.) It is proper to permit, and if necessary to require, a witness to relate his or her relations with the parties to the litigation, and in Commonwealth cases with the accused or the prosecuting witness, or the deceased, if the prosecution is for homicide, for the purpose of showing his bias or prejudice or interest in the result of the trial, so as to enable the jury to place a proper estimate upon the weight that should be given to his evidence. We do not mean to be understood as declaring that a witness may be required to answer a question that would subject him to a criminal or penal prosecution, but the fact that the answer may degrade, disgrace or humiliate a witness will not excuse him. (Underhill on Criminal Evidence, section 248; Greenleaf on Evidence, section 450.) This rule does not conflict with section 597, of the Civil Code, providing, among other things, that a witness may not be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts. (Commonwealth v. Welch, 111 Ky., 530; Britton v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 857.) Under the Code, as construed in these and many other cases, a party can not impeach the testimony of a witness by evidence of specific acts, with the exception mentioned in the section supra. To ask a witness questions for the purpose of impeaching his credibility or morality is one thing, and to make inquiries that will show his interest, bias or prejudice is another, although in some respects the end sought to be accomplished by each line of interrogation is the same. The impeachment of a witness is confined to his own life and character, without respect to his interest in the case or his relations to the parties to the controversy. The attack is made upon the witness as an individual independent of his interest or bias or prejudice in the case upon trial. On the other hand, the reputation of the witness for truthfulness or morality is not necessarily involved in inquiries made for the purpose of showing his feelings of kindness or hostility towards the parties or his social or family or business or other relations with them, although in instances like the matter we are considering inquiries along this line would reflect upon the character of the witness. But the purpose of the examination is not particularly to discredit the reputation of the witness for truth or morality, as it is when he is sought to be impeached; and the rule that protects a witness attempted to be impeached from investigation into specific or particular acts in his life can not be invoked to save him from disclosures touching his relations with the party in whose behalf he is testifying, although such disclosures may develop particular acts that have a tendency to degrade or disgrace the witness.

As the record fails to show what answer Bassitt and other witnesses would have made to the question, the assigned error in declining to permit them to answer the question can not be considered by this court. (Nichols v. Commonwealth, 11 Bush, 575; L. C. & L. R. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 81 Ky., 624.) It may be remarked, however, that other evidence reasonably sufficient to convince the jury that immoral relations did exist between the Clark woman and the deceased was heard by the jury from other witnesses, so that the accused had before the jury substantially the same evidence that his counsel in their brief say would have been made by Bassitt and others.

Several witnesses were introduced by appellant who said that, for a number of years, he had been subject at intervals to epileptic fits, and that while under the influence of this disease he was prostrated mentally and physically, but when he recovered from the effects of the disorder, which only continued for a few hours, he was not legally incompetent to form a criminal intent or commit a crime. But as no evidence was introduced affecting the mental capacity of the accused at the time he killed Gayle, his counsel argue that the evidence relating to epileptic fits was offered only to show his weak condition generally, and not for the purpose of resting upon it an instruction upon the subject of insanity; and the complaint is made that the court erred to the prejudice of appellant in giving to the jury an insanity instruction. It may be conceded that the evidence introduced in behalf of appellant did not authorize the court to submit to the jury an instruction upon the subject of his mental soundness at the time of the homicide, but we are unable to perceive in what respect the giving of this instruction could have been prejudicial to the accused. It gave to him the benefit of an instruction he was not entitled to under which the jury might have acquitted him. The error of the court was prejudicial to the Commonwealth rather than the accused.

It is insisted that none of the instructions given to the jury presented the defense of appellant. His counsel contend that, as he believed at the time he fired the fatal shot, that the person at whom it was fired was attempting to enter his house, that he had the right to shoot to prevent such entry. A man has a right to kill a burglar or thief who is at the time committing a felony by attempting to break into his house. And so he may, if necessary to protect himself or family from death or bodily harm, shoot an assailant. But a person has no legal or moral right to kill another merely because, in the night time, he comes upon his premises, or even knocks on the door of his house. The owner, controller or occupant of premises who, in the night or day time, shoots and kills an intruder or trespasser, can not excuse or justify his conduct upon the ground that the person killed was a burglar or thief, and upon the premises for the purpose of committing a felony, or attacking with evil intent the persons in possession of the premises, in the absence of some evidence conducing to establish this defense. (Kentucky Criminal Law and Procedure by Roberson, sections 155-7; Bishop's New Criminal Law, section 858; Chapman v. Commonwealth, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 704; Utterback v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1515; Baker v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky., 302; Saylor v. Commonwealth, 97 Ky., 184; Wright v. Commonwealth, 85 Ky., 123; Sparks v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky., 644.) If there was any evidence that Gayle, at the time he was shot, was forcibly and wrongfully attempting to enter or break into the house of Leach, or any evidence that Leach believed, or had reasonable grounds to believe, that the person on his porch was a burglar in the act of entering into his house, the court should have instructed the jury upon the law applicable to this state of facts. So that the question narrows down to the proposition whether or not the evidence of Leach was sufficient to warrant the court in giving an instruction that, if the jury believed from the evidence that Leach believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that some one was trying to break into his house to commit a felony, he had the right to take the life of the intruder, if necessary, or believed by him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to prevent him from committing the contemplated crime. A careful consideration of Leach's evidence convinces us that it did not authorize an instruction upon this branch of the law. Leach did not testify that he believed, or had any grounds to believe, that the person on his front porch was a burglar, or had come to his house for the purpose of doing him or any of his family any injury, or for the purpose of committing any offense against his property. Hence, there was no evidence to warrant the court in giving the instruction counsel insist their client was entitled to. Indeed, it is very questionable if, under the evidence the appellant was entitled to, the instruction given by the court, or to any instruction that would authorize the jury to find him not guilty upon the ground that the shooting was either excusable or justifiable.

After a careful consideration of the entire record and the well-prepared argument of his counsel, we find no error that would authorize us in granting a new trial.

The judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

HARGIS, &c. v. BEGLEY, CLERK, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1908—To be reported.)

Bail Bonds — Forfeiture — Defendant Accidentally Disabled While Absent From State—Sufficiency of Plea—Where a defendant, who was a resident of the State, went with his brother to another State on a hunting trip, and while there accidentally shot himself so that he could not attend the term of the court at which his case was set for trial, which facts were made to appear by the sureties on his bail bond in an action to set aside the forfeiture of his bond and it also appearing that he had subsequently returned and executed another bond, it was error in the court to sustain a demurrer to the plea of his sureties.

Cleon K. Calvert and J. J. C. Bach for appellants.

Ira Fields and Jas. H. Jeffries for appellees.

Appeal from Leslie Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

Prior to October, 1906, one Doug Hays was indicted in the Leslie Circuit Court, charged with a felony, and his bail fixed at $500. Appellants, James Hargis, Ed. Callahan and S. B. Stidham, executed the usual bond for the appearance of Doug Hays at the October term of the Leslie Circuit Court to answer the charge. He failed to attend and there was an order made forfeiting his bail bond and another bench warrant issued and his bail fixed at $1,000, and summons was awarded against his sureties, appellants. At the February term, 1907, of the court appellants failed to answer and a judgment was rendered against them for the amount of the bond. This action was instituted by appellants to enjoin the collection of this judgment. As reasons why appellants should not be compelled to pay this judgment they presented the following: That they and Doug Hays resided in Breathitt county, about forty-five miles from Hyden, in Leslie county, the place where the judgment was rendered; that shortly after the bail bond was executed Doug Hays went to the State of Minnesota on a visit to his brother, who resided there; that while there Doug Hays and his brother went on a hunting trip and Doug Hays accidentally shot and wounded himself, and it was impossible for him to appear at the Leslie Circuit Court in October in fulfillment of the bond; that after he became able to travel he returned to Breathitt county and executed another bail bond for the $1,000. It is made to appear that they failed to attend the Leslie Circuit Court, which began on the first Monday in February, 1907, for the reason that they did not know that there was a February term of that court; that they believed the term began on the third Monday in March, 1907; that they relied upon the "Bradley & Gilbert Co." court calendar for the year 1907, which fixed the term for the Leslie Circuit Court on the third Mondays in March, June and November; that they did not know of the change fixing the terms of the Leslie Circuit Court to begin in February, May and October. They filed with their pleadings the court calendar of Bradley & Gilbert Co., for the year 1907, and it substantiates their claim. The lower court concluded that, notwithstanding these alleged facts, which were not disputed, appellants had no cause of action.

Appellee's counsel contends that appellants, the sureties of Doug Hays, acted at their peril when they permitted him to leave the State to visit his brother; and it was no defense to the action to recover the amount of the bond that Hays was accidentally shot and thereby prevented from appearing at the October term of the Leslie Circuit Court; and refers to the cases of Starr v. Commonwealth, 7 Dana, 243; Alguire v. Commonwealth, 3 B. Mon., 349, and Withrow v. Commonwealth, 1 Bush, 17, and other cases of similar import, as sustaining their position. These cases are unlike the case at bar. The seventh Dana case was one where an infant was defendant in the indictment, and he failed to appear to answer it, and the sureties on the bail bond defended upon the ground that the infant's mother had taken him out of the State and kept him away until after the bond was forfeited. The court adjudged that this defense was insufficient. The third B. Monroe case was where the defendant had not appeared because he was imprisoned by the State authorities in the city of Louisville, Kentucky. This fact was pleaded as a defense to the forfeiture of the bail bond and was held insufficient because it was defectively pleaded. The first Bush case was one where one Catlin, who was charged with murder in Marion county, Kentucky, was arrested and gave bond; then went to the State of Indiana, where he was arrested and imprisoned for the violation of the law in that State. While thus imprisoned in the State of Indiana his bail bond was forfeited for his appearance in the Marion Circuit Court, and the court held that his enforced absence in the State of Indiana, at the time the forfeiture proceeding was had, was not a defense to the forfeiture. In the last two cases referred to the defendant was prevented from attending court in compliance with their bail bond on account of wrongful acts committed by them. They were imprisoned for committing other crimes. When the sureties executed bond in the first case referred to they knew that the infant was in the charge of his mother, and when they permitted her to take him from the State they took the risk of her permitting him to return, or of his returning of his own will in spite of her objections. If it had been made to appear in those cases that the defendants had been prevented from appearing in answer to their recognizance, not on account of any wrongful act or dereliction on their part, but on account of unavoidable accident or sickness, over which they had no control, the results would have been different. (Commonwealth v. Terry, 2 Duvall, 383; Bonner v. Commonwealth, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 652.)

The second proposition presented by appellee's counsel is, that the judgment was rendered in February, 1907, and this action was not instituted to set aside the judgment until the 31st day of May, that year; and that one court had passed between the date of the judgment and the institution of this action, and the court was without power to vacate or modify it, except upon the grounds set out in section 518, of the Code of Practice, which is claimed are not presented in this proceeding. This contention of appellee's counsel is correct, except the last proposition to the effect that appellants present no grounds for vacating or modifying the judgment under section 518, of the Code. The seventh sub-division of that section is as follows: "For unavoidable casualty or misfortune, preventing the party from appearing or defending."

Casualty is that which happens without design or without being foreseen. If Hays was "accidentally shot" it was without design on his part, and if he was prevented from appearing at the Leslie Circuit Court by reason thereof it would be the same as if he had become seriously ill and was thereby prevented from attending court. If Hays had been at his home in Breathitt county and had been sick and thereby prevented from attending the Leslie Circuit Court, it would not be contended that his sureties could not have successfully defended for his not appearing; and there is no reason why that defense would not avail them if his sickness had occurred to him while on a visit to his brother. It is true, appellants in their pleadings, did not use the words, "that Hays was prevented from attending the Leslie Circuit Court by reason of an unavoidable casualty or misfortune," but the facts stated by them, if true, show these facts.

We are of the opinion that the lower court erred in sustaining a demurrer to appellants' pleadings. The judgment is reversed and remanded for trial; and if appellants' contentions are found to be true, the court will set aside the judgment and render judgment according to the justice of the case as provided in section 98, of the Criminal Code, which is as follows: "If, before judgment is entered against the bail, the defendant be surrendered or arrested, the court may, at its discretion, remit the whole or part of the sum specified in the bail bond."

BLANTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Homicide—Husband Killing Wife—Accidental or Intentional—Question for Jury—On the trial of accused for homicide by shooting his wife with a pistol, in which he claimed the shooting was accidental, but which the evidence for the Commonwealth tended to show was intentionally done because he was enamored of another woman, it was peculiarly the province of the jury to weigh the evidence, and considering it all, decide which theory was correct.

2. Same—Trivial Errors—A case should not be reversed for trivial, immaterial or unprejudicial errors.

W. F. Hall for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This is the second appeal of this case. Appellant was indicted, tried and convicted for the murder of his wife, and, upon appeal to this court, the case was reversed because the trial judge failed to give an instruction embodying appellant's theory of how the killing occurred, to-wit: That it was an accidental shooting. The former opinion is found in 31 Ky. Law Rep., 800. Upon a re-trial appellant was again found guilty and his punishment fixed, as in the former trial, at confinement for life in the penitentiary. The facts, as developed in this last trial, as shown by the record before us, are practically the same as those brought out on the first trial, which are fully set out in the former opinion.

Three grounds are relied upon by appellant for reversal: First, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. Second, that in the involuntary manslaughter instruction the law is not correctly stated. And, third, that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that if they believed appellant proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, but entertained a doubt as to the degree of his guilt, that they should convict him of the lower degree, to-wit: involuntary manslaughter.

It is the theory of the Commonwealth that appellant deliberately shot and killed his wife for the purpose of getting rid of her, and, in support of this theory evidence was offered which tended to show that appellant was unduly intimate with another woman, and on several occasions was caught in a compromising position with her; that he had said to, and in the presence of different persons, that he wanted to get rid of his wife, and would do so even if he had to blow her head off, and other similar expressions. The pistol with which the shooting was done was furnished by this "woman in the case."

On the other hand, appellant introduced evidence which tended to show that it was an accident; that he stayed at the house and waited on her after she was shot; that she stated that it was an accident, and insisted upon having him wait upon her and care for and minister to her from the time she was shot until she died. It was peculiarly the province of the jury to weigh the evidence, and considering it all, decide which theory was correct. They accepted the theory of the Commonwealth and rejected the contention of appellant that it was an accident. If the testimony offered for the Commonwealth was true, as they must have believed it was, the proof amply supports their finding and verdict.

The instruction complained of by appellant is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the accused had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, there was no danger in handling the pistol as he did, and that it was done without any purpose of harm upon his part, and further believe from the evidence to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt that the killing resulted from the careless use of the weapon, they should find him guilty of involuntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment at a fine or imprisonment, in the county jail, either or both, in your discretion; but if they believe the killing was accidental and without carelessness, he should be acquitted."

This is the instruction which this court, upon the former appeal, said appellant was entitled to have been given. It is not subject to the criticism which appellant's counsel is disposed to make of it, but expresses fairly and fully appellant's legal right under his theory of how the killing occurred. It would have been the better practice for the trial judge to have given the jury an instruction telling them that although they believed appellant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, yet, if they entertained a doubt as to the degree of his guilt, they should find him guilty of involuntary manslaughter, as defined by instruction number two, but his failure to give this instruction did not prejudice appellant's right. The jury was not misled by such failure, for there was no proof offered which tended to show that appellant handled the pistol in a careless or reckless manner, unless such can be inferred from the facts to which he testified about the manner in which the shot was fired.

A case should not be reversed for trivial, immaterial or unprejudicial errors. Two impartial juries have tried this case and each rejected the theory of appellant as to how the killing occurred, and accepted the theory of the Commonwealth that appellant had become enamored of the charms of another woman and killed his wife in order to get her out of his way.

Under the proof the jury had either to find appellant guilty, as they did, or else acquit him, and, under the evidence in this case, the failure of the court to give the instruction which it is now contended he should have given furnishes appellant no ground for reversal, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

JAMES, AUDITOR V. CROMWELL.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Kentucky Senate—Unauthorized Service Rendered—Copying Bills, &c.—Countersigned by Chief Clerk—Compensation Denied—Section 249, of the Constitution, and sections 342 and 1992, of the Statutes, provide for the appointment of the employes of the House and Senate, and these sections are a limitation upon the right or power of either the House or Senate to hire officers or employes; therefore, a claim for services by one who is not an employe in copying bills, resolutions and other papers for the Senate, though endorsed and countersigned by the chief clerk thereof, can not be allowed under the head of contingent expenses or otherwise.

Jas. Breathitt and John F. Lockett for appellant.

James T. Buford and Wm. Cromwell for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

Appellee filed her suit in the Franklin Circuit Court, in which she alleged that, during the 1908 session of the Legislature, at the instance and request of the chief clerk of the Senate, she performed services in copying bills, resolutions and other papers necessary to be done as a contingent expense of the Senate, and which work it was impossible for the clerks of the Senate to do. That these services on her part, were reasonably worth $314.75. That the chief clerk of the Senate endorsed and countersigned her said claim for services as correct, and she thereafter presented same to the Auditor of Public Accounts, and requested that he issue his warrant on the Treasurer, directing him to pay them. That the said Auditor refused to issue his warrant for said sum, or any part thereof. She asked that a mandamus be issued, directing the Auditor to issue his warrant on the Treasurer for the payment of said claim. To this petition the Auditor of Public Accounts filed a general demurrer, and pending same filed his answer, in which he denied that the work which appellee alleged she had done was such as could be properly charged to the contingent expense of the Senate, under section 342, of the Kentucky Statutes, and denied the right and authority of the chief clerk to make such employment, or to endorse and countersign her said account, and pleaded affirmatively that the plaintiff was not employed by the joint action of the two houses of the General Assembly, and denied that the right existed in any one to employ plaintiff without such action on the part of the General Assembly.

To this answer plaintiff filed a general demurrer and pending same filed as part of the petition the certificate of William Cromwell, chief clerk of the Senate, to the effect that the itemized account of plaintiff, amounting to $314.75, was just and correct as a contingent expense of the Senate. The court thereupon overruled the demurrer to the petition, as amended, and sustained the demurrer to the answer with leave to amend, and the Auditor declining to amend, a judgment was entered, directing him to draw his warrant upon the State Treasurer, in favor of plaintiff for the amount of her claim, to-wit: $314.75. From this judgment the Auditor prosecutes an appeal.

For appellee it is admitted that the only authority for allowing this claim is that given by section 342, of the Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows: "The pay and mileage of the Lieutenant Governor, President pro tem. of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and members of both Houses of the General Assembly, the compensation to the officers of the two Houses, except the chief clerks thereof to be made on the certificate of the respective clerks of the amount due; the compensation of the chief clerks upon the order of each House stating the amount due; all other contingent expenses of the General Assembly upon the production of the vouchers, countersigned by the clerks of the respective Houses."

Section 249, of the Constitution, provides: "The House of Representatives of the General Assembly shall not elect, appoint, employ, or pay for, exceeding one chief clerk, one assistant clerk, one enrolling clerk, one sergeant-at-arms, one doorkeeper, one janitor, two cloak room keepers, and four pages; and the Senate shall not elect, appoint, employ, or pay for, exceeding one chief clerk, one assistant clerk, one enrolling clerk one sergeant-at-arms, one doorkeeper, one janitor, one cloakroom keeper, and three pages; and the General Assembly shall provide by general law for fixing the per diem or salary of all of said employees."

This section of the Constitution is clearly a limitation upon the right or power of either the House or Senate to hire officers and employees. It was evidently passed for the purpose of preventing either body from creating needless offices at the expense of the State.

The case of Walker v. Coulter, Auditor, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 530, is very like the case at bar. In that case Walker was employed as a porter in the Senate at $2.50 per day for seventy-one days. His employment covered the entire time that the Legislature was in session; whereas in the case at bar the time during which appellee rendered services extended throughout the full legislative session. A distinction is attempted to be made between the two cases, in this, that in the case of the porter an attempt was made to charge the State for a fixed price per day during the legislative session, whereas in the case at bar appellee has presented a claim for the sum which she says her services during the legislative session were reasonably worth. It is a distinction without a difference, the one is no more contingent than the other.

It is evident that the makers of the Constitution intended that all the work of the legislative bodies should be performed by the officers and employes as defined by section 249, above referred to. And, it may be presumed, that in designating the names and numbers of such employes the Constitutional Convention was fully advised, for in addition to having among its members men of broad experience in the conduct of the affairs of both House and Senate, it had access to the public records showing the number of employes that had heretofore been required. That they did so is made manifest by their express declaration that neither body should pay for the services of any employe other than those designated in section 249. It could hardly be contended that the chief clerk had authority to do that which the Senate itself is expressly prohibited from doing.

It is urged that work of the character which was performed by appellee was absolutely necessary in order that the business of the Senate might be expeditiously carried on. This argument would address itself most forcibly to the Legislature as a reason why the Constitution should be amended so as to give to the respective legislative bodies more employes than those designated in section 249, if it should be found necessary to have such employes in order to properly conduct its business. Such an argument, however, has no place and can not be considered here. Again it is urged that these services should be paid for as a contingent expense of the Senate. We can not agree with learned counsel that an employment of this character could be paid for as a contingent expense, for, if one copyist could be so employed and paid, the number could be multiplied ad libitum, and the very purpose and aim of the Constitutional provision defeated.

Counsel for appellee rely upon the case of McDonald v. Norman, Auditor, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 137, to support her contention, but, in so doing they evidently overlooked the fact that in the more recent case of Walker v. Coulter, Auditor, this court said, in referring to the McDonald case:

"That case can, therefore, not be considered authority upon the construction of this clause of the Constitution (249), and in the light of this clause was incorrectly decided, and would doubtless not have been so decided had the attention of the court been called to the Constitutional provision."

Again, on June 11, 1893, section 1992, of the Kentucky Statutes, was enacted, which provides:

"No other employes shall be elected, appointed, employed, or paid for, without the joint action of both houses."

So that, even if it should become necessary for either house to have the services of additional employes, before they could be legally employed, a joint resolution to that effect would have to be passed, if section 1992 is constitutional, which is not now decided.

With the case of McDonald v. Norman, Auditor, practically overruled in Walker v. Coulter, Auditor, and section 249, of the Constitution, prohibiting the Senate from giving to appellee the employment for which she seeks compensation, we are of opinion that the trial court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition, as amended. The case is, therefore, reversed, and remanded with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the petition, as amended.

FIBLE v. CRABB.

(Filed September 25, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Schedule of Debts—Failure to Give Proper Notice—Effect—The bankrupt law of 1898, requires the bankrupt to submit with his petition "a list of his creditors showing their residence, if known, if unknown that fact to be stated, the amounts due to each of them, the consideration thereof," &c., where a bankrupt in his schedules listed among his liabilities, "D. M. Fible estate, Chicago, Ill., $12,000," when he knew that D. M. Fible was dead and that his estate belonged to his two daughters to whom he had made payments since their father and mother's death, his failure to give their names and address in his schedule, did not operate to discharge their claims.

W. O. Bradley for appellant.

W. S. Pryor for appellee.

Appeal from Henry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice O'Rear, reversing.

W. L. Crabb and D. M. Fible were partners in a whisky distillery in the seventies and later. They incorporated their business, the stock to have issued equally to each of them. But before the shares were actually issued and delivered, D. M. Fible died. By his will he bequeathed the stock to his widow, Harriet Fible. Certificates were subsequently issued to her by the corporation, and delivered by Crabb. Later she sold her shares to appellee, Crabb, for about $15,000, about $12,000 of which was deferred and represented by certain notes now sued upon in this action. Crabb made small payments on the notes from time to time. Harriet Fible died intestate at Chicago. Her two daughters were her only heirs. One of them administered upon her estate and the Crabb notes were divided between them. He was apprised of the fact of their ownership. Besides he was on intimate terms of acquaintance with them, knew their post office addresses and received letters from them and wrote letters to them on the subject of these notes, making a number of small payments on them to the two daughters.

In 1903 appellee, having some years previously made a deed of assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, filed his petition in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, to be discharged of his debts and liabilities. In his schedules he listed among his liabilities as follows: "D. M. Fible estate, Chicago, Ill., $12,000." Notice was mailed to that address, but neither appellant nor her sister (who were the two daughters of the late Mrs. Harriet Fible) received the notice, nor had any notice or knowledge of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings.

Appellant recently sued appellee to recover judgment upon the notes which she held, and which had been assigned to her by the administrator of Harriet Fible. Appellee relied on his discharge in bankruptcy. The question is, was the debt sued on sufficiently scheduled in the bankrupt's proceedings to bring it within the benefit of the statute?

The Bankrupt Law of 1898 (U. S. Court Statutes, page 3425, section 7), requires the bankrupt to submit with his petition "a list of his creditors, showing their residence, if known. If unknown that fact to be stated, the amounts due to each of them, the consideration thereof, &c. And by section 17, Ibid (page 3428) it is provided:

"A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all his provable debts except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district or municipality in which he resides: (2) a judgment in action for frauds or obtaining property under false pretenses or false representations, or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another; (3) or have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy."

The benefits of the statute can be had only by a compliance with its conditions. A discharge is obtainable from provable debts by "duly scheduling" such debts, which is to list the creditors, showing their residence, if known, and if unknown to state that fact. It is allowed, we see, that the debtor may not know his creditor's residence, or where he may be expected to be found, but it is not allowed that the creditor's name be omitted from the list at all. The statute is specific in its declaration that "unless the name of the creditor is given" the discharge shall not operate upon his claim unless he had actual knowledge or notice of the proceedings.

The bankrupt law was designed to relieve overwhelmed debtors from their liabilities, if they but freely and truly surrendered all their property, saving exemptions, to all their creditors. Unless they should be compelled to give a correct list of all their creditors, so that they might be brought into the proceedings by the court, it might happen and frequently would, that the debtor would not give a correct list of all his property; the unworthy would thus use the statute, passed for the benefit of the unfortunate, as the means of perpetrating a fraud upon his creditors. No one else is so apt to know all a man's property as his creditors are. All his creditors are required to be named, else by selecting such as he knew were ignorant of his property, and omitting such as had knowledge of it, the debtor could still work a fraud on his creditors, and make the law and its machinery the means of doing it. So the statute wisely requires the bankrupt, as a condition precedent to obtaining a discharge from his debts, that he shall name all his creditors, and as to such as not named (unless they themselves had notice) the discharge shall not operate to discharge their claims. The statute ought to be applied strictly, else its real purpose will be but an incident of its existence, while its perversion to ignoble ends will be its main use.

We find that appellee did not list appellant as a creditor. The listing of "D. M. Fible estate, Chicago, Ill., $12,000," was not enough. D. M. Fible's estate was not his creditor, and had never been. Whether appellee made an error, due to misrecollection in making out his list, as we think likely, or whether he designedly omitted the name of appellant, is not material. His good faith, or lack of it, does not affect the question, as the statute makes no allowance on account of mistakes. Appellant's name not being given in the list filed with appellee's petition in bankruptcy, the benefits of that act as to her claim, by the express exception of the statute, do not apply, and her claim is unaffected by those proceedings.

There was an effort made to show that appellant had actual notice of the pendency of the proceedings. Mr. A. D. Hudson testified that while she was visiting his home in 1905 he discussed with her the bankruptcy proceedings. Appellant denied the fact. But whether one or the other was mistaken, or mis-remembered, the matter is immaterial, as appellee was discharged in bankruptcy in March 1903, and there is no evidence to show she had any knowledge or notice of the proceedings before that date.

The judgment should have been in appellant's favor.

Reversed and remanded, for proceedings consistent herewith.

REED, &c. v. FORD.

(Filed September 25, 1908—To be reported.)

Action for Damages—Unlawful Assault of Another—Damage to Third Party—Allegations—Sufficiency—A petition which charges that the defendant in a drunken condition, came to plaintiff's house and in front of her room and in her hearing assaulted a defenseless man in a room near hers, by cursing, abusing and threatening to kill him, by which she was frightened, made sick and threatened with miscarriage, she being then pregnant, does not allege such acts of negligence that will support an action for damages, it not being alleged that the defendant saw or knew that plaintiff was in the room or sick, or that defendant did not lawfully enter the house.

Duff & Hutchison for appellants.

Baird & Richardson for appellee.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle, affirming.

Appellants complain of a judgment of the Barren Circuit Court sustaining a demurrer to their petition, as amended, and dismissing the action. The appeal, therefore, presents for our consideration but one question, viz: Do the facts alleged in the petition state a cause of action? The original petition is as follows:

"The plaintiffs, Nettie May Reed and her husband, I. W. Reed, state that during the month of September, 1907, the defendant, Harry Ford, came to their house in Glasgow, Ky., during the darkness of the night, in a drunken condition, and in front of the rooms in which they resided, and in the hearing of the plaintiffs, assaulted one Jas. D. McConnell, who occupied a room near them, and then and there in a loud and boistrous manner, cursed and abused said McConnell and threatened to kill him; that the defendant remained in front of this said room for a half hour or longer and continued to curse and abuse said McConnell and to threaten to take his life, who was perfectly defenseless and unable to resist him.

"The plaintiffs state that the plaintiff, Nettie May Reed, at the time was pregnant with child, that she was greatly alarmed and frightened at the action of the defendant, as aforesaid, so much so that she was compelled to take her bed and remain there ten days; that her nervous system was greatly shocked; that she has since been threatened with a miscarriage in consequence of the fright received by her; that she has suffered great mental agony and physical pain from said fright and that her health has been greatly, and as they fear and believe, permanently impaired as the result of the fright aforesaid."

The following are the averments of the amended petition:

"Amending their petition herein, the plaintiffs state that the assault on Jas. D. McConnell took place in the hall immediately in front of the room occupied by the plaintiffs at the time and within three or four feet from the plaintiff, Nettie May Reed, that the plaintiff, Nettie May, was made violently sick by the fright which she received; that she was compelled and did take her bed for at least ten days, as the result of said fright, and they state that her health has been greatly impaired and they fear permanently destroyed, as the result of the fright aforesaid; and they further state she sustained physical injuries, in consequence of the fright aforesaid, and has been and was damaged, as set out in the original petition herein, in the sum of $500, which injuries are, and were, the direct and proximate result of the fright complained of by her in said original petition."

A careful analysis of the language of the petition and amendment will demonstrate that the sole ground of recovery alleged is that injury and damage resulted to the appellant, Nettie May Reed, from fright superinduced by the conduct of appellee in committing an assault upon, and using in her hearing and within a few feet of her, profane and abusive language toward a third person, one Jas. D. McConnell. That the fright given her by the misconduct of appellee toward McConnell caused her great physical and mental suffering, made her ill for ten days, nearly produced a miscarriage and perhaps permanently impaired her health.

While it is alleged in the petition that appellee's assault upon and abuse of McConnell occurred in her house at night, where he had gone in a drunken condition, these facts did not necessarily make him a trespasser as to the person or premises of Mrs. Reed. It is alleged that McConnell occupied a room in the same house near hers, and not alleged that appellee did not lawfully enter the house. He may have gone there upon McConnell's invitation or to see him on a business matter, and for some reason, whether with or without provocation, became angry with and abusive toward him, after entering the house.

It will be observed that neither the original nor amended petition alleges that appellee, at the time of his assault upon or abuse of McConnell, was seen by Mrs. Reed; that he saw her; knew she was in hearing, or in a room near him, or that she was then an occupant of a room in the house, nor does either aver that the door to the room she was occupying was open; thereby affording appellee an opportunity to discover her presence therein.

It is also true that the petition does not charge that appellee assaulted the appellant, Nettie May Reed; that he knew she was pregnant, or that anything said or done by him was directed to or at her. On the contrary its only averments on that point are to the effect that McConnell, who was not a member of her family or related to her, was alone the subject of appellee's wrath and abuse. It is patent from the averments of the petition, as amended, that appellee committed no assault upon or trespass against the appellant, Nettie M. Reed. The pain and suffering alleged resulted solely from fright and were unaccompanied by any physical injury. The damages sought to be recovered are too remote and speculative. The injury is more sentimental than substantial; being easily simulated and hard to disprove, there is no standard by which it can be justly or even approximately compensated. As said by this court in Reed v. Maley, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 209, a case in which the question here involved was considered:

"The objection to a recovery for injury occasioned without physical impact, is the difficulty of testing the statements of the alleged sufferer; the remoteness of the damages and the metaphysical character of the injury, considered apart from physical pain." (Railway Company v. Elliott, 55 Fed. Rep., 950; Keys v. Railway Company, 36 Minn., 290; Moore v. C. & O. Railway Company, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1160.)

It is equally certain that no right of recovery can be asserted in this case upon the ground that appellee's assault upon or abuse of McConnell, occurring at the house of the appellant, Nettie M. Reed, and in her hearing, constituted negligence for which he should be made to respond in damages for the alleged injury resulting to her. It seems to be well settled that no recovery can be had for injuries resulting from mere fright, caused by the negligence of another when no immediate personal injury is received. (Thompson on Negligence, sections 156-157; Mitchell v. Rochester Railway Co., 455 E., 354; Gulf, &c. Railway Co. v. Hoyter, 77 Am. State Rep., 860.)

Moreover, under the facts alleged, negligence can in no event be imputed to appellee in this case, or regarded as the proximate cause of appellant's injuries; for not seeing appellant, being unseen by her, and not knowing of her presence in the adjacent room, it can not be claimed that he could have foreseen or reasonably anticipated that any injury would probably result to her from his assault upon or abuse of McConnell.

Being of the opinion that the petition fails to state a cause of action, the judgment sustaining the demurrer thereto, is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

HUBER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 25, 1908—To be reported.)

Intoxicating Liquors—License to Sell—Confined to One Barroom— Under Kentucky Statutes, section 4198, providing that "all licenses, except as to peddlers, shall specify the place where the business is to be conducted, nor shall the privilege granted be exercised in any other place;" one who has a license to sell spirituous liquors can not run two barrooms in separate and distinct buildings under one license.

C. L. Raison, Jr., and W. A. Burkamp for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

George P. Huber owns several small lots. On one of these is a brick building, in the upper part of which he lived with his family, and in the lower part he carried on business as a saloon keeper. Fifty or one hundred feet from this building there was a large frame building which was used for picnics and the like for a while, and afterwards was used as a pool-room. He got a license from the county court to sell spirituous, vinous and malt liquors. Under this license he conducted his saloon in the brick building; and while he was running the poolroom business in the frame building, he opened another bar in that and was selling liquor there. For this he was indicted, and having been fined in the circuit court, he appeals.

Section 4198, Kentucky Statutes, provides as follows:

"All applicants for license except peddlers shall state the county, city, town and place therein where it is proposed to carry on the business, and all licenses except to peddlers, shall specify the place where the business is to be conducted, and no one but the person named in the license shall sell under or exercise the privilege granted; nor shall the privilege granted be exercised in any other place than that mentioned in the license, except that retail dealers in spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, in any incorporated city or town, may remove their place of business to some other place in the same city or town by the consent of the county court and municipal authorities of such town or city, entered of record and indorsed on the license. But when the place is once changed the party shall not be allowed to change the location a second time or sell at the original place without first procuring a license."

It is clear from this statute that it was not contemplated that a man under one license could run two bar rooms in separate and distinct buildings. If he could thus run two, he could run as many bars as he saw fit, under one license. His ownership of both buildings does not affect the question. If he had owned only one and rented the other, or owned neither, the rule would be the same. The license is to run one business and at one place of business; and when Huber opened and conducted the bar in the brick building, he exhausted his license. His opening the bar thereafter in the frame building was the running of that bar without license. It is earnestly insisted that as he had a right to run one bar, it can not be said which of the two, was unlawful; and that therefore the selling in the frame building, for which he was indicted, was not unlawful. This argument overlooks the fact that the business in the frame building was begun after he had located his license by conducting his saloon in the brick building. In addition to this a man who under one license opens two bars in separate and distinct buildings can not maintain that he can not be punished for maintaining either as one or the other was lawful. When the Commonwealth has fined him for conducting one of the bars, it is an election by the Commonwealth to treat the other place as the one that is licensed.

The instructions of the court aptly submitted to the jury whether the two bars were separate and distinct, and the proof before the jury left no doubt that they were in separate and distinct buildings.

The indictment was not defective. It gave the name of the offense with sufficient certainty to apprise the defendant of what was meant, and in the descriptive part of the indictment describes it in the usual form.

The court properly refused to allow proof to be heard to the effect that other men in Campbell county were running two bars under one license, just as he was doing; or to the effect that the county officials had so construed the statute. One violation of the law can not justify another, nor can the county officials make nugatory the statutes of the State.

Judgment affirmed.

STEELY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Homicide—Indicted as Principal—Convicted as Aiding or Abetting—Although one is indicted as a principal he may be convicted on the showing that he was present at the time the crime was committed, counseling, aiding, advising or assisting the real perpetrator thereof.

2. Instructions—Based on Evidence—On the trial of one for homicide no instruction should be given based upon any theory which is not supported by some evidence.

3. Joint Indictment—Mother and Son—Apparent Damage by Deceased—Defending Each Other—On the trial of an indictment against the mother jointly indicted with her son, for a homicide, if the conduct of the deceased at the time of the killing, was such as to justify the son in the belief that deceased was then about to inflict upon his mother or himself great bodily harm, he should go acquit on the ground of self-defense, and if the son is justified the mother should likewise be excused for having been present urging and advising him to do so.

R. S. Rose and J. K. Watkins for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

Appellant and her son, Granville Steely, were indicted for the murder of Martin B. Snyder. She demanded and was given a separate trial. The jury having found her guilty and fixed her punishment at five years confinement in the penitentiary, she appeals and seeks to reverse the judgment predicated on that verdict on several grounds, the principal of which, however, is that the court did not properly instruct the jury.

The facts in the case, as developed by the testimony of both the Commonwealth and the accused show that on the night of the third of July, 1908, appellant was living with her husband and two sons about twelve and sixteen years of age respectively, in a small cottage on the bank of the river in the town of Williamsburg. Her husband was not at home on that night, and a short time before midnight, the deceased, accompanied by some six or eight of his gentlemen friends, took a sixteen gallon keg of beer to the home of appellant for the purpose of drinking it. The keg was placed in the middle room on the floor and tapped. Deceased and his friends, and appellant and her son, Granville, all engaged in drinking. While the drinking was in progress the deceased, Granville Steely and others of the men assembled were shooting dice on the floor by the light of a small lamp. Later in the night, sometime between one and two o'clock, the crowd had become somewhat boisterous, and appellant ordered them from the house. Deceased took offense at being ordered from the house, and threatened to take the lamp, which was the only light, away with him. This threat on his part brought on a wordy war between himself and appellant in which she several times ordered him from the house. The lamp was taken from the floor by some one and in being lifted up went out.

In the meantime appellant had gotten possession of an axe and was approaching deceased in a threatening manner with it when one of her guests caught hold of the axe so as to prevent her from using it, and while he was so holding the axe deceased struck appellant over the shoulder and neck with the lamp. This blow, at least, staggered appellant, and, according to the weight of the testimony, which supports her contention, knocked her down. She immediately exclaimed that she was killed, and called to her son to cut deceased, and he was stabbed twice. Just when this cutting was done, or whether in the house or outside is not clear, for it was dark in the house at the time and no witness saw deceased cut, though Granville Steely testified that he cut him when deceased attacked his mother. From the effects of these wounds, there inflicted upon deceased, he died two days later.

For appellant it is urged that as the Commonwealth utterly failed to show that she cut or stabbed deceased, the jury should have been peremptorily instructed to find for her at the conclusion of the Commonwealth's testimony, and certainly it should have been so instructed at the conclusion of all of the testimony, when it had been clearly established that the cutting was done by Granville Steely.

This contention is without merit, however, for it has been expressly decided that although one is indicted as a principal, he may be convicted on the showing that he was present at the time the crime was committed, counseling, aiding, advising or assisting the real perpetrator thereof. In the case of Evans v. Commonwealth, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 573, the appellant was jointly indicted with others charged with the crime of house-burning. The lower court instructed the jury that if the burning was done by either of the persons indicted with appellant, and he was present aiding or abetting, they should convict him, and in passing upon the correctness of this instruction, upon review here this court said:

"The indictment charges the accused with the burning. It does not speak of aiding or abetting. If, however, the torch was applied by a co-defendant of the accused, and he was then present aiding and abetting he was, under our law, a principal, and the indictment, therefore, authorized such an instruction."

And in the more recent case of Reed v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1212, the same principal was approved in a most elaborate and exhaustive opinion by Judge Settle.

The objection to the instructions given is well taken. The instructions in every case should present the law of the case as warranted by the particular facts proven. No instruction should be given based upon any theory which is not supported by some evidence, and certainly an instruction should not be given upon any theory where all of the evidence in the case tends to show that the converse is true.

In the case at bar appellant was charged with having cut and stabbed deceased, from the effects of which he died. There was not a particle of proof offered which tended to show that she did so; on the contrary there was positive proof offered which tended to show that the cutting was done by her son. No instruction, therefore, should have been given based upon the idea that she herself did the cutting, hence, instructions one and three are superfluous.

The instruction on self-defense is also objectionable in that it fails to submit to the jury the idea that if at the time he did the cutting Granville Steely believed and had reasonable grounds to believe that either he or his mother were in danger of suffering death or some great bodily harm at the hands of deceased, then he had the right to use such means as seemed necessary under the circumstances, as they appeared to him, to repel such threatened bodily harm or danger to himself or his mother. Certainly if the conduct of deceased at that time was such as to justify Granville Steely in the belief that deceased was then about to inflict upon his mother or himself great bodily harm, he should go acquit on the ground of self-defense, and, if Granville Steely is justified and excused for cutting deceased, appellant should likewise be excused for having been present urging and advising him to do so.

Upon a re-trial of the case, if the evidence introduced is substantially the same as that offered upon the last trial, the court will give the following instructions:

"If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that Granville Steely, in Whitley county, Kentucky, before the finding of the indictment herein, willfully, feloniously and with malice aforethought, and not in the necessary, or to him apparently necessary, defense of himself or his mother, with a knife or dirk, a deadly weapon, cut, stabbed and wounded one Martin B. Snyder, from the effects of which cutting, stabbing and wounding, the said Snyder then and there, presently died, and if you further believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time he did so the defendant, Sarah Steely was then and there present willfully, feloniously and with malice aforethought, and not in her necessary or to her apparently necessary, self-defense, counseling and advising the said Granville Steely to do said cutting, stabbing and wounding, or aiding or assisting the said Granville Steely in doing said cutting, stabbing and wounding, then, in that event, you should find the said Sarah Steely guilty, as charged in the indictment, and fix her punishment at confinement in the State penitentiary for life, or at death, in your discretion.

"If you believe from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that Granville Steely, in Whitley county, Kentucky, and before the finding of the indictment herein, did unlawfully, willfully, feloniously in sudden affray, or in sudden heat or passion, without previous malice, and not in the necessary, or to him apparently necessary, defense of himself or his mother, cut, stabbed, and wounded Martin B. Snyder with a dirk or knife, a deadly weapon, from which cutting, stabbing and wounding the said Snyder then and there presently died, and if you shall further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time the said Granville Steely so cut, stabbed and wounded the said Martin B. Snyder, the said Sarah Steely was then and there present, unlawfully, willfully, feloniously in sudden affray, or in sudden heat of passion, and not in her necessary, or to her apparently necessary, self-defense, counseling and advising the said Granville Steely to do the said cutting, stabbing and wounding, or aiding or assisting the said Granville Steely in doing said cutting, stabbing and wounding, then you should find the said Sarah Steely guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fix her punishment at confinement in the State penitentiary for any length of time not less than two years nor more than twenty-one years, in your discretion.

3.

"Although you may believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Sarah Steely has been proven guilty, yet, if you entertain a doubt as to the degree of her guilt, you should give her the benefit of the doubt, and find her guilty of voluntary manslaughter, as defined in instruction number two.

4.

"Although you may believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that Granville Steely cut, stabbed and wounded Martin B. Snyder, from which cutting, stabbing and wounding, he then and there presently died, and that the defendant, Sarah Steely was then and there present, aiding, advising and counseling the said Granville Steely to cut, stab and wound the said Snyder, yet, if you shall further believe from the evidence that at the time the said Granville Steely so cut, stabbed and wounded the said Snyder, either the defendant, Sarah Steely, or her son, Granville Steely, had reasonable grounds to believe and in good faith did believe that the said Snyder was then and there about to take her life or inflict upon her some great bodily harm, then the said Granville Steely had the right to use any means at his command that were necessary, or to him apparently necessary, to protect the life of defendant, Sarah Steely, or to ward off the then impending, or to him apparently impending danger; then the defendant, Sarah Steely, under such circumstances, had the right to advise and counsel her son Granville Steely, to do so, and you should find the defendant, Sarah Steely, "not guilty" on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity.

5.

"If, upon the whole case, you entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant has been proven guilty, you should find her 'not guilty.'"

Certain other objections are made by counsel for appellant in their brief, but as these questions can not arise on another trial we deem it unnecessary to consider them.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

JONES' ADM'R v. JONES' ADM'X, &c.

(Filed October 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Vendor and Purchaser—Sale with Mortgage Back—Failure to Pay—Remedy of Vendor—A sale of a stock of goods and fixtures, used in operating a restaurant, for $800, to be paid in installments of $20 per month, and in default of any payment the whole stock to belong to the vendor, must be considered as an absolute sale with mortgage back, and the vendor's remedy on default of payment was a suit in equity to enforce his mortgage lien, and have the property subjected to the balance of the purchase price.

J. B. Paxton for appellant.

P. M. McRoberts for appellees.

Appeal from Lincoln Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, reversing.

In June, 1905, L. R. Jones sold to his son, J. T. Jones a stock of goods and fixtures, used in operating a restaurant and soda fountain, for $800, to be paid in monthly installments of $20 per month. The contract of sale provided that in the event of default of any monthly payment the whole purchase price was to become due, and L. R. Jones thereupon had the right to resume possession, and treat any installment that might have been paid as rent. It further provided that the entire stock was to remain in the possession of L. R. Jones until the purchase price was paid, and when so paid it was then to become the property of J. T. Jones. It further provided that J. T. Jones should keep and maintain the stock of goods up to or above its standard of excellence at the date of sale.

Both contracting parties died before the institution of this suit. Appellant was appointed administrator of L. R. Jones, and Woodie S. Jones, wife of J. T. Jones, was appointed administratrix of his estate. The administrator of L. R. Jones filed suit to recover of Mrs. Woodie S. Jones, individually and in her capacity as administratrix, the purchase price of the stock of goods, to-wit: $800 less $480.65, alleged to have been previously paid.

In the first paragraph of the petition it is alleged that the sale was conditional, that the covenants thereof had been broken, in that the decedent, J. T. Jones, had failed to pay any installment as it fell due, and that the defendant, Mrs. Woodie S. Jones, had wrongfully converted all of the articles named in the contract to her own use, and he prayed judgment against her for the purchase price, less the credit to which the same was entitled, as above indicated.

In the second paragraph plaintiff charged that the administratrix, Mrs. Woodie S. Jones, had committed waste, and converted the property to her own use, and failed to account for it as administratrix, and he asked that, in the event the court should construe the contract to be an absolute sale with mortgage back, that he should be given judgment against administratrix and her bondsman for the amount due. To each paragraph of the petition, a demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed, and he appeals.

The contract, which is the basis of this litigation, is as follows:

"This contract of agreement made and entered into this 6th day of June, 1905, by and between L. R. Jones, party of the first part, and J. T. Jones, party of the second part, both parties of Lincoln county, Kentucky.

Witnesseth: Whereas the party of the first part has this day sold to J. T. Jones, party of the second part, all his right, title and interest in and to a restaurant, stock of goods, furniture and fixtures, soda fountain, show cases, and all other property contained in store room on the south side of Main street in Stanford, Kentucky, for the sum of $800. Said sum is to be paid as follows: $20 to be paid on the 15th day of October, 1905, from this date, and $20 on the 15th day of each month thereafter. and in addition thereto the said second party is to pay the interest on all sums remaining unpaid on the 6th day of each month, at the rate of six per cent. per annum or half per cent. interest per month on all sums remaining unpaid. In the event the second party should default on any monthly installment with the accumulated interest, then in that event the entire sums remaining unpaid shall become due and payable, and the first party may at once assume charge and resume possession of the entire stock of goods.

"The monthly payments herein are only to be in the way of rental and the entire stock, &c., aforesaid are to remain in the possession of the first party, until the entire $800, with interest is paid, and when so paid the second party becomes the owner thereof, and not till then.

"The second party agrees to keep up the stock in as good or better condition as when bought, shall he fail in this particular, then the entire sum becomes due and payable. It is the distinct understanding that the business is to be run in the name of J. T. Jones the second party hereto, and in no event and in no way is the first party hereto, L. R. Jones to be liable for any indebtedness that first party may in any way incur."

Similar contracts have frequently been before this court, and the rule announced by Justice Story has been followed, to-wit:

"Wherever a conveyance, assignment, or other instrument transferring an estate, is originally intended between the parties as a security for money, or for any other incumbrance, whether the intention appear from the same instrument or from any other, it is always considered, in equity, a mortgage."

In the case of Baldwin & Company v. Crow, &c., 86 Ky., 679, Baldwin & Company had sold to a man named Dennis, a piano, for which Dennis had executed to them three notes for $150 each, payable in six, twelve and eighteen months. Each of said notes contained the following provision:

"This note is of a series given for the purchase of the instrument mentioned below, the conditions of which purchase are, that said instrument remains the property of D. H. Baldwin & Company until all notes given for the instrument are paid, and in default of payment of any of said notes at maturity, or at any time after such default, before accepting payment of amount thus due, or in case said instrument, before payment in full, is removed from Nicholasville, Kentucky, without written consent of D. H. Baldwin & Co., they may receive possession of said instrument without any liability on their part to refund any money previously paid on account of said purchase. Loss in case of fire to be borne by me.

"A. J. DENNIS."

It will be observed that the contract in that case was very much like the one in the case at bar, and the court there said:

"It is manifest the object of the contract under consideration was to secure payment of the agreed purchase price, and it should, therefore, be regarded as an absolute sale and mortgage back, and such has been the uniform ruling of this court in similar cases."

No contrary rule has ever been announced by this court.

Applying this rule to the case at bar, the contract must be considered to be an absolute sale with mortgage back, hence, appellant's remedy was a suit in equity to enforce his mortgage lien, and have the property subjected to the payment of the balance of the purchase price due thereon.

The first paragraph of the petition alleged a default on the part of the purchaser in the payment of the monthly installments, which default, according to the terms of the contract, precipitated the maturity of the entire debt. It is also alleged that the defendant, Mrs. Woodie S. Jones, had taken all of said property, every article thereof, and converted it to her own use, and he asked that he be given judgment against her for the balance of the debt due his intestate. This paragraph of the petition stated a good cause of action against the defendant, for the demurrer admits that she was wrongfully in the possession of the mortgage property, viz: not an innocent purchaser for value and, hence, she was answerable for the return of the property or the value thereof at the election of the plaintiff.

The suit should have been upon the equity side of the docket and, in the absence of a motion to transfer it, the court should have done so on its own motion.

Upon its return the case should be transferred to the equity docket, and either party permitted to amend his pleading, and appellant permitted to subject the property covered by the mortgage to the satisfaction of the balance, if anything, due upon the purchase price thereof.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WEISINGER, &c. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. IN KY.

(Filed October 6, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Beard & Marshall and Muir Weisinger for appellants.

Willis & Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Shelby Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

Appellants, Harry Weisinger and son, are engaged in the business of farming and stock raising, and live about two miles from Shelbyville, Kentucky. On August 7th, 1907, they contracted with appellee to furnish them a car suitable for shipping fine hogs from Shelbyville to Lexington, Kentucky, where they were to be exhibited at the Blue Grass Fair. Appellants had six hogs which they desired to ship, and arrangements were made by which these hogs were to be placed in the same car in which one Frank Smith proposed to ship his hogs appellants to have the use of one-half of the car and Smith the use of the other half.

On August 10th, 1907, about 8:30 p. m., appellants' six hogs were brought to appellees' depot in Shelbyville for the purpose of being loaded for shipment to Lexington. Smith, who was to use the other half of the car, reached the depot shortly before the employees of appellants. The latter, upon arriving at the depot, went immediately to appellee's agent for the purpose of obtaining directions as to which car the hogs should be loaded in. According to the testimony for appellants, appellee's agent designated as the car in which the former's hogs were to be shipped the car that was by Henry Moxley's car and in which Smith had already loaded his hogs. The testimony of appellee is to the effect that its agent stated to appellants' employees that their car was next to Moxley's car; that he had shown it to Smith's son, and that they would probably find him at that car. Appellants' employees then went to the car in which Smith had been loading his hogs, and proceeded to load their hogs in the same car. Shortly thereafter appellee's agent came to the car and notified appellants' employees that they had loaded their hogs in the wrong car; that it would be necessary for them to unload the hogs and place them in the car, which had been ordered for that purpose. Appellants' employees stated that it would be dangerous to remove the hogs at that time, and that they would only do so at the risk of the company. Appellee's agent says that he gave them the privilege of letting the hogs remain in the car in which they had been placed. This is denied by appellants' employees, who assert that they were required to remove them at the time. Among the six hogs which appellants' employees brought to the station for shipment was one fine, large boar weighing 600 or 700 pounds, and it is claimed the agent was notified that the removal of this boar would in all probability result in his death. The hogs were then unloaded and moved into another car soon thereafter the boar died.

Appellants instituted this action for the value of the hog, which the petition alleges was $1,500, claiming that its death was due to the negligence and carelessness of appellee, its servants, agents and employees. Appellee denied any negligence on its part, and also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of appellants. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellee. From the judgment based upon that verdict the appellants appeal.

Appellants ask a reversal upon three grounds: First, the verdict was contrary to the evidence; second, errors in instructions; third, the admission of incompetent testimony.

First. In view of the fact that the court has determined to reverse the judgment on other grounds, it will be unnecessary to set forth the evidence at length for the purpose of determining whether or not there is any merit in appellants' first contention.

Second. Appellants asked an instruction to the effect that it was the duty of the defendant to designate the car in which the stock was to be shipped, and if, by reason of the negligence of the defendant, the stock was loaded in the wrong car and had to be unloaded, and that such unloading and reloading caused the death of the hog, the jury should find for the plaintiffs the reasonable, vendible value of the hog. This instruction was refused. The court thereupon instructed the jury that it was the duty of the defendant and its agents to exercise ordinary and reasonable care under all the facts and circumstances of the case to properly indicate to the plaintiffs, or their agents, the car in which the hogs were to be loaded for transportation to Lexington; that it was also the duty of plaintiffs, or their agents, on the same occasion, to exercise ordinary and reasonable care under all the facts and circumstances of the case to ascertain, before proceeding to load their hogs, the proper car in which the same should be loaded for transportation to Lexington, and to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to avoid loading their hogs in the wrong car; that if the jury should believe from the evidence that the defendant negligently failed to discharge the duties required of it in the instructions, and if by reason of any such negligence on its part the hogs of plaintiffs were loaded in the wrong car, so that the removal of them from the wrong car became or was necessary, and should further believe that the defendant, or its agent, negligently ordered the removal of the hogs, at a time or in a manner which in view of the condition of plaintiffs' hog in question in this case, would naturally or reasonably result in the death of said hog, the jury should find for plaintiffs, unless they believed from the evidence that the plaintiffs, or their agents, were themselves guilty of contributory negligence. Other instructions were given, which are not complained of.

We are of opinion that the above instruction does not present the law of the case. When a shipper appears at the station of a railroad company with live stock which he intends to load and ship in the latter's cars, it is the duty of the railroad company to designate the car in which the stock should be loaded. It does not perform its full duty merely by, using ordinary care. If the shipper, without first having made inquiry as to the car in which his stock is to be loaded, should load it in the wrong car, he would do so, of course, entirely at his own risk. But, if he first inquires of the railroad company and asks that the proper car be designated, and the latter designates the wrong car, it is liable for such damages as naturally result from the removal made necessary by the improper directions, where such removal is required by the company.

Upon the next trial, the court will instruct the jury as follows:

"No. 1. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, or its agent, designated the car in which Frank Smith's hogs were loaded as the car in which plaintiffs should load their hogs, and that plaintiffs did load their hogs in said car, and that the defendant, or its agent, required plaintiffs to unload the hog in question and load him in another car, at a time when it was not reasonably safe to do so, and that plaintiffs' hog died as a result of such removal, you will find for plaintiffs the reasonable market value of the hog at said time unless you believe that plaintiffs failed to use ordinary care in removing and handling said hog, and that by reason thereof the death of the hog resulted.

"2. If, however, you believe that plaintiffs' hog was in such condition that he would have died notwithstanding such removal, or that defendant's agent gave plaintiffs the privilege of letting the hog remain in the car in which it was first loaded, until it could be safely removed or that the defendant did designate the proper car for plaintiffs to load their hog in, and that the plaintiffs were themselves negligent in not loading their hog in the car so designated or that the hog's death resulted from the careless and negligent manner in which it was removed and thereafter handled; then, in any one of these events, you will find for the defendant."

No. 3. Appellants insist that the court erred in permitting one J. M. Logan to testify that he heard a hog squealing as it passed his house on the night in question. The purpose of offering this testimony was to show that the hog was very hot at the time and would have probably died even though it had not been loaded in one car and subsequently removed to another. On the next trial this evidence should not be admitted unless the hog that squealed is sufficiently identified as that belonging to appellants.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

CRIMINAL LAW—

1. Homicide—Self-defense—Law of—Instruction—The single error complained of in this record is the failure of the trial court to give an instruction asked for upon the law of self-defense, and while the instruction properly expresses the law of self-defense, it was unnecessary to give it because of one previously given by the court on its own motion which it approved as a correct exposition of the law on this subject. While the verbiage of the instruction may differ somewhat, it is in meaning and substance such as have been approved by the former opinions of this court. Commonwealth v. Boyd, Jr. 993
2. Horse Stealing—Possession Under Pretense of Hiring—Felonious Intent—Conversion—Where one gets possession of another's horses under the fraudulent pretense of hiring them, but without intending to return them, and with the felonious intent of converting them to his own use, he is guilty of stealing, and in such case the removal of them from the owner's custody is a conversion without proof of a subsequent sale or other wrongful disposition of them. Smith v. Commonwealth..... 998
3. Defense—Unsound Mind—Opinion Evidence—Non-expert Witnesses—The mere expression of an opinion by witnesses who are non-experts that the accused is of unsound mind, is of little weight, where no acts are given showing unsoundness of mind. Idem..... 998

5. Immaterial Error—An error in an instruction which will not mislead the jury will not authorize a reversal. Idem.1001
6. Indictment — Statutory Offense — Allegation of Felonious Intent—An indictment for a crime that is felonious under the common law must charge its commission with a "felonious intent," but where the crime is purely statutory and is defined by the statute, the indictment is sufficient if it follows the language of the statute without the use of the term "feloniously" or the words "felonious intent." *Howerton v. 8. Misconduct of Attorney for Commonwealth—Affidavit for Continuance—Charged to be Untrue—Reversible Error—Where, on the trial of one indicted for a felony, it was a reversible error for the trial court to permit the attorney for the Commonwealth to say to the jury that the affidavit of the absent witness for the defendant that had been filed for a continuance and admitted to be read as his deposition, "was untrue and that the Commonwealth was forced to admit it to get a trial." Idem.....1009

Homicide—Witness for Commonwealth—Immoral Relations With Deceased—Evidence of—Competency—Where, on the trial of accused for homicide, a female witness testified for the Commonwealth, it was competent for the defense to ask her if she had had immoral relations with the deceased, for the purpose of showing her interest or bias in the case, and this fact might have been shown by other witnesses if she had not been questioned or had denied such relations. Leach v. Commonwealth	1016
13. Same—It is proper to permit, and if necessary to require, a witness to relate his or her relations with the parties to the litigation, and in Commonwealth cases with the accused or the prosecuting witness, or the deceased, if the prosecution is for homicide, for the purpose of showing his or her bias or prejudice or interest in the result of the trial, and the fact that the answer may disgrace or humiliate the witness will not excuse him. Idem	1016

15. Homicide—Husband Killing Wife—Accidental or Intentional—Question for Jury—On the trial of accused for homicide by shooting his wife with a pistol, in which he claimed the shooting was accidental, but which the evidence for the Commonwealth tended to show was intentionally done because he was enamored of another woman, it was peculiarly the province of the jury to weigh the evidence, and considering it all, decide which theory was correct. Blanton v. COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY.

HILL, &c. v. PETTITT, &c.

(Filed October 6, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Jurisdiction of Appellate Court—An attorney for petitioners in a proceeding in the county court, under the drainage law, moved the court to allow him a fee of $250, which the court refused and allowed him $100, from which he appealed to the circuit court, and thence to this court. Held—That as the fee sought to be recovered was only $250 and the lower court allowed $100, the amount in controversy as to appellant is only $150 of which sum this court has no jurisdiction.

R. G. Hill for appellants.

J. R. Hays for appellees.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, dismissing appeal.

This was a proceeding under the drainage law of the State found in the Kentucky Statutes, section 2380.

The appellants here, first appealed from the county court to the circuit court. The order of the county court appealed from sets out that R. G. Hill moved the court to allow him an attorney's fee of $250 as attorney for the petitioners, to be taxed as costs and apportioned among the parties. This motion was objected to, and upon hearing the matter, the county court allowed Hill $100, and further adjudged that this sum, together with the remainder of the costs in the action, be apportioned among the parties—then follows the names of the parties and the respective amount that each is directed to pay—the judgment further providing that if the amounts charged to each party were not paid by a designated day they should be placed in the hands of the sheriff of Daviess county for collection. To so much of this order as fixed his fee at $100, in place of $250, R. G. Hill appealed to the circuit court. In the circuit court, the following judgment, which is the basis of the appeal to this court, was rendered:

"This action coming on to be heard upon the pleadings and proof, and the court, after hearing argument and being fully advised, adjudges that R. G. Hill, as attorney for the petitioners herein, be and he is allowed a fee of $100; and the court further adjudges that the costs of the action was properly assessed; and overrules the objection to the manner of assessing the same; to all of which the petitioners object and except and pray an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted."

Unless there is something in the record aside from the question concerning the attorney's fee, this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. Jurisdiction is denied where the amount in controversy in cases for the recovery of money or personal property is less than $200. As the attorney's fee sought to be recovered was only $250, and the lower court allowed $100, it is clear that the amount in controversy as to appellant is only $150. Therefore this court would have no jurisdiction.

Appellants complain of the manner in which the costs in the action were apportioned between the parties. The record discloses the amount of costs each party is adjudged to pay, but we are not informed as to what each should pay if the contention of appellant was sustained. To put it in another way, appellant complains that the appellees are credited by amounts to which they are not entitled, the result being that they are not required to pay such costs as they should be; but how much costs they should be required to pay, is not stated. Therefore, we are unable to determine whether or not the judgment of the lower court is correct. Nor can we tell what the amount, if any, in controversy is outside of the attorney's fee.

It results from these conclusions that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal and it must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. MELTON.

(Filed October 7, 1908—To be reported.)

Benjamin D. Warfield and Waddill & Dempsey for appellant.

Clay & Clay and Gordon, Gordon & Cox for appellee.

Appeal from Hopkins Circuit Court.

Judge Barker delivered the following dissenting opinion:

I find myself unable to concur in the opinion affirming the judgment in this case, and the duty I owe myself, as well as that due the appellant, constrains me, much against my natural inclination, to state the reasons for dissenting from the conclusion reached by a majority of my brethren.

On March 2, 1905, a carpenter's force of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company were constructing coal chutes near, but not upon, the tracks or roadway of the railroad company, at the mines of the Ingle Coal Company, at or near Howell, Indiana. The force consisted of seven laborers, including the foreman, one W. C. Shrode, and appellee Melton. In raising, with an ordinary pulley, block and tackle, a bent of timber weighing about one thousand pounds from a partly horizontal to an upright position, the bent fell by reason of a latent defect in the welding of one of the links of the chain, with which one of the pulley blocks was temporarily attached to the frame-work. In falling the bent fell upon Melton and produced a concussion of his spine, resulting in partial paralysis of his lower extremities. For this injury Melton brought his action against the railroad company in the Hopkins Circuit Court, and elected to proceed under the statute of the State of Indiana, commonly known as the "Employers' Liability Act." A trial of the action resulted in a verdict for compensatory damages in the sum of twenty-two thousand dollars.

As Melton's cause of action is rested upon the Indiana statute regulating the liability of corporations for injuries received by their employes, the first question with which we are confronted is, whether or not that act, as construed by the majority opinion, is constitutional, or whether, on the contrary, it is inimical to that provision in the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, which guarantees to all the equal protection of the law, or, as has been said, the protection of equal laws. As the act in question is fully set out in the opinion of the court, it is not necessary to incorporate any part of it here. It is deemed sufficient to say that it prescribes a different rule of liability for those employers who may be brought within its purview from that imposed by the laws of Indiana upon other employers for injuries occurring to their employes, and unless it can be differentiated by a reasonable classification from those laws, it must be held violative of the Federal Constitution.

It is earnestly contended by counsel for appellant, that the Indiana court of last resort has construed this act to be applicable only to those employers operating railroads; and further, that it has limited its application to injuries occurring to employes engaged in the hazard of the actual operation of the railroad at the time they were hurt. Whether this be so or not, I shall not now investigate. This court has enforced the act as applying to injuries occurring to all railroad employes, whether they be at the time engaged in the active operation of the railroad as such, or whether they are engaged in what may be termed collateral occupations, among which may be included all those occupations which are merely auxiliary to the active operation of the railroad and not subject to the extreme hazard which exists in the active carrying forward of its operation. This conclusion makes it necessary to inquire whether the act, as construed, is or not inimical to the equality clause of the Federal Constitution.

As said before, it is not permissible, under the Federal Constitution, to impose arbitrarily upon one class burdens which are not imposed upon the community in general; nor may a Legislature arbitrarily impose a liability upon one class of employers which is not imposed upon others. Undoubtedly, the State may regulate the liability of employers to their employes if the classification for regulation be based upon just and reasonable principles; but it may not arbitrarily select one class whose liability is to be ascertained by rules more stringent than apply to employers generally doing a similar business.

This principle has nowhere been more clearly and forcibly expressed than by the Supreme Court of the United States in G. C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S., 150, where the question we have in hand is discussed. In the opinion, it is said:

"But it is said that it is not within the scope of the fourteenth amendment to withhold from States the power of classification, and that if the law deals alike with all of a certain class, it is not obnoxious to the charge of a denial of equal protection. While, as a general proposition, this is undeniably true (citing many cases), yet it is equally true that such classification can not be made arbitrarily. The State may not say that all white men shall be subjected to the payment of the attorney's fees of parties successfully suing them and all black men not. It may not say that all men beyond a certain age shall be alone thus subjected, or all men possessed of a certain wealth. These are distinctions which do not furnish any proper basis for the attempted classification. That must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such bases. * * *

"But arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. The equal protection demanded by the fourteenth amendment forbids this. No language is more worthy of frequent and thoughtful consideration than these words of Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for this court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S., 368-369: 'When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and in view of the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.' The first official action of this nation declared the foundation of government in these words: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among those are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.' While such declaration of principles may not have the force of organic law, or be made the basis of judicial decision as to the limits of right and duty, and while in all cases reference must be had to the organic law of the nation for such limits, yet the latter is but the body and the letter of which the former is the thought and the spirit, and it is always safe to read the letter of the Constitution in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence. No duty rests more imperatively upon the courts than the enforcement of those constitutional provisions intended to secure that equality of rights which is the foundation of free government. * * *

"It is apparent that the mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment, and that in all cases it must appear not only that a classification has been made, but also that it is one based upon some reasonable ground—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification—and is not a mere arbitrary selection. Tested by these principles, the statute in controversy can not be sustained."

Upon the same subject, the Supreme Court, in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S., 540, said:

"The difficulty is not met by saying that, generally speaking, the State when enacting laws may, in its discretion, make a classification of persons, firms, corporations and associations, in order to subserve public objects. For this court has held that classification 'must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis. * * * But arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. The equal protection demanded by the fourteenth amendment forbids this. * * * It is apparent that the mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment, and that in all cases it must appear not only that a classification has been made, but also that it is one based upon some reasonable ground—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification—and is not a mere arbitrary selection.'"

To the same effect are Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Company, &c., 183 U. S., 79, and Ballard v. Mississippi Cotton Oil Com- pany, 81 Miss., 507, 62 L. R. A., 407; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th edition, pages 560-563.

In view of the foregoing authority, the question recurs: Does the statute under discussion, as construed in this case, afford a reasonable or just classification when it establishes one rule of liability for injuries occurring to all railroad employes without regard to whether they are engaged in the hazard of railroad operation, leaving the liability of all other employes subject to a less stringent rule of liability? It is a matter of common knowledge that only a small per cent. of a railroad corporation's employes are engaged in its active operation. Outside of the men operating the railroad, there is a very large class of employes who are engaged in mere clerical work, and who have no more to do with the actual operation of the railroad as such, than the clerks and bookkeepers of any mercantile establishment. Railroads employ many lawyers, surgeons and clerks; some of them keep large forces of men engaged in cutting cross-ties in the forests, or in the breaking of stone for ballast, and in mining coal for the use of the engines. All are engaged in precisely similar business to that carried forward by other employes who are confessedly not within the purview of the act. The appellee, himself, at the time he was hurt was engaged as a carpenter in building a coal chute or tipple at the Ingle Coal Mines, near or on the railroad's right of way. It does not appear whether this chute was for the benefit of the railroad or the mining corporation; but I shall assume, in order to eliminate any question of fact, that the chute was being constructed for the purpose of coaling the railroad's engines. Now, let us suppose that the coal company had had a force of carpenters building coal chutes by the side of those being built by appellee, for the purpose of putting its coal on the cars for shipment, and that a similar accident had happened at the same time to one of its employes; the employe of the coal mining corporation, if he had sued, would have been forced to ground his action upon the common law prevailing in Indiana, while if the majority opinion be sound, appellee could maintain his action under the statute. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that the two accidents were caused by identically the same mishap, we would have different rules regulating the remedy of the injured persons, although the occupation of each was precisely the same. Such illustrations could be multiplied indefinitely; but they would throw no additional light upon the discussion. The appellee, in building the chute by the side of the railroad, was subject to no more hazard than would have been the employes of the coal company, had they been engaged in building chutes for their employer. It seems to me utterly fallacious to say that the statute, when made to apply to the cases of those employes who are hurt in collateral occupations, does not prescribe an arbitrary rule of liability for railroad corporations for injuries to their employes, from which other employes doing identically the same business are exempt.

The view I have expressed above is supported by very high authority. In the case of Kline v. Minnesota Iron Co., 93 Minn., 63, 66, the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in construing a statute of that State identical in principle with the one under discussion, said:

"This statute has been before the court in numerous cases, and we have uniformly held that it was intended by the Legislature to apply to 'railroad hazards,' and not to railroads as such; that the character of the employment was the test to be applied in determining its validity, and not the character of the employer. It was first construed in Lavallee v. St. Paul, &c., R. Co., 40 Minn., 249, 41 N. W., 974, where it was held that, if the statute be held to apply to railroad corporations, as such, it would be invalid and unconstitutional as class legislation, for it is beyond the power of the Legislature to single out a particular class of employers, and impose upon them a distinct rule of liability for personal injuries; but, if construed to apply to the character of the employment, the legislation was valid. It was accordingly held in that case that the Legislature intended that it should apply to the hazards and dangers peculiar to the use and operations of railroads, and the decision there made has been followed in all subsequent cases."

In the case of Deppe v. Chicago, &c., R. Co., 36 Ia., 52, 55:

"But if the statute be so construed as to apply to all persons in the employ of railroad corporations without regard to the business they were employed in, then it would be a clear case of class legislation, and would not apply upon the same terms to all in the same situation, and hence would be unconstitutional, and manifestly so. To illustrate, suppose a railroad company employ several persons to cut the timber on its right of way where it is about to extend its road, and the land owner employs a like number of persons to cut the timber on a strip of equal length alongside such right of way. If one of each set of employes shall be injured by the negligence of a co-employee, and the employee of the railroad company can, under the statute, maintain an action against his employer and the other can not, then it is clear that the law does not apply upon the same terms to all in the same situation. The law, then, would not have uniform operation, but would be violative of the Constitution just as much as a law that should prescribe under the same circumstances different liabilities for merchants, for mechanics, and for laborers. The manifest purpose of the statute was to give its benefits to employes engaged in the hazardous business of operating railroads. When thus limited it is constitutional; when extended further it becomes unconstitutional."

To the same effect is Jemming v. G. N. R. Co., 104 N. W., 1079; R. Co. v. Pontius, 52 Kan., 264; Johnson v. St. Paul & Duluth R. Co., 8 L. R. A., 419; Lavallee v. St. P., M. & M. R. Co., 40 Minn., 249; Ballard v. Mississippi Cotton Oil Co., 81 Miss., 507.

I can not agree to the assumption that the Supreme Court of the United States, in Tullis v. Lake Erie & Western Railroad, 175 U. S., 348, upheld the constitutionality of the act in question as construed in the opinion. An examination of the opinion in the case of the Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 80 N. E., 529, and the various opinions reviewed therein, will show that the Supreme Court of Indiana limited the application of the statute to the injuries of railroad employes engaged in the hazard of the active operation of the road; and it was this construction that was upheld by the Supreme Court in the case referred to above.

The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States and that of the Supreme Court of Indiana show that these courts both held that the Indiana statute, as construed by the latter court, was practically the same as the statutes of Kansas and Iowa, as construed by the supreme courts of those States; these statutes were construed without doubt to apply only to the hazard of railroading, and it was expressly said if they had been intended to apply to all employes of railroads they would be violative of the Federal Constitution. (Deppe v. Chicago, &c., R. Co., supra; Atkinson v. Chicago, &c., R. Co., 106 Ia., 54, 56; Railroad Co. v. Pontius, 52 Kansas, 264; Railway Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S., 205.)

To show that the Supreme Court of Indiana was of opinion that the statute under discussion, as construed by it and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, is identical with the statutes of Kansas and Iowa, as construed by the supreme courts of those States, I copy the following excerpt from the opinion in Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, supra:

"The Employers' Liability Act of Kansas was the same as the Iowa act above set out. (Mo. Pac. R. Co. v. Haley, Adm'r., 25 Kan., 35, 53), and the Supreme Court of that State, following the construction given by the Iowa Supreme Court, held in 25 Kan., supra, page 53, that it 'embraced only those persons exposed to the hazards of the business of railroading.' (Missouri, &c., R. Co. v. Medaris, 60 Kansas, 151, 154, 155; Mo. Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 33 Kan., 298, 302.)

"It was held, in effect, by this court in Pittsburg, &c. R. Co. v. Montgomery, 152 Ind. 1, 8-14, that the Employers' Liability Act of this State was capable of severance, by putting railroads in a class by themselves, and that such classification was proper on account of the dangerous and hazardous business of the operation of railroads, and that so construed, said act, as applied to railroads, was not in violation of either said section 23, of article 1, of the Constitution of this State, or of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, even if unconstitutional as to the other employers and employes mentioned.

"In Tullis v. Lake Erie, &c., R. Co., 175 U. S., 348, it was held that this court in the Montgomery case treated the Employers' Liability Act as practically the same as said statutes of Iowa and Kansas, and that so construed, it did not arbitrarily classify railroads by name, but with regard to the business in which they were engaged, which was a proper classification on account of the dangerous and hazardous business of operating railroads, citing Mo. Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S., 205; Minneapolis, &c., R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S., 210, which sustained the constitutional validity of a like statute.

"In Pittsburg, &c., R. Co. v. Lighteiser, 166 Ind., —, 78 N. E., 1033, 1041, 1043, this court approved the Montgomery case, gave the Employers' Liability Act, as applied to railroads, practically the same construction as had been given to the statutes of Iowa and Kansas on that subject, and held that putting railroads in a class by themselves was proper classification on account of the dangerous and hazardous business of operating railroads, and that such classification is not based upon the difference in employers, but upon the difference in the nature of the employment."

Nor can I agree to the statement in the opinion, that Melton was engaged in the hazard of the operation of the railroad, because he was building a coal chute and coal is necessary to the operation of a railroad. The chute was entirely separated from the railroad's right of way, and the carpenters who were building it were in no danger from anything done in its operation. Railroads, in order to be operated, must have cross-ties and ballast, they must have clerks, bookkeepers and auditors to keep their accounts, lawyers to defend their suits, and telegraphers to despatch their trains; but none of the men employed in these occupations can be said to be engaged in the hazard of the operation of the railroad.

Believing that the statute under which this suit was brought violates the equality clause of the Federal Constitution, and is, therefore, void, I can not concur in the opinion of the court.

I am authorized to say that Judge Lassing concurs in this dissent.

CLARK, &c. v. NORTHERN COAL & COKE CO.

(Filed October 1, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Deeds—Name of Grantee—It is not necessary that a grantee in a deed be mentioned by name. If the designation or description is sufficient to identify the person intended, the deed is effectual.

2. Same—Construction of Deeds—A deed, like any other instrument, must be construed to effectuate the intention of the parties, and it seems to have been intended by the makers of the deed herein that the title to both the land and personalty should vest in Russell Pinson.

P. B. Statton and C. M. Whitt for appellants.

York & Johnson for appellee.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

This appeal involves the proper construction of the following deed:

"This deed made this 9th day of February, 1876, between John King and Malissa King, of Pike county, and Ann Adams, heirs of Henry Pinson, deceased, of the county of Pike and State of Kentucky of the first part, and Russell Pinson and wife, heirs of Henry Pinson, deceased, of the second part; that the said Russell Pinson, is to take care of his mother during her natural life, and is to have the following described tract of land:

(Here follows description.)

"And the said Russell Pinson is to have all the personal property belonging to said Henry Pinson, deceased, for taking care of Mary Pinson, his mother. I do hereby acknowledge my right of dower to the above tract of land.

"In testimony whereof the said John King and Malissa King, Henderson Adams and Ann Adams of the first part have hereunto subscribed their names the day and year first written herein. The parties of the first part do hereby warrant generally the title to the property hereby conveyed.

"In testimony whereof, the parties of the first part have hereunto subscribed their names the day and year aforesaid.

"ANN ADAMS,

"JOHN KING,

her

mark

About the year 1886, Russell Pinson's wife died; and in 1892 he conveyed the coal and other minerals on and under the land to the remote grantor of the Northern Coal & Coke Company. This action was brought by the children of Russell Pinson and wife against the coal and coke company, claiming that under the deed their mother took an undivided half interest in the land, and that this at her death descended to them. The circuit court sustained a general demurrer to the petition and they appeal.

It is not necessary that a grantee in a deed be mentioned by name. If the designation or description is sufficient to identify the person intended, the deed is effectual. Thus a deed to a man and his wife or to a man and his children is good as to the wife or children, although their names are not given. A deed, like any other instrument, must be construed to effectuate the intention of the parties and the proper construction of the deed must depend upon all its provisions. While Russell Pinson and wife are named in the caption of the deed in question as "of the second part," the wife is not named in any other part of the deed than in the caption; and in the body of the deed it is provided that Russell Pinson is to take care of his mother during her life and is to have the tract of land. It is also provided that he is to have all of the personal property for taking care of Mary Pinson, his mother. While the instrument is awkwardly drawn, when taken as a whole, we think it was manifestly intended to vest the title to both the land and the personal property in Russell Pinson. The deed is made evidently between the heirs of Henry Pinson, deceased. Russell Pinson was an heir of Henry Pinson; his wife was not. The sum of the instrument is that the other heirs of Henry Pinson vest in Russell Pinson the title to the personal property and this piece of land, and that he is to take care of his mother during life. The consideration of the deed moved from him; it did not move from his wife so far as appears from the instrument. She was under the disability of coverture and could make no contract. The deed does not show that any obligation was imposed upon her. Upon the whole instrument we conclude that the word "wife" was used in the caption by inadvertence, or was left there by inadvertence; that the deed was intended to embody a family settlement between the Pinson heirs; that no obligation was assumed by her; and no part of the property was vested in her.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH, FOR USE, &c. v. CATLIN, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1908—To be reported.)

Judicial Sales—Infant's Real Estate—Code Provisions—Lien of Infants on Land—Payment by Purchaser to Commissioner—Effect—Under section 497, Civil Code, providing that "in an action mentioned in sub-section 2, of sec. 490, the share of an infant * * * shall not be paid by the purchaser, but shall remain a lien on the land, bearing interest until the infant becomes of age, or until the guardian of the infant * * * executes bond, as required by section 493, of the Code," where a purchaser of land belonging to infants, at a judicial sale, paid the purchase price to the commissioner of the court, who squandered it, in an action by a guardian subsequently appointed for the infants against the purchaser and commissioner and his surety, Held—1st. The court would have had no authority to direct payment except in accordance with the letter of the statute, and the payment by the purchaser on his own motion was unauthorized and void so far as the interest of the infants was concerned. 2d. The court correctly sustained the demurrer of the commissioner and his surety to the petition, but erred in sustaining that of the purchaser of the land at the judicial sale, and his subsequent vendees.

Finley Shuck for appellants.

John McChord for appellees.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, reversing.

In 1892 W. D. Catlin died, intestate, domiciled in Marion county, Kentucky, leaving a wife and seven children, two of whom were infants of tender years. His son, P. D. Catlin, was appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate. The personal property was sufficient to pay off all the indebtedness left by the decedent, and his real property being indivisible without material impairment of its value, the administrator instituted an action in the Marion Circuit Court, under sub-section 2, of section 490, of the Civil Code of Practice, for a sale and division of the proceeds among the heirs.

All of the children and the widow of W. D. Catlin were made parties to this action, it being No. 2129, in the Marion Circuit Court. In this action such proceedings were taken and had that judgment was rendered, ordering a sale of the real property left by the decedent for division among his children, as prayed in the petition. The property, consisting of about one hundred and fifty-seven acres, which is described by metes and bounds in the petition, was sold by the commissioner of the Marion Circuit Court in pursuance of the judgment above referred to, and purchased by the appellant, P. D. Catlin, who executed purchase bonds payable to the commissioner, E. L. England. Afterwards the purchaser paid into court all his purchase money, including the shares of the two infants, W. T. Catlin and Nanie M. McCallip, although the infants had no statutory guardian to execute bond in accordance with the provisions of section 497, of the Civil Code. The shares of the infants, amounting to five hundred and nineteen dollars and fifty cents, were received by the commissioner, and, upon the order of the court, loaned out at interest, but afterwards the order loaning it out was set aside and the money collected back by the commissioner, who, it is alleged, has squandered it and left the State, becoming a non-resident. Thereafter the appellant, J. B. Hundley, was appointed and qualified as the guardian of W. T. Catlin and Nanie M. McCallip, executed the bond required by sections 497 and 493, of the Code, and then instituted this action, setting forth in his petition the facts recited in this opinion, seeking to enforce the statutory lien given by section 497, of the Code, to his wards to secure their part of the purchase money due for the sale of the land involved in this action, he also made E. L. England, the commissioner, and the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Co., surety on his bond, parties defendant, and prayed judgment against them. All of the defendants (appellees) filed general demurrers to the petition, which were sustained by the court, and the plaintiff (appellant), declining to amend, the petition was dismissed.

Section 497, of the Code, in so far as applicable to the case in hand, is as follows: "In the action mentioned in sub-section 2, of section 490, the share of an infant, or of a person of unsound mind, shall not be paid by the purchaser; but shall remain a lien on the land bearing interest until the infant becomes of age, or the person of unsound mind becomes of sound mind, or until the guardian of the infant, or the committee of the person of unsound mind, executes bond, as required by section 493."

The infants having no guardian to whom their respective shares of the purchase money could be paid, by the express terms of the Code these remain a lien upon the land, bearing interest, and the purchaser was prohibited from paying the money over to any one prior to the time they became of age, except to their statutory guardian after the execution of the bond required by section 493. The court would have had no authority to direct payment except in accordance with the letter of the statute, and the payment by the purchaser on his own motion was unauthorized and void so far as the interests of the infants are concerned. The rights of the infants are fixed and secured by the provisions of the Code cited, and the lien on the land could not be lifted or discharged except in the manner pointed out by the letter of the law. No order of the court made concerning the money wrongfully paid to the commissioner by the purchaser could affect the rights of the infants; and when the appellant qualified as their guardian, and executed the proper bond in accordance with the provisions of the Code, supra, he had a right to demand and receive the purchase money belonging to them and to enforce the statutory lien which secured it.

The provisions of the Code herein referred to were enacted for the express purpose of securing the interests of infants in their patrimonial estates, and to protect them from the very calamity which has occurred in this case. It would practically abrogate the law, enacted for the benefit of infants, to allow a purchaser to violate its provisions as is detailed in the petition in this case. This court has uniformly enforced the requirements of the Code for the protection of the interests of infants, and we see nothing in the case under consideration which warrants us in relaxing so salutary a rule. It follows, from the conclusion herein set forth, that the court correctly sustained the demurrers of the commissioner, England, and his surety, the guaranty company, but erred in sustaining that of the purchaser of the land at the judicial sale, and his subsequent vendees.

Judgment reversed, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

PARSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Impeachment of Witness—Exclusion of Testimony of One Convicted of Felony—The Code authorizes the impeachment of a witness' testimony by showing that he has been convicted of a felony, and appellant's rights were not prejudiced by the exclusion of the testimony of his witness that he had been pardoned. The pardon being the best evidence, oral testimony of its existence was properly excluded.

2. Commonwealth's Attorney—Improper Statements By—Action of Court in Excluding—When the court directs the jury not to consider improper remarks of the Commonwealth's attorney in argument, justice to the defendant requires nothing further in order to secure an impartial verdict.

Morrow & Morrow for appellant.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

Appellant, John Parson, was indicted by the grand jury of Pulaski county, charged with willfully and maliciously shooting at and wounding Marshall Lewis with intent to kill him. A trial of the case resulted in appellant's being found guilty, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of five years. From the judgment based upon this verdict he is here on appeal.

It is not questioned that the evidence for the Commonwealth was sufficient to take the case to the jury, or claimed that any error of law was committed by the trial court in the written instructions given for their guidance in reaching a verdict. The defense of appellant was that he fired the shot, which wounded Lewis, in defense of his own life, and one of his witnesses on this plea was Kirk Shelton. The Commonwealth sought to impeach the testimony of Shelton by asking him if he had not been convicted of a felony and sentenced to the penitentiary, which he answered in the affirmative; whereupon the defendant asked the witness if it was not true that he had been pardoned by the Governor and released from prison within three months from the time of his conviction. To this the Commonwealth interposed an objection because of its incompetency, and the objection was sustained by the court. The defendant then avowed that the witness would answer in the affirmative. There was no evidence as to what offense the witness had committed which caused him to be convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary; nor was it offered to be shown upon what ground the Governor pardoned him. The pardon of the Governor did not restore the character of the witness in so far as it was besmirched by the commission of the felony of which he was convicted. The Code authorizes the impeachment of a witness' testimony by showing that he has been convicted of a felony, and we are unable to see how any substantial right of the defendant was injured by the exclusion of the testimony that he had been pardoned. Besides all this, the pardon itself was the best evidence of its being granted, and the court properly excluded oral testimony of its existence.

The Commonwealth's attorney, in arguing the case to the jury, spoke of the witness, Kirk Shelton, as follows: "Why, gentlemen of the jury, who would believe anything Kirk Shelton said? Think of it, the principal witness of this defendant who was sent to the penitentiary for the burning of his neighbor's house." Undoubtedly, the Commonwealth's attorney committed a gross error in stating to the jury that the witness had been sent to the penitentiary for burning his neighbor's house, there being no evidence in the case upon which to base this statement; but upon motion of the appellant the court excluded this statement from the jury by telling them that they should pay no attention to it; and the Commonwealth's attorney, himself, before the jury, admitted his error, withdrew his statement, and asked the jury to give it no weight in considering the case. It must be presumed that the action of the court and of the Commonwealth's attorney effaced from the minds of the jury any evil effect which might have followed from the unauthorized statement complained of, and there was no error on the part of the court in refusing to discharge the jury from further consideration of the case. It would seriously impair the administration of the criminal law, if, when a Commonwealth's attorney is swept by the zeal of advocacy beyond the rules of fairness or propriety, it should be held necessary to discharge the jury from further consideration of the case. We do not believe that, when the court instructs the jury that the statement of the attorney for the Commonwealth is improper and directs them not to consider it, justice to the defendant requires anything further to be done in the premises in order to secure a fair and impartial verdict.

Appellant also complains that the Commonwealth's attorney spoke of one of the witnesses for the Commonwealth as follows: "Jim Davis is as fine a man with as fine a character as any man in this country." The witness had been before the jury; they had seen him and heard his testimony; they had observed his deportment; and the employment by the State's attorney of this ordinary laudation indulged in by lawyers in describing their own witnesses, did not injure the substantial rights of the defendant. It seems to us the matter is too trivial to be the subject of serious complaint.

On the whole case, we believe appellant obtained a fair and impartial trial, and that no injury was done him, either in the rulings of the court or the verdict of the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

EVANS v. DOBBS, &c.

(Filed September 29, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Contracts—Construction of—Trespass—In this action for trespass, the question turns upon a construction of a timber contract and the evidence, and it appears from the evidence that the contract was exhausted before its assignment to appellant who, therefore, acquired no rights under it. Hence, he was a mere trespasser in his attempt to cut and remove timber from it.

2. Same—Time in Which a Contract May be Executed—Where no time is fixed for the execution of a contract, the law implies that it is to be carried into effect within a reasonable time.

Joe Bertram and Stone & Stone for appellant.

J. N. Sharp and T. A. Wallace for appellees.

Appeal from Wayne Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker, affirming.

This action was instituted by the appellees, claiming to be the owners of the fee-simple title of a tract of land situated in Wayne county, Kentucky, and which is described in the petition, against the appellant, alleging that he was trespassing upon the land, cutting down timber and manufacturing staves therefrom and committing irreparable injury to them. Appellant answered, setting up title to all of the white oak timber upon the land in question and the right to cut the same and manufacture it into staves under a certain contract made by his grantor, D. Hungerford, with William Dobbs, Sr., the grantor of appellees, and who at the time of the contract owned the land. The merits of this case turn upon a proper construction of this contract, which is as follows:

"This indenture made this 11th day of September, A. D., 1899, between William Dobbs, of Wayne county, Kentucky, party of the first part, and D. Hungerford, of Nashville, Tenn., party of the second part.

"Witnesseth: That said party of the first part has this day sold and does hereby convey to said second party, all the white oak timber suitable for the manufacture of staves, now growing on the hereinafter described land, at the following prices per thousand staves in the tree, to-wit:

Staves 60 inches in length, 5 inches, 1¾ inches thick, at.....	$8.00
Staves 60 inches in length, 4 to 5 inches wide, 1½ thick.....	7.00
Staves 60 inches in length, known as merchantable culls	5.00
Staves 44 inches in length 4½ inches wide, 1½ inches thick.....	5.00
Staves 44 inches in length, 4½ inches wide, 1¼ inches thick	5.00
Staves 44 inches in length, known as merchantable culls	5.00
Staves 34 inches in length, 4½ inches wide, 1¼ inches thick	4.00
Staves 34 inches in length, known as merchantable culls	4.00

"Merchantable culls are such as do not fill the specifications for the grade which they are made, but may be cut down so as to fill the requirements of a shorter or smaller stove.

"The timber is to be paid for on the following terms, to-wit:

"Eight hundred (800) dollars cash in hand on delivery of this indenture, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance of purchase price in advancements as follows: When a sufficient number of staves shall have been made and delivered on the banks of the creeks to amount to the eight hundred dollars first paid on purchase price, one-half of the balance of purchase price, as near as can be estimated, shall become due and payable, and when a sufficient number of staves shall be delivered on the banks of the creeks to balance the payment thus made, one-half of the then remaining purchase price shall become due and payable, and further payments shall be made in like manner, until the balance of purchase price, as estimated, shall not exceed two hundred ($200) dollars, in which case the last payment shall not become due and payable until the balance of the timber is manufactured into staves and delivered on the banks of the creeks.

"It is understood that second party has this day let the contract to manufacture said timber, and deliver the staves on the banks of the creeks to John Dobbs, John C. Hurst, William Dobbs, Jr., and Jesse W. Evans, and that said parties have agreed to pay a certain bonus to said first party as a part of the consideration for which this timber is sold.

"It is also understood and agreed that in case of the death of any of said parties, or for any other cause the manufacture and delivery of said staves shall pass into the hands of any other party or parties, said D. Hungerford or his assigns or legal representatives, shall be bound, as a part of the consideration for which this instrument is given, to see to it that the said William Dobbs, Sr., gets promptly, at the date of the other payments of the purchase price, the amounts of the bonus due as per the contract with said parties, Messrs. Dobbs, Hurst and Evans, above mentioned.

"The boundaries of the lands on which the said timber stands are as follows, to-wit:

"First tract known as the 'Flint Work tract,' bounded on the east, south and west by what is known as the 'Washington Young ten thousand-acre tract,' and on the north by State line between Kentucky and Tennessee, and situated in Pickett county, Tennessee, containing 500 acres, more or less.

"Second tract, known as the 'Step tract,' entered by Eli Phipps, containing 50 acres, situate in Wayne county, Kentucky.

"Third tract, known as a part of the 'consolidated survey,' bounded on the east by the lands of Diancess Blevins, on the south by the State line between Kentucky and Tennessee, on the west by the lands of Cooper Burnett and F. B. Dobbs, the Gobson lands, the lands of J. L. Smith, and the lands of Wm. Dobbs, Jr., and on the north by the lands of F. B. Dobbs and William Dobbs, Jr., and the big road, containing eleven hundred acres, more or less, situate in Wayne county, Kentucky.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have subscribed their names this day and year above written.

(Signed) "WILLIAM DOBBS, SR.,
"D HUNGERFORD,"

It will greatly simplify the issues in this case to say in advance that the record shows that the appellant acquired, and now owns, all of the rights which his remote grantor, D. Hungerford, had under the foregoing contract, and that it is also true that the appellees have acquired, by regular conveyance, the fee-simple title to the land in question, which was formerly owned by William Dobbs, Sr., but that they took it with full knowledge of Hungerford's contract, and, therefore, subject to his rights thereunder.

As we understand it, appellant advances two theories: First, that by the terms of the contract William Dobbs, Sr., sold to D. Hungerford all of the white oak timber growing upon the land covered by the contract; and, second, that if this be not true, and it should be held that, under the terms of the contract, Hungerford only acquired such white oak timber as was suitable at the time to be manufactured into staves, then it is true that neither his grantor nor he has cut all such timber, and he is entitled to finish up the contract and now cut whatever remains standing upon the land.

The theory of the appellees is that, under the terms of the contract, Hungerford only acquired such white oak timber as was then suitable for the manufacture of staves, and that he at once proceeded, and did cut and manufacture into staves and remove from the land, all of the trees which were then suitable for that purpose, and, therefore, the contract is now exhausted and was exhausted at the time it was assigned to appellant.

A reference to the contract above set forth, shows the class of timber conveyed to Hungerford by its terms. Its language on the subject is as follows: "That said party of the first part has this day sold, and does hereby convey to said second party all the white oak timber suitable for the manufacture of staves, now growing on the hereinafter described land, &c." It is clear, from this, that Hungerford only acquired, by the terms of the contract, such timber as was then suitable for the manufacture of staves, and did not acquire any right or title to trees which at that time were not suitable for the manufacture of staves.

On the same day that the contract between William Dobbs, Sr., and D. Hungerford was entered into, Hungerford entered into a contract, in writing, with William Dobbs, Jr., John Dobbs and Jesse W. Evans to cut the timber he had purchased from William Dobbs, Sr., and manufacture it into staves. This contract throws a strong cross light on the contract between William Dobbs, Sr., and Hungerford as to the character of timber that Hungerford acquired, and the time when it was to be removed from the land. The contract contains the following provisions: "Said second parties also agree to work out all timber closely that is suitable for the manufacture of rived staves. * * * Said second parties expressly manufacture to work said timber with the least possible waste, and to manufacture not less than 25,000 staves per year until the timber is exhausted." We think these stipulations show that it was the intention of the parties to the contract for the sale of the timber that only such timber as was suitable for the manufacture of rived staves were sold; and, also, that the timber was to be cut and removed as soon as this could reasonably be done, the work to be commenced at once.

The evidence for the appellees is to the effect that Hungerford proceeded to cut and manufacture the timber he had purchased from William Dobbs, Sr., into staves, and that this work progressed from 1899 until 1901, at which time all of the timber purchased had been manufactured into staves and the parties had abandoned the field; that Hungerford, by agents, pointed out the timber which he considered suitable for the manufacture of staves, and all of this was cut and manufactured. On the other hand, the evidence for the appellant tends to show that while a part of the timber purchased was cut and manufactured between 1899 and 1901, all of it was not cut, and there remains upon the land a large number of trees which were suitable to be manufactured into rived staves at the time the contract was made. This, of course, is a question of fact, but we think the preponderance of the evidence is with the appellees. As the contract between William Dobbs, Sr., and D. Hungerford fixed no time in which it was to be executed, the law implies that it was to be carried into effect within a reasonable time; and this seems to have been the contemporaneous construction given it by the parties themselves, because it is undisputed that Hungerford proceeded at once with the cutting of the trees and their manufacture into staves, that this was carried forward continuously for three years, and then the further cutting was abandoned until 1905, a period of four years.

We think the undisputed acts of Hungerford with reference to the execution of the contract between him and William Dobbs, Sr., and the positive testimony of the appellees and their witnesses, that they cut for Hungerford all of the timber suitable for the manufacture of staves and exhausted the contract, fully sustains the chancellor's judgment in the conclusion that he evidently reached, that the contract between Hungerford and William Dobbs, Sr., had been exhausted before it was assigned to appellant; and Hungerford having no further rights thereunder, appellant acquired none, and, therefore, he was a mere trespasser, and the appellees, being the owners of the land trespassed upon, were entitled to an injunction against appellant as a wrongdoer.

For these reasons the judgment is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS PACIFIC RY. CO.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Indictments—Nuisance—An indictment charging appellee with conveying to its premises and permitting to assemble there in large numbers persons who engaged in dancing, drinking, swearing and so on, the grounds being on a public highway, and further charging that such acts disturbed the peace, happiness and pleasure of those residing at, on and near the said highway, sufficiently states a public offense, and it was error to sustain a demurrer to it.

2. Dancing—When Constituting Public Offense—Where dancing and drinking are accompanied by swearing and being drunk, making loud noises and otherwise misbehaving, such acts constitute a public nuisance.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellant.

N. L. Bronaugh for appellee.

Appeal from Jessamine Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

The grand jury of Jessamine county, Kentucky, at the June term, 1907, of the Jessamine Circuit Court returned the following indictment:

"The grand jury of Jessamine county, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company of the offense of suffering a nuisance, committed as follows, viz: That said Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company on the 5th day of June, 1907, in the county aforesaid, and on divers other days and times before the finding of this indictment, it, the said Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company, being then the owner occupying and having control of a certain tract of land lying and being situate in and at a point in said county, known as High Bridge, said tract of land being known as the palisade and right of way of said railroad company, did unlawfully and willfully suffer and permit divers persons, men as well as women there to be and remain on said land, and cause same to be brought upon said lands, and there to be and remain and congregate in large numbers upon and about said premises on Sunday, and engage in dancing, drinking, tippling, cursing, swearing, being drunk, making loud noises and otherwise misbehaving. The said ground being on and near a public highway, commonly known as the Shaker Ferry road, it, the said road, being then a public highway, it, the said grounds, being located in and near to a village known as High Bridge, and at and near to divers dwelling houses of various persons residing in said village, and on and near said highway, thereby disturbing the peace, happiness, comfort and pleasure of persons residing in said village and at, on and near said highway. To the common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and especially those residing in said neighborhood and living in said village and along said highway and passing, repassing along said highway. It, the said Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company, being then a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Kentucky, and some other State of the United States of America, the exact State being unknown to this grand jury, and owning and operating a railroad in and through said county, and owning lands and rights of way in and through the said village of High Bridge, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

The trial court sustained a demurrer to the indictment, and the Commonwealth appeals.

Counsel for appellee insists that the allegations of the indictment are not sufficient in that the acts complained of are not alleged to have been taken place within the sight or hearing of those passing or repassing appellee's premises, or living in the vicinity thereof. In this connection we are cited to authority holding that an allegation in an indictment that certain facts were to the common nuisance of all good citizens of the State, will not make it a good indictment for a common nuisance unless these facts be of such a nature as may justify that conclusion as one of law as well of fact. (Wharton's Am. Crim. Law, 4th edition, section 2362.) Perhaps there would be some merit in counsel's contention if the acts complained of were unaccompanied by any other allegation than that they were to the common nuisance of all good citizens of the State, &c. The indictment under consideration, however, not only charged the appellee with conveying to its premises and permitting to assemble there large numbers of persons who engaged in dancing, drinking, tippling, swearing, being drunk, making loud noises and otherwise misbehaving, but also charged that the grounds were "on and near a public highway, commonly known as the Shaker Ferry road * * * and being located in and near to a village known as High Bridge, and at and near to divers dwelling houses of various persons residing in said village, and on and near said highway." It further charged that the acts complained of disturbed the "peace, happiness, comfort and pleasure of persons residing in said village and at, on and near said highway." We think the latter allegation sufficient to overcome the failure to allege that the acts were committed in the presence or hearing of the various persons residing in or near said village.

While it is true that dancing is frequently an innocent amusement and drinking may be engaged in without becoming a nuisance, yet if the dancing and drinking are accompanied by swearing and being drunk, making loud noises and otherwise misbehaving, there can be no doubt that such acts will constitute a nuisance.

In the case of Rex v. Moore, B. & Ad., 184, the defendant kept an inclosed lot near a highway for the purpose of allowing persons to practice at rifle shooting, by shooting at marks and at pigeons; and as a consequence large numbers of people frequented the place for those purposes, many of whom were idle and disorderly persons, armed with firearms, and by their noise and conduct disturbed the king's subjects, and put them in peril. It was held that he was chargeable for a nuisance. In the case of Inchbald v. Robinson, L. R., 4 Ch., 388, it was held that a noise made by a disorderly crowd at a place of public amusement may be a nuisance. In the Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 21, page 698, it is said: "The noise arising from the exercise of lawful amusement may be a nuisance when it materially interferes with the comfort of those in the vicinity." And this court, in the case of Jung Brewing Co. v. Commonwealth, 29 Ky. Law Rep., 939, held that a corporation, though having a license to sell whisky by wholesale or even by retail, in a small town, has no right to allow the assembling around its premises of noisy, drunken, boisterous crowds, whose insolence and profanity make the use of the highway in the neighborhood always unpleasant and some times dangerous, and may be indicted for maintaining a public nuisance on its premises.

In our opinion, the indictment herein sufficiently states a public offense, and the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer thereto.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule appellee's demurrer to the indictment.

COMBS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed September 30, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Indictments—Principal—Aider and Abettor—Under the indictment, although John Combs is charged to be the slayer, and Henry Combs, the aider and abettor, both were equally guilty as principals and either or both might be convicted as such. (30 Ky. Law Rep. 1212, for a full consideration of this question.)

2. Instructions—Assault Upon Sister of Defendants—It was error to fail to instruct the jury as to the right of appellant to shoot and kill deceased if they believed that at the time he was attempting to commit an assault upon their sister, and that the contemplated assault could only be prevented by taking his life.

Thos. F. Cope and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg for appellants.

James Breathitt and Theo. B. Blakey for appellee.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of the Breachitt Circuit Court, sentencing each of the appellants to confinement in the State penitentiary for twenty-one years. The conviction was had under an indictment charging them with the murder of Thomas Combs. Three grounds for reversal are relied on: first, that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence; second, that the court misinstructed the jury and failed to give the whole law of the case; and third, because of misconduct on the part of one of the jurors during the trial.

The indictment averred that the act of killing was committed by John Combs, who was aided, abetted and encouraged by Henry Combs. There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether the shot that killed Thomas Combs was fired by Henry or John Combs. There is, however, no dispute that it was fired by one of them. A witness for the Commonwealth testifies that John Combs did the shooting; while both Henry and John say that Henry fired the shot. Each of them, at the time, was armed with a gun, and there is some evidence conducing to show that the appellants said they would kill Thomas Combs if they found him at their father's house. Appellant, Henry Combs, who admits the shooting, claims that he fired to prevent Thomas Combs from killing his brother, John, and to protect his sister.

The facts leading up to the homicide, as related by appellants and witnesses in their behalf, are substantially as follows: On Sunday afternoon the deceased, who was drunk and also had a jug of whisky, went, in company with Frank Clemmons, to the house of his cousin, Jerry Combs, the father of appellants, and remained there until he was killed, the following afternoon. During the time the deceased, who bore the reputation of being a quarrelsome and dangerous man when drinking, was noisy and troublesome, and created considerable disturbance in the little house where Jerry Combs, with a large family, lived. He made several indecent proposals to Mary, the daughter of Jerry Combs, and sought on more than one occasion to compel her to submit to his desire. There is also evidence that on Monday morning he forcibly required a son of John Combs, who was at the house, to drink such a quantity of whisky that it made the little boy deathly sick. When this happened, Henry Combs left his father's house and went to the home of his brother, the appellant John Combs, who lived about four miles distant, arriving there at noon on Monday. After relating to John the conduct of the deceased, they each procured a gun and went to the house of Jerry Combs, where the deceased was. They each testify that, as they approached the house, and when within a few steps of the front porch, they saw Mary Combs running out of the front door, closely followed by the deceased, who had a large pistol in his hand. That when he saw them, he stopped, and pointing his pistol at John Combs, endeavored to shoot him, but the pistol failed to fire. That while he was in the act of trying to shoot John, Henry, who was standing back of the deceased, shot him in the head, killing him instantly.

The first ground of reversal urged is that Henry could not be convicted as principal because he was not indicted as such, but as an aider and abettor; and that John could not be convicted as an aider and abettor because Henry was not indicted as principal. Neither of these contentions is good. Under the indictment, although it charges John as the perpetrator of the act and Henry as aider and abettor, both were equally and alike guilty as principals and either or both of them might be convicted as such, and it was not necessary that the court, in the instructions, should designate either of them as principal or aider and abettor. This question is fully considered in Reed v. Commonwealth, 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1212; and Sarah Steely v. Commonwealth, decided Sept. 30th, 1908, and it is not necessary to devote further attention to it here.

A technical error was committed in instruction number four, but the serious error is found in the failure of the court to instruct the jury as to the right of appellants to shoot and kill deceased if they believed or had reasonable grounds to believe that at the time he was attempting to commit an assault upon the person of their sister, and they believed and had reasonable grounds to believe that the contemplated assault could only be prevented by taking his life. There is evidence tending to show that when the deceased was shot, he was pursuing Mary Combs, whom he had previously attempted to force to yield to his lust, and this evidence authorized an instruction submitting this feature of the case to the jury. The appellants had the same right to shoot and kill deceased to prevent him from committing an assault upon the person of their sister as they did to prevent him from doing them some great bodily harm. Upon another trial of the case, if the evidence is similar to that upon the trial from which this appeal is prosecuted, the court should give to the jury the following instructions:

"1. If the jury believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants, John Combs and Henry Combs, or either of them, both of them being present aiding, abetting and assisting each other, in Breathitt county, Kentucky, before the finding of the indictment, willfully, and feloniously, did then and there kill Thomas Combs, by shooting him with a gun loaded with powder and ball or other hard and explosive substances, when it was not necessary or apparently necessary as defined in instruction number four, to protect them or either of them or their sister, Mary Combs, from immediate danger of death or great bodily harm, or the person of Mary Combs from attempted rape by deceased, they will find each of the defendants guilty. Guilty of murder, if the act was done willfully, feloniously and with malice aforethought; guilty of manslaughter, if the act was done in sudden heat and passion or sudden affray and without previous malice and not in the defense of their persons or the person of their sister, as defined in instruction number four. If the jury find the defendants guilty of murder, they will fix their punishment at death or confinement in the penitentiary for life, in their discretion. If the jury find the defendants guilty of manslaughter, they will fix their punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than twenty-one years.

"2. If the jury believe that the defendants have been proven guilty by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, but have a reasonable doubt whether they have been proven guilty of murder or manslaughter, they should find them guilty of manslaughter, and fix their punishment as described in instruction number one. If the jury have a reasonable doubt of the defendants having been proven guilty, they should find them not guilty.

"3. the jury may find either of the defendants guilty and the other not guilty; or they may find both of them guilty or both of them not guilty.

"4. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, believed and had reasonable grounds for believing that at the time the deceased was shot and killed he was then and there about to take the life or inflict upon them or either of them some great bodily harm, or was about to take the life or inflict some great bodily harm upon their sister, or take forcibly possession of her person for the purpose of having carnal knowledge of her, and there appeared to the defendants or either of them, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, no other safe way to avert the then impending danger, or to the defendants or either of them apparent danger to themselves or either of them or Mary Combs, but to shoot and kill deceased, then they, or either of them, had the right to shoot and kill him, and the jury should acquit them.

"5. The word 'willful' as used in these instructions means intentional, not accidental. The phrase 'malice aforethought' means a pre-determination to do the act of killing without legal excuse, and it is immaterial how suddenly or recently before the killing such determination was formed."

The judgment is reversed with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, affirming.

This is the second appeal of this case, the former opinion is to be found in the 31 Ky. Law Rep., 253. The facts out of which this litigation grew are fully set out in that opinion, and a repetition of them here is unnecessary. All questions were settled in that opinion same one, to-wit: whether or not there was any consideration for the $2,000, note in suit. The case was remanded to the circuit court and the right given both parties to take further proof, and the court directed to determine from all of the proof whether or not the note of Leigh & Shinn, executed on September 14th, was simply given as an additional security for the $2,000 note of Mrs. Shinn, which was then held by the bank, or whether this note was executed for money which Leigh & Shinn then got from the bank, and whether there was any consideration for the note and mortgage of December 5th, other than the debt represented by the $2,000 note of Mrs. Shinn.

Upon the filing of the mandate in the lower court the plaintiff, Effie L. Leigh, tendered a supplemental petition, in which she prayed for a judgment in accordance with the mandate and opinion of this court. Over the objection of the defendant this supplemental pleading was permitted to be filed. It appears that, after the rendition of the judgment and before the case was reversed in this court, the plaintiff had paid to the defendant bank the sum of $2,200, in satisfaction of the judgment. In the supplemental petition she prayed for a judgment directing a return of this money, with six per cent. interest from the date of its payment to her, and a cancellation of the lien which the bank held to secure same against her property.

Thereafter, the deposition of W. F. Paxton, cashier of the bank, was re-taken and plaintiff took the deposition of Wilson Shinn. These two depositions, together with all of the evidence in the original record bearing upon the validity of the debt in question, were considered by the chancellor. Upon the whole record he found in favor of plaintiff and entered a judgment accordingly directing the said bank to cancel the lien of record, which it held against her property and repay to her the money which it had received from her, with six per cent. interest from the date of its payment, and he also dismissed the cross-petition of the bank against certain other parties, with judgment for costs. From that judgment the bank appeals.

The question for our consideration upon this appeal is, does the evidence support the finding of the chancellor? The only evidence on behalf of the bank which was before the chancellor upon this trial, which was not considered at the time the former opinion was written, is the testimony of the cashier, Paxton, and a careful consideration of his testimony shows no fact which was not brought out in his former deposition. It is true he states in his last deposition that on the 14th of September, 1892, he, as cashier, paid to Wilson Shinn, or some one, for his wife, $2,600; that $600 of this sum was placed to the credit of Mrs. Shinn, in his bank, and he gives no satisfactory account of what was done with the remainder of this money, Wilson Shinn testifies that he received no money whatever at that time from the bank, nor at any time thereafter, either from the bank or from the firm, other than some small sums from the firm, which were used in defraying the ordinary expenses of his household. He further testifies that he attended to all business for his wife, and that if any such sum as $2,000 had been paid to her he would certainly have known of it.

The bank was placed in the unfortunate position of not being able to produce the "Daily Statement," a book which should have shown this transaction more fully than did the "blotter."

For plaintiff it is insisted that $2,000 of the $2,600 was used by the bank in taking up the $2,000 note of Mrs. Shinn, which was surrendered to her husband on that date. This theory of the transaction is the only one which can be drawn from the testimony of the cashier, when read in connection with the entries on the "blotter," and the testimony of Wilson Shinn. Mrs. Shinn owed to the bank $2,000, she received on that day a check for $2,600, the bank cancelled her note and surrendered it to her, thus disposing of $2,000 of the check, and placed the remaining $600 to her credit in the bank, which was later withdrawn by her. Her husband received her note but no money. We are unable to understand why the entire $2,600 was not placed to the credit of Mrs. Shinn if no portion thereof was deducted to settle the note which was that day surrendered to her husband for her. Neither such books of the bank as were exhibited, nor the cashier offer any satisfactory explanation of this transaction.

"On the evidence now before us Mrs Leigh should not be required to pay the note in controversy."

The additional testimony which has been taken, by the bank in no wise strengthens its case, but, when the testimony of Wilson Shinn is taken into consideration, it is made clear that the chancellor was correct in his finding and judgment that the bank was not entitled to recover.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. WILLIAMS

(Filed September 30, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Parties to Action—Taking Deposition of Adverse Party—Refusal to Give—Under Civil Code, section 606, providing that "a party may be examined, as if under cross examination, at the instance of the adverse party, either orally or by deposition, as any other witness," a party to an action can not refuse to give his deposition when called on by the adverse party, on the ground that it will enable one party to get the benefit of the testimony of the adverse party, and that if the adverse party, whose deposition is sought, actually appears at the trial and testifies, the party seeking his deposition can not complain because he failed to take it.

2. Same—Grounds for Continuance—Prejudicial Error—By section 537, of the Code, the right is given the defendant to begin taking depositions immediately after filing his answer. In such case the failure of the plaintiff to give his deposition, when called on by the defendant after answer filed, was ground for continuance by the defendant, and a failure to grant the continuance was prejudicial error.

3. Telegram—Illness of Mother—Failure to Deliver—Non-arrival of Son—Disappointment of Mother—In an action for damages against a telegraph company for mental anguish in failing to deliver a telegram announcing the illness of a mother, where the plaintiff was a physician, it was error in the court to permit the plaintiff to testify that he had treated his mother frequently before, and that she yielded to such treatment and speedily recovered, and that she was disappointed and depressed when she heard that he had not arrived and that this hastened her death, which would be a recovery for the mother's anguish instead of her son's.

4. Mental Anguish—Evidence—Statement of Facts—Harrowing Recitals—In cases of this kind the party suing should be confined to a statement of the mere facts of mental anguish, and should not be permitted to introduce testimony of the nature referred to for the mere purpose of harrowing the feelings of the jury and increasing the size of the verdict.

Richards & Ronalds, Geo. H. Fearons, J. W. Brown and J. W. Alcorn for appellant.

Bethurum & Bethurum for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by William Rogers Clay, Commissioner, reversing.

On February 1, 1906, about nine o'clock in the evening, W. J. Sparks sent the following message from Mt. Vernon to appellant, J. M. Williams, 654 Fourth street, Louisville, Ky.:

"Lovell says you had better come. Mamma no better.

(Signed) "W. J. SPARKS."

This telegram reached the Western Union office in Louisville at 10:56 p. m. It was not delivered until shortly after eight o'clock the next morning—too late for appellee to take the morning train for his mother's home. Had he taken this train he would have reached Mt. Vernon at 1:24 p. m. His mother died at 3:20 p. m.

Appellant instituted this action to recover damages for his mental anguish resulting from the failure of appellant to deliver the telegram to him in time to enable him to reach his mother's bedside before her death. Appellant answered denying negligence on its part, and pleading contributory negligence on the part of appellee. According to the testimony for appellant, its night delivery clerk made an effort to call appellee over both telephones immediately upon receiving the telegram. Being unable to reach him, a messenger boy proceeded to 654 Fourth street. After considerable search, he found appellee's office. There was no one there, and he left a note stating that the Western Union had a telegram for Dr. J. M. Williams. According to the testimony for appellee, he had a telephone connection in his sleeping apartments, which were immediately over his office, which rang whenever his office was called. He was in his apartments at the time it is alleged the boy attempted to deliver the message, and also at the time appellant claims to have called him over the 'phone, and he heard no call of any kind. When he received the message the next morning, a little after eight o'clock, it was then too late for him to take the 8:10 train for the home of his mother. The jury awarded appellee damages in the sum of $750.00. A new trial was refused, and the telegraph company prosecutes this appeal.

The case was assigned to the 27th day of September, 1907, for trial. On the 24th day of September the defendant tendered a motion for an order to require the plaintiff to give his deposition, as provided by sub-section 8, of section 606, of the Code of Practice, and to continue the case until such time as appellant could take the deposition of plaintiff and summon or take the deposition of witnesses to rebut such portions of his testimony as it should desire. In support of said motion appellant filed the following affidavit, which was sworn to by its attorney, A. G. Ronald:

"Affiant, A. G. Ronald, says that he is one of the attorneys for the defendant herein; that on the 19th day of September, 1907, plaintiff, Dr. J. M. Williams, and his attorney, Mr. Herman Nettleroth, were present at the office of the Clerk of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky for the purpose of taking the deposition of certain witnesses on behalf of the defendant herein; that while plaintiff and his counsel were thus present, the defendant, as its attorney, called the plaintiff as a witness for the purpose of examining said plaintiff, as provided under sub-section 8, of section 606, of the Kentucky Code of Practice; that the plaintiff declined and refused to testify or to answer any questions that might have been put to him by this affiant as attorney aforesaid, and on advice of his counsel left the room.

"Affiant says that he thereafter, on said day, caused a subpoena to be issued by an officer duly authorized to issue same summoning plaintiff to appear as a witness to testify in this case, as provided in sub-section 8, of section 606, of the Kentucky Code of Practice, at the office of Clarence E. Walker, Louisville Trust Building, Louisville, Ky., on the 21st day of September, 1907, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and that said subpoena was duly served upon said plaintiff and also a notice that his deposition would be taken as aforesaid; that the plaintiff and his counsel did appear at the office of said Clarence E. Walker, notary public, at the time and place named in said subpoena, but that this plaintiff declined and refused to give his deposition, and upon the advice of his counsel declined and refused to answer any questions which might have been put to him by affiant as attorney aforesaid.

"Affiant says that this action has been instituted in a court which sits more than one hundred miles distant from the place where the occurrences which are made the basis of the suit transpired; that the only way to rebut any claim or statement that may be made by the plaintiff is to bring its witnesses to the place where the court is held or to take their depositions; that neither the defendant nor affiant nor any of its counsel have any knowledge or information as to what statement or claims will be made by the plaintiff, and do not know the witnesses whose depositions it will be necessary to take or to have present as witnesses.

"Affiant says that defendant can not properly prepare this case for trial or can not properly prepare its defense without taking the deposition of plaintiff, as provided for in the section of the Code of Practice above referred to; that under said section it has the right to take the deposition of plaintiff in order that it may know what evidence it has to rebut, and what witnesses to call; that after plaintiff gives his testimony on the witness stand at the trial of this cause there will not be sufficient time for it to secure the attendance of the witnesses who would rebut same, or take their depositions.

"Affiant says that this motion is not made for the purpose of delay, but only that it may be placed in a position where it can properly prepared its defense; that unless it is given an opportunity to examine plaintiff and he is required to submit to said examination, this defendant will be deprived of a substantial right; that it can not safely go to trial without the exercise of the right of examination of plaintiff granted to it by the Code of Practice, and without the opportunity of procuring witnesses to rebut the testimony if it should so desire. Affiant says that had said plaintiff submitted to an examination or given his testimony upon either of the occasions upon which he was called as a witness by the defendant, it would have had sufficient time to rebut his testimony if it so desired, and would have been ready to go to trial."

The court refused to allow either the motion or the affidavit to be filed, but passed the matter to the day upon which the case was set for trial. On said day the court allowed the motion and affidavit to be filed, but overruled the motion, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The case then proceeded to trial. At the conclusion of the testimony of appellee in chief as a witness in his own behalf, appellant avowed that it was taken by surprise by the testimony of appellee to the effect that the telephone in his office was at all times connected by wire with the telephone in his sleeping apartments, and that when the telephone in his office was rung the telephone in his sleeping apartments was also rung for the same call; also by the statement that the rule of the railroad company was that it would not postpone the departure of its trains except to await the coming in of a connecting train. Appellant further avowed that it could introduce testimony to rebut the statements made by appellee, but was then unable to do so because the witnesses it required for that purpose lived so far away that their presence could not be obtained or their depositions taken. Appellant thereupon moved the court to set aside the swearing of the jury and continue the case or postpone the trial until such reasonable time as would give appellant an opportunity to take the depositions of said witnesses, all of whom it alleged resided in the city of Louisville. This motion the court overruled, and appellant excepted.

In support of its contention that the trial court erred in failing to grant it a continuance when it was made known to the court that appellee had declined to give his deposition, appellant relies upon sub-section 8, of section 606, of the Civil Code of Practice. This section is as follows:

"A party may be examined as if under cross-examination at the instance of the adverse party, either orally or by deposition as any other witness; but the party calling for such examination shall not be concluded thereby, but may rebut it by counter testimony."

It is insisted by counsel for appellee that the only purpose of this provision is to enable one party to get the benefit of the testimony of the adverse party at the trial; that, therefore, if the adverse party, whose deposition the other party sought to take, actually appears at the trial and testifies, and subjects himself to cross-examination, the party seeking his deposition can not complain because he failed to take it. While this view appears plausible, the Code itself does not place any such restriction upon the right of one taking the deposition of the adverse party. It gives to one party the absolute right to take the deposition of the adverse party, as that of any other witness. It appears that appellee, whose deposition it was sought to take, lived more than twenty miles from the county seat where the trial was to take place, and in addition to this he was a practicing physician. If, then, he were a witness other than the plaintiff in the case, appellant would have had the right to take his deposition. That being the case, it necessarily follows that under sub-section 8, of section 606, appellant had the right to take his deposition.

It is earnestly insisted that the right given by sub-section 8, of section 606, if interpreted according to the contention of appellant, is liable to great abuse; that it will enable the party to find out his opponent's evidence in advance of the trial. As, however, the right is given to each party, they will both be upon terms of equality; and, as it is to be presumed that neither will offer any evidence other than the exact facts and truth of the case, we do not see how either could be prejudiced.

By section 537, of the Code, the right is given to a defendant to begin taking depositions immediately after filing his answer. Appellant's answer had been filed when it made the motion for a continuance on the ground that appellee had declined to give his deposition. Appellant had the right to take appellee's deposition. This right was denied to it; we, therefore, think the court should, under the circumstances, have continued the case, and its failure so to do was prejudicial error.

Appellant also insists that the trial court erred in permitting appellee to testify to the fact that he, in conjunction with Dr. Lovell, a physician who attended his mother at the time of her death, had treated his mother frequently before, and that she yielded to such treatment and speedily recovered; also that the court erred in permitting Dr. Lovell to testify to the fact that appellee's mother was disappointed and depressed when she heard that her son had not arrived on the train, and that this disappointment and consequent depression had a tendency to hasten her death.

Counsel for appellee insist that such evidence was admissible as bearing upon appellee's mental anguish, for his grief would be all the greater because of his inability to give his mother the treatment that had previously brought about her recovery, and because of the fact that she was depressed by reason of his failure to arrive in time to see her. In our opinion, however, the effect of appellee's testimony would be to lead the jury to the conclusion that the telegraph company was in a sense responsible for the death of appellee's mother, because of his failure to get there and give her the treatment that had formerly resulted in her recovery, while to admit the testimony of Dr. Lovell would, in effect, permit a recovery for the mother's anguish instead of the son's. This is one of the few courts giving the right of recovery in cases of mental anguish. We have restricted this to cases of the nearest degree of relationship. The ground of this restriction is that there is a natural mental anguish resulting from a failure to arrive at the bedside of a dying relative or the failure to attend the funeral of such relative. The law naturally concludes that mental anguish in case of such relationship will necessarily follow. If testimony of the kind given above were admissible, there would be no reason for restricting a recovery to cases of the nearest degree of relationship, for friends could frequently prove greater mental anguish than could a parent or son. Again, if such testimony were admissible a son might prove that the relationship between him and his mother was more tender than that which usually exists between mother and son; he might go into matters of sentiment and love which it would be impossible for the defendant in any way to rebut. We think in cases of this kind the party suing should be confined to a statement of the mere facts of mental anguish, and should not be permitted to introduce testimony of the nature referred to for the mere purpose of harrowing the feelings of the jury and increasing the size of the verdict. Upon the next trial the court will exclude such testimony.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

ROGERS v. S. C. & C. ST. R'Y CO.

(Filed October 1, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Master and Servant—Injury to Servant—Rule as to Master's Liability—Where a servant objects to the continued use of a defective tool, or calls the master's attention to its defective condition, and the master, with such information, insists that the servant proceed with the work, or assures the servant that the tool is safe, the servant has the right to rely upon the master's superior knowledge, and if he is injured in using the tool, the master is liable. Such a state of fact appearing in the trial of this case, it was error to peremptorily instruct the jury to find for appellee.

A. E. Stricklett for appellant.

Ernst & Cassatt for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn, reversing.

This action was instituted in the court below by appellant to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by him while in the employ of appellee. It was charged, substantially, in the petition and amended petition that appellee furnished and required him to work with a wrench, in the performance of his duties as its servant, which was defective, unsafe and dangerous, and not fit to do the work which he was required to perform. On the day that he received his injury, he informed one Cox, appellee's foreman in charge of the work, of the unsafe and defective condition of the wrench, and that it was in need of repair; thereupon the foreman assured him that it was safe and sufficient to do the work. He relied upon the assurance of the foreman and began the work with the wrench, and because of its defective and worn condition the wrench slipped and turned on the nut he was tightening, precipitating him violently to the ground and across a rail, injuring him about the side and back, in the region of the kidneys. Appellee answered and traversed all the material allegations of the petition and amended petition, and charged contributory negligence on the part of appellant, to which a reply was filed, thus joining issue.

From the evidence it appears that the wrench in question was an ordinary solid iron or steel wrench, with a piece of gaspipe attached to the handle to give it sufficient leverage to securely tighten the nuts. The nuts which they were engaged in tightening were those which held the joints of the steel rails together; they were square, being one and one-half inches across. Two wrenches were in use—one with a short handle was used to start the nuts on the bolts, and the other one was used by appellant to turn them farther up and tighten them securely. At the time of the injury the foreman was hurrying his workmen to complete the work laid off for them before quitting time, which was about fifteen minutes after the accident occurred. It was also proven that this long handled wrench was furnished appellant with which to do the work, and it was the only wrench of that kind furnished for the work; that when he was directed by the foreman to work with it, he told the foreman, Cox, that it was not safe; that it was out of repair, and Cox told him to go ahead and do the work, the wrench was all right; to tighten the bolts up tight; and that he proceeded to do the work in a careful manner and received his injury as stated. It was also shown that the foreman knew, before that time, of the defective condition of the wrench, for he had used it himself in the morning before appellant's injury in the afternoon, and it had caused him to be nearly thrown by its defective condition.

In compliance with a peremptory instruction given by the court, after the introduction of appellant's testimony, the jury returned a verdict for appellee. Appellee's counsel contends that this action of the court was correct for the reason that the defective condition of the wrench was known to appellant, and he must be regarded as having voluntarily assumed the risk incident to the use of it. If a servant knows of a defect in a tool with which he is required to work and continues to use it, without complaining to his master, and is injured thereby, he can not recover for such injury; but when the servant objects to the continued use of a defective tool or calls the master's attention to a defective one and the master, with information of such defects, insists that the servant proceed with his work or assures the servant that the tool is safe and adequate, the servant has the right to rely upon the master's presumed superior knowledge, and if, in the use of the defective tool, the servant is injured, the master is liable, unless the danger or risk is so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person would have refused to do the work under the circumstances, in which event the servant acts at his own peril. Appellant began work with this tool on the day he was injured, about the noon hour, and used the wrench in tightening bolts most of the time that afternoon, and in two or three instances, before he received his injuries, the defects came near causing him to fall. Appellee's counsel contends that he made no complaint of this to the foreman, and for this reason he should not be allowed to recover in this action. The foreman was present with the crew, and if he had called the foreman's attention to these slips of the wrench that occurred during the afternoon, it would only have been a repetition of what he had said to the foreman that noon with reference to the defective condition of the wrench. The fact that the wrench slipped two or three times during the afternoon and he saved himself from injury indicated that the use of the defective wrench was not an obviously dangerous undertaking. This was a question for the jury to determine. (Long's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 113 Ky., 806; Wake & Co. v. Price, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 696; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Keebler, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 305; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Richardson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2090; and Pullman Co. v. Geller, 32 Ky. Law Rep., 884.)

Appellee's counsel also claims that the action of the lower court should be sustained for the reason that appellant relied in his petition entirely upon the assurance of the foreman that the wrench was all right, and that it was not alleged that appellant was directed to tighten the nuts with the wrench referred to. Counsel overlooked the fact that appellant alleged, in both his petition and amended petition, that appellee provided a dangerous, unsafe and defective tool and required him to use it in the performance of his duties, by reason of which he was injured. In our opinion, the court erred in giving a peremptory instruction.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and remanded, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

GOULD CONSTRUCTION CO. v. CHILDERS' ADM'R.

(Filed October 1, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Master and Servant—Constructing Bridge—Absence of Foreman—Authority of Acting Foreman—Duty of Hands—Where a foreman in charge of hands constructing a bridge put one of the hands in charge while he was temporarily absent, such hand, for the time, stood in place of the foreman, and the men were under the same obligation to obey his orders as the orders of the foreman.

2. Same—Death of Servant—Orders of Acting Foreman—Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury—In constructing a double track railroad bridge across a river it was necessary to draw up some logs from below by the use of a derrick, which when hoisted to the proper height the foreman gave the stop signal. Where in such case the foreman gave such signal when the log had been raised too high, and one of the hands whose duty it was to guide it to its proper position, in attempting to do so was struck by the log and thrown from the bridge, killing him. Held—That the deceased was not required to anticipate that the stop signal would be given until the log was lowered to its proper position for his guidance, and the question of his contributory negligence was properly left to the jury.

J. N. Sharp and M. S. Singleton for appellant.

C. C. Williams and Robert Harding for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, affirming.

The Gould Construction Company was engaged in constructing a double track railroad bridge across Rockcastle river. The tracks were eight or ten feet apart, and the ends of the cross ties were so far apart as to leave an opening of about three feet between them. Through this opening the construction company was drawing up logs from below, and placing them on trucks which were loaded on one of the railroad tracks. The logs were about twelve feet long and twelve inches in diameter. To get them up a rope attached to a derrick was let down and fastened to one log at a time, and this was then raised through the opening by machinery to a point above the bridge and then lowered to the truck placed to receive it. One man was stationed at the engine and controlled it; another was stationed at a pulley and guided the rope. Men under the bridge tied the rope to the log and when it was ready, the foreman standing on the bridge gave the signal to the engineer who hoisted it up; and when it had reached the proper height, he gave him the stop signal. In order to get the log placed on the truck properly, one man was placed at each end of the truck and it was the duty of these two men, when the log had been raised to the proper height and was lowered, to take hold of the ends of the log and guide it to its proper position on the truck. The regular position of these two men was at the ends of the truck. The ties on which the truck rested extended out about six inches beyond the side of the truck. Childers and one James Neil were the men at the truck. The foreman had gone to the express office, and had put in his place a man named McEwan while he was gone. When the log was brought up the small end of the log was toward Childers, and as the large end was the heavier, it hung lower down than the small end. The log being tied in the middle by the rope would not always swing parallel with the track, and the small end of this log swung out to the side next to the opening between the two tracks. To pull it back to its position Childers stepped to the side of the truck, and standing there was pushing the log back to its position, when McEwan suddenly gave the signal to the engineer to let the log drop. The engineer obeyed the signal; the log dropped to the truck through a space of about four feet; the large end striking first, the smaller end was thrown around against Childers, striking him on the point of the chin and knocking him from the bridge. He fell to the river below, a distance of about sixty feet, and when rescued, was dead. This suit was brought by his administrator to recover for his death on the ground that there was negligence on the part of McEwan in giving the engineer the drop signal at the time he did and that this was the cause of Childers' death. The answer controverted the allegations of the petition, and on a trial, the jury found for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at $4,000. The defendant appeals.

The first question to be considered on the appeal is whether the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. It is insisted that this should have been done for two reasons: First, because McEwan was a fellow servant of Childers; second, because Childers would not have been hurt if he had remained at the end of the truck, and it was negligence of him to go to the side of the truck. It is also insisted that if there was any evidence to take the case to the jury, the verdict is palpably against the evidence, and should be set aside.

1. If the foreman had not gone to the express office and had remained on the bridge continuing to give the signals as before, it would hardly be maintained that the company would not be responsible for his negligence. That there was negligence on the part of McEwan is manifest. The custom was to lower the log gradually until it reached the truck. Any one would know that as large an object as this, if dropped through a space of four feet, suddenly, was liable to hurt the man at the truck whose duty it was to guide it into position and load the truck. Instead of giving the drop signal, when McEwan saw the man take hold of the log to push it over to its proper place, he should have given the engineer the signal to let it down slowly; and if this had been done, Childers would not have been hurt. The drop signal should not have been given until the log had reached the truck and been placed in its proper position. McEwan could see the log; he could see the men at the truck; he could not but know that Childers was at the side of the truck, and that the dropping of the log, at the time it was dropped, would imperil him. We do not think it is material that McEwan was not the regular boss. He was there at the time in the place of the boss. The gang of men had not been left without any head; McEwan, for the time, stood in the place of the boss and the men were under the same obligation to obey his orders as the orders of the boss. He was not at the time a fellow laborer; the other men could not control him or exercise any supervision over him; his signals were his orders and it was their duty to obey these orders. In giving these orders he represented the master, and they were not his equals, but his inferiors for the time being. The case of Dana v. Blackburn, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 695, is not in point. There it was held that the engineer was a fellow-servant of the men who loaded the coal at a coal elevator, and that one of the loaders was a fellow-servant of the other loader. The same rule was in effect applied in Cooper's Adm'r v. Oscar Daniel's Co., 29 Ky. Law Rep., 1172. There it was also held that the engineer in charge of the engine employed in lifting the girders in a building, was a fellow servant of the other men employed in handling the girders. But this case does not turn on the negligence of the engineer. The engineer here simply obeyed the signal that was given him. The negligence was in the giving of the signals and these signals were given by the man who was directing the work, and who for the time being was the foreman.

2. Every one knows that a log one foot thick and twelve feet long tied in the center with a rope, when drawn up will not always stay in one position, and that when it got above the truck it might be at right angles to the track or parallel with it or in any position between the two; so that it must necessarily be that the men who had to handle the log would have to leave the ends of the truck at times and push the log at the side back to its position. The testimony for the plaintiff clearly shows that such was the case when Childers went to the side of the truck. He could not reach the log from the end of the truck and he went to the side, because that was the only practicable way of getting it into position. He was not, therefore, guilty of contributory negligence in taking this position. He was not required to anticipate that the log would be dropped before it reached the truck or to anticipate if it was dropped which way it would jump when it rebounded on the truck. In cases of this sort, the question of contributory negligence is ordinarily for the jury; and in this case there was no error in submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury.

The weight of the evidence sustains the verdict of the jury. There was conflict in the testimony on several questions, but we think the facts as we have stated them, are shown by the weight of the evidence. The instructions of the court submitted to the jury substantially the material questions in the case. There was no showing made which would warrant the court in continuing the case for the defendant after the plaintiff's proof was introduced on the trial. The decedent was a healthy young man, twenty-four years of age; the verdict for $4,000 is a reasonable one; and on the whole record we see no reason for disturbing it.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTBROOK, &c. v. POTTER'S SONS' TRUSTEE.

(Filed October 1, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Judgment—Rule of Court of Appeals as to Chancellor's Judgment—Evidence—Question of Fact—This case turns on a question of fact. While it is a rule of this court not to disturb the chancellor's judgment on questions of fact, where the evidence is conflicting and the mind is left in doubt as to the truth, but this does not mean that his judgment will be affirmed on a question of fact where it is clearly against the evidence. In this case the clear weight of the evidence does not support the chancellor's finding.

J. M. Simmons and Wright & McElroy for appellants.

Basham & Basham for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson, reversing.

On May 20, 1901, Nancy Westbrook bought at commissioner's sale for $1,335, a tract of land in Warren county, belonging to her father, John B. Horton, containing about 100 acres. J. E. Potter signed the sale bond as her surety. Potter paid off the sale bond and on November 12, 1901, Nancy Westbrook and her husband, James Westbrook, executed to Potter a note and mortgage to secure it, for the sum of $1,379.95, being the amount of the sale bond with interest. This mortgage covered not only the Horton land but also a tract of land owned by James Westbrook. On June 26, 1903, Westbrook and wife executed to Potter a note for $1,500, with interest from date and a mortgage on the same land to secure it. On November 9, 1903, Nancy Westbrook and her husband sold and conveyed the Horton land to J. S. Hunt for $2,000, for which he executed notes. These notes went into the hands of Potter. Hunt failed to pay his notes, and sold the land on November 14, 1904, to Oscar Finney for $2,500. Finney paid Potter the amount of the Hunt notes which he held. On September 28, 1906, Potter having become a bankrupt, this suit was brought by his assignee in bankruptcy against Westbrook and wife on the $1,500 note and the mortgage securing it. Westbrook and wife filed an answer pleading that the note for $1,500 and mortgage securing it, were given in renewal of the note for $1,379.95, a small debt which John Allen Cherry had against James Westbrook being included in the note; and they pleaded that the debt had been satisfied in the sale of the Horton land, when Finney paid off the Hunt notes to Potter. On the other hand the plaintiff pleaded at the time the $1,500 note was executed, the banking house of P. J. Potter & Sons, of which J. E. Potter was a member, held 21 notes against James Westbrook aggregating $1500, and that the note for $1,500, was given to take up these 21 small notes and not in renewal of the note for $1,379.95. Proof was taken on the issues thus made by the parties and on final hearing, the circuit court entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the note, and subjected the land to its payment. From this judgment Westbrook and wife appeal.

The question raised by the appeal is wholly one of fact. Nancy Westbrook and her husband James Westbrook by their testimony sustain the allegations of their answer. J. E. Potter by his testimony sustains the allegations of the plaintiff's reply testifying positively that the $1,500 note was given to take up the 21 small notes. J. M. Simmons, a member of the Warren county bar, testifies that he was employed by J. E. Potter to draw the $1,500, mortgage, and that Potter, at that time, had him to make an abstract of the title telling him that he wanted the abstract with a view to a sale of the land; that when Potter employed him he told him that he had a note and mortgage for thirteen hundred and some odd dollars and that he was going to pay a little remnant of a judgment in favor of John Allen Cherry, and that he wanted to get the thirteen hundred and some odd dollars mortgage and the remnant of that judgment together and get them all in one debt; that he prepared the abstract and prepared the mortgage and note; that the parties came to his office after the papers were prepared and Mrs. Westbrook then said to him in the presence of Mr. Potter, "When we execute this $1,500 note and mortgage, why of course Mr. Potter will deliver to me the thirteen hundred and some odd dollar mortgage and note;" that he said, "of course," and turned to Mr. Potter, and Mr. Potter said, "Why certainly." He also testified that after the papers were executed he said to Potter, "I have not made any calculation of the interest on the mortgage and note, and I do not know how much the amount of the John Allen Cherry judgment is, and I do not know whether your $1,500 note will cover the $1,379.95 note and interest and the John Allen Cherry balance on the judgment, and you had better be sure about that because I do not know;" and that Potter replied that he had been collecting some rents on what was known as the Horton tract of land and that the $1,500 mortgage and note was sufficient to pay the thirteen hundred dollar mortgage and interest and the balance on the John Allen Cherry judgment; and that he was going to sell the Horton tract of land for Mrs. Westbrook to pay off the $1,500 mortgage and note. Hunt, the purchaser of the land, testified to this statement made to him by Potter before his purchase: "He had told me before that he had a mortgage for $1,500 on the two places, on the place that he got and on the home place; but when he sold out to me for $2,000 there would be something like $600 coming to Mrs. Westbrook." He also testified that Potter at no time ever mentioned to him having any other mortgage on the land than the $1,500 mortgage. Byron Renfrew, also a member of the Bowling Green bar, testified that he represented Hunt in his purchase of the property, and Finney in his purchase from Hunt; that Finney paid to Potter $2,120, and he then makes this statement: "My recollection is that Mr. Potter said that that wiped out the Westbrook debts and that they would have to have a straightening out, as if there might be something coming back to the Westbrooks." The plaintiff introduced on his behalf John Allen Cherry, who testified that he signed, as surety for James Westbrook, a note to P. J. Potter & Co., for $160, dated November 22, 1898, and due four months after date; also a note for $70 dated April 10, 1899, and due four months after date; that on July 15, 1899, P. J. Potter & Co., executed to him a written release from the $160 note, by reason of an arrangement between them and James Westbrook by which they were to look to Westbrook alone for the money; and that when the $70 note fell due, he received notice of it and went to see Potter with Westbrook and Potter said: "That note is settled and all other notes you are on." These two notes referred to by Cherry are among the 21 notes which Potter testifies were included in the $1,500 note and mortgage, but it will be observed that Cherry was released on these notes in the year 1899; that Mrs. Westbrook did not buy the Horton land until two years after that; and that the $1,500 note and mortgage was executed some four years afterward. There is no witness in the case but Potter who testifies that the $1,500 note was given in the renewal of the 21 small notes, and there are no facts in the evidence confirming his testimony. He does not deny that he employed Simmons; he does not deny that Simmons called his attention to the fact that he had made no calculation to see whether the $1,500 note was large enough to cover the $1,300 note and the Cherry judgment. He does not deny Simmons' statement that he then said that he had been collecting the rents; and that he had collected the rent is shown by other evidence. He does not testify that he named to Nancy Westbrook or to Simmons that the $1,500 note was given to take up the 21 small notes. These 21 small notes were not delivered to the Westbrooks; they remained in the bank and when the bank failed, were included in its list of assets. No reason is shown why Mrs. Westbrook should have mortgaged her land to secure the 21 small notes, nor is it shown that any one at any time ever proposed to her that she should do so. She shows by herself and by her daughter that she called on Potter to surrender to her the $1,300 note and to release the mortgage, and that he said that he could not put his hand on the note, but would attend to it another day. A married woman may lawfully mortgage her land to secure her husband's debts; but she must make the mortgage freely and intelligently. She must not be led to believe that she is securing her own debt.

It is insisted that the $1,379.95 note with interest and the balance of the Cherry judgment, amounts to much more than the $1,500 note. Whether this is so or not, we can not tell from the record, but it does appear from the record that Potter had collected the rents on the Horton land; and that the balance would be over $1,500 after subtracting the rents nowhere appears in the record.

Our rule is not to disturb the chancellor's judgment on the facts in cases of this sort, where the proof is conflicting, and on the whole evidence the mind is left in doubt as to the truth; but this does not mean that the chancellor's judgment will be affirmed on a question of fact, where it is against the clear weight of the evidence. When that is the case we must assume either that the chancellor misunderstood the evidence, or that his judgment is based upon some view of the law not held by this court. On the whole case the clear weight of the evidence is with the defendant.

Judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the circuit court to dismiss the petition.

Judge Settle not sitting.

COMMONWEALTH v. STANDARD OIL CO.

(Filed October 2, 1908—T., be reported.)

1. Penal Action—Selling Oil Unsafe for Illuminating Purposes—Pleadings—Burden of Proof—In a penal action by the Commonwealth against the Standard Oil Co., under section 2209, Kentucky Statutes, for selling oil that had been condemned as "unsafe for illuminating purposes," the answer admitted that certain oil had been so condemned, but alleged that it had subsequently been mixed with other oil in a large tank that brought the resultant mixture up to the required standard, which answer was denied by a reply. Held—That under the pleadings the burden was on the defendant to show that the resultant mixture was up to the required standard.

2. Same—Peremptory Instructions—New Trial—Failure to File Motion—Presumption—Upon the conclusion of the evidence for both parties the court directed the jury to find the defendant, appellee, not guilty. No motion or grounds for a new trial was made or entered. Held—As the answer presented a good defense and the evidence is not in the record, the court must presume that the proof offered by defendant in the lower court sustained the defense and that the action of the trial court was proper.

3. Same—Civil Actions—Practice—It may be regarded as the settled practice that in civil actions, where a verdict is returned in obedience to a peremptory instruction, there must be a motion and grounds for a new trial, if it is desired to have this court consider errors committed during the progress of the trial, or pass upon the correctness of the ruling of the lower court in taking the case from the jury.

Denny P. Smith, N. B. Hays, C. H. Morris, Jas. Breathitt and T. B. Blakey for appellant.

Humphrey & Humphrey and L. R. Yeaman for appellee.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This penal action was instituted in the name of the Commonwealth against the Standard Oil Company for a violation of section 2209, of the Kentucky Statutes, providing that:

"If any person or persons in this State shall sell, or offer to sell, to be consumed or used in this State, for illuminating purposes, any of the oils or fluids specified in section 2202, that will ignite or permanently burn at a temperature less than 130 degrees Fahrenheit, or shall sell or offer for sale, to be consumed in this State for illuminating purposes, any of the oils and fluids aforesaid, which have been condemned by an authorized inspector of this State, and the barrels, casks or packages containing the same been branded or marked by him 'unsafe for illuminating purposes,' the person or persons so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, and the oils and fluids be forfeited and sold, and the proceeds go to the State."

The petition charged in substance that the appellee company did offer for sale about eight thousand gallons of oil, a product of coal, petroleum or other bituminous substance for illuminating purposes, which oil might be used for illuminating purposes. That the oil so offered for sale had then and there and previous to the offer for sale, been tested, examined and condemned as unsafe for illuminating purposes, and the cask or tank containing the oil had been marked or branded "unsafe for illuminating purposes" by a duly appointed and authorized inspector, who found that it would and did ignite and permanently burn at 125 degrees Fahrenheit.

The appellee, in the first paragraph of its answer, traversed all the material averments of the petition. In the second paragraph it set out the following facts:

"Further answering, defendant states that the facts concerning the eight thousand gallons of oil referred to in the petition herein are as follows: Said oil was shipped and delivered to this defendant at Cadiz, Ky., and was there condemned and marked 'unsafe for illuminating purposes' by John S. Lawrence, an inspector. Thereafter, at the request of the defendant, C. O. Prowse, an inspector located at Hopkinsville went to Cadiz and in conjunction with Lawrence re-inspected and retested said oil, and reported to this defendant that said oil would ignite and permanently burn at a temperature slightly less than 130 degrees Fahrenheit. Thereupon this defendant shipped said oil from Cadiz to Hopkinsville, where it caused said oil to be pumped into a large storage tank owned by this defendant and containing a large quantity of oil which would not ignite or permanently burn at a less temperature than several degrees above 130 degrees Fahrenheit. After said eight thousand gallons of oil, which had been condemned as aforesaid, had been pumped into and mixed with this large quantity of oil in this large tank, the resultant mixture was inspected and tested by said C. O. Prowse, an authorized inspector of this State, and said Prowse found and notified this defendant, and it is true, that the oil composing said mixture would not ignite and permanently burn at a temperature less than 130 degrees Fahrenheit. Defendant further says that none of said eight thousand gallons of oil which had been condemned as aforesaid was sold or offered for sale by this defendant before it was pumped into said storage tank, and mixed with the oil contained therein and became a component part of the resultant mixture."

In a reply the plaintiff denied that the resultant mixture in the large tank in Hopkinsville would not ignite or permanently burn at less than 130 degrees Fahrenheit after the said eight thousand gallons of condemned oil was pumped into the said large tank, as alleged in defendant's answer.

Upon the conclusion of the evidence for both parties, the court directed the jury to find the appellee not guilty. No motion or grounds for a new trial was made or entered. With the record in this condition, the point is made for appellee that we cannot consider the bill of evidence, and that the case must be determined on the sufficiency of the pleadings alone to support the judgment entered on the verdict. This question of practice, under the decisions of this court, must be ruled favorably to appellee's contention. Under section 11, of the Criminal Code, proceedings in penal actions are regulated by the Code of Practice in civil actions; so that the question must be adjudged as if this were a purely civil action. There is no statute treating particularly of this subject, but this court, in more than one decision, has held that, in civil actions, in the absence of a motion and grounds for a new trial, there is nothing before this court except the question whether or not the pleadings are sufficient to support the judgment appealed from. (L. & N. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 92 Ky., 114; Kistler v. Slaughter, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1937.) There is an intimation to the contrary in Meachem v. L. & N. R. Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 112, but this must be regarded in conflict with the better considered opinions in the other cases. So that, it may be regarded as the settled practice that in civil actions where a verdict is returned in obedience to a peremptory instruction, there must be a motion and grounds for a new trial if it is desired to have this court consider errors committed during the progress of the trial, or pass upon the correctness of the ruling of the lower court in taking the case from the jury.

This leaves to be considered only the question whether or not the pleadings alone supported the judgment. The petition stated a good cause of action for the Commonwealth, and the second paragraph of the answer presented a good affirmative defense. The statute prohibits the selling or offering for sale oil that will ignite or permanently burn at a temperature less than 130 Fahrenheit, or oil that has been condemned by an authorized inspector and branded "unsafe for illuminating purposes." But it does not prohibit the owner of oil that has been found to be below the test, or that has been condemned, from mixing it before it is sold or offered for sale with other oil, thereby bringing the entire quantity up to the statutory test. In this particular, the appellee company after the 8,000 gallons of oil had been condemned and branded "unsafe for illuminating purposes," had the right to pump the condemned oil into a larger tank in which there was other oil, and then sell and offer for sale the resultant mixture, provided the whole of it was up to the legal standard. But, when the appellee company in its answer admitted that it placed the condemned oil in a larger tank with other oil and by failing to deny that it sold the resultant mixture, admitted that it did so, it assumed the burden of proving that the oil in the large tank, after the condemned oil had been pumped into it, was up to the standard required by law, as this averment was denied by the reply. It is the general rule that in prosecutions, whether by indictment or penal actions, the burden of proving the guilt of the accused, and every fact necessary to establish it, is on the Commonwealth; and this practice would be applicable to this case if the appellee had contented itself, as it might have done, with entering a plea of not guilty or standing on the first paragraph of its answer which was in effect a plea of not guilty. Under a plea of not guilty, which in law would amount to a traverse of every material averment of the petition, a conviction could not be had unless the appellee was proven to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, of the offense charged. But it did not content itself with entering a plea of not guilty and resting its case upon this defense. It filed, as it had the right to do, an answer, setting up an affirmative defense, and having done so, its defense must be adjudged by the averments of the pleading and the rules of practice applicable to pleadings in civil actions. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1900.)

The answer set up a defense that was more than a traverse of the allegations of the petition, and involved new matter entirely separate from and independent of the original transaction, upon which the Commonwealth sought to recover.

In the second paragraph, the answer admitted that the oil mentioned in the petition was below the standard and had been condemned as "unsafe for illuminating purposes;" and that for the purpose of bringing this oil up to the standard it put it in a tank in which there was other oil above the standard, the result being that the whole body of oil was above the legal test; and that after mixing the oils, it sold the resultant mixture. This plea, although it denied the sale of any part of the 8,000 gallons before the mixture, was in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance. It put into the case a distinct and affirmative defense, upon which it rested its right to a verdict of acquittal. Under this defense, it was not necessary that the Commonwealth should prove that the oil mentioned in the petition would ignite or permanently burn at a temperature less than 130 degrees Fahrenheit, or that it had been branded "unsafe for illuminating purposes," because these two material facts were admitted. Nor was it necessary that the Commonwealth should prove that a part of the condemned oil had been sold or offered for sale, as the answer admitted that it had been after it was mixed with the other oil. So that, there was only left open by the pleadings the single question of fact, whether or not the oil in the large tank, after the condemned oil had been mixed with it, was up to the standard. The appellee affirmed that it was, and the Commonwealth denied it. Therefore, the burden of proving this fact was upon the appellee. If no evidence had been introduced and the case had been submitted on the pleadings alone, judgment should have gone for the Commonwealth. There are exceptions to the general rule that places upon the Commonwealth the burden of proof as to every element of the offense necessary to constitute the guilt of the accused. These exceptions are generally recognized, and are well stated in an article on Criminal Law, by authors of established reputation, in 12 Cyc., page 380, where it is said:

"Although the burden of proof is on the prosecution, even as to negative matters, such as the absence of self-defense, the want of sufficient provocation, and the like, yet, by the weight of authority, as to distinct and substantial matters of defense consisting of facts either of justification or excuse, or of exemption from criminal liability, which are wholly disconnected from the body of the particular offense charged, and constitute distinct affirmative matter, the burden of proof is on the defendant, unless the fact relied upon otherwise appears in evidence to such an extent as to create a reasonable doubt of guilt." (State of Kansas v. Wilson, 52 L. R. A., 679; State of Connecticut v. Schweitzer, 6 L. R. A., 125.)

The principle announced in these authorities is uniformly applied in this State in prosecutions against persons for selling liquor without license, when the accused rests his defense upon the fact that he had a license. (Haskill v. Commonwealth, 3 B. Mon., 342; Orme v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1412, as well as in other like cases.) And is well illustrated by the practice in prosecutions for murder where the defendant relies upon the plea of insanity, thereby assuming the burden upon this issue. The defendant may, in many statutory misdemeanors, by relying upon a distinct affirmative defense, relieve the Commonwealth of the necessity of proving all the facts necessary to constitute his guilt. This is particularly true in prosecutions by penal actions where the defendant may set up his defense in a written pleading. In the case before us, when the defendant company admitted that the oil was below the statutory test, and placed its defense upon the ground that by mixing it with other oils it cured the quality, the burden of establishing this, the only issuable fact left open was upon it. As the answer presented a good defense, and the evidence is not in the record, we must presume that the proof offered by defendant in the lower court fully sustained its affirmative defense, and that the action of the trial judge in giving the peremptory instruction was proper. If the answer had not presented a good defense, then it would not support the judgment in favor of appellee, and on the pleadings alone a reversal would follow.

The judgment must be affirmed.

LOWE, &c. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed October 2, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Bonds to Keep the Peace—Strikers—Threatening Violence to Persons and Property—Warrant by Magistrate—Trial by Circuit Judge—Where strikers are threatening to do violence to the employes and to destroy the property of a corporation, they may be arrested on a peace warrant, properly sworn out before a magistrate, and where the circuit court is in session the officer making the arrest may deliver the prisoners to the judge of the circuit court for trial on the warrant, who may hear the evidence and determine whether or not they shall be put under bond to keep the peace, and, on their failure to give such bond, may commit them to jail.

2. Same—Failure to Execute Bond—Commitment to Jail—Right of Appeal—There is no statutory authority authorizing an appeal from an order of a circuit judge committing one to jail under a peace warrant, upon his failure to execute the bond fixed by the judge as required by the statute.

Weller & Points for appellants.

Jas. Breathitt and Tom B. McGregor for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Lassing, dismissing appeal.

Appellant and nine others were arrested on a warrant which was issued by a justice of the peace of Bell county, charged with having threatened to do violence to certain persons in the employ of the Wallsend Coal & Coke Company, and to destroy the property of said company. Circuit court being in session, the officer making the arrest, instead of returning the warrant to the magistrate who issued it, delivered it and the prisoners to the judge of the circuit court. Appellant and his associates objected to the jurisdiction of the court, and moved to dismiss the warrant on that ground. This motion was overruled. They then filed a demurrer to the warrant and the affidavit upon which it was based. This was likewise overruled. They each thereupon demanded a separate trial which was also overruled.

It appears that a strike had been on at the mines of the Wallsend Coal & Coke Company from sometime in May until September, the date of the issuing of this warrant, in which some 125 miners were involved. The evidence brought out during the hearing before the circuit judge showed that much lawlessness had existed in and around the camp during the time covered by this strike. That the union men had done all that they could do to induce other miners to cease work at the mines, and to prevent newcomers from entering the mines. Much shooting was done at night; property of the company along the railroad lines was patrolled by union men; houses belonging to the company were burned under suspicious circumstances; foreign miners were, at times, driven from their homes, and terrified by shots at night, and threats were shown to have been made against the lives of several persons who were opposed to and not in sympathy with the union miners.

After hearing all of the evidence for and against those charged in the warrant, the judge dismissed all of them save appellants Richard Lowe, Robert France, Harve McDonald and Ed Jagers, whom it appears were the principal offenders, according to the proof offered. He fixed the bond of each of these at $1,000, save Robert France, whose bond was fixed at $2,500, conditioned that they each should keep the peace for a period of twelve months, and directed that the bonds be executed forthwith, or the defendants placed in jail in the custody of the jailer. Thereupon Robert France, J. H. McDonald and Richard Lowe executed bond and were released from custody. The defendant Ed Jagers was committed to jail for three months, or until he executed bond. They each thereupon filed a motion for a new trial, upon the following grounds:

First. Because the finding of the court is not sustained by the evidence, and is not supported by any evidence.

Second. Because the finding of the court is contrary to law; and,

Third. Because the court erred in refusing to quash the warrant and affidavit upon which the prosecution was based. The court, upon considering the motion, overruled same, and refused to grant the defendants, or either of them, a new trial, and they prosecute this appeal. The bond of Ed Jagers was reduced to $500 and he executed same on the 14th of September, the same day upon which the motion for a new trial was overruled.

The circumstances and conditions under which peace bonds may be required in this State are regulated by sections 382 to 393, inclusive, of the Criminal Code. Section 382 makes it the duty of the magistrate to issue a warrant for the arrest of the offending person, when an affidavit is filed to the effect that another person has threatened to commit an offense against his person or property, or where the conduct of the accused in the presence of the court is such as to lead him to believe that one person is about to commit an offense against the person or property of another, and in the latter case the court may verbally order the arrest of the person so offending. (Section 383.) Upon being taken into custody, either under oral direction or on warrant, section 384 makes it the duty of the magistrate or court to: "Hear the evidence which may be produced on either side; and if satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for apprehending that the defendant will commit an offense against the person or property of another, or will commit violence endangering human life, or an offense amounting to felony, may require of him surety to keep the peace, or for his good behavior, in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, if human life be endangered, or one thousand dollars in other cases; and in default of giving such surety, may commit the defendant to jail, for a period not exceeding three months, unless he shall, in the meantime, give such surety."

By section 385 it is made the duty of the magistrate, if in his opinion the evidence justifies holding the accused, to take a bond for his good behavior, until the defendant shall appear before the circuit court of the county on the first day of its next term, and the bond so taken shall be returned to the circuit court of the county (386.) Section 387 directs how the trial shall be conducted in the circuit court.

Appellants' principal complaint is that when arrested they were taken before a circuit judge, (the circuit court then being in session) rather than before the magistrate who issued the warrant. Had they been taken before the magistrate he could not have tried the case further than to ascertain whether or not the accused should be held over to the circuit court, and if, in his judgment, they should he would have required bond for their appearance in the circuit court on the first day of its next term for trial. Had he been of the opinion that the charge in the affidavit had not been substantially sustained he would, of course, have discharged them from custody. The circuit court being in session, we are of opinion that no substantial rights of the accused were violated by having them surrendered up to the custody of the circuit court upon being arrested. It was within the power of the circuit court to try the charge against them, and, from the evidence offered by the complainant and such as accused had to offer in their behalf, determine whether or not they should be put under bond to keep the peace.

Appellants do not complain that they were not given ample opportunity to procure their witnesses, and present their defense, but there was no evidence which warranted the judge in holding them. The conclusion which we have reached in the case renders it unnecessary to go into the merits of the case, but in justice to the circuit judge it may be said that, while there is a sharp conflict between the testimony offered by the complainant and that introduced by appellants, still there was evidence which tended to show that appellants were very active in promoting the interest of the union men in the prosecution of their strike, and had, at times, been guilty of acts calculated to precipitate serious difficulties and endanger both life and property; under such circumstances the judge was entirely justified in requiring of them a bond to keep the peace.

The real question in this case is, have appellants any right of appeal?

In the sections of the Code regulating proceedings of this character, no provision is made for an appeal from the finding and judgment of the circuit judge, and, if an appeal lies, the authority therefor must be found in those provisions of the Code regulating appeals in civil or criminal cases. Clearly such a right does not fall within the provisions of the Code regulating appeals in civil cases; the provisions regulating appeals in criminal cases of the class under which this case must fall, to-wit: section 347, is as follows:

"The Court of Appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction in penal actions and prosecutions for misdemeanors, in the following cases only, viz: if the judgment should be for a fine exceeding fifty dollars, or for imprisonment exceeding thirty days; or, if the judgment be for the defendant, in cases in which a fine exceeding fifty dollars, or confinement exceeding thirty days, might have been inflicted."

The order of the circuit judge is not that appellants pay a fine, nor is it for imprisonment, nor fine and imprisonment, but it is simply to the effect that they shall give bond, conditioned for their good behavior in general and toward the complainant witness and his company in particular, during a stated time, named in the order, and not exceeding one year.

This exact question has not heretofore been before us, although in the case of Commonwealth v. Oldham, 31 Ky., 466, it was held that where a party had been arrested on a bench warrant and improperly discharged, the Commonwealth had no right of appeal. And, in the case of State v. Long, 18 Ind., 438, the same doctrine was announced. In the case of State v. Lyon, 93 N. C., 576, it was held that there was no appeal from the action of the officer requiring a party to give security to keep the peace, "for," says the court:

"The nature of the purpose to be subserved suggests and requires that the action of the officer requiring such security of a party must be conclusive and not subject to the right of appeal ordinarily. An appeal, in the absence of any statutory regulation to the contrary, would vacate the order requiring security to keep the peace, and the persons from whom danger is apprehended, might, without such restraint, commit the offense pending the appeal."

And, in the case of State v. Locust, 63 N. C., 574, it was held that generally there was no appeal from the action of the justice of the peace in requiring a bond to keep the peace. There is much good sense and reason for such a rule.

Proceedings of this character are instituted for the purpose of preventing crimes or violations of the law of a serious nature, and, by requiring the one who is threatening to violate the law to give security to the effect that he will behave himself and not do so, the good of society is promoted and the peace and quiet of the neighborhood is, in a measure, assured, so far as the parties complainant and accused are concerned. Nothing is exacted of the one required to give bond further than what the law expects every good citizen to do without being coerced. The Code provisions undertake to deal with the subject in detail, defining the mode of procedure with much particularity, and yet, no provision is made therein for an appeal from the finding of the circuit judge. Whether the law-makers failed to make such a provision because they intended that ultimate power should be rested with the circuit judge, or, whether they regarded any order which he might make as an interlocutory one and not a final order, and therefore, not subject to appeal, we do not know, but certain it is that there is no statutory authority in this State authorizing an appeal. The order of the court is not final, for the judge has control over it during its legal existence, to-wit; the time the bond has to run.

For the reasons given the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, affirming.

This litigation involves the construction of certain clauses in the will of Mrs. Scota Inskeep Chenoweth. Mrs. Chenoweth was a lady of large estate, and in her will there are numerous distinct items disposing of it. The fourth, sixty-first and sixty-second clauses are the only ones particularly involved. They read as follows:

"4. I bequeath and devise all the right, title and interest of which I may die seized in and to my grandfather, Silas Roberts', estate, also all my interest of which I may die seized in and to my uncle, John Roberts', estate and in addition thereto twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars out of the balance of my estate, to my beloved aunts, Miss Di Roberts and Mrs. Louisa L. Lackey, both of Xenia, Ohio, to be equally divided between them share and share alike.

"61. I devise and bequeath the residue of my estate up to ten thousand ($10,000) dollars unto the trustees of the Hill street Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to be used by them in buying additional property adjoining said church building or in erecting a new stone church building in place of the present church, upon this condition, however; provided the congregation of said church, the church extension fund and conference will raise twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars to complete and furnish said new building within two years after my death, and provided said new church, when complete and furnished, can be turned over to the congregation free from debt; otherwise this legacy shall fail and become null and void.

"62. In the event any legatee herein mentioned dies before I die, the legacy devised to such a one shall pass to my residuary estate and all the balance and residue of my estate I devise to all my legatees above named ratably and in proportion their respective legacies bear to the sum total of all said legacies."

In clauses 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59 and 60, she made bequests of money also ranging from one hundred dollars, to seven thousand dollars, to different persons and to various charitable, educational and benevolent institutions.

In clauses 5, 6, 7, 14, 21, 24, 28, 33 and 35, she bequeathed to sundry individuals specified sums of money, and to each of them in addition to the money, articles of jewelry, household furniture, tableware and other personal property.

In clauses 23, 32, 34, 37, 38, 39, 40 and 41, she bequeathed to other persons specified articles of personal property.

After all of the bequests of money, and the various articles of personal property had been given to the respective legatees, there remained of her estate a large sum of money, which passed under the sixty-second clause of her will.

The questions to be considered are whether or not the beneficiaries of this residue are limited to the persons to whom specified sums of money were given; and whether the Hill street Methodist Episcopal Church is entitled to receive any part of the residue upon the ten thousand dollars given to it in clause sixty-one. To put it in a simpler form, Miss Di Roberts and Mrs. Louisa R. Lackey contend that they are entitled to receive a proportionate part of the residue, not only on the $20,000, given to them, but also on the value of the land devised. This, the other legatees deny, and insist that these ladies are only entitled to share in the residue to the extent of $20,000. The Hill Street Methodist Episcopal Church contends that it is entitled to a proportionate part of the residue on the $10,000 given to it; while the other legatees insist that it is not entitled to any part of the residue.

The lower court adjudged that Miss Di Roberts and Mrs. Louisa R. Lackey were entitled to participate in the residue only in proportion to the pecuniary legacy of $20,000 given to them, and that the value of the real estate devised to them was not to be considered in determining their proportion of the residuum; and further, Held—That the trustees of the Hill Street Methodist Episcopal Church were, entitled to participate in the residue in proportion to the amount bequeathed to them in clause sixty-one.

In the briefs of counsel for appellants, it is argued that the legatees to whom specified articles of personal property alone were given are entitled to participate in the distribution of the residue in proportion to the value of the respective articles received by them. But we do not understand from the record that these legatees are complaining of the judgment. The only persons who excepted to the judgment are Miss Di Roberts and Mrs. Louisa R. Lackey; and they are the only appellants as appears from the statement filed with the record. Doubtless counsel for appellants in order to make their argument harmonious, were obliged to insist that the persons to whom articles of personal property had been given were entitled to share in the residue as well as their clients to whom land was devised. Looking at the matter from their standpoint, if any of the persons except those who received specified sums of money are entitled to share in the residue, then there is no good reason for denying the right of the persons who received personal property alone to participate. If the testatrix intended that those who received land should share in the residue; and the will was so construed there would be no escape from the conclusion that the persons who received gifts of personal property were equally entitled to share in it. And so, if it were held that the legatees of personal property were entitled to participate, no sound reason could be assigned for not allowing those to whom land was given to share in proportion to the value of the land. In our opinion, the testatrix did not intend that either the persons to whom she gave land or the persons to whom she gave articles of property, should participate in the residue of her estate. Her purpose was that the residue should be distributed between the persons to whom specified sums of money were given. The testatrix did not fix any value in her will upon the land devised by the fourth clause, or any value upon any of the articles of jewelry or personal property given in other clauses. She directed that the residue of the estate be distributed among the legatees in "the proportion their respective legacies bear to the sum total of all said legacies"—evidently having in mind in using the words "sum total" the amount of the money legacies that she disposed of. It seems clear that she did not intend that her cousin, Miss Ewing, or her cousin, Miss Kaufman, to whom she gave diamond rings, pictures, and other jewelry, should share in the residue of her estate upon the value that appraisers might place upon these articles; and equally plain that she did not contemplate that her cousin to whom she gave as an heir-loom, a flint lock shot gun, or the lady to whom she gave a sewing machine, bed-room set, and carpets, or the gentlemen to whom she gave machinery, tools and harness, should receive any part of this residue. We rather conclude that these articles were given as mementos of her friendship and affection for the persons to whom she left them, and not with any intention that their value, whatever it might be, should be appraised in a business way and made the basis for other gifts to these friends and relatives. If the testatrix intended that Miss Di Roberts and Mrs. Louisa R. Lackey should share in the residue upon the value of the land received by them, or desired that the legatees of personal property should participate in proportion to the value that might be fixed on these articles, it is fair to conclude that she would have used some other language in designating the persons who were to be the beneficiaries of the residue of her estate, and would not have used the words "in proportion their respective legacies bear to the sum total of all said legacies." Judging by human experience, the testatrix did not and could not know the exact value of the estate she would leave at her death; but, desiring to dispose of the whole of her estate, and recognizing that the bequests and legacies might not exhaust it, she provided for the disposition of whatever residue might be left, and directed, in language reasonably clear, that this residue should be distributed between the legatees to whom she had given specific sums of money. This disposition of the residue made the matter of distribution and the share to which each was entitled a simple matter of calculation.

In the construction of this will, as well as all other wills, the intention of the testator or testatrix must control if it can be reasonably gathered from a reading of the entire paper, and in our opinion the conclusion reached by the chancellor effectuates as nearly as may be the intention of Mrs. Chenoweth.

We do not attach great importance to the use in the will of the words "legatee" or "legacies" or "devisee" or "devises." It is apparent that they were interchangeably used and not in any technical sense. To illustrate, in several clauses disposing of money as well as in the clause disposing of land, the words "devise and bequeath" and "give and devise" and "bequeath and devise" are used. The word "devise" properly and technically applies only to real estate; and means a gift of real property by a person's last will and testament. A "devisee" is a person to whom a devise has been made. While a "legacy" is a gift of personal property by a last will and testament, and a "legatee" is a person to whom a legacy is given. "Bequest" is a gift by will of personal property; and "bequeath," means to give personal property by will to another. (Bouvier's Law Dictionary.) In Webster's Dictionary the same definition is given.

In wills and other writings, and indeed often in legal papers, as well as the opinions of courts, and statutory enactments, these words are used indiscriminately, interchangeably and without regard to their strict legal signification. Recognizing the generally careless, inadvertent and interchangeable use of these words, the General Assembly of the State provided in section 467, of the Kentucky Statutes, that "the words 'legatee' and 'devisee' shall each be held to convey the same idea; and the words 'bequeath' and 'devise' to mean the same thing; and the words 'bequest' and 'legacy' shall be held to mean the same thing and to embrace and include either real or personal property or both." Although this statute is more particularly applicable to questions involving the construction of statutes, yet in a will or writing, unless it was plain these words were not intended to mean the same thing, we should say it would be fair to apply in the construction of the document the rule laid down in the statute.

There is more room for difference of opinion about the correctness of the judgment below in holding that the Hill Street Methodist Episcopal Church was entitled to share in the residue of the estate than there is about the exclusion of appellants and the legatees of personal property from participation.

It is argued that in the sixty clauses of her will preceding clause sixty-one, the testatrix had disposed of the principal part of her estate without mentioning any residuum; and that she intended by the language: "I devise and bequeath the residue of my estate up to $10,000 unto the trustees of the Hill Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South," to give to the church this sum out of the residue of her estate left after the payment of the legacies mentioned in the preceding clauses; and that as this $10,000 is spoken of as a part of the residue of her estate, she did not intend that the church should participate in any residue that might be left after it had received, out of the residue, the $10,000 given to it. This argument is plausible and there are some reasonable grounds upon which to rest it; but clause sixty-two, which entirely disposes of any residue of the estate that might be left after paying all the legacies, including the $10,000 given to the church, does not directly or by implication exclude the church from participation in the residue. The language, without any qualification in a separate distinct clause of the will, immediately following the clause making the gift to the Methodist Church, is "all the balance and residue of my estate, I devise to all my legatees above named, ratably and in proportion their respective legacies bear to the sum total of all said legacies." The Methodist Church was one of the legatees above named, and if the testatrix did not intend the church should share in the final residue, it seems singular that she did not exclude it.

We think the fair meaning of the use of the phrase "the residue of my estate up to $10,000," in item sixty-one, is that when the testatrix came to make this gift she did not know definitely what the residue of her estate, if any, would be, after the payment of the sums mentioned in the sixty preceding clauses, or whether or not there would be any residue left; and therefore used this language to indicate her purpose that if the remainder of her estate, after providing for the gifts and devises in the sixty preceding clauses of her will, was not sufficient to pay the $10,000, the church could not require the other legatees to contribute any portion of their legacies to make it equal with them. In other words, if the language had been "I devise and bequeath to the Methodist Church $10,000," thereby placing the church upon the same footing as the other legatees, and in the settlement of the estate there was not sufficient to pay all the legacies in full, each legacy would be reduced so that all of them would receive the same proportionate part. To provide against a contingency of this kind, the words "residue of my estate" were used—the effect of these words being that if, after all the other legatees had received their legacies in full, there had been only $5,000 left, this is all the Methodist Church would have received. We think this construction is more in harmony with the intention of the testatrix, as we gather it from the entire will, than the one insisted upon by appellants.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CORNELISON v. MILLION.

(Filed October 2, 1908—To be reported.)

1. Guardian and Ward—Settlements with County Judge—Statutory Provisions—Failure to Settle—Kentucky Statutes, section 1065, provides that county judges shall "once in each two years require all fiduciaries to settle their accounts," section 1068 requires the county judge "once in each year to carefully inquire into the solvency of all the sureties upon the bond of each fiduciary, &c.," where, upon the failure of such judge to perform this duty the wards estate or any part of it is lost, the ward may recover upon the bond of the judge the amount of the loss so sustained.

2. Action by Ward Against County Judge—Failure to Require Settlements—Negligence of Predecessors—In an action by a ward against his guardian the pleadings show that one Bales, was appointed his guardian in 1887, and made a settlement in 1889 and in 1902, showing a balance of some $400 due his ward. Suit was brought by the ward and judgment obtained upon which execution was issued and returned no property found. The ward then brought this suit against the county judge who held the office from December, 1899, until January, 1902. Held—That a county judge can not excuse a performance of his duty upon the ground that he presumed his predecessors in office did their duty.

Grant E. Lilly for appellant.

W. S. Moberly for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Carroll, reversing.

In 1887, J. W. Bales was appointed by the Madison County Court as guardian of the appellant, and executed a bond with Socrates Maupin as his surety. In February, 1889, Bales made a settlement of his accounts as guardian, which was put to record in the proper office. Again in January, 1902, he made a settlement, showing a balance of some four hundred dollars due his ward. Afterwards, Cornellison brought suit against his guardian on the bond to recover the amount due him on the settlement, and obtained judgment upon which execution issued and was returned no property found. Thereupon Cornellison brought this action against Chenault, Burnam, Sullivan, Turpin and appellee, Million, who were judges of the Madison County Court at different times from 1887 to 1905. The action was dismissed or filed away with leave as to all of the defendants except the appellee, Million.

So that, the only questions before us are whether or not the petition stated a cause of action as against appellee Million, and whether or not his answer presented a defense.

It is in effect alleged that Million was elected county judge and acted as such from December, 1899, until January, 1902. That he did not, during that time, make any inquiry into the solvency of Bales or his surety, and that if he had made reasonable inquiry as to their solvency he would have discovered that they were in failing circumstances and in debt in excess of the reasonable value of their property; and if he had required the guardian to make a settlement or had inquired into the solvency of the surety, the condition of their affairs would have been disclosed and the rights of the ward protected and his estate saved from loss; but by reason of the negligence of Million in failing to inquire into the solvency of the guardian and his surety and in failing to require the guardian to make a settlement, the whole of the amount due the ward has been lost.

In his answer, Million admitted that during the time he was judge he did not make any inquiry into the solvency of the guardian, Bales, or his surety, or require any settlement, and attempts to excuse himself from discharging this duty upon the ground that the only settlement Bales made as guardian, previous to his assuming the office of county judge, in 1899, was made in 1889. That he had no knowledge or information that Cornelison had a guardian or that Bales had ever qualified as his guardian. That when he became county judge, he examined the guardian settlement books in the clerk's office of his court, for the purpose of ascertaining what guardians had made settlements within the two years preceding his induction into office. That not finding any settlement made by Bales, or any record in the settlement book, concerning his guardianship within the two years, he had no notice that Bales was then or had ever been a guardian.

It is admitted in the record that the last settlement, and indeed the only one prior to the time Million became county judge, made by Bales, was in 1889. If Judge Million had examined the records of the county court as far back as 1889, he would have discovered that Bales made a settlement showing a balance of some four hundred dollars in his hands.

The argument of counsel for appellee is that as the statute requires county judges to make settlements with guardians every two years, which are recorded, that each county judge may presume that his predecessors have performed their duties under the statute, and is not required to examine the records further back than two years preceding his induction into office for the purpose of ascertaining what guardians are delinquent. We can not agree in this construction of the statutory duties of a county judge in respect to guardians. Section 1065 provides that the county judge "shall, when called on by a fiduciary, settle his accounts, and shall once in each two years require all fiduciaries to settle their accounts, unless there is an action pending in the circuit court for such settlement." And section 1068, provides that "it shall be the duty of the county judge to at least once in each year, to carefully inquire into the solvency of all the sureties upon the bond of each fiduciary; and if upon such inquiry there is reasonable grounds to believe that any bond is not amply sufficient to protect from all loss to those interested, he shall at once give notice to such fiduciary that a new bond or additional surety on the old one is required, and upon the failure of the fiduciary to give said bond or surety within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court, he shall be removed." These statutes are mandatory. They impose unconditionally upon the county judge certain duties that he must perform. He can not excuse a performance upon the ground that he presumed his predecessors in office did their duty. Each county judge must do his duty as pointed out in the statute without reference to what his predecessor did, or whether he was punctual or careless in discharging the duties of his office. Judge Million was county judge of Madison county for two years. It was his peremptory duty to, at least once in each of those years, carefully inquire into the solvency of the sureties upon the bond of Bales and all other fiduciaries who had executed bond in the county court, and to require settlements to be made in accordance with the statute. If by his failure to perform this duty the ward's estate or any part of it was lost, the ward may recover upon the bond of the county judge the amount of the loss so sustained. It is not material when Bales was appointed or whether he made any settlement within the two years preceding the induction into office of Judge Million. The record showed that he was appointed guardian and in the settlement of 1889 that he had in his hand money due his ward. These two facts made it the duty of Judge Million to comply with the statute. As suggested by counsel, these statutes impose upon the county judge duties that may, unless great care and diligence is exercised, involve them in serious loss. But the law is so written and it has been so construed, and we are not disposed at this day to impair the useful purpose of the statute by getting away from the opinions that seem to us do no more than give them the effect intended by their enactment.

The law applicable to cases of this character is so fully and clearly settled in Cosby v. Commonwealth, 91 Ky., 225; and Commonwealth v. Lee, 27 Ky. Law Rep., 806, that it is unnecessary to further elaborate it in this opinion.

As the case went off on the pleadings, we express no opinion whatever as to the liability of Million. Whether he is liable or not will depend upon the facts developed when the case is prepared for trial.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

POOR v. NEW SOUTH BREWERY & ICE CO.

(Filed October 2, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Lies Only From Final Order—Refusing to Permit Filing of Amended Petition Not Final Order—There was no order dismissing appellant's action. An appeal lies only from a final order. An order refusing the filing of an amended petition is not a final order, and no appeal lies from it.

E. N. Ingram for appellant.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Wm. Rogers Clay, Commissioner, dismissing appeal.

Appellant, H. M. Poor, instituted this action against the New South Brewing & Ice Company to recover damages for personal injury. Summons was served on the New South Brewery & Ice Company. The latter afterwards filed a pleading which it denominated a plea in abatement and in which it set forth that it and the New South Brewing & Ice Company were not the same corporation, and that it is in no wise liable for the acts of the former. Thereafter, appellant tendered and made a motion to have filed an amended petition. In this amended petition appellant set forth the fact that the New South Brewery & Ice Company was the real defendant to the action, and that it was the only corporation in Bell county operating a brewery; that the New South Brewery & Ice Company is the successor to the New South Brewing & Ice Company, and is, in fact, the same company. The trial court at first permitted this amended petition to be filed; afterwards, upon reconsideration, it refused to permit the filing of the amended petition. From this ruling appellant has prayed an appeal to this court.

No order was entered dismissing appellant's action. An appeal lies only from a final order. An order refusing to permit the filing of an amended petition is not final; therefore, no appeal lies from it. It follows, that the appeal herein must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

3. Same—Death of Servant—Orders of Acting Foreman—Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury—In constructing a double track railroad bridge across a river, it was necessary to draw up some logs from below by the use of a derrick, which, when hoisted to the proper height, the foreman gave the stop signal. Where in such case the foreman gave such signal when the log had been raised too high, and one of the hands, whose duty it was to guide it to its proper position, in attempting to do so was struck by the log and thrown from the bridge, killing him, Held—That the deceased was not required to anticipate that the stop signal would be given until the log was lowered to its proper position for his guidance, and the question of his contributory negligence was properly left to the jury. violence to the employes and to destroy the property of a corporation, they may be arrested on a peace warrant, properly sworn out before a magistrate, and where the circuit court is in session the officer making the arrest may deliver the prisoners to the judge of the circuit court for trial on the warrant, who may hear the evidence and determine whether or not they shall be put under bond to keep the peace, and, on their failure to give such bond, may commit them to jail. Lowe v. Commonwealth 1078

2. Failure to Execute Bond—Commitment to Jail—Right of Appeal—There is no statutory authority authorizing an appeal from an order of a circuit judge committing one to jail under a peace warrant, upon his failure to execute the bond fixed by the judge as required by the statute. Idem. 1078

PENAL ACTIONS—

1. Selling Oil Unsafe for Illuminating Purposes—Pleadings—Burden of Proof—In a penal action by the Commonwealth against the Standard Oil Co., under section 2209, Kentucky Statutes, for selling oil that had been condemned as "unsafe for illuminating purposes," the answer admitted that certain oil had been so condemned, but alleged that it had subsequently been mixed with other oil in a large tank that brought the resultant mixture up to the required standard, which answer was denied by a reply. Held—That under the pleadings the burden was on the defendant to show that the resultant mixture was up to the required standard. Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co. 1074
2. Same—Peremptory Instructions—New Trial—Failure to File Motion—Presumption—Upon the conclusion of the evidence for both parties the court directed the jury to find the defendant, appellee, not guilty. No motion or grounds for a new trial was made or entered. Held—As the answer presented a good defense and the evidence is not in the record, the court must presume that the proof offered by defendant in the lower court sustained the defense and that the action of the trial court was proper. Idem. 1074
3. Same—Civil Actions—Practice—It may be regarded as the settled practice that in civil actions, where a verdict is returned in obedience to a peremptory instruction, there must be a motion and grounds for a new trial, if it is desired to have this court consider errors committed during the progress of the trial, or pass upon the correctness of the ruling of the lower court in taking the case from the jury. Idem. 1074

RAILROADS—

1. Indictments—Nuisance—An indictment charging appellee with conveying to its premises and permitting to assemble there in large numbers persons who engaged in dancing, drinking, swearing, and so on, the grounds being on a public highway, and further charging that such acts disturbed the peace, happiness and pleasure of those residing at, on and near the said highway, sufficiently states a public offense, and it was error to sustain a demurrer to it. Commonwealth v. Cin., N. O. & T. P. R. R. Co. 1056
2. Dancing—When Constituting Public Offense—Where dancing and drinking are accompanied by swearing and being drunk, making loud noises and otherwise misbehaving, such acts constitute a public nuisance. Idem. 1056

1. Parties to Action—Taking Deposition of Adverse Party—Refusal to Give—Under Civil Code, section 606, providing that “a party may be examined, as if under cross-examination, at the instance of the adverse party, either orally or by deposition, as any other witness,” a party to an action can not refuse to give his deposition when called on by the adverse party, on the ground that it will enable one party to get the benefit of the testimony of the adverse party, and that if the adverse party, whose deposition is sought, actually appears at the trial and testifies, the party seeking his deposition can not complain because he failed to take it. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Williams.....1062
2. Same—Grounds for Continuance—Prejudicial Error—By section 537, of the Code, the right is given the defendant to begin taking depositions immediately after filing his answer. In such case the failure of the plaintiff to give his deposition, when called on by the defendant after answer filed, was ground for continuance by the defendant, and a failure to grant the continuance was prejudicial error. *Idem.*1062
3. Illness of Mother—Failure to Deliver—Non-arrival of Son—Disappointment of Mother—In an action for damages against a telegraph company for mental anguish in failing to deliver a telegram announcing the illness of a mother, where the plaintiff was a physician, it was error in the court to permit the plaintiff to testify that he had treated his mother frequently before, and that she yielded to such treatment and speedily recovered, and that she was disappointed and depressed when she heard that he had not arrived and that this hastened her death, which would be a recovery for the mother's anguish instead of her son's. *Idem.*1063
4. Mental Anguish—Evidence—Statement of Facts—Harrowing Recitals—In cases of this kind the party suing should be confined to a statement of the mere facts of mental anguish, and should not be permitted to introduce testimony of the nature referred to for the mere purpose of harrowing the feelings of the jury and increasing the size of the verdict. Idem......1063

WILLS—

1. Construction of—Where a will provided for whatever residue might be left after paying specific legacies, by directing that such residue should be distributed among legatees to whom specific sums of money had been given, it was not intended that persons to whom mementoes were given should share in the residue, or that persons to whom land was given should share in it, the purpose of the testator was plainly indicated that only those should share in the residue who were given specified sums of money. *Roberts, &c. v. Chenoweth, &c.*1081
2. Same—Meaning of Words and Phrases—Unless it is plain that certain words mentioned in section 467, Kentucky Statutes, were not intended to mean the same thing, it is fair to apply to the construction of wills, the rule laid down in that statute. Idem......1081
3. Same—The Methodist church, being one of the legatees named in the will, and not being excluded from sharing in any residue of the estate, is placed upon the same footing as the other legatees. Idem......1081

WITNESSES—

1. Impeachment of Witness—Exclusion of Testimony of One
Convicted of Felony—The Code authorizes the impeachment of a witness' testimony by showing that he has been convicted of a felony, and appellant's rights were not prejudiced by the exclusion of the testimony of his witness that he had been pardoned. The pardon being the best evidence, oral testimony of its existence was properly excluded. Parson v. Commonwealth.....1051
2. Commonwealth's Attorney—Improper Statements by—Action of Court in Excluding—When the court directs the jury not to consider improper remarks of the Commonwealth's Attorney in argument, justice to the defendant requires nothing further in order to secure an impartial verdict. Idem.1051
